torial is its insolence and patronizing tone. One would think that Infidels were some rare species of the race, set apart and rather "leprous," and therefore dangerous to visit, but who might be subdued by kindness, like a beast, when kicks and blows failed. Such writing is unworthy of even the Independent, mercenary as it is in its character. It may please the rabble of churchmen, but it must disgust the person of intelligence who reads also the leading periodicals of the day, in which the brightest writers are the Infidels, and who mingles with the activ world, wherein the most brilliant inventors and sturdiest business men are Freethinkers.

No Infidel in the world denies that there are honest preachers—honestly deluded; it is the religion that is false. And to imply that it is only necessary for a minister to really believe what he preaches to make that religion appear true to Infidels is to write for fools to read. We do not believe that the Independent's estimate of its subscribers' mental capacity is accurate.

Where is this Infidel family which the minister buncoed so easily?

The Chicago Fair.

Some person in the employ of the Sabbatarian fanatics has sent the Pious One's newspaper some figures pretending to show the number of people who hav petitioned for the closing of the World's Fair on Sundays. The total is given as something over twenty-five millions. As usual, the number is made up by counting the religious folks four or five times. For instance, it is claimed that from Pennsylvania fifteen millions hav so petitioned. This result is obtained because societies alleged to represent that number of citizens hav met within the borders of the state and adopted closing resolutions. In this way the fanatics hav counted all the members of a sect whether they liv in Pennsylvania or not, and then gone into some other state and counted them again. As a matter of cold fact, the actual number of signatures obtained is but a little over three hundred thousand.

This actual result of the canvass the churches hav made for names cannot be very encouraging. Stupendous efforts hav been made and the machinery of the church has been used freely. It ought not, under the circumstances, with almost every evangelical preacher as an agent, to hav been difficult to hav obtained millions of signatures, were the people on that side. As it is, the meager showing proves what we hav all along said, that though the synods and presbyteries and assemblies and conferences may vote to close, the people themselvs are not of that way of thinking. The official utterances do not represent the constituencies, and such figuring as the Sabbath Union is doing is to the last degree dishonest. And furthermore, the Sabbath Union knows it.

On the other hand, mainly through the efforts of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Liberals hav sent in seventy-eight thousand names. Considering the opportunities of both sides, this number is most significant. It shows the public sentiment, when a few organized workers can cope so well with the trained army of the church. It will not surprise us if in the campaign for the coming Congress we beat the church folks out of sight.

We do not believe that the Fair is yet closed. The Chicago people, managers of the Fair included, are stiffly determined to hav it open. One of them, a Mr. Lafflin, represented as a prominent and wealthy citizen, talked to a World reporter thus, while in this city lately: "Congress or no Congress, we will open the World's Fair on Sunday. Government or no government, we will keep the World's Fair open on Sunday. They hav made restrictions, it is true. The restrictions didn't exist when we captured the Fair, and so they will not hold in the courts."

The action of the Sabbatarians has aroused much activ opposition not only to their particular hobby but extending to religion itself. One of the latest writers on this subject has this severe criticism of the pretensions of the church: "We are taught that Christianity has civilized the world. If Christianity has civilized the world, of course it has employed Christian laws and doctrins, for if it has followed other than Christian teachings, we must look to other sources for our civilization. Now, if our civilization is not based on a foundation of Christian doctrins it cannot be said that Christianity has built our civilization any more than a religion without a foundation of Christian doctrins could be called Christianity. To the extent that Christian doctrins hav been dropped from that faith's foundation that faith is not Christian. To the extent that Christian doctrins are not recognized in our civilization we are in advance of Christianity.

"If Christianity has civilized the world, perhaps some good Christian scholar can account for the disgraceful history of the faith. Perhaps some one will tell us the meaning of Christian power in the dark ages, when the dungeon and the torture-chamber were the altars of Christ. Perhaps some Christian will dare to drown the groans of a tortured unbeliever with that weak and miserable falsehood: 'Christianity has civilized the world.'"

If the Sabbatarians finally are defeated on this question of Sunday opening they will find that they hav lost more than a day; and if they win they will be remembered with ire by a good many millions of people. It is a losing battle for them whichever way it goes.

Another World's Fair Petition.

The new phase which the question of opening or closing the World's Fair on Sunday has assumed necessitates action tending to influence another body of authorities. Until the Sabbatarians found their hypocritical Congressional allies the matter was in the hands of the World's Columbian Commission and the local authorities. The vote of Congress tacking a Sunday-closing clause to the appropriation bill now makes it imperativ to get down on our knees to our rulers who hav so misrepresented the people by their action.

On the last page of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be found a petition suited to the emergency. We beseech every reader of this paper to cut it out, attach it to a sheet of paper, and procure signatures. When filled, send them to the address given. Mr. Putnam will see that they are properly presented to Congress, backed by the earnest words of our ablest orators.

Do not delay, and do not let the cause lag. The next few months will tell the story, and during that period no Freethinker should be inactiv. In addition to the petition personal letters to Senators and representativs will do a great deal of good.

An Old Notoriety-Seeker.

A convention of Women Suffragists, which appears to hav conducted its proceedings with unusual privacy at Washington, D. C., September 21st, has furnished to the press a report, authenticated by the signatures of Anna M. Parker, president, and Elizabeth Powers, secretary, representing that fifty delegates from twenty-eight states, under the call of April 26th by the Victoria League, hav nominated for president of the United States Mrs. Victoria Woodhull-Martin, of New York and London, and for vice-president Mrs. Mary L. Stowe, of California.

The Washington Post prints the stunning report, ending with the following resolution:

"Resolved, That by the united efforts of the women voters of this nation we will drive Anarchy, crime, insanity, and drunkenness from our midst by our humanitarian efforts, backed by the ballot."

Why is free love omitted in the resolution? Woodhull (sic) and Claflin's Journal, in 1881, denounced Pantarchic Free Love as "the most immeasurable infamy that ever formed a plague-spot in the temple of humanity." And in a recent republication of Theodore Tilton's Biography of Mrs. Woodhull, entitled, "Victoria C. Woodhull's Life Sketches," one of the amendments is the substitution of "finance and a new version of the Bible" for "free love and the pantarchy." The latter phrase is as Mr. Tilton wrote it in 1871; the amendment is credited to the Toronto Mail, twenty-one years ago, in the new and expurgated edition, which was evidently prepared by Mrs. Woodhull-Martin herself as a preliminary campaign document, issued from this city in April last.

In these later years Mrs. Woodhull is as great a notoriety-seeker through misrepresentations of S. P. Andrews as she was in former years through borrowing some of his ideas to startle the world with. Which shows that she is the same humbug still.

A Plague from Providence.

The following is from the Natal, South Africa, Mercury, and is a condensed report of a discussion in the Transvaal Volksraads over the proposition of the Cape government that all South African states should take measures to destroy the eggs of the locusts, to prevent the spread of the plague:

"Mr. Wolmarans said locusts were a plague, and it was the work of the almighty. He considered it useless to fight against them.

"The chairman said no harm would be done if the different governments corresponded about this matter.

"Mr. Roos said that he did not think it right to fight against the plague sent by the supreme power. He should not feel justified to instruct government to take any measure to destroy locusts.

"Mr. Leclerq spoke in the same strain.

"Mr. De Beer said he only considered it right for every man to protect his property.

"Mr. Lucas Myer took a practical view of the matter. Everyone knew that years ago the country was infested with wolves, jackals, and other wild animals; thousands of these animals had been killed, with the result that the country was now comparativly free from them. Why should locusts not be destroyed? They do just as much harm as the animals referred to, and perhaps more.

"Mr. Labuschagne said that men had no right to destroy locusts. The Bible taught them that it was a visitation for punishment from the almighty in olden times; and men had no right to fight against them.

"The chairman closed the discussion, and asked for proposals.

"The following was brought forward by Messrs. Wolmarans and Roos: 'To authorize the executiv to correspond with the different governments in South Africa, but to fix two or three days all over the country to devote to prayers, humbly asking the almighty not to bring this visitation over them for some time to come. To send a copy of this to the different states in South Africa, asking them to join in their prayers.'

"Messrs. Van der Merwe and Beukes were not willing to grant the request of the executiv, as this plague of locusts came to them from supreme power."

It appears that at least some of the Boers of South Africa are boors indeed!

News and Notes.

L. K. Washburn broke the ground for Freethought at Ellenville, N. Y., and thro ugh his introduction I had the pleasure of continuing the work in this pleasant mountain region. I could not, however, see all the glory of it, for although I went a day in advance the rains and the mists descended and the vast and picturesque sceneries could not be witnessed. I could only behold dark outlines of the huge hills and imagin what might be in the sunny weather, when skies are blue. Ellenville is a place where city people throng in the summer. It is quite orthodox; has seven churches to about four thousand inhabitants, but there is a pretty good undercurrent of Liberalism, and it flashes forth occasionally. Ellenville is a healthful place. It is not at all up in the line of making angels. Some of the people here liv to be over one hundred years old. The father of my Freethought comrade, Isaac A. Coon, the first one to meet me at the station, died at the age of one hundred and nine years. Along with Mr. Coon to greet me on my arrival was John T. De Witt, through whom the arrangements were made for my lecture. Washburn, from the tone of De Witt's correspondence, expected to meet a very energetic young man, but to his surprise he found a very energetic old man, and wonderfully energetic indeed for his years. He is eighty years of age; but has the vivacity and hope of youth. He is a Freethinker, and has been for over three-quarters of a century. That is a fine record. He is still ardently progressiv. By his efforts, in spite of the stormy weather, the lecture on "Modern Thought in the Churches" was a success. A good audience was present, and an appreciativ one. I hope to strike this place next time in bright summer weather, and I am sure of a large audience with the aid of the sturdy Liberal element that is here. John H. Divine introduced me, and a good divine he is, by regular apostolic succession, I guess. He is seventy-eight years old, next in line with De Witt for the century goal. He is quite in demand as a speaker in this section, both on politics and religion. As he is a farmer he also givs popular discourses at the county fair. Up in his region—Sullivan county—they wanted to build a Methodist church, and he generously contributed to its erection, but after it was built the dominies failed to get an audience, and therefore friend Divine was summoned to the help of the Lord. It was announced that he would preach, and preach he did, a good Secular sermon, and the building was crowded to its utmost capacity. It is seldom that a Freethinker is obliged to do double duty. Oftentimes he is called upon to pay money for the support of churches, but not often called upon to preach in order to keep the church alive. But John H. Divine did this in his Liberal way. He was willing even to preach, but he did not giv any theology with his preaching. It was probably one of the best sermons that a Christian pulpit ever gave forth. Dr. M. C. Derby, J. H. Westfall, M. Deponai, and others are among the Liberals of Ellenville who are willing to stand up and be counted. They are all prominent citizens of the place, and hav for years—some of them over half a century—been identified with the interests and progress of Ellenville. By organized effort Freethought can stand at the front.

In its record of events the New York Times says:

THE GOOD COLONEL SHEPARD REJOICES.

A meeting under the direction of the American Sabbath Union was held last night in the Calvary Baptist church, Fifty-seventh street and Sixth avenue, to ratify the action of Congress in closing the gates of the Chicago Fair on Sundays. About two hundred and fifty persons were present. Col. Elliott F. Shepard presided.

The program included hymns, reading of the scriptures, prayer, and addresses by Colonel Shepard, the Rev. Dr. R. S. MacArthur, the Rev. F. C. Iglehart, and others. The work of the Sabbath Union in sending out petitions asking that the Fair be closed on Sundays was commended by the speakers. Dr. Charles L. Thompson said the American Sabbath came over with the Mayflower, and it looked to him now as if it had come to stay.

"But I beg you to remember," added the speaker, "that the lock has not yet been turned on the gates, nor the key thrown away. I hav been in the West and know what vast efforts are being made to secure a reversal of the decree closing the Fair on Sundays. We must unite and continue to work in order to prevent the success of their unrighteous plans."

After all their efforts it seems that those who are in favor of closing the Fair on Sundays could only gather two hundred and fifty in New York city. It is to this pitiable minority that Congress has succumbed. According to the confession of the Mail and Express, the chief organ of bigoted idiotcy, there are only three hundred and fifteen thousand individual signatures to the petition in favor of closing the Fair on Sundays. These three hundred and fifteen thousand are really all who are in favor of closing; only so many church-members hav taken the trouble to publicly put themselvs on record. As a matter of fact Congress has been bulldozed by this small minority of Christians. I hav no doubt the vast majority of Christians are in favor of Sunday opening if only they had the courage to say so. Of course Colonel Shepard has the sublime effrontery out of these 315,000 individual signatures to figure 25,000,000 in favor of closing. How does he get this number? Simply by the resolutions of organized bodies. This is an absolutely false method. It wouldn't do to elect a president in that way. If so, even Colonel Shepard might hav a chance, for 100,000 votes might be made so many millions. The only way to find one's real sentiment is by his individual vote. The voice merely of an organization is simply worthless in a matter of this kind, as it would be worthless in the election of a president. Colonel Shepard credits 15,000,000 to Pennsylvania, 4,000,000 to Ohio, 4,000,000 to Michigan—more than twice the inhabitants that these states contain. What kind of a republic should we hav if Christians had charge of the ballot-box? A more preposterous system of getting at the voice of the people was never exploited than this of Colonel Shepard. No despotism in the world would be like it, if once established. Is it by such lying and hypocrisy that the World's Fair is to be closed on Sunday—315,000 individual signatures swelled into 25,000,000 by a mere stroke of the pen? What an autocrat Colonel Shepard would make.

In talking with one of the leading lawyers of Ellenville, N. Y., he told me that in an interview with two New York Congressmen who voted for the Sunday closing, these representativs of the people declared that they were not at all in favor of closing on Christian ground, for they were not Christians themselvs, but voted for it on grounds of "morality." No wonder that these Congressmen made themselvs the laughing-stock of their own constituency. I can see some reason why a Christian might vote for Sunday closing on religious grounds, but for a non-Christian to vote for it on "moral" grounds is absolutely astounding. The force of idiotcy could no farther go. Think of it, the great World's Fair, the grandest exposition of industry, art, human history, human progress of this century, this to be closed to millions of working people, to every poor man, woman, and child in the land, on "moral" grounds. It makes one sick to think that our Congressmen are such fools. There was never a greater exhibition of bigotry, hypocrisy, lying, self-abasement, stultification, folly, and brutal blindness than in this vote of Congress. It makes one hang his head in shame for his country's sake, that its legislators are such relics of barbarism.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Freethought Federation of America.

Since my last letter was sent to press I hav been favored with letters from valued and trusted friends of our cause, congratulating us upon the great success that has crowned our efforts to organize a Freethought political party in the United States. All these letters agree with us in the necessity for a definit national agitation, which shall throw the churches upon their defense, and by giving a greater publicity to our principles and our objects, increase the number of our adherents.

The religious press already recognizes the power to which the Federation may aspire, and even attain, in our efforts. They are now on the alert. Every movement of ours is watched with increasing interest. The enemy with which we hav to deal is alive, powerful, and rich; their forces are well organized and ours scattered, yet, if we can but obtain a plentiful supply of the munitions of war, we will carry on the campaign with increasing vigor against priestly power, bigotry, and intolerance. We must meet them on their own grounds. As Mohammed said, "If the mountain will not come to us, we will go to the mountain," and if the priestly party will not meet us upon equal terms on the platform, if they still insist upon using corrupt and dishonest methods to reach their selfish ends, then we must carry on the war into their own camp, and force the conflict.

The principles that pervade this Federation and which spur us on in the work are, first, to secure a state of society wherein every man and woman shall stand equal before the law; we ask no special favors, we simply demand that justice shall be done to all, justice to ourselvs and others. And secondly, it is the desire for further conquests and extended freedom to the Freethought party that fills us with courage, and inspires us with the hope of ultimate success. It is impossible for us to remain silent and inactiv when we witness the stealthy march of superstition.

Defenders of the faith hav usurped the throne of truth, and golden crowns sit lightly upon the brows of those whose feet are hard pressing upon the prostrate form of humanity. The blessing of the gods rests upon them, until the curse of man redeems the evils that the gods hav done, till violence expends itself, dishonesty is dethroned, and overthrows that upon which it rests. Among the letters received are some that are very encouraging, and manifest the extreme delight with which the inauguration of the Federation was hailed.

John C. Sprong, of Chicago, writes a pleasing letter, inclosing a list of thirteen names for membership. If every Freethinker would but do likewise, we should soon be established as a powerful factor in American political life, so powerful, indeed, that the church itself would quake and tremble upon its very foundations.

The following is also a fac-simile of many that I hav received:

NEW YORK CITY, Sept. 16, 1892.

MR. J. R. CHARLESWORTH, Dear Sir: Having read in THE TRUTH SEEKER fully the accounts of call, address, and constitution of the Freethought Federation of America, I desire to be enrolled as a member. I will send a donation to the treasurer in a few days.

E. J. KIMBALL.

Jos. Schaffer, of Philadelphia, writes as follows:

MR. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Dear Liberal Sir: I beg leave to pass in my name to be placed on the roll of the Freethought Federation of America. It is hardly necessary here to express my dearest hopes for the ultimate success of this organization, for if the Liberals generally would but wake up to a realization of the dangers with which we are threatened, there might be twenty-five thousand names enrolled here in our city. I partake a great deal of Mr. S. P. Putnam's enthusiasm in this matter, and cannot see how it would be so difficult to raise the one hundred thousand members which he speaks about. I think that this recent act of Congress is sufficient to put every liberty-loving American citizen on their guard. Our Congressmen are American Esaus, only some degrees worse. Esau sold his birthright, but Congress sold their own birthright and bartered away that of every American citizen. Men who would so violate their trust in defiance of the Constitution of the United States, are traitorous scoundrels, and the sooner we can find some means of removing such cowardly incumbents the better. Allow me the honor to be enrolled. I will enlist for the full term of my natural life.

Yours very truly, JOS. SCHAFFER.

Philadelphia, Pa.

P.S.—Will render all assistance, financially, that I can.

J. S.

It is such words of encouragement as the above that show us distinctly that we hav struck the right vein, and we intend to follow. Our motto is, "Onward, still onward, and ever onward." We will follow the vein to its end, until the foundations are securely built for the righteous evolution of society. With truth on our side we hav nothing to fear, but everything to hope for, to liv for, and to work for. Truth fears not the most searching inquiry and craves not for reverence or credit. Its impassiv soul heeds not the scorn of fools nor the perversion of knaves; neither does it take into consideration the terrors of priestly dupes. Before this letter reaches our readers I shall hav addressed an official letter to the presidential candidates of the Democratic, Republican, and People's parties to ascertain the position they occupy upon the principles and objects of our Federation. I would therefore advise every Freethinker who may desire to use the ballot-box in the direction most advantageous to Freethought not to promis his support to any political party until such time as I shall receive the answers to my inquiries. Remember, Freethinkers, the suffrage is the best weapon we possess against the enemies of truth, and it is the one we must use. Those politicians who hav trampled upon our rights, those politicians who for the sake of favors and gain hav sold the liberties of the American people, who hav ignored the Constitutional rights and privileges of our fellow-citizens, must be taught a lasting lesson at the polling stations.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH,
Sec. Freethought Federation of America.

Science and Its Usefulness.

From Meehan's Monthly.

People often ask what is the use of the abstract studies scientific men and women often indulge in. The reply is you must first discover a new truth before you can tell whether you can make any value of it. The valuable discovery that the black rot can be prevented from injuring grapes by inclosing the bunch in a paper bag is the direct result of scientific studies. When it was found that the rot was caused by a fungus growing from a little seed or spore which, floating through the atmosphere, attaches itself to the grape berry, it was the easiest thing to think of putting bags over the bunch early in the season so that the spore couldn't get there. Hundreds of thousands of dollars hav been saved to the cultivator by this bagging of grapes which would hav been totally lost but for the labors of scientific men.

Infidels and Charity.

AN OPEN LETTER TO A MINISTER.

Rev. J. L. Sooy, D.D., Rev. Sir: It was my fortune on Sunday evening, July 10th, to listen to part of your sermon delivered at the Union meeting of the Des Moines churches at the Central Christian church. As to the manner of your discourse, I do not hesitate to say that it was both able and eloquent, as well as a complete statement of your side of the case. But on the other hand, ministers, when they have occasion to refer to Freethought and Freethinkers, make no pretension to fairness or justice, and your address partook of its full share of this well-known clerical quality. You made wholly uncalled-for and inaccurate assertions of Freethinkers, both living and dead. You placed them in false positions; you made unfair demands of them; you accused them of not doing what, from their circumstances and surroundings, they could not possibly have done. You misconstrued certain facts, which gave a false color to the point at issue, and unless your audience were acquainted with the other side of the question they would go away holding erroneous ideas. I question no man's motives, and impugn no one's sincerity, but upon a consideration of your utterances upon the relation of unbelievers to charity, I decided to address you a few lines in criticism thereof.

When entering upon the conclusion of your discourse, you said, substantially, this: "Let us now consider the world of philanthropy: who built our charitable institutions? Did Infidels? No: Christians have built them. Did a Tom Paine establish an insane asylum? No: he was too selfish. Did Voltaire ever give any aid toward establishing a hospital? No: he was too mean. Did a Hume or a Gibbon ever do anything of the kind? No: they were too cold."

Your error, reverend sir, consists in your assuming that institutions of charity are the outgrowth of Christianity, an error into which the clergy are prone to fall. You should remember that the desire to relieve human suffering springs from that faculty in man which makes it odious for him to witness his fellow-man in trouble when it is in his power to render him aid. This sympathy of man for man exists in the breasts of all civilized beings. Charitable institutions sprang from the action of this noble sentiment, and they have existed in all countries, Christian and pagan. They did not have their origin with Christianity, but existed prior to it, by many centuries. Three hundred years before the time of Christ, Asoka, a Buddhistic monarch, ordered hospitals to be established in every town. Max Müller says: "Contrast the modern English beggar and the ancient Buddhist. Now we punish the beggar by law, then the man who did not give was considered impious, and a heretic, and the beggar was regularly protected and honored. . . . Buddhism and charity are synonymous. The brother lived upon the charity of lay supporters. Charity is the very soul of Buddhism." Lecky says in his "History of European Morals," Vol. II, "No lunatic asylums existed in Christian Europe till the fifteenth century. The Mohammedans in this form of charity preceded the Christians." R. Basworth Smith in his "Mohammed and the Mohammedans" gives evidence against your claim as follows: "No Christian need be sorry to learn, or backward to acknowledge, that, contrary to what is usually supposed, two of these noble institutions [hospitals and asylums] owe their origin and early spread, not to his own religion, but to the great heart of humanity which beats in two other of the greatest religions in the world." In the Roman empire every city was possessed of an independent revenue with which to purchase food for the poor (see Gibbon, Vol. I, page 140).

Christianity for fourteen hundred years did not build asylums for its feeble-minded, but regarded the unfortunates as being possessed of an evil spirit. Instead of treating them after the kind and humane manner of the Greeks and Mohammedans, religious fanaticism joined with ignorance of the true cause of insanity, and the demented creatures were tortured, imprisoned, and burnt. The ablest men in the church were believers in this doctrine. (See Andrew D. White in the Popular Science Monthly for February, 1879.) Yet in the face of these facts, the clergy of to-day have the audacity to stand in their pulpits and declare that insane asylums are the outgrowth of Christian civilization! These facts are easily attainable, and it is a matter of surprise to me that you have never heard of them.

However, your mistake did not end here. You will certainly admit that if institutions of charity have then been established by the devotees of all religions, Christians who have established similar ones are entitled to no especial credit for so doing. Neither could their religion be called the cause for an action which it is the nature of all to perform. But you made a vigorous onslaught upon Infidels for not erecting and supporting such institutions, while you unnecessarily lauded Christians. First you should ask yourself the question, How many institutions of charity did the church establish in the early and even the later days of its existence? We have already seen that it did not build an insane asylum for a thousand years after it had all the power and wealth of Europe placed at its command. According to the Rev. Dr. Gregory, the Christians did not even build churches until the third century, after they were taken under the protection of Constantine ("History of the Church," Vol. I, p. 108). Before this they held their meetings in private houses (see Mosheim, Cent. I, Sec. 37). You should ask yourself the further question, What has been the history of the condition of Freethought? Has it had the same advantages accorded to it that Christianity has? Did it have, or has it, governmental support? Have Freethinkers always been even permitted to express their convictions without being subject to persecution or ostracism? Honesty will compel you to answer in the negative. Infidelity has ever been the bugbear of the church. Its advocates have been considered greater criminals than murderers or thieves. They have been persecuted, fined, imprisoned, and had their civil rights denied them on account of their belief. Within the last few years these weapons have been wrested from the hands of the clergy, and to-day they have substituted slander of their opponent. They try to injure his business and social position. Many unbelievers who live in orthodox communities are compelled for the sake of a living to keep closed mouths, for the venom-tongued orthodox slanderer is ever ready to smirch the good name of, and injure in any possible way, a person known to be an Infidel. Considering these facts, do you not candidly believe that they have not as an organization been in a position to found institutions of charity, or to build colleges or halls? In England to-day a bequest for the purpose of propagating Freethought is illegal and cannot stand. Many wills appropriating money for this purpose have been set aside. There an Infidel organization cannot hold property in its own name. In this country, if money is left for that purpose, Christians will plot to steal possession of the money, and divert it from the object intended. Take the case of Girard College and Lick Observatory for instance. Stephen Girard, an Infidel, left a large fortune to found a school for orphans, with the proviso that no religion should be taught in the institution, and that no minister should enter it. The old philanthropist well knew the insinuating and grasping nature of the clergy—that if permitted to exercise any influence over it whatever, they would soon control it in the interest of the church. We know that he was correct. Religion is to-day taught in Girard College in violation of the will of its founder and the decision of the supreme court sustaining it.

In regard to Lick Observatory, founded by the same man whose generosity caused Paine Hall in Boston to be built, the case is identical. Christian trustees now control this in the interests of Christianity, and once when some Freethinkers applied for the use of its hall for a lecture, they were refused. These two instances reflect the moral principle of those who make their living preaching Christianity, and prove the well-known fact that the church will disobey, evade, and oppose any law, however just, if it conflicts with its interests.

But since, reverend sir, you seem to be unaware of the fact that some of the world's greatest philanthropists have been unbelievers in your religion, it gives me great pleasure to give you a few names and circumstances which I hope will so enlighten you that you will not fall into similar error again. Freethought, with all odds against it, can show a record in philanthropy of which it may well be proud:

Robert Owen was an Infidel, yet his whole life was devoted to charitable work. When his mills were stopped in 1806, on account of President Jefferson's "Embargo Act" cutting off commerce between this country and England, this liberal and unselfish man paid out £70,000 to his men rather than see them suffer for want of work. Stephen Girard, besides the $6,000,000 he left for the establishment of a college, gave during his lifetime and at his death the following: $30,000 to the Pennsylvania Hospital; $20,000 to the Deaf and Dumb Asylum; $10,000 to the Orphan Asylum; $10,000 to the Lancaster schools; $10,000 to provide the poor of Philadelphia with free fuel; $10,000 to aid distressed sea captains; $20,000 to the Pennsylvania Masonic lodge for the relief of poor members; $500,000 to the city of Philadelphia for city improvements; $300,000 to the state of Pennsylvania for her canals. When the government was impoverished, in 1814, and needed money to carry on the war, Girard immediately furnished it with $5,000,000. In 1793 and 1797, when Philadelphia was afflicted with the yellow fever scourge, but twelve persons in the entire city could be induced to nurse the sick and bury the dead, as it meant almost certain death to anyone who would undertake it. Stephen Girard was one of these. He gathered up the sick and the dying from all parts of the city, superintended the hospital, and in many cases helped bury the dead. Yet this man, who left his great mercantile business for months to perform these acts of mercy, was an Infidel. His favorite author was the man whom you so affectionately hate, Voltaire, and his ships were named after the most celebrated French Infidels. James Smithson, founder of the Smithsonian Institute, was an unbeliever in evangelical Christianity, as was also Peter Cooper, founder of the Cooper Institute, New York. John Redmon, another Infidel, gave $400,000 to support free beds in the hospitals of Boston, Peter Brigham $3,000,000 to establish hospitals in the same city. James Lick gave over a million dollars for scientific and benevolent purposes. A. T. Lilly, an avowed Infidel to your religion, built, at a cost of $30,000, a school at Northampton, Mass., wherein to teach women science without superstition, besides many other donations for educational purposes. He also established in Florence, Mass., a free public library costing $13,000. A Mr. Wade, of Cleveland, O., at his death, two years ago, left thousands of dollars to local charitable institutions, and also a fund to be used to propagate Freethought. I well remember a glowing eulogy of Mr. Wade in the Lutheran Observer in which his generosity was highly spoken of, but the fact that he was an Infidel concealed. I beg leave to inform you that the Freethinkers of Belgium have an orphan asylum in which children of their belief are reared up, and that the National Secular Society of England for over thirty years has had a special benevolent fund out of which aid is given to Freethinkers who cannot help themselves. All unbelievers help support institutions already in existence and give according to their means to new ones. I have only given you remarkable instances. I might give you many more did space permit. You can see, though, reverend sir, that your attack upon Infidels for not caring for their fellow-men in distress is wholly unjustifiable, and is simply a ministerial claptrap argument. Will you be candid enough to admit it? I would remind you that Voltaire's acts of charity won for him the praise of a Christian like Lord Brougham. Hume and Gibbon lived and died poor men, and you exhibited a very narrow spirit in referring to them as you did. But a short time ago Colonel Ingersoll gave a lecture the proceeds of which were given to a family in destitute circumstances. He charged nothing for the lecture and paid for several tickets himself. Did ever your Talmage, Sam Jones, or Joseph Cook do anything of the kind? If they have, information of the fact has failed to reach your humble servant.

As a matter of course, you had to indulge in the clerical stock-in-trade slanders against Thomas Paine. You say he was selfish. The man who spent his whole life working for human liberty, and gave his whole year's salary to start a subscription for buying clothes for the American army, was selfish, was he? Are Methodist preachers affected with this kind of selfishness? If you know of one who ever lived in poverty and gave his year's salary toward any object unless for his own benefit, you will inform the world of the greatest theological curio in existence. I suppose Thomas Paine was selfish when he donated the copyright of "Common Sense" to the country, merely for the good it would do, when he might have made a handsome fortune by its profits. He was certainly a grasping, penurious man when he refused to copyright the Crisis, after being offered £1,000 to do so. He surely cared only for his own life and interests when he defended the right of the king to be spared from the guillotine, when in consequence only a mistake of the jailer saved himself from a similar fate. Thomas Paine was one of the most purely unselfish men that ever lived, and I can only account for your statement by supposing that you are wholly unacquainted with the history of his life. If you will read his biography by Moncure D. Conway, just published, you will find him proved to be a much greater man than his most ardent admirers hitherto claimed him to have been. What a contrast in the spirit of Thomas Paine and a former Des Moines minister, who would only debate with a prominent Freethought lecturer for a guarantee of $500 for six nights, paid in advance. Compare his position upon the subject of American independence with that of the founder of your church! Paine, the fearless, uncompromising advocate of independence; Wesley, the Tory, speaking against the Americans, writing against them, and hobnobbing with Dr. Samuel Johnson and other bitter foes of the colonies! (See "Life and Times of John Wesley," by Rev. L. Tyerman, Vol. III, pages 185–195. London edition.) Another thing, reverend sir. If I were to stand upon a platform and refer to the author of Methodism as "Jack" Wesley, you would, to say the least, think me rude, vulgar, and without the instincts of a gentleman. If you continue to speak of the author-hero of the Revolu'ion as "Tom" Paine, you must not be surprised if some time in your life you find people who hold the same opinion of yourself as you would of them under similar circumstances. In the interests of truth, and of justice to all, whether Christian or Infidel, I am, Respectfully yours,

Des Moines, Ia. FRANKLIN STEINER.

The Essence of Government Sovereignty.

I really do not know what is meant by Anarchy. If it means living in society without any government I cannot understand how that is practicable. If I had not lived in regions unsettled and seen the very foundations of empire laid—seen a small community without law taking up homes on public lands for years undisturbed by outsiders, and witnessed its growth from perfect liberty, equality, etc., up to conditions that now prevail at New York, I, too, might believe in Anarchy (if that is Anarchy). We had to organize and get up some kind of rule to prevent robbery and oppression. It was forced on us, and right here where I liv the Missouri river often throws thousands of acres open to occupancy, no owners, and the people near by begin to fight about possession and kill each other. Humanity must grow into something very different from what it is before people can liv without law and rulers. For suppose ninety-nine hundredths of us capable of living in Anarchy, the one man by his ruffian conduct forces us to either do violence to him or appeal to some ruler. I know how happy people liv when all are poor and industrious, and hav equal chances. I saw that, and then I saw the same community in ten years divided off into millionaires and wealthy and miserable poor. I know the millionaires become so by monopolizing opportunities, such as lands, streets, cars, ferry, telegraphs, railroads, etc. Where I liv the best of wood is delivered on cars at $1.50 per cord, and carried to Omaha, one hundred miles north, and sold at $15 to $18. Yet none but the persons "in the ring" can get a cord delivered. This is done without law, and worse would be done if there were no laws. Law rule is bad enough, as it is. "The love of money is the root of all evil."

The above letter from a friend and contributor to THE TRUTH SEEKER being typical of many received, I hav thought many readers would be interested in its discussion. I do not intend to discuss what Anarchy is. The sweetness of a rose or sharpness of its thorn depends not on its name. Still, as my correspondent had read an article of mine wherein I had acknowledged the name as representing my line of thought, I will say that to me Anarchy means just what its etymology indicates: An, without; archy, chief, ruler, governor—a state without an established government. But the real difficulty lies in defining the definition. What is government? Most of our Liberal writers contend that if you corner the Anarchist you will find that he really believes in government after all; hence the value of a true definition. Chambers's Encyclopedia says: "It is the essence of every government that it shall represent the supreme power or sovereignty of the state, and thus it shall be capable of subjecting every other will in the community, whether it be that of an individual or a body of individuals, to its own. In the power which government possesses of controling every other will is implied the power of protecting every separate will from being needlessly or wrongfully controled by any other will or number of wills, the will of the government always excepted. With a view to the exercise of this latter power, government possesses a right which, politically, is also unlimited—the right, namely, of inquiry into the relations between citizen and citizen." This is a good definition of what government is, was, and ever must be, an irresponsible, supreme power. As the above authority says, "It is implied in the idea of government that it shall be politically responsible to no human power." This is the personal will which I deny exists except in name and imagination, but which, like the sovereign God or "devil," or both, "brought death into the world, and all our woe." Eliminate this "will," and, whatever we may hav, government, I claim, will no longer exist. But to the average Liberal a voluntary organization of individuals for mutual aid and protection is simply another form of government. And so we find the name government, like the name Anarchy, may stand for anything. But the idea as implied in government, which may "inquire into the relations between citizen and citizen," and "be capable of subjecting every other will in the community to its own," I claim as not only unnecessary, but impossible of performance except that it be in the interest of some person or class of persons, to the robbery and oppression of all others. And I base this assertion on what I believe to be purely scientific principles underlying and influencing all human actions. Self-interest or selfishness, and its development into pure egoism, which I claim is the highest plane of civilization, depends largely upon restricting the "devil opportunity." And I claim (excuse my apparent egotism; I use the personal pronoun, as I wish to involve none other with my utterances) that government is the personification of the "devil opportunity."

> Thou set'st the wolf where he, the lamb, may get;
> Whoever plots the sin thou 'pointest the season;
> And in thy shady cell, where none may spy him,
> Sits Sin to seize the souls that wander by him.

Is it practicable to liv in society without government? If by government you mean society, order, law, I not only say it is impracticable, but impossible. But if you mean government as it is and always has been, I affirm that it is not only practicable, but the only possible way of realizing liberty, equality, and fraternity in their highest and happiest reality. It seems our correspondent, who has seen "the very foundation of empire laid," believes that "a small community" can so liv, for he has seen one such, "without law, taking up homes on public lands, for years undisturbed by outsiders, and witnessed its growth from perfect liberty, equality, etc., up to conditions that now prevail at New York and vicinity." But difficulty arose, and they were "forced to organize and get up some kind of rule," and they followed the custom of their sires and government was the result.

Charles Lamb humorously tells us the origin of roast pig. One was discovered in the ruins after the conflagration of a farmer's home, and the taste was so extremely nice that the loss of his home was not considered, and realizing no other way of obtaining the savory morsel, he reared another home and pig and repeated the conflagration. And the secret getting abroad, other homes were consumed, until the wealth of the kingdom was threatened with extinction. Happily, some genius averted the disaster by discovering or inventing a process of roasting pig without burning down a farmer's home. Whenever a community can realize their individual strength and power and refuse to be dominated by any higher power, they may continue to "liv in liberty, equality, etc." He says, "I know happy people liv where all are poor and industrious and hav equal chances." Cannot he realize that the change he saw into "millionaires and miserably poor" was due to what he terms "the foundation of empire?" I like that word; it conveys a good idea of what government really is. And cannot he realize that the monopoly of the natural opportunities arising from the use of lands and money are due to the license of government? People "begin to fight about possession and kill each other" even as they fight to escape a burning building. It is all owing to the unnatural condition which the existence of government imposes. Can not he see that "persons in the ring" do not act "without law," but are enabled to so act by taking advantage of the laws, or by "standing in" with the officials who are supposed to execute the laws? Cannot he see that it is not "the love of money" but the desire to rule, which the acquisition of money enables men to do, that is the real "root of all evil?" This and the desire to escape the degradation of poverty forces men into the flood to catch the rising tide that leads to fortune.

> Omitted, all the voyage of their lives
> Is bound in shallows and in miseries.

But when the order of liberty is known and the law of equal freedom recognized, then shall cease

> The low, dull strife that makes men mad,
> The tug for wealth and power,
> The passions and the cares that wither life,
> And waste its little hour.

The Medieval Church.

A HISTORICAL STUDY.

(The material for this paper is drawn chiefly from English, Dutch, German, and French sources.—G. N.)

There is a predisposition among Freethinkers to regard the church of the Middle Ages as an embodiment of everything evil, to paint it in a color of deepest black. But the church was not then, nor has it ever been, wholly a curse, for had this been the case, had there been no mitigating circumstances, society would hav broken down under its burden.

The church was democratic in some respects. It was she who made the birth and subsequent growth of a middle class possible. It was the church who crushed the excessiv individuality of the feudal baron. And it was she who, by her calls for cathedrals, abbeys, etc., caused the development of an order of architects unsurpassed by none.

But to these claims for doings of good none can be added. They stand alone, shining out as stars from an else clouded evening sky. Let us giv the Scarlet Lady her dues, her record otherwise is more than sufficient to condemn her.

What services did she render to learning and general enlightenment? Her learning was false and bad. And the road of true science she illuminated with the light from Auto-dâ-fés, paved with instruments of torture, and hedged with the prisoner's chain. Yet not in this way only did she retard the progress of civilization. In the church, clothed in the garb of monk or priest, we find, with a few exceptions, every man whom nature had endowed with superior mental faculties. Here they lived, here they died, doing the race no good, not even bequeathing to it in the persons of descendants the mental powers they themselvs possessed. Who can measure the evil done the world by the institution of celibacy?

We cannot in an article like this enter upon a thorough discussion of the various evils due to the church, their destructiv effects upon the progress of civilization. We will confine ourselvs to one specific evil, one left untouched by most historians and other writers, and yet one which more plainly than any other shows the evil character of the medieval church.

According to the most reliable statistics the population of England was at about the year 1100 not quite two million inhabitants. Let us divide the time between then and now into eight periods and we find an increase of 10, 10, 10, 25, 30, 25, 64, and for the last ninety years 180 per cent.

Now, remembering that during the first four centuries there were no great calamities; that the English kings and statesmen were better than their contemporaries; that soil, climate, and national character remained the same—remembering all this, how can we account for the small increase of population except by the circumstance that capital increased so slowly that each generation had the greatest difficulty in maintaining the proper number of offspring? Under such circumstances, living in ignorance, working hard, subjected to hunger, exposure, and cold, few were the young that could survive, few the men and women that passed their fiftieth year.

But religious edifices increased in number and grandeur. Millions upon millions of dollars were spent in their construction. But what good did they do, what commodity did they yield for the sustenance of life? None.

And during these four centuries the church abstracted from useful labor at least one-fourth of the population and at least one-third of the time which ought to hav been devoted to production. Saint's day followed saint's day, and every saint needed money, and every one got it too. These days were enforced, and if the sum paid was not large enough imaginary offenses were invented and the desired contribution was taken in with interest.

One of the most imposing edifices in England is the cathedral of York. It took money to build it, and money to maintain the scores of clergy occupied in its daily service, and this implies an extensiv annual revenue raised from the industry and savings of the people. How the money was raised a few examples will explain. In 1352 Archbishop Thoresby issued a brief to all abbots, barons, colleges, officials, deans, parsons, vicars, etc., within his province, "requiring and exhorting them to ask and demand alms and charitable benevolence of the people, for the use of so noble a stone house and so laudable a structure." In 1361 the same archbishop granted an indulgence of forty days to all benefactors to the new choir. Pope Innocent VI. granted an indulgence of two and a quarter years' relaxation. In 1366 Pope Urban V. granted indulgence for one year to benefactors. What success followed the wire-pulling of the clergy one can imagin by reading the following examples taken from one of the volumes published by the Surtee Society:

1495. Thomas Lord Scrope of Masham. Six bequests of capital and yearly sums for masses in various places.

1493. John Beseby, merchant, York. Considerable bequest of money for his funeral rites, and for the hire of a chantry priest for a year "to sing for my soul, my father's and mother's, and for Mr. Beverley's soul with whom I was apprenticed, and all Christian souls," on condition that the said priest shall "with his vestment upon him go to my grave and say De Profundis, and cast holy water on my grave."

1494. Agnes Maners, widow, York. Fifteen houses in York to the church of St. Margaret, on condition of a perpetual mass to be said every Sunday.

1496. John Bone, merchant, Doncaster—divides his whole estate into three parts. The first to be "given in good use for the well of my soul;" the second part to his wife; and the third to his son.

1487. John Carre, merchant, York, to be buried in church of St. Sampson, York. Twelve legacies of money and goods to clergy and others concerned in his burial; £7 to poor people "as soon as I am dead, without any tarrying for my soul and my friends' souls." A gold ring with a diamond to "hang about the neck of the image of our Lady that stands above our Lady altar in the minster where they sing our Lady mass;" and a second ring with a ruby and turquoise to hang "about our Lord's neck that is in the arms of the said image of our Lady." Bequests of money to all priests in the city and suburbs who may say masses for the souls of himself and wife. Bequests of capital sums to the fabric of the minster, and several monasteries and churches. A few secular legacies, e. g. £24 to be divided among 15 "poor maidens well disposed to marriage, every maiden £2." The residue of his estate his executors are to apply in their discretion in procuring masses to be said "for my soul, our father's and mother's souls, and all Christian souls." (Revd. James Raine, Testamenta Eboracensia, II. 27.)

Not satisfied by this, the clergy encroached upon all space available for building purposes. We must remember that the cities of that time were each surrounded by a wall and bastions, and that safety was to be found only within these fortifications. Still what do we find? Spacious gardens, sumptuous edifices, churches, graveyards, monasteries, hospitals (not in the present sense of this term), wherever we look on a city map. The population proper we find crowded into narrow, tortuous lanes formed by tall, overhanging timber houses. No provisions made for pure air, for wholesome drinking water; hence the numerous epidemics, the deadly fevers, the destructiv fires. Selfish and ostentatious, then as now, the clergy, by its spirit of tyranny and its opposition to education, is to be blamed for most of the avoidable calamities which mankind is subjected to.

The industries were insignificant, except those whose work could be used by the clergy. The trade, at home as well as abroad, was in the hands of foreigners. Agriculture existed but in name.

I can do no better than close this brief article with an extract from Mr. Rogers's essay on "Medieval Agriculture," as it shows better than anything else what are the results of clerical supremacy:

The dwelling of the peasant "was built of the coarsest material, most frequently of wattles daubed with mud or clay. Bricks appear never to hav been used. . . . The offering of a candle at the shrine of a saint was a rational tribute because it was a choice personal enjoyment. Few persons could then afford to break the curfew. . . . Scurvy, in its most virulent forms, and leprosy, modified perhaps by the climate, were common disorders, for the people lived on salt meat half the year; and not only were they without potatoes, but they do not appear to hav had other roots which are now in common use, as carrots and parsnips. Onions and cabbage appear to hav been the only esculent vegetables. Spices were quite out of reach; sugar a very costly luxury; bees very rare; cloth was coarse and dear; linen was very costly, so much so that sheets were often the subjects of ostentatious doles, and at this time and centuries afterward were devised by will."

GUSTAVE NELSON.

Harrison and Wanamaker.

We all know how bad it is for the intelligence and honesty of our people to hav clergymen forced to speak and think as the sect dictates; but there is a very similar danger in the case of one hundred and sixty-five thousand office-holders, and some half a million of other Americans closely connected with them. No sect nor party has a right to say, "You must think as I do, if you want to earn your daily bread." The main difference is that sects do this wickedness with their own money, but parties do it with the people's money, which is collected in taxation for public ends. The people has a right to say that the $60,000,000 which it pays its servants annually shall be used entirely for the public benefit, in getting the best possible service, but not for the private emolument of individuals who make a profession of politics, and who, in many well-known instances in both parties, are notoriously corrupt. This is so important that if anyone were to tell me that he wishes to giv his vote to the candidate likely to do the most for civil service reform, without regard to any other issues, I should say nothing to him, but what I wish also to say particularly to everyone who likes to hav women hold office, namely this, look at Harrison's record!

At the meeting of the Massachusetts Reform Club at Young's Hotel, in Boston, Saturday evening, September 10th, Hon. William Dudley Foulke, a member of the National Civil Service Reform committee, said he had supported Harrison in 1888 because he promised that "fitness, and not party service, shall be the essential and discriminating test, and fidelity and efficiency the only sure tenure of office." Harrison had said, "I am an advocate of civil service reform," and had pledged himself not only to enforce the laws which favor it, but to extend it to offices not yet under its regulations, all which he has had full power and opportunity to do. He also agreed to use his influence for repealing the law setting a limit of four years to tenure of office.

This last promis has been left unfulfilled. He has allowed the laws forbidding the levy of contributions upon government officials, and excluding them from offensiv partisanship, to be violated with impunity; and he has refused, despite repeated solicitations, to make any general extension of the principles of civil service reform. Those principles were applied by him to about a thousand offices, mostly in the Indian bureau; but he has declined to extend them to postmasters of the fourth class, to great numbers of clerks in that department, and also to the employees of the census bureau, whose value depended largely on its being carried on independently of all partisan objects and political influence. Officials of the highest ability and efficiency, including the postmasters of Boston and New York and holders of important places, hav been removed in order to reward activ politicians; and similar injustice, it may be added, has been done to many deserving women. He still retains a postmaster-general who has acknowledged, as may be seen in the September Forum, that he owes his place to his having raised more than $200,000 for the campaign fund, besides $10,000 which he paid out of his own pocket. One of the first results of Wanamaker's appointment was that circulars were sent by his private secretary, Mr. Cushing, to Mr. Foulke, Mr. Cleveland, and other men interested in civil service, asking in behalf of a member of the cabinet, why this reform was so much criticised, and "Why should not both parties abandon their insincere professions of reform, and hav the patriotism to go back to the old system?" Mr. Wanamaker afterward denied any knowledge of this letter to Mr. Foulke; and the latter then asked Mr. Cushing, who was present, "On behalf of what cabinet officer was it that you were making those inquiries?" "That has nothing to do with it," interposed Wanamaker; but Mr. Foulke persisted in asking who the cabinet officer was in whose behalf the inquiries were made; and Mr. Cushing answered, "I was making them in my own way, and the officer for whom I was making them happened to be the postmaster-general." This same official refused to reappoint a postmaster who was recommended by most of the patrons of the office, as well as by a Republican representativ of the district in Congress, and added, "So long as there is a Republican, who is able and willing to take the place, I will not reappoint a Democrat." How well President Harrison agrees with these sentiments may be judged from the fact that he has secured his renomination by packing the convention with office-holders, of whom a hundred and forty were delegates, while some two thousand others were activ in his behalf.

I see nothing in Mr. Harrison's long letter of acceptance to permit me to hope that he will behave differently if he has another term, and if I had no other reason for voting against him, I should feel bound to do so in order to punish his betrayal of the principles of purity and independence in politics.

F. M. HOLLAND.

From a Swedish Freethought Leader.

STOCKHOLM, SWEDEN, Aug. 30, 1892.

MR. E. M. MACDONALD, Dear Friend: Yours at hand, and I am glad to see and know myself remembered by you.

The Utilitarian movement, headed by Lennstrand and Utiliska Samfundet, has had, I am sorry to acknowledge, after the deliverance of Lennstrand from his last prison at Langholmen by the king's grace in May, 1890, rather a retrograde than a progressiv tendency, occasioned here, as everywhere at the beginning of Freethought movements, by total want of funds and practical organization to meet and cope with the persecutions and hindrances laid in the way by the powerful and wealthy bigoted Christian adversaries.

A great many unnecessary and deplorable personal differences and troubles between the leaders themselvs and the members of Utiliska Samfundet in Stockholm, and other disadvantageous circumstances, hav contributed to retard and slacken the interest outside of the society and the devotedness within. A large part of the best and ablest of the members hav absented themselvs from the society in Stockholm; the continual variances and personal conflicts hold the thinking and reflecting aloof awaiting better times. This stage must hav its turn, as everywhere has been the case, before concord and harmony can be established by experience and mutual forbearance.

By the public report of the congress at Stockholm of the Utiliska Samfundet, the 14th of August, branches in Stockholm, Eskilstuna, Söderlelje, Gefle, and Skutskura were the only ones that now remain. All the others are discontinued or not heard about. Although this is not encouraging and promising, our adversaries may be sure that where Freethought once has been awakened and has raised its banner it can never be entirely annihilated. It will revive with redoubled energy, forcing its way and keeping its banner waving upon the air higher than ever.

A very encouraging testimony of what the Freethought movement has brought about in Sweden is the "glad tidings" that the king has ordered the archbishop Sundberg and Bishop Ullman, and the two theological professors of Upsala University, Bring and Norrby, to revise the old ecclesiastical handbook of the established church, and the result of this kingly commission to these four worthies of the "Black Guards" has been that they hav been forced by science, Freethought, and common sense to alter in this handbook the words, "descended to hell," to, "descended to the realm of death." Accordingly the Christians' hell is forever abolished by the church of Sweden, his majesty the devil dethroned, and the ministers of the state church forbidden to utter any more from the pulpits the name of this potentate. This is indeed "tidings of glad news" to every Freethinker all over the globe, at which they will rejoice.

Forward my well-wishings to all the folks of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and other American friends, and receive yourself my very best.

From your old but depressed fellow-campaigner, sincerely your brother and friend,

OTTO THOMSON.

Items of Foreign News Interesting to Freethinkers.

The foreign society which was the first to petition for Sunday closing of the World's Fair, was the Swedish lodge of Tempeliers.

Nineteen Spanish-American republics hav witnessed a revival and organization of Freethought. They will all send representativs to the International Congress at Madrid.

Thirty-seven new Freethought societies hav been formed in Spain during the last three weeks, and each and all of them has joined the National as well as the International Federation of Freethinkers.

To defray the expenses of sending delegates to the International Freethought Congress at Madrid, the various Belgian Freethought societies are giving each an entertainment. The Belgian Freethinkers are made of the right material.

Prof. Hector Denis, the Belgian Freethinker, and member of the general committee of the International Freethought Federation, has been elected provost of the University of Brussells, and the Atheist Elisée Reclus is to fill the chair of geography.

The bishop of Brixen, Tyrol, has issued an order to the mountain guides in his diocese to the effect that they are not to accompany tourists on their mountain ascensions on Sundays and holidays unless they hav previously attended mass. Of course no more accidents will henceforward happen.

Owing to the lack of organization among Freethinkers of the United States, we will not send a representativ to Madrid. Mr. Leon Furnemont, upon our request, has promised to represent us. No country on the globe contains as many Freethinkers as does ours, nor does any other equal us in indifference. Brethren, we must organize. Let us cease our petty quarrels, and show the world that we too are alive.

"Force and Matter," by Prof. Dr. L. Büchner, president of the German Freethought Association, has reached the seventeenth edition in Germany. The sixth French edition of the same work is out of print. It has been translated into all European languages except Russian, and in Asia it can be read in the Arabic and Japanese languages. We hav read the book and can heartily commend it to the attention of American Freethinkers.

We are the recipient of Journal de Charleroi, edited by our friend and colaborer Jules des Essarts. We call especial attention to this, as the journal, a daily paper, contains in full the Appeal to Freethinkers issued by the general council of the International Federation of Freethinkers, and likewise the program of the Congress. What American daily or weekly secular paper would dare to publish these? THE TRUTH SEEKER, as the American organ for the Federation, will in its next number contain a translation of the Appeal.

In October, 1868, the Freethinkers of Vienna organized under the leadership of the editor of Der Lichtfreund, Edward Schwella. The society met at first several times each week, but for the last few years its meetings hav been held every Sunday evening. Freethinkers are not recognized as a religious body, according to the constitution of Dec. 21, 1867, and hence were required—and are yet—to pay a tax of two marks for each meeting held. A movement has now been started to bring about the abolition of this tax, on the ground that the lectures, which are strictly scientific, are expressions of "worship at home," Science being the goddess.

The Oregon State Union.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE OREGON STATE SECULAR UNION, Greeting: Through the advice of a few of our members and the approval of others, I hav, with the consent of Mr. D. C. Stewart, member of the executiv board, concluded to change the time and place of the convening of our next convention to some suitable time during the next session of our legislature.

I deem it unnecessary to mention the advantages to be gained by this change, because I think they are apparent to all.

I therefore announce that the next convention of the Oregon State Secular Union will be held at Salem, Ore., either on the first or second Saturday, Sunday, and Monday of the session of the legislature.

Due announcement will be given of the place of meeting as soon as proper arrangements are made, also of the time agreed upon. I ask the coöperation of all Secularists, and especially those residing in Salem and vicinity, to make this meeting a success, and that through it we may gain recognition and secure the taxation of church property and possibly others of our just demands.

I hav also been requested to appoint a time and place of meeting at Portland so that those of us who attend the exposition may enjoy a reunion. I therefore appoint Sunday, October 9th, at 2 o'clock P.M., at 49½ First street, the meeting to be continued during the pleasure of those attending.

This meeting will be preliminary to the convention. I therefore respectfully recommend the discussion of ways and means to make the convention a grand success.

The last congress voted $500 for this year's work. There hav been to date no pledges made toward this except from a few soon after our last convention to meet a deficiency. I would therefore ask all to pledge their mite as soon as convenient, so that your executiv board may know how much they may depend on to defray expenses of the convention.

I hav appointed Mr. D. C. Steward, Forest Grove, secretary, vice Mrs. Todd, who has virtually resigned, whom you will please notify of the amount of your subscriptions.

Yours for the cause, J. HENRY SCHROEDER,
Pres. Ore. State Sec. Union.

The Real Money.

Each piece of money is nothing but a little clearing-house sign moving about to balance differences that arise in the exchange of services. For as labor creates all commodities, at bottom all the business of the world is but a trade of service for service. We use a vehicle of some kind to carry the commodities and we use a money sign to convey the difference between the values of the things carried and make the transactions even. If this sign is accepted by the creditor or seller only because of a value supposed to be in its material, it is not taken as money, but as a commodity. If it is taken because of the confidence or trust the receiver has in it that the community will also take it from him at the same value, it is then circulating as a money sign. Money is, then, credit in circulation, represented by signs impressed on metal or paper, or by any other signs as agreed upon. The heaviest monetary transactions are done by the clearing-house stamp. Confidence or credit is the creature of opinion. When we reflect upon it, the whole artificial world has been created by opinion, and men are savage or civilized because of their opinions. In the opinion of the wild Africans beads were the most valuable things in the world, and for centuries they loaded European ships with gold-dust and ivory for beads, thus compelling the merchants of towns on their coasts to use beads for money signs. And for ages the stupid Hindoos prized gold and silver and jewels over all things and gave the fruits of their labor upon that marvelous soil of Hindoostan to their rulers for these things, which they mostly hoarded underground, themselvs living wretchedly on top of it. And now even the great mass of mankind are led as by a hook in the nose because of their false opinion that money is a thing of value and is the thing they handle instead of being something else represented by the thing. Subtract our confidence from the thing and no person would hav it. Confidence, trust, credit, are controvertible terms. Hid or hoarded, the things are not even money signs, being such only while at work. And the only work they can do is to adjust differences between services and services, or between their products, which is the same. Now, to declare by law or custom that gold, or any other thing, bonds and the like, is the only money, is to violate the very being of this great artery of communication. It is equal to declaring that no vehicle shall be lawful but wheelbarrows that run on golden wheels, and no contracts for carriage shall be enforced by law unless the carrying be done by them. We know that a thousand other kinds of vehicles would be used in protest against your folly, as there are so many other representativs of money used in spite of our laws. Let the natural money be used untrammeled and there can be no more danger of overissues than there is danger of overissues of wheelbarrows or other vehicles. Declare that but one kind of barrow is lawful and on the least question arising all other kinds would be thrown aside till confidence returns. The analogy holds throughout.

The Topolobampo colony of Sinaloa has just completed near half a million dollars' worth of public works of the most valuable and substantial character, and not one cent of debt has been made. In THE TRUTH SEEKER of New York, June 11th, A. Butterfield givs a statement of the works done, and says: "We hav demonstrated the fallacy of gold and silver coin as the only medium of exchange, for all this has been done on a basis of service for service. All the debts of the individual colonists are settled by the credit and debit plan as lined out by Clarke Irvine in THE TRUTH SEEKER, the general accountant settling in the clearing-house style all the accounts."

Governments are the great creditors and debtors nowadays. We, the people, i. e., government, owe our employees all the revenues, that is, services to their amount, and they owe us services in return to just the same amount. Instead of settling this mighty sum by a simple sign, our agent, government, either hires gold to be dug or borrows of private individuals and taxes us for the cost. It is virtually as though two parties owed each other an equal sum and borrowed the money to pay it.

CLARKE IRVINE.

Bible Reading.

NO. 5.—ON THE SIN AND CRIME OF USURY.

Ques. What is usury?

Ans. "Usury, as employed in our version of the Bible, means only interest. When our translation was made, the word usury had not assumed the sense which it now has" (Am. Tract Soc.'s Bib. Dict., 1859).

"The school divines hav branded the practice of taking interest as contrary to divine law, and the canon law proscribes the taking even the least increase for the loan of money as mortal sin" (Blackstone).

"Whatever is received above the principal lent, or the capital that was given, whether it be money or anything else that may be purchased or estimated in money—is usury" (Catechism of Council of Trent).

Q. Did God forbid his people to take usury or interest from a brother?

A. "If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as a usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury" (Ex. xxii, 25).

Q. Did he also forbid taking interest from strangers?

A. "If thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen in decay with thee; then thou shalt relieve him: yea, though he be a stranger, or a sojourner; that he may liv with thee. Take thou no usury of him, or increase: but fear thy God; that thy brother may liv with thee. Thou shalt not giv him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals for increase" (Lev. xxv, 35–37).

Q. Is this prohibition concerning the taking of increase for the use of articles lent, made more emphatic?

A. "Thou shalt not lend to thy brother upon usury; usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of anything that is lent upon usury" (Deut. xxiii, 19).

Q. Did the Jews regard the prohibition as binding upon them?

A. "Then I consulted with myself, and I rebuked the nobles, and the rulers, and said unto them, Ye exact usury, every one of his brother. And I set a great assembly against them. And I said unto them, . . . will ye even sell your brethren? . . . Then held they their peace and found nothing to answer" (Neh. v, 8, 9).

Q. Did the pious and lovely David think that obedience to this command, not to receive interest on money, was essential to salvation?

A. "Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? Who shall dwell in thy holy hill? . . . He that putteth not out his money to usury, nor taketh a reward against the innocent" (Ps. xv, 1–5).

Q. Did Solomon, the wise man of God, consider interest-money as illegitimate gain?

A. "He that by usury and unjust gain increaseth his substance, he shall gather it for him that will pity the poor" (Prov. xxviii, 8).

Q. Did the prophet Jeremiah congratulate himself upon his freedom from the iniquity above described?

A. "I hav neither lent on usury, nor hav men lent to me on usury" (Jer. xv, 10).

Q. What was the prophet Ezekiel's opinion of the practice of interest-taking?

A. "He that hath not given forth upon usury, neither hath taken any increase, that hath withdrawn his hand from iniquity . . . hath walked in my statutes . . . he is just, he shall surely liv, saith the Lord God. . . . And he that . . . hath given forth upon usury, and hath taken increase . . . he shall not liv" (Ezek. xviii, 8–13).

Q. Hath the Lord, therefore, any people left in these days?

A. If so, they are very poor. Their indigence probably conceals them.

Q. What species of property does the Lord claim?

A. "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof" (Ps. xxiv, 1; 1 Cor. x, 26).

Q. Concerning that portion of his possessions which he allows man to use, does he require an account?

A. "If therefore ye hav not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches?" (Luke xvi, 11, 12).

Q. What amount of usury does the Lord require?

A. "Concerning the tithe of the herd, or of the flock, or of whatsoever passeth under the rod, the tenth shall be holy unto the Lord" (Lev. xxvii, 32).

Q. What does he wish us to do with this interest-money?

A. "Bring all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, saith the Lord of hosts" (Mal. iii, 10).

Q. Does he really claim it as his?

A. "Ye hav robbed me . . . in tithes and offerings" (Mal. iii, 8).

Q. Is Jesus, also, a usurer, like his father?

A. "Thou oughtest therefore to hav put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should hav received mine own with usury" (Mat. xxv, 27).

Q. Is more than usury required in the gospel dispensation?

A. "From him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath" (Matt. xxv, 29).

Q. What, then, is the normal fate of the believer?

A. "Let the extortioner catch all that he hath" (Ps. cix, 11).

Q. Who are the true believers?

A. "Blessed be ye poor: for yours is the kingdom of God" (Luke vi, 20).

Q. But, will God be there?

A. "Nor thieves, nor covetous . . . nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor. vi, 10). The Bible God will hav to abdicate.

Q. From whom were God's people allowed to take usury?

A. "Unto a stranger [foreigner] thou mayest lend upon usury" (Deut. xxiii, 20). They might also giv or sell bad meat to foreigners (Deut. xiv, 21).

Q. Were these same foreigners regarded as friends or enemies?

A. "But of the cities of these people, which the Lord thy God doth giv thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth, but thou shalt utterly destroy them" (Deut. xx, 16, 17).

Q. Does Jehovah, then, in taking tithes or usury from his servants, treat them like friends or enemies?

Letters of Friends.

Criticisms.

HAMMONTON, N. J., Aug. 30, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2 for another two-thirds term of the pleasure of reading your most excellent paper. The "Letters of Friends" are very interesting, as also are the editorials. By these we may learn of what is going on in certain directions. "News and Notes" is excellent. Of the friends on money, Severance, of California, has the prime article. D. K. WOLLISON.

A Proselyter.

REEDLEY, CAL., Sept. 4, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed subscription to your most estimable paper.

I liv in a would-be Christian community. However, there are a few Freethinkers here who never had had the opportunity of reading THE TRUTH SEEKER until I gave them a few copies which I received from my grandfather, F. D. Shelden; also "Old Testament Stories Illustrated," which suits them exactly. My subscription will be the only one to Freethought literature in this community. I hope in the near future to be able to send you several new subscribers. I will as soon as possible order several of your books, among which will be the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book." F. P. SOUTH.

Would Make the Best of This World.

CALVERT, TEX., Sept. 12, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.50, for which send the Bible Picture Book in cloth. I hav been trying to get you a few subscribers, but it is "no go." The church has our town by the throat. Still, some of the members come round every week to get my TRUTH SEEKER. One of the goody-goody preachers came round while I was from home and read two or three papers through. I hope it did him some good. We hav plenty of Liberals here, but they take no interest in Freethought. Thanking you for the prompt and regular manner THE TRUTH SEEKER has come to me the last year, hoping to remain a subscriber till I pass over to the saints in Abraham's bosom, I remain, Yours to learn how to liv and make the best of this world and not to save the immortal soul hereafter, C. S. BAINUM.

Serene Close of a Wise Life.

NEW YORK, Sept. 16, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Nathan D. Reed, of Surrey, N. H., died August 5th, aged ninety-two. Having visited this uncle annually for some years past, and being present at his death, I felt it right to publish some truthful remarks concerning him, and block any claim of priest or devil. I quote:

"Mr. Reed's views on religious questions were somewhat peculiar. He believed life to be what we ourselvs make it; that it is our business to improve things in this world; to enjoy life, not to find fault with it. He expressed thanks for life in this beautiful world; he had no knowledge nor fear of any other. He begged not for money, for he could not feel himself a criminal. He believed men as wise liv to-day as ever lived before. He did not regard ancient oracles as binding thought and reason. He neither affirmed nor denied anything outside his own consciousness," etc.

The great majority of folks in that region are still benighted in the shadow of the old, old superstition, and the few Freethinkers fear to become free-speakers. However, the obituary was published in the Keene, N. H., Sentinel and in the Cold River (Alstead) Journal. But the latter, by way of atonement, inserted in its next issue a Talmage sermon entire.

A Sprightly Miscellany.

ROEDER, WASH., Aug. 15, 292.

MR. EDITOR: It givs a throb of joy to see "our Put" dashing over the rocks "To the Liberals of America."

Mrs. Freeman says, "Due notice has been given that an effort will be made to revise the constitution." Inasmuch as preachers hav Ten Commandments, we may hav Ten Demands, and I suggest the following for No. 10: Nothing claiming to be truth shall be promulgated and exempted from immediate and public criticism. The first man that objects shows his green eyes.

Question: Why is it none of our excellent writers speak of the terribly depressing, distorting, deforming consequences of living in that prayerful-tearful state of "giving the heart to God"—of the awful evils of that mental excitement called religion? I happen to liv intimately associated with it, and certainly nothing can more utterly destroy a high-poised and happy equanimity of soul.

I am encouraged with "Letters of Friends," and in sixty more years it would be nice to see worshipers begin to secrete themselvs in small groups to worship.

Now, I expect to see the "one hundred thousand Liberal voters" immediately join the "Freethought Federation of America." No war, but the right in the end must win at the polls. J. W. BELL.

Resist Christian Tyranny.

CROOKSTON, MINN., Sept. 5, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5.05, for which please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year more. Life is too short to be without it (THE TRUTH SEEKER). For the balance send books as follows: "Age of Reason," "The Crisis," "Rights of Man," and last but not least, "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." Heston's illustration of the western Kansas man in your issue of September 3d is a "Jim dandy." I believe Heston knocks out more superstition than any other living man.

We expect Remsburg here this month.

If a Freethought Federation is organized as per call of S. P. Putnam, all Freethinkers here will join. It is time we organize and put a stop to religious hypocrisy in politics, Congress, and legislature. It certainly is not business to recognize God or religion in any of these three branches so long as we are a republic. I believe that without Freethinkers a republic cannot exist. If that be true, then for us to be indolent is treason to our country. The pious Christians of to-day would burn a Freethinker at the stake if they had the power under the law to do so, and if we do not look out they will soon hav the laws to suit them. If all Freethinkers were united it would be a power. If we fall short of the Christians in number, we would gain on them in intelligence, so I think we could more than hold them level.

Wishing the Truth Seeker Company unbounded success, and also the workers in the Liberal cause, I am,

Yours for justice and liberty,

ELIAS STEENERSON.

Pleasing Enthusiasm.

NEW YORK, Sept. 18, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read with pleasure in your crisp paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, Notes of Travel by one of your able correspondents. It is not known who was the first inventor of letter-writing. All agree that it is an admirable and great art. To paint speech and speak to the eyes, and by tracing out characters in different forms to giv color and body to thought, is truly a great art. Some learned men giv the honor to Abraham, others to Moses, others to the Phenicians, others to the Egyptians. It is all conjecture. Can any man know? An art, it is said, is the power of doing something not taught by nature. There is so much envy and jealousy in the world with a certain class of people that it is not prudent to praise another that is worthy of praise for fear of receiving their enmity. But I am free to confess to be delighted with those people who hav brains to put their thoughts in writing. One of such is your correspondent that writes the articles, "Across the Atlantic." The shrewd notice of events attracting the attention of the writer, the account of the visit through the cities of London and Paris, call for more than a passing notice—indicating a level head.

Well, it is pleasant to know that a Freethinker is one of an independent mind and can giv a reason for the hope that is in him without fear or favor. One of this kind is our Robert G. Ingersoll. I say "ours," for he is the champion of equal rights, liberty, love, and justice, that all good men love and honor. May his shadow never grow less.

Why are these things so? Because hate, superstition, hypocrisy, bigotry, deceit, blind zeal, prejudice from early tuition, prevent many persons from coming out and declaring openly their convictions.

From all accounts, it is known, THE TRUTH SEEKER is opening the eyes of the blind, giving strength to the weak, fortitude and encouragement to the doubtful. May it go on and prosper.

Perhaps I may be giving you too much matter to print. When I begin to think about the mind of man, freedom of thought, independence of will, the ignorance of people, I do not know when to stop. S. R. THORNE.

A Good-Hearted Girl Brought Up Wrong.

TOLBERT, TEX, Sept. 13, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: For some time I hav been reading your paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and as I see many letters from its readers I thought perhaps you would like to hav the opinion of one from the Lone Star state. Are you indeed a "truth seeker," or one who sees only the dark side of life? I hav read your brilliant editorials with tears blinding my eyes and a sad heart to see to what use you hav put the talents intrusted to you. 'Tis said a woman does not reason but arrives at conclusions by instinct. If so, then I say he who writes the most scathing misrepresentation of facts is in some way a disappointed, world-weary man whose soul is longing for "the peace that passeth understanding." I can but giv you my earnest sympathy, for man is but human and in every walk of life you will find a brother whose feet hav led him astray. In the church, business, society, everywhere, seek not to find the faults around you, but look deep down in the hearts of your brothers and see the good therein. Hav you a wife, mother, or tiny babe, and can you find no purity from God's own throne shining in their eyes? Your influence is not only on your own hereafter but that of others. Instead of winning one soul you are trying by every means to damn for time and eternity all you can. Do not think I am not acquainted with "Freethinkers," for I hav two uncles who are weary of God, weary of life; earth has its cares, and for them the future is a dark abyss. Last September I stood by the bedside of my dying sister. She was just seventeen years old, a bud of rare fragrance. Hers had been a life of promis. But when she heard the summons she gave up all that life had promised. Perfectly conscious when the kiss of death was given, there was such a look of overjoyed surprise in her sweet eyes as they saw beyond, that were all the world to think the love of Christ a myth that gaze alone would convince me He was with her. My earnest prayer is that He who took her gently in his arms as she fell asleep may soften your heart and giv you the assurance of his never-dying, never-ending love, in this and the life to come. As ever,

Your well-wisher in all that is good,

MILLIE MARIE SCOTT.

An Ancient Roman on the Soul.

HOUSTON, TEX., Sept. 5, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I send the following reflections on the soul from the writings of C. Pliny Secundus: "After burial come the different quiddities as to the existence of the manes (soul). All men, after their last day, return to what they were before the first; and after death there is no more sensation left in the body or in the soul than was before birth. But this same vanity of ours extends even to the future, and lyingly fashions to itself an existence even in the very moments which belong to death itself: at one time it has conferred upon us the immortality of the soul; at another transmigration; and at another it has given sensation to the shades below, and paid divine honors to the departed spirit, thus making a kind of deity of him who has but just ceased to be a man. As if, indeed, the mode of breathing with man was in any way different from that of other animals, and as if there were not many other animals to be found whose life is longer than that of man and yet for whom no one ever presaged anything of a like immortality. For what is the actual substance of the soul, when taken by itself? Of what material does it consist? Where is the seat of its thoughts? How is it to see, or hear, or how to touch? And then, of what use is it, or how can it avail, if it has not these faculties? Where, too, is its residence, and what vast multitudes of these souls and spirits must there be after the lapse of so many ages? But all these are the mere figments of childish ravings, and of that mortality which is so anxious never to cease to exist. It is a similar piece of vanity, too, to preserve the bodies of men; just the promis that he will come to life again, which was made by Democritus, who, however, never has come to life again himself. Out upon it! What downright madness is it to suppose that life is to recommence after death! or indeed, what repose are we to enjoy when we hav been once born, if the soul is to retain its consciousness in heaven, and the shades of the dead in the infernal regions? This pleasing delusion, and this credulity, quite cancel that chief good of human nature, death, and, as it were, double the misery of him who is about to die, by anxiety as to what is to happen him after it. And, indeed, if life really is a good, to whom can it be so to hav once lived? How much more easy, then, and how much devoid of all doubts, is it for each of us to put his trust in himself, and guided by our knowledge of what our state has been before birth, to assume that after death it will be the same." H. W. NELSON.

TURNER, ORE., Sept. 15, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Whatever else one may or may not do, one can think, and hav ideas, "without money and without price," and I am pleased with the idea of that Chicago meeting, and I do sincerely hope the Freethought Federation may be a success. It appears to me that, sooner or later, Freethinkers must become organized politically. Their interests are mostly in that direction, and the tendency is surely that way. Churchanity is little else but a political party, and is surely trying to destroy American freedom.

"The laboring classes are drifting away from the church." Of course they are. The church is their enemy. Always has been. Always must be. The church must ally herself with the money power, with monopoly. This means danger to freedom, and the laboring classes are finding this out. Hence the drifting. As education and consequent intelligence increase this tendency to drifting away will increase; and our next conflict, of either ballots or bullets, will be between the money power and the church, and we the people. And this conflict is not so far off as some may think. I hav lived through one and can more readily discern the signs of the one now coming. And we should be ready. And we should understand the situation. Party has nothing to do with it. Let us stand on principles only. The points appear to me to be: Personal and mental liberty. Absolute freedom of trade. Taxation of the rental value of natural opportunities to labor only. Government control of transportation and communication. Fiat paper money, irredeemable, an absolute legal tender, with no "exception clause," issued by the United States government only, and in volume sufficient to transact business.

These propositions appear plain to me, and to cover the whole ground. If our people will study them, and understand them, laying aside party prejudice and preconceived opinion, I believe they will agree with me. Our cause is political, and should be handled accordingly.

The "truths of religion" would then, to a great extent, be brought squarely before the people, and the wily priest would be compelled to "stand up for Jesus." The "coward's castle" will not be so available against the political "stump," and ecclesiastical bigotry could be fought to better advantage. The large majority of the people are not inclined to churchanity anyway, and the drifting process will be accelerated. Let us get into the political "swim." F. S. MATTESON.

Piercing Thrusts at a Christian.

PATCH GROVE, WIS., July 7, 1892.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE BLOOMINGTON

Record: In my early days I read much, including the four gospels, some texts of which are brought vividly to mind in reading your recent Notes from Patch Grove, in which you say, under the name of "Weary Walker," that that place was once noted for its "cursed doctrins of Freethought, Atheism, and kindred religions." Among the texts remembered are these: "Do unto others as you would others should do unto you." "If a man smite thee on the right cheek turn to him the other also." "Ye hav heard it said that it was written of old, an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth; but I say unto you, resist not evil." "Do good to those who hate you and despitefully use you." "Love your enemies," etc., etc. Christians are in the habit of quoting these texts to show their system of religion is better than any other. Are they in any wise its standard? If they are, you, as measured by such standard, can hardly expect yourself to pass as a pure, unadulterated Christian—not the 24 4-5 grains of gold, 9-10 pure metal, to the dollar, no, no! The love you hav shown your enemies is of a kind that was shown by the Holy Inquisitors, not saturated by a quintessence of a heavenly distillation. So far from you resisting not evil, you hav struck out at those who never in any wise offended you, going out of your course to do so. Will you be good enough to explain how this is returning good for evil? No, measured by these texts you cannot claim to be a Christian. Do you wish to be taken for one?

Webster writes it down that one who assumes to be what he is not, a false character, is an impostor, and there are those who are malignant enough to call you such. But I do not, rather ascribing your faux pas to a lapse of your memory. Yes, you perhaps forgot in your fervid zeal that you should "love your enemies," "do good to those who hate you." Alas, how very unkind was your treacherous memory!

But if this hypothesis is incorrect, and you did not forget these texts as inferred, meaning to strike the enemies of Christianity a blow when occasion offered, and claim still to be a Christian, then a new apparition comes to view. It is every man's natural right in this free land to be a hypocrit if he wants to be, and in fact every man ought to choose to be a hypocrit before being an impostor; bigoted zeal every time before false pretenses.

There is one phase of this matter that embarrasses me, to wit: These people, whose opinions you pronounce "cursed," are not in the newspaper business, hence when attacked hav no means of defense. Your courage must not be questioned by me, yet some less charitably disposed persons may in their warm wrath say no one but a coward would attack people who are by his methods defenseless.

What a pity you should hav forgotten to love your enemies instead of hitting them. But it only strengthens the views of any such, if there are any, to learn you assume a fictitious name as a correspondent of your paper. You want the saying said, yet are afraid to be responsible for it.

If Freethinkers, etc., are cursed, will you be pleased to tell us when, where, and by whom they were cursed? Some people suppose that only to the bishop of Rome has been delegated the proper authority to do this cursing business. If it has been done properly and you know it, giv us the particulars, but be very careful not to assume to do yourself any of this divine love-your-enemies cursing. It might prove to be a boomerang and return to hit the head of the curser—and you would be open to the charge of being a usurper, taking from Cæsar the things which belong unto Cæsar of Rome, pouring out your vials of dynamite love-your-enemies on the defenseless heads of people who can make no direct reply.

It will be a very sad dilemma in the end if it prove no cursing has been done as against the aforesaid religious views. It again exposes you to the charge of exaggerating for the good of the holy cause, which, if Paul is correct, you are not allowed to do. He says: "And if the truth abound through my lie, wherefore am I also adjudged as a sinner?" So, my dear sir, you cannot lie for the good cause; and you know, or ought to know, the fate the same authority dishes out to all "drunkards, liars, usurers," etc.

Freethought cursed, indeed! It is owing to the fact that thought is free in all religious matters that you, sir, are enabled to select from all that which meets your views, or nonconforming with a popular and all-powerful creed would make you liable to be burnt at the stake or broken on the wheel.

Ay, thought is free, in commerce, in art, in invention, as well as in religion, never more to be bound to the altar of the priest or the chariot-wheels of the king.

One more text before we part: "Judge not lest ye be judged."

And now, Christian or hypocrit, bigot or impostor, I hav smitten thee on thy right cheek, turn the other also, and if I fail to smite it with my best regards, believe me to be no exponent of FREETHOUGHT.

If He Were God.

CHICAGO, ILL., Sept. 10, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I submit an account of what I would do if I was God:

1. I'd come down here and attend to my own business, in the following order, to wit:

2. I'd cut off all religious preachers' heads, place them in their hands so that their souls could see what fools they are making of themselvs.

3. I'd wipe out the pope and Congress, by all means.

4. I'd keep the World's Fair open for three hundred and sixty days and nights, and whip every opponent.

5. I'd giv the devil such a kick that he would be totally annihilated.

6. I'd destroy every railroad on earth, and furnish everybody with an air-ship.

7. I'd destroy everything that is known as money and giv everybody my "word" free of charge.

8. I'd destroy every saloon in Chicago. No—I might not do this, because there might not be enough of buildings left standing.

9. I'd destroy every church on earth and take the materials to build levees along the Mississippi river below New Orleans.

10. I'd turn the current of the Mississippi river into the gutters of New Orleans and keep them clean.

11. I'd demonstrate how the average financially successful man gets rich and to own most of this world by getting property and money, rightly or wrongly, in this wise: The methods, like all religious doctrins, not to be questioned. Once possessed of money and property, how he insidiously makes it known. How some one else comes around to get some. He gets a little, then he owes. Then three, four, or five times as much is taken from him to pay up. Then how he is sent into the cold world stamped as a rascal.

12. I'd cremate the czar of Russia and send his soul into the mines of Siberia for five hundred million years to come.

13. I'd destroy every manner of food and make it so that people would not need to eat, if it was only to beat the wheat and corn future speculators.

14. The ground on which the churches stood I would gather together and turn into a grand picnic ground, adorned with all the beauties of nature, where all would hav access without tipping waiters.

15. I'd make such a big muscular fellow to fight John L. Sullivan that Sullivan'd back out for once. (I learn that this has been done since I wrote the above.)

16. I'd make my son Jesus Christ come back to earth to tell the people to stop making a fool of him and of themselvs.

17. I wouldn't let people get sick and occupy hospitals. I'd make them all well, and turn the hospitals into delightful cottages.

18. I'd turn the convents into concert halls and turn the darling sisters out to get darling hubbies.

19. I'd put salt in the sugar trust, steel in the lead trust, and water into the ale trust.

20. I'd teach people to treat one another humanely as the best mode of preventing cruelty to animals.

21. I'd prove to mothers-in-law that they must teach their daughters the duties of married life, and not of fashion, if they want them to be happy wives.

22. When I'd get through with my business I'd go about my business, and leave everybody to attend to his own business.

23. But, before going about my business, I'd pull down old Columbus, Georgie Washington, old Abe Lincoln, U. S. Grant, and lots of other fellows like them, with Tom Paine, from their present hunting-grounds, to come down here and run this earth in my absence, with Bob Ingersoll at the head to decide all religious misapprehensions.

24. If I had time I'd take the good old queen of England down in the ocean just to show her how weak the foundation of her kingdom, or queendom, is!

25. I'd make so many little Carnegie works that there'd be no use of striking, outside of striking the iron while it's hot.

26. I wouldn't allow the publication of a single newspaper unless it published the whole truth. I wouldn't do this at once, because there might not be any published at all. I'd do this piecemeal.

27. I'd burn that book called the Bible, and I'd write one, nice and clean, with only nice things in it, and call it "The Book of Nature."

28. I'd swap my name of God for that of "Everybody's Friend."

29. I'd take my wife, the blessed Virgin Mary, to Chicago. I'd hav her start a "World's kindergarten" sort of affair, to teach other wives economy in hats, dresses, sealskins, and such stuff.

30. I'd take up New Orleans and throw her into Lake Michigan, right in front of Chicago, just to see if I couldn't wake her up and make her catch a little of Chicago's hustling, go-ahead, stop-at-nothing sort of a way. Just as a trial, don't you know?

31. I'd make all the "niggers" white, and all the professional politicians black.

32. I'd make Adam and Eve come back and giv religion the lie about the famous garden!

The only thing or result I might fear is that there would be too much truth exposed at one pop. But, I'd do all these things, and more as I'd think of them.

JOSEPH MAILLE.

A Persecuted Freethinker.

VERA CRUZ, IND., Sept. 20, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In this country of religious humdrum and commotion of fanatics I hav but recently discovered THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am happy to say that I can heartily accord with its general tone. I hav learned by sad experience during my work as public-school teacher, and since, that the world is deplorably wrapped in superstition and aggressiv error. Woe unto him who dares to assail it. But now, since there seems to be concerted action, I take courage anew, with some hope that I may do some good in dispelling error and wrong from the human family.

Among my Christian neighbors and friends (?) I hav not only been left severely alone but debarred from influence. Now, with so much wrong, suppressed aspirations, and convictions for unrestrained intellectual freedom, I fancy myself well qualified as a pioneer campaigner. With such pent-up zeal for Freethought, for truth vs. error, for freedom from mental bondage, and to vindicate myself and others from the wiles and persecutions of superstition and bigotry, I launch forth into the midst of the arena of Freethought federation. I will not stop to portray the grief and wrong I hav suffered socially, politically, and pecuniarily, at the hands of orthodox fanatics. Ground down, altogether crushed, misrepresented, refused a hearing in the press in altogether Christian communities, my emotions certainly need congenial ventilation.

I therefore say again, count me with you as an anxious colaborer in the realm of free investigation and congenial, reciprocal criticism.

The more I investigate Bible morals the more groveling and absurd they appear to me.

And right here let me say that so many candid, well-meaning people think or say they believe in those queer ancient doctrins because they never investigated them, but rather these absurd theories, perverted religions, hav been impregnated into the very bones from youth up and by degrees. No human intellect could swallow the monstrosity at once, or even a considerable portion of it, but they do it by degrees when the minds are yet weak. You know—"The droppings of the sanctuary," and always with the warning, "If you do not believe you will be damned." Thus the stigma on the intellect is perpetrated and perpetuated. We are led to cry out in earnest, O that men may become thinkers instead of believers!

This reminds me of the wonderful physical phenomena which may be performed by constant practice. All the performances of legerdemain, which present to the eye something which we know is impossible, might be recorded in a book just as they appear to the eye, handed down to uneducated tribes and nations of future generations, with now and then a dictum, "He that believeth not shall be damned"—what an orthodox set those fellows would be.

Before we accept an opinion from the ancients or anybody else about "God," "devil," "religion," or "heaven and hell," let us use our utmost reason.

Now for a few points in which we hav used candid, honest thoughts, our conclusion, and our reward.

God, being omniscient, knowing man would disobey and violate his law, still created him, surrounded with the opportunity and created with the capacity to transgress. After the "fall," endless punishment, eternal loss, was the result pronounced, unless a savior could be found, which they say was found. We will examin that point directly. Now, the eternal punishment for finite transgression, and that too from the creator to the creature he had made himself, with every lock of hair on his head and every thought and will in his mind, to do just as he did do when he ate the "apple," seemed to me too tyrannical for any God of respectability or justice, to say nothing of mercy. (About that time I might hav been a good Universalist.) Thanks, brother Universalists, for that much light!

Now for the "plan of salvation." You know it is a bloody affair. The idea of a God accepting blood of an innocent person to atone for the guilty or to appease his wrath against creatures he had made himself, is too heinous to contemplate.

No wonder that with such ruinous, perverted doctrin Christians hav been and still are continually cutting other Christians' throats, and are torturing each other and other people who take the liberty to reject their "blessed gospel."

But time and space forbid to enumerate the fallacies; they are not in pairs like "the animals which Noah took into the vessel," but by the hundred.

One more. You know Moses told his soldiers to kill all the boy babies, and all the women that had, etc., and keep the maidens, virgin maidens, for themselvs. You know Moses was the man of God.

If any credulous persons, who hav not thoroughly examined the record, doubt these barbarous details being authentic, let them feel at liberty to call on me and I will point them out in the book which they hav considered the holy word of God.

What thoughts I may hav of a deity or spirit of providence must be nobler, juster, truer, than I can hav of the one delineated by orthodoxy.

Brethren! I hav been persecuted for truth's sake.

Hav you any work for me in advancing Freethought, and the principles of truth as we can understand it? No matter if we differ, let us shake hands of genuin friendship over all our differences. Not one drop of blood shall be shed or one persecution perpetrated on account of religion. How much better than the Christians we must be.

I am of no good to thrive among the orthodox as a literary man. I am too prone to tell the truth, as I understand it. You know that won't do.

I wish to make an honest living by an honest calling. If you know of a place, I will migrate or travel.

Fraternally, J. J. M. MILLER.

Good-bye to London. — Stratford-on-Avon.—An Old Feudal Castle.—The Warwick Vase.—Kenilworth.—A Medieval City.—A Bit of Roman History. —On the Way to Windermere.—How One Gentleman became "Engaged."

Monday, Aug. 22, 1892.—

We were up early this morning ready to say good-bye to London, to its art, its treasures, its busy people, and its grime and smoke.

Some of the boarders at the Mansions thought enough of us to come down in their dressing-gowns to kiss us good-bye and wish us a pleasant journey, among whom were Mrs. Leslie and "Emmeline," Mrs. Mason, and a few others.

Our trunks were sent on to Glasgow, and we boarded the train for Stratford, a place we could not omit visiting upon any account. But such a quaint, old-fashioned place it is! It was with a feeling akin to awe that we left the train at Stratford and stepped upon the soil that had been pressed by the feet of the greatest poet of any time. We were soon in the house in Henley street where Shakspere was born, they say. The old house is braced and plastered here and there to keep it intact as possible. It is now the property of England.

We stood in the old kitchen where the poet, as boy and man, has stood. Here his father and mother were wont to sit and talk over village matters. We went above to the room where he first saw the light, a low-roofed apartment, the walls of which present the most remarkable autograph album in the world; among others are some very distinguished names—Sir Walter Scott, Byron, Edmund Kean, and others. A young gentleman in our company whipped up a piece of the fast-decaying wood from the floor and handed me a part of it. I would not speak of the act of vandalism. Words cannot express my emotion as I stood bare-headed in that room where he who sounded the whole range of human thought and feeling was born. I recalled the words of one who, in my opinion, stands next to the great poet of humanity in the use of the wonderful gift of language. Colonel Ingersoll, in his appreciativ sentiments regarding Shakspere, says of him: "He knew all crimes and all regrets, all virtues and their rewards. He heard all the applause and curses of the world, and on his heart had fallen all the noons and nights of failure and success. He sat beneath the bo-tree's contemplativ shade, wrapped in Buddha's mighty thought, and dreamed all dreams that light has wrought from dust and dew and stored within the poppy's subtle blood. He was an intellectual ocean, whose waves touched all the shores of thought and within which was the inverted sky; an ocean toward which all rivers ran and from which now the isles and continents of thought receive their dew and rain." It was a sublime moment.

We drove out to the cottage of Anne Hathaway, in which one little room is said to be the same as when the immortal bard of Avon sat there in the wide chimney corner and wooed the woman whose name afterward became linked with his own. It is a good many years since then, and there may be some question as to the identity of this room and the old chambers above; but the old, thatched, low-roofed house, low ceilings, quaint cupboards, and the general air of age seem to warrant the truth of the assertions made. The building has had several additions, and the Anne Hathaway room is now occupied by an aged lady, who claims to be a lineal descendant of Shakspere's wife. After drinking from the old well a draught of cool and sparkling water, the day and hour being emphasized by quotations eloquently given by Mr. Elias Brookings, we entered our carriage, and drove to the old church wherein reposes the dust of the most remarkable child of genius that this world ever knew. As we were driving away from the cottage a lad came running up with a little bouquet from the flower-garden in front of the house, which we promised to keep in memory of the occasion.

The church is on the banks of the Avon, a sweet, secluded spot, exquisit and romantic. Here in the church, as in several of the dwellings, can be seen the quaint architecture of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

Two rows of elm trees shade the long path leading to the church door. There are some odd old carvings in the church; particularly I noted one of a scolding wife with a gag in her mouth, and the face of her husband represented close at hand laughing in great glee at her appearance. A railing keeps the tourist from coming too near the spot where lies the dust of the immortal dead, but he may look upon the sacred place, and above it see the marble bust of him whose thoughts of life and death can never die. The "Seven Ages of Man" are pictured in the stained-glass window of the old church. "Why, that is not literal," I said, observing some strange signs upon the window. "Well, ye know," said the gray-haired sexton, "we couldn't hav the 'Seven Ages of Man' in the church without applying a scriptural meaning to the whole of it!" So the Seven Ages must be turned and twisted to suit ecclesiastical taste. "Alas! poor Yorick!"

We reclined on the banks of the beautiful Avon as it wandered slowly past in quiet, dreaming splendor, and watched the clouds floating overhead in the wondrous sea of blue. The graves of the dead were all around us, the living walked by the riverside, the lowing cattle browsed in the meadows opposit, and the sleepy old town seemed resting beneath a benediction. We went on to the grammar school where Shakspere did receive a little school education, but the old building was being repaired, and we were not permitted to go to school that day. We had lunch at the "Golden Lion," a hall built on the spot where the famous inn stood which was so oft frequented by the "bard of Avon." The walls were decorated with mottoes and well-chosen selections from his plays.

How strange it seemed to be walking among the scenes and over the same ground, seeing the same hills, vales, sky, and river, that his eyes had looked upon!

Reluctantly we turned from them and started for a drive of ten or twelve miles through the lovely country of Warwickshire, much of it owned by Lord Spencer, who, by the way, is called "the best landlord in England." We stopped at Warwick, a lovely old town on the banks of the Avon river. Richard Neville Warwick, the "King-maker," "the fighting earl," as he was called, once lived here, and was the founder of the town. But this brave and independent man was killed in the battle of Barnet, more than four hundred years ago, and in accordance with the barbarism of his age his body was exposed naked to the elements for three days. Close to the leaping, dancing, dashing river is Warwick castle, one of the finest old feudal establishments in the kingdom. The roadway leading to it is cut through the solid rock for a hundred yards, and its cool winding way, the high walls adorned with sweeping, feathery ferns, flowers, and mosses, makes one of the most delightful rambles in the world. The castle is now inhabited by Earl and Lady Warwick, who, for a fee, permit strangers to view the state apartments. A guide conducted us through the various rooms and we were shown the beautiful mosaics, tapestries, armor, bric-a-brac, inlaid tables, paintings of royal personages by Vandyke, Rubens, and other distinguished artists. In the drawing-room was piled a cord of wood—big sticks and forelogs for the capacious fireplace. This is in keeping with the customs of the olden time, but it appeared queer enough to our American eyes to see so much wood in so handsome a room. One of the towers of this castle was built in the fourteenth century, and another tower is still older, it is said. A pretty scene was the bubbling, babbling river in the rear of the castle, as it came through green meadows, dashing over the rocks, the shadows of the big trees on its edges lying caressingly upon its dark, cool face. It was a most fascinating spot, and leaning from the wide window we recalled the stories of the old English knight, old Guy of Warwick. He courted Phillis, or Phelis, as the story goes, and a gallant lover was he. But Phelis demanded some brave deed to test his love for her before she would listen to his suit. He loved her and was afraid of nothing. A knight in those days must fight a battle and kill men to be distinguished, and Guy fought the Saracens and killed the doughty Coldran, and Elmage, also the king of Tyre and the soldan too. He rescued Blanche of Germany, the daughter of the emperor, and was exposed to many dangers. After these exploits Phelis consented to marry him, and following the marriage, which was celebrated with great éclat, he accomplished more daring feats than ever, such as slaying the giant Amerant, and the Danish giant Colbrand. Giants were as straws in his strong hands.

It is interesting to read Drayton's "Polyolbion," who tells there all about this "Jack the Giant-killer." It is told, with how much exaggeration I know not, that he slew a boar of passing might at Windsor, and on Dunsmore heath he slew the dun cow of Dunsmore, a dreadful, vicious creature that was the terror of the whole country. In addition, it is told, he slew in Northumberland a fierce winged dragon as "black as any coal." It had, they say, paws like a lion, and a hide which no sword could penetrate. Guy did so many bold and unique deeds that the praise of them quite turned his head, and he became a hermit and went and lived in the woods. Phelis did not go after her giant-killing husband, but when hungry he would go home for something to eat; at which times she did not seem to recognize him. On his death-bed, however, he sent her his ring and desired her to come to him. She went and remained with him to the last like a true and devoted wife.

The romantic legends of Sir Guy are evidently of Anglo-Norman origin. Shakspere refers to Guy and to Colbrand in the play of "King John," and also makes similar reference in "Henry VIII."

The old town of Warwick was founded in the year 50, and its castle in the year 916. Some of its walls are ten feet in thickness—truly its inmates might "laugh a siege to scorn." Below "Cæsar's tower" are the dark and chill dungeons where prisoners were once kept in "durance vile."

I wish I could tell you in detail all about the magnificent furnishings of the various apartments in this grand old castle, but it would take too much space. The grounds are very lovely and a profusion of flowers are on every side. There is a portcullis in one of the walls and a bridge across a moat, beyond which is the greenhouse. Here is the famous Warwick vase which was found at the bottom of a lake near Tivoli by Sir Wm. Hamilton, who was at the time embassador at the court of Naples. It is of white marble, of exquisit Grecian design, and can hold one hundred and thirty-six gallons. Its handles are carved vine branches, from which run tendrils, grapes, and leaves in marble. A panther skin, head and claws, are represented on its outward surface, and above are heads of satyrs, ivy wreaths, the vine-clad spear of Bacchus, and the crooked staff of the augurs. The vase is said to be older than the castle.

Peacocks and guinea fowls quite tame wander over the lovely lawns, and although I was warned to "keep off the grass," I crossed it and picked up pretty peacock feathers, and Bethia found a quill of a pea-hen and gave it to me for a pen to write these letters with.

A five miles' drive from Warwick castle and we are at the old ruin of Kenilworth, made famous by Sir Walter Scott in his novel, "Kenilworth." This ancient ruin, once covering seven acres, was founded by Geoffrey de Clinton, treasurer of Henry I. Old "John of Gaunt, time-honored Lancaster," once had his home here. So, also, did his son Bolingbroke and Henry IV.

It was a great place for kings. Henry III. gave it to the earl of Leicester, and while the Jack Cade rebellion was going on Henry VI. was glad to find shelter here. That deformed monster, Richard III., dwelt here and held high carnival in its stately halls. Harry VII. and licentious Harry VIII. held high carnival within its ivy-covered walls. It was a prison-house for Edward II. Queen Elizabeth gave it to her lover and favorit Dudley, and it was on July 9, 1575, that the great fête was held here which Scott has so vividly described.

Once a grand, an imposing structure, now it has fallen into crumbling, broken fragments, the ivy still clinging, clasping, and clutching its stones with tenacious tendrils, as if it would stay the hand of death and decay. The Gallery tower and Mortimer's tower are now but tottering ruins. Here is the avenue through which Queen Elizabeth and Dudley rode in jewels and splendor, followed by a stately cavalcade lighted by two hundred waxen torches. We can see the remains of the great festiv hall, one hundred feet long and fifty broad, and the "strong tower," which is the "Mervyn's tower" of the story into which the ill-fated Amy Robsart was thrust while expecting a visit from Leicester during the revels of that great visit. The "pleasance" is still shown as the place where the queen met poor Amy. Here in this castle she, Amy, was kept a prisoner, but it was at Cumnoor place she met her death, Richard Varney, the hireling, dropping the trap-door by which she fell into an abyss and was killed while running to meet her husband.

Visitors throng the ruins of Kenilworth, and artists are very busy here and there sketching the picturesque arches and broken oriel windows, but there is little to see but the sad work Change has made. Flowers are blooming by the roadside, and a vender sells pictures of the old place, and photographs of the unhappy Amy Robsart. We lounged about on the grassy, unkempt lawn, bought some views, plucked a rose and pinks unbeknown to the keeper, gathered some pansies in memory of Amy Robsart, and reflected on the instability of all things earthly. Miss Lawson came along and said: "You can get a nice cup of tea over yonder for a penny. Come, I'll show you the way." So we went along together, Mr. Robert Adams following close along, and in a cosy upper room of a century-old house we had tea, and bread and butter, which we were quietly enjoying when our guide came hurrying up, saying, "The carriage is waiting; we must hurry or we will not catch the train for Birmingham." We arrived at the latter place just at dusk, walked up the street, and through an old graveyard to the elegant Grand Hotel, where we were glad to partake of an excellent dinner.

Birmingham is a fine business city, where almost every necessary article is manufactured. It is the birthplace of steel-pen-making. Several establishments, among them the renowned Joseph Gillott, Perry & Co., and others, still carry on the business. The weekly average of production of steel pens here is said to be one hundred and sixty thousand gross, using from sixteen to eighteen tons of steel, of which eight tons appear in the pens, the remainder being simply waste in the process of making.

Birmingham has been the home of such men as Matthew Boulton and James Watt; Henry Clay, the inventor of papier-mâché; Francis Eginton, who invented processes for reproducing pictures and for painting on glass; Murdock, who invented lighting by gas, and who was ahead of Stephenson in the invention of the locomotiv, besides many other notable characters. In such a lively, wide-awake city there can be little cringing to priestly power, and it was no surprise to learn that there was no old abbey or cathedral in its limits, the earliest reference to a church in its annals being in the year 1285, when, it is recorded, "William Bassley placed himself in the church of Birmingham, and acknowledged himself a robber!" Would that all robbers in our time would be so conscientious.

Just about a hundred years ago some zealous Christians distinguished themselvs here by raising a mob and attacking the "Jacobins" who commemorated the anniversary of the French Revolution by a dinner party. The mob attacked and burnt the houses of the dissenters, among them the house of Dr. Joseph Priestly, who fled to London, and from thence to the United States, where he died in 1804.

There is not so much superstition in Birmingham as in some places, and I would hav been pleased to hav remained longer, but was obliged to leave on the following day.

Our next halting-place was Chester, in Wales, an old town seeming to hav stopped all progress in some portions about three hundred years ago. Such old dry oddities of houses, projecting over the streets with tiny panes of glass and curious inscriptions carved on their old crossbeams. Chester is the only town in Great Britain that has kept the foundation lines of the Roman walls intact. These walls inclose the city, and are two miles in circuit. The Romans erected these walls in the year 61. In 73 Marius, king of the Britons, extended the walls, and in 607 the Britons were defeated beneath them. Alfred the Great's daughter rebuilt them in 907. In 1399 Henry of Lancaster mustered his troops under the walls, and in 1645 Parliamentary forces made a breach in them, and a tower marks the spot where King Charles I. stood in that year and saw his army defeated on Rowton moor about four miles distant. We walked on the walls the entire two miles, saw the remains of an old Roman bath, and the old mill on the river Dee, the miller of which was the hero of the song, "The Miller of the Dee"—whose miller's cap was better than a crown, who envied nobody, no not he, and he thanked the river Dee. There is a legend that the original old miller would not sell any corn to Cromwell, for which offense the unenvious miller was put to death. Many a one has been hanged for less cause in the superstitious times of the past. But the river Dee runs on, the best of salmon find their beds in its clear waters, and another miller grinds corn in the ancient mill. We passed the "Wishing steps," where it is said if one walks up and down the eighteen steps seven times without breathing, wishing all the time, he will be sure to obtain his wish. None of our party, of which there were thirty-eight, tried the experiment.

Near the end of the wall is the Chester cathedral, founded in the year 200, and in the year 800 it was used as a retreat against the Danish invasion. It is an ancient structure, and its antique wood-carving is worth inspection, though some of it is not very modest. Under the building is the crypt, and the dark, damp cells make one shudder to recall what may hav once taken place there. Attached is the ecclesiastical court-room in which George Marsh, a Protestant minister, was tried in 1554, for heresy, by the bishop of Chester, who sentenced him to be burnt for the offense. The seats of the judges and the heretic are still preserved. O religion, what demons thou hast made! What crimes thou hast committed!

Chester has an old grammar school founded by Henry VIII. The scholars are sleepy, and the teaching is nearly of the age in which the school was built.

The river Dee runs almost around the town, and the space inclosed by the walls marks a perfect parallelogram. When the place was a Roman station it was called Deva Castra, but the Saxons called it Legecester. The two principal streets cross each other and the dwellings project over them in a strange, odd fashion. The "rows" are queer little streets, and the stores are queer, too, and prices high. It was sad to see the little huts where the very poor liv. I thought the abodes were houses for cattle till told different. Beggars were plenty and squalor and wretchedness apparent.

A man accompanied us in our walk on the walls, and his evident desire to please was quite amusing. To all our assertions he would raise his cane and say, "Quite right! Quite right!" One of our party said, "George Washington came here once and planted a bean, did he not?" "Quite right, sir, quite right—so he did, so he did!"

They are very polite in Chester and say "thank you" for everything. We lunched in a little restaurant, but the quality of the food was not equal to its price. We remarked the same, at which the proprietor said smilingly, "Thank you;" and when we declared, "We will never come here again," he bowed even more politely, and said again, "Thank you."

In the afternoon of this day (August 23d) we left Chester for Windermere. The ride was through a fine country, but the homes in some districts were plain and poor. We stopped a few minutes at Preston, and our guide, Mr. A. Godfrey, bought newspapers and chocolates for the company. "How did you know girls liked chocolate?" we inquired. "Oh, I read it once in a magazine, and then I observe they eat it more than anything else," was the reply. As we rode along, we got lovely views of the Cumberland mountains and a bit of the Irish sea, with plenty of green meadows, and browsing sheep on the hillsides.

We rode in our own special cars, locked in of course, as is the English custom. Every car was marked "Engaged." A roguish young lady detached one of these "Engaged" papers and cautiously pinned the same to the coat of a bright but serious-looking young gentleman, who walked about the car unconscious of the tag attached to his coat, to the great amusement of the others who occupied the compartment. News of the Week.

INDIANS about Oklahoma are ghost-dancing.

FRANCE has celebrated the one-hundredth anniversary of the proclamation of its republic.

AT Kirkintilloch, Scotland, a man has been fined ten shillings for playing a bagpipe on Sunday.

THE largest shoe factory in Burlington, N. J., has been destroyed by a fire set by a religious crank.

CATHOLIC congregations in Prussia are increasing in much greater proportion than the population.

BERKMANN, the attempted assassin of Frick, has been sentenced to twenty-two years' imprisonment.

THE pope has approved Cardinal Gibbons's plan for an exhibition of Catholic schools at the World's Fair.

THE pope has received ten large boxes of money from the ecclesiastical province of New York as presents for his annual jubilee.

THE Russian government is bankrupt, and is unable to borrow from Jew financiers because of its persecution of their race.

IN Pennsylvania law-courts relativs of Father Mollinger are contesting possession of his property with the Catholic church, to whom he willed it.

ANOTHER holy relic of St. Anne has arrived at New York and will be used, like the other, to make miraculous cures. It is a piece of bone from her arm.

PROFESSOR MCCOOK, of Hartford, Conn., has investigated the number of purchasable voters in twenty towns of his state, and estimates them at sixteen per cent.

CATHOLICS continue to complain that the Protestant Indian commissioner Morgan "is doing his best to destroy the Catholic missions among the Indians."

IT is said in Germany that the repeal of the law excluding Jesuits has been promised the Catholic members of the Reichstag in return for their support of government measures.

THE Frankfort, Germany, Zeitung says: "The rapid development of the material power of the United States menaces the continuation of the economic and intellectual supremacy of Europe."

MISS LAISY, a schoolteacher at Cleveland, O., whose admiration of the Catholic church has long displeased her Protestant parents, has disappeared, and it is feared that she has entered a convent.

TALMAGE has returned, and says of his interview with the czar: "We talked like brothers—discussed religion and politics. I found the czar bright, cheerful, emotional, sympathetic, and most intellectual."

THE strict Sunday law which has been in operation in Germany since July 1st has provoked such resentment that it will be repealed. This will deter the government from giving to the legislature another paternalistic law, for the punishment of habitual drunkards.

NEAR Bordeaux, France, a peasant who suffered from what he thought was a foreign substance in his stomach was told by a clairvoyant that he was afflicted with an evil eye cast on him by Madam Fort, a reputed witch, whereupon he killed the Fort woman.

THE acting land commissioner at Seattle, Wash., has rejected the applications of two men who wished to file claims of land which they had named "Holy Moses" and "Jumping Jesus," but offers to enter the claims under any names that are not blasphemous.

PAPAL examinations hav confirmed the virtues of, and established the authenticity of the miracles attributed to, Bianchi, the Barnabite; Baldinecci, the Jesuit; Matella, also a Jesuit, and Leopold of Gaichis, the Franciscan, which four persons will accordingly be made saints.

A SUPERSTITIOUS Japanese was told that a human liver eaten raw would cure his mother's blindness. He would hav killed his child to procure one, but was disarmed by the infant's smiles and his wife's pleadings. Finally his wife offered herself, and helped him strangle her to death.

THE German Kölnische Zeitung prints extracts from a widely circulated Catholic schoolbook which show that the work contains legends of three saints murdered by Jews in the Middle Ages to obtain their blood for use in religious rites, accompanied by a footnote declaring that Jews still continue the practice.

Gems of Thought.

NATURE does all things by intuition and without the interference of the gods.—Lukretius Carus.

THE race must be guided by intelligence, must be free to investigate, and must hav the courage and the candor not only to state what is known, but to cheerfully admit the limitations of the mind.—Ingersoll.

THE hypothesis of creation cannot for a moment be entertained by natural science. The ever-recurring attempt at effecting a compromise between revelation and knowledge is a useless playing with ideas. —O. Taschenberg.

NATURE presents but a single chain of cognate phenomena, unbroken by any insuperable gaps. By her own power—whether in one fashion or in another—she brought forth the first materials and forms of life; by her own power she caused these to develop further and further.—Büchner.

ALAS, what millions of men hav been thus employed [on theology] in all countries, ever since the world began! What a blooming paradise would the whole earth be, if the same amount of intellect, labor, and zeal, had been expended on science, agriculture, and the arts!—Lydia Maria Child.

ALL the authors of Benares and Siam agree, that men lived an infinity of ages before they had the sense to make laws, and they prove it by an unanswerable argument, which is, that even at present, when all the world piques itself upon having sense, we hav not yet found the means of making a score of laws passably good. —Voltaire.

THERE is not one life of animals and another of plants, but their existences are similar in nature. The same "vital force" acts within each, and is seen at work also in the mineral kingdom, forming crystals and combining various elements into one form. As all material things are now supposed to be the variations of one original substance, so all the forms of matter are the results of one force manifested in different ways. Thus we come to the unity of all nature. From the original existence of moving matter, the laws of Evolution construct the varied universe.—Robt. C. Adams.

SEND us common sense, O God, and keep thy "only begotten son" to thyself, and make a kirk and mill of him. Will you only do this, Lord God, and you and I will be friends forever. Will you not expose this redemption sham and enjoin upon man to gird up his loins and redeem himself? For Godsake turn his eyes away from that well-meaning rustic who may or may not hav been crucified some two thousand years ago. Direct man to rely upon righteousness and love and high endeavor to redeem himself from crime and sorrow and man's inhumanity to man. Will you do this?—Saladin in God and His Book.

EVERY human being grows up inside a sheath of custom, which enfolds it as the swathing-clothes enfold the infant. The sacred customs of one's early home, how fixed and immutable they appear to the child! It surely thinks that all the world in all times has proceeded on the same lines which bound its tiny life. It regards a breach of these rules (some of them, at least) as a wild step in the dark, leading to unknown dangers. The elders hav always said (and, indeed, it seems only reasonable) that by this time of day everything has been so thoroughly worked over, that the best methods of ordering our life—food, dress, domestic practices, social habits—hav long ago been determined. But if so, why these divergences in the simplest and most obvious matters? And then one thing after another givs way The sacred, world-wide customs in which we are bred turn out to be only the practices of a small or narrow caste or class; or they prove to be confined to a very limited locality, and must be left behind when we set out on our travels; or they belong to the tenets of a feeble sect; or they are just the products of one age in history and no other.—Anon.

FROM BUDDHISTIC SACRED LITERATURE.

WHAT profit, then, in iniquity?—Buddha.

DISGUSTED with all evil deeds.—Sabhiya-sutta (v. 22).

As men sow, thus shall they reap.—Ta-chwang-yan-king-lun (ser. 57).

THE evildoer writhes both in this life and in the next.—Dhammapadu (v. 17).

WHEN a person does evil he lights the fire by which he himself is burnt.—Mulamuli.

YOUR evil words and deeds work ill to yourself.—Fo-sho-hing-tsan-king (v. 2,047).

A Physician's Sermon to Young Men. By Dr. W. Pratt. Price, 25 cents. Prof. R. A. Proctor, the well-known English astronomer, says of it: "Through false delicacy lads and youths are left to fall into trouble, and not a few have their prospects of a healthy happy life absolutely ruined. The little book before us is intended to be put into the hands of young men by fathers who are unwilling or incapable of discharging a father's duty in this respect; and as not one father in ten is, we believe, ready to do what is right by his boys himself, it is well that such a book as this should be available. If it is read by all who should read it, its sale will be counted by hundreds of thousands." The publisher will send 10 copies by mail, postpaid, for $2. Should anyone desire them by the 100 or 1,000 they can make satisfactory terms by correspondence.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress Assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, do hereby respectfully pray and memorialize your Honorable Body to repeal that portion of the Act entitled "An Act to aid in carrying out the Act of Congress, approved April 25, 1890, entitled 'An Act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by the holding of an International Exposition in the City of Chicago'"—approved August 5, 1892, which reads as follows: "That it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition, are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and it is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by the Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modifications of the rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

Also, to repeal that portion of the Act entitled, "An Act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes"—approved August 5, 1892, which reads as follows:

"And it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition, are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and it is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modifications of the rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

We ask the repeal of these portions of these laws for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago, who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you ought to decide is that of the public welfare.

5. It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

Life of Thomas Paine,

WITH A

History of His Literary, Political, and Religious Career in America, France, and England.

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY,

Author of "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," "George Washington and Mount Vernon," "Washington's Rules of Civility," etc.

To Which Is added a Sketch of Paine by William Cobbett.

No real biography of Paine has ever appeared. The so-called Lives of Paine have been mainly the controversial work of pamphleteers, turning chiefly on his religious heresies. Paine was in his fifty-eighth year before he published anything concerning religion, and before that time he had acted an important part in revolutionary movements in the United States, England, and France. But in the religious conflict initiated by him, his political services and military career hav been but inadequately considered. A certain historical ostracism has buried in the archives of various countries a large mass of documents containing records of paramount interest and importance. Mr. Conway has personally searched such records, in Europe and America, and has obtained from these fresh light, not only on Paine, but on various eminent figures in American and European history with whom he was associated. A large amount of unpublished correspondence has been included in the volumes.

Mr. Conway says in his Preface: "In the laborious work of searching out the real Paine I hav found a general appreciation of its importance, and it will be seen in the following pages that generous assistance has been rendered by English clergymen, by official persons in Europe and America, by persons of all beliefs and no beliefs In no instance have I been impeded by any prejudice, religious or political. The curators of archives, private collectors, owners of important documents bearing on the subject, have welcomed my effort to bring the truth to light."

Two vols., royal oct., gilt top, portraits, $5.

Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism examined historically and critically. It is thought to be the most damaging exhibit of Christianity that has appeared. 500 large pages. Price, $1.50.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate on Christianity and Infidelity between D. M. Bennett and Rev. G. H. Humphrey. This book has had a very large sale, and is a splendid work for Freethinkers to loan to Christian neighbors. 550 pages. Price, $1.

Bennett-Teed Discussion. Between D. M. Bennett and Cyrus Romulus R. Teed. Jesus the Lord God Creator of Heaven and Earth. Paper, 30 cents.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. Bennett and G. M. Mair, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. 2. Miracles and supernatural achievements have been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus. 3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history. Bennett affirms; Mair denies. This is an exhaustive discussion. Price, $1 50.

Trial of D. M. Bennett in the United States Circuit Court upon the charge of depositing prohibited matter in the mail. This gives a full history of this celebrated case, and shows what monstrous injustice was perpetrated upon Mr. Bennett. Price, cloth, 75 cts.; paper, 50 cts.

Religion and Cholera.

Religion is responsible for the present prevalence of cholera. It is responsible for the lives that hav been lost, the illnesses endured, the misery, the fear, the stoppage of trade, the destitution, the detention in Europe of would-be immigrants, the expense of quarantine, and an endless list of similar evils. It is responsible for the calamities which the disease may still inflict, before another twelve months hav passed; among other discommodities, the Columbian Exposition may hav to be put off—to religion this must be charged.

For the cholera arises each time in certain districts of India, especially about the delta of the Ganges, where the prevailing religion has to the present day suppressed science so that its own misteachings might flourish; the disease is thence disseminated by the annual religious pilgrimages to the holy cities such as Hurdwar in India, Bokhara in Central Asia, Mershed in Persia, and Mecca in Arabia; in these countries it spreads quickly and extensivly for lack of the sanitary measures which religion has ever forbidden to be taught; from hence it this year entered Russia, a country where a Christian populace has equally exalted priests' mummeries and ignored physicians' prophylactics, and through Russia it reaches us who by a wiser neglect of supernaturalism and regard for fact hav deserved better things.

Thus to those never-ending, abominable world-curses of Brahmanism and Buddhism, Mohammedanism and Christianity, is due all our misery under this hideous scourge.

The first intimation in America of an outbreak of cholera this year in the breeding-place of the disease in India came on April 22d in the shape of a cable dispatch from Calcutta. In this message it was announced that on the preceding day one hundred and eighty cases of the disease had been reported in Benares and that it had been raging there in the shape of a virulent epidemic for some time. In the twenty-four hours preceding the filing of the dispatch one hundred and thirty-five deaths had been reported. Dr. Gregg, the royal sanitary commissioner for Bengal, in a report on the conditions prevailing in the neighborhood of Benares, stated that everything favored the spread of the disease. Over the whole of the affected area it was found that tanks of various shapes had been made containing accumulations of dirty water which was used for household purposes by the nativs. Low, foul jungles reeking with bad smells surrounded these tanks, the surfaces of which were almost completely covered with thick, decaying water-plants. Between and around the houses were narrow lanes, bordered by deep, uneven drains in which filth collected. The substances, under the influence of the hot sun, quickly decomposed. Wherever the people living in houses in the neighborhood of these tanks had used the water there the cholera made its appearance. The tanks were also the sources from which the milkmen obtained water for their cows, and it is more than probable that they diluted the milk they sold with the same water. These practices were upheld by ancient custom, and by that arch fortifier of all custom however absurd or harmful, religion. Medical counsel was disregarded in favor of sacerdotal drivel.

From this part of India the disease seems to hav spread into Central Asia and Asia Minor by means of the religious pilgrimages to Mershed in Persia. It is possible, however, that the propagation of the infection was accomplished by the pilgrimage to Mecca instead. On the pilgrimages to this latter place a traveler returned from those parts writes to the Sun:

"Every year, as is well known, soon after the lunar month of Ramadan, caravans of faithful Mussulmans set out from all parts of the Eastern world to perform the pilgrimage to Mecca, and anyone traveling in the Levant at the present time would be apt to see many of these pilgrims already on the way. After a round of religious ceremonies at Mecca the proceedings culminate in a sacrificial feast called the Great Beiram, upon which occasion every pilgrim is admonished to make a sacrifice of a live sheep. Save a few inconsiderable parts reserved as perquisits and consumed, the carcasses of these sheep, to the number of many thousands, and the blood which flows from the altar in sluices, are left to putrefy and fester under the torrid Arabian sun, offering the best possible conditions for the generation and development of the cholera germs, which are then, by the returning pilgrims, carried into the uttermost parts of the Mohammedan world."

Under the domination of their religion, Persians and Turks resort to extraordinary behavior in the hope of warding off the dread epidemic. In Persia the nativs weep, wail, and gnash their teeth. In Turkey incessant prayers go up to the Prophet, imploring him to preserve his faithful followers from the terrible scourge. A strange ceremony was seen in Mershed the other day. A horse, covered with a tiger skin, was led out into the principal street and all the Persians in the city gathered round him. From the tiger skin hung countless amulets, and the animal was otherwise curiously caparisoned. A lad of sixteen years was mounted on the horse, and, after a black flag had been placed in his hands, the great crowd moved in procession around the market-place, at the head being three young girls, who were dressed in red trousers and black jackets, shouting "Ali Houssem! Ali Houssem!" to which the throng replied with loud prayers, lamentations, and self-flagellation. After a while the procession broke up and the crowd went home and, gathering a supply of provisions, such as bread, mutton, butter, eggs, etc., took it down to the riverside and spent the remainder of the day there feasting, weeping, wailing, and pounding their breasts with their clenched fists. Their one aim was to propitiate their deity and thus escape cholera, and it never occurred to them that they were actually inviting the epidemic by feasting in this mad fashion.

When the cholera reached Russia it found lying open and ready to its ravages a populace as helpless under Christian misbeliefs and mispractices as it had met in Turkey and Persia under Mohammedan. E. B. Lanin, the most eminent of the half-dozen travelers who hav recently been revealing to the world the condition of the Russians, writes of their lack of self-help and dependence on the supernatural:

"This helpless inability or unconquerable repugnance to duly shape the means to the end proposed, this deep conviction that, the first step taken, everything else may be safely left to God or to chance, is manifest in every act of individuals, societies, and representativs of the nation. It strikes us with quite as much force in Siberia as in Moscow, and testifies to Russian nationality as loudly in Archangelsk as in Kieff. Startling disclosures were published by two respectable doctors concerning the hospital of the Russian Sisters of Mercy in Odessa, of which they were the consulting physicians. 'Patients are received,' we are told, 'mainly in order that they should die. They are kept in narrow, moist, stinking cells, are treated in the name of mercy with a degree of cruelty that outstrips the limits of the probable; they are fed with loathsome food, are made to wait eight hours for their medicins, which are prepared in the kitchen along with the meals, being for economy's sake compounded with water instead of spirits, and put up in match-boxes and cigaret-boxes; paralytics are purged with enemas, and sufferers from typhus put in strait-waistcoats. Since the arrival of the new superioress from St. Petersburg a new method of treatment has been superadded, and now patients are healed by charms, spells, and magical formulas.' . . . This mixture of religious faith and presumptuous hope lies at the root of most of the crimes and avoidable accidents of which a large part of contemporary Russian history is composed. It is rank Malebrancheism in the sphere of ethics: a belief that mere mortals are but the occasions of all their so-called acts, which are really performed by God, or fate, the sole efficient cause, who can shape and form them as he pleases. 'Man may walk, but it is God who leads him,' is a Russian proverb."

The same writer has just favored us, through the London Fortnightly Review, with more information. The one impossible thing to do with the Russian, says Lanin, is to make him clean. The Russian people are very malleable in the hands of the czar and the clergy—to use the national expression, can be twisted into a ram's horn. A raw peasant may be suddenly transformed into a brave soldier, a pious priest, or a dangerous conspirator, but nothing short of a miracle will make him clean. Few hav any use for the washwoman. This is true not only of the very poor. Of an inmate of one of the gigantic apartment houses of St. Petersburg, who was a man of property, the Novoe Vremya casually remarked: "He never has his linen washed. Whenever he puts on a shirt he puts it on for good, and he wears it until it drops in shreds off his back."

As for sanitary preparation against cholera, the Russian peasants would look upon this as a profane interference with providence. The origin of this belief is to be found in the fact that the priests regard it as a profane interference with themselvs, certain to decrease the sales of their own anti-cholera remedies of prayers and spells. It is said that the Russians explain the outbreak of the cholera as the result of machinations of English enemies, who went visiting the famin districts last year, and under the pretense of distributing alms to the hungry, bribed Russian physicians to work this spell upon the people. The proper preventivs to use against cholera are the prayers of priests and the counter spells of lasses plowing in the dead of the night. Sanitary precautions are not legitimate. Another difficulty in the way of sanitation is the expense of it. It has been calculated by experts that the sanitation of a peasant's hut would cost seven rubles (about $3.75), and no Russian peasant would think of sparing such a sum for the purpose.

In describing the things which Russians eat and drink, Mr. Lanin says that it requires great caution to keep within limits of decency of language and yet giv an adequate notion of the subject. The foreign visitors to St. Petersburg or Moscow who stroll down "Glutton's Row" will see men and women, boys and girls, devouring hideous messes which would be speedily destroyed by the sanitary officers of other countries. So much for the food of the poor. But it is said that the manner of preparing food in "first-class" bakeries and butcher's shops would not bear relation in plain English. Thus, it is said that in the preparation of the exquisit jams by the most renowned Russian confectioners the seeds are separated from currants, gooseberries, etc., not by means of a mechanical apparatus, but by the application of human lips, poor women being employed to do the work. The facts as to the preparation of the national drink, quass, are of the same sort. The water is said to be no better. No city or hamlet in Russia has drinking water pure enough to meet the requirements of the most tolerant sanitary engineer in more Western countries. In Bakhû, where the cholera found favorable soil, a semi-official Russian journal says that "in many yards stand artificial ponds filled with water carried thither in jars. In this water the inhabitants are wont to perform their daily ablutions, bathing every day. They also use it to wash their fruits and commodities, besides which they drink it." In a scientific treatis by Dr. Kolokoloff on the waters of St. Petersburg, it is said that one of the rivers of the capital receives daily from the city one-seventh of its own bulk in impurities.

The dwellings of the Russian people are in a fearful state of uncleanliness and misery. Even in the most magnificent apartment houses of the Russian capital the tenant who is paying $3,000 a year for his flat knows that under his marble staircase a whole family is hidden away in one room and living in a manner which must endanger his own health. In the tenements of the poor in parts of Russia the distance from floor to ceiling is sometimes not more than three feet, so that the occupants must crawl in upon all-fours to the rags upon which they lie. Disease is greatly on the increase. Diphtheria in particular has become a regular periodical epidemic, the proportion of deaths from this disease to the number of persons attacked being in 1888 greater than in the most malignant cholera known in the nation.

From this God-beloved land of Russia the cholera entered Hamburg, Germany, which it has so fearfully ravaged. This city of Hamburg contains a less proportion of Freethought and Rationalism, and a greater one of Christianity, than most other localities in the nation. Its people liv in close and foul quarters. They hav studied no text-books of hygiene, but are familiar with the catechism. A dispatch from that city on a recent Sunday says:

"The church services were attended by about every decently dressed person in the city. The churches could not hold the throngs, and hundreds of persons stood before the church doors, or under the church windows, listening to the prayers for the abatement of the plague."

Now the dread disease is at our own doors. No community can be safe while there remains on the same globe another community that really believes and practices religion.

German Catholics Bad Citizens.

The German Catholics last week held a congress in Newark, N. J., which was notable for the bold expression of treasonable sentiment by the priestly speakers who addressed the people. The church, by them, was repeatedly put ahead of the government, and they declared their allegiance to it in these words: "We approve what St. Peter approves; we recommend what he recommends; we condemn what he condemns, and we tolerate what he tolerates."

On the school question particularly do the utterances deserve attention. In the resolutions adopted the congress declares that, "following the many declarations of the holy see, particularly of Pius IX. of blessed memory and our present gloriously reigning holy father, and abiding with the direction of our episcopate and the third plenary council of Baltimore, we see in the training of Catholic parochial schools the only means effectivly to preserve and protect faith and morality, and we declare school without religion, in its nature and as experience teaches, dangerous. It is this sad experience to which the demoralization of society to a great extent is due." And the resolutions further call upon "all our Catholic fellow-citizens to giv their votes only to such candidates as take a correct stand on the school question."

In a speech by Priest Heinen are these words: "The church alone is the proper institution to take charge of the education of children. Nor is the right and province of the church, in this respect, limited to only religious education. A religious test must also be applied to secular education, which is worse than worthless if it is not inspired by religion. I claim, therefore, that there is only one school worthy of the name, and that is the parochial school. If we expect that our schools shall hav the desired influence on the minds of our young people, then religious instruction can never be considered a mere secondary affair, but it must, on the contrary, be placed far above secular instruction of any kind. Don't let us be unnatural sons and daughters; don't let us hasten the death of our mother tongues. If that language [German], so dear to us, is to die, then let its death be natural. For the present let us remember that this language is not dead yet, but is, on the contrary, very much alive. We demand that this language be taught in our parochial schools. What the heroes of the German Ultramontane party hav done in the old country we hope to be able to accomplish in this country—in this alleged free land of America. I therefore now propose three cheers for the parochial schools, and especially for the German parochial schools."

There is no need of comment on these sentiments. They are distinctly antagonistic to American principles, and if carried out would make an alien religious government paramount to our state and national governments. The holders of them are bad citizens.

Some Outrageous Religious Legislation.

A neighbor in Newark, N. J., Mr. John W. Ogden, calls our attention to some laws of New York state hitherto overlooked by the Liberals. They might be fitly described as progressiv stealing. The first reads:

"CHAPTER 191. SESSION LAWS OF NEW YORK, 1889.

"An Act to Limit the amount of property to be held by Corporations organized for other than Business purposes. Approved by the Governor, April 25, 1889. Passed, three-fifths being present.

"The people of the state of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

"§ 1. Any Religious, educational, literary, scientific, benevolent, or charitable corporation, or corporation organized for hospital, infirmary, or other than Business purposes, may take and hold property not exceeding in value Two Million Dollars, or the yearly income derived from which shall not exceed One Hundred Thousand Dollars, notwithstanding the provision of any special or general Act heretofore passed or certificate of incorporation affecting such corporations. In computing the value of such property, no increase in value arising otherwise than from improvements made thereon, shall be taken into account.

"§ 2. This Act shall not affect the right of any such corporation to take and hold property exceeding in value the amount specified in section one of this Act, provided such right is conferred upon such corporation by Special Statute.

"§ 2. This Act shall take effect immediately."

The second improves on this by a million dollars:

"CHAPTER 497. SESSION LAWS OF NEW YORK, 1890.

"An Act to amend Chapter One Hundred and Ninety-one of the Laws of Eighteen Hundred and Eighty-nine, entitled: An Act to Limit the amount of property to be held by corporations organized for other than Business purposes. Approved by the Governor, June 4, 1890. Passed, three-fifths being present.

"The people of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

"§ 1. Section one, of Chapter one hundred and ninety-one, of the Laws of Eighteen hundred and Eighty-nine, entitled an Act to Limit the amount of property to be held by corporations organized for other than Business purposes, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"§ 1. Any Religious, educational, literary, scientific, benevolent, or charitable corporation, or corporation organized for hospital, infirmary, or other than Business purposes, 'may take and hold property not exceeding in value Three Million Dollars, or the yearly income derived from which shall not exceed Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand Dollars, notwithstanding the provisions of any special or general act heretofore passed, or certificate of incorporation affecting such corporations. In computing the value of such property, no increase in value arising otherwise than from improvements made thereon, shall be taken into account.'

"§ 2. This Act shall take effect immediately."

The third caps the climax of legalized robbery:

"CHAPTER 553. SESSION LAWS OF NEW YORK, 1890.

"An Act to amend Chapter One Hundred and Ninety-one of the Laws of Eighteen Hundred and Eighty-nine, entitled an Act to Limit the amount of property to be held by corporations organized for other than Business purposes, and relating to such corporations. Approved by the Governor, June 7, 1890. Passed, three-fifths being present.

"The People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

"§ 1. Chapter One Hundred and Ninety-one of the Laws of Eighteen Hundred and Eighty-nine, entitled An Act to Limit the amount of property to be held by corporations organized for other than business purposes, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"§ 1. Any Religious, educational, Bible, Missionary, Tract, literary, scientific, benevolent, or charitable corporation, or corporation organized for the enforcement of laws relating to children or animals, or for hospital, infirmary, or other than business purposes, may take and hold in its own right, or in trust, for any purpose comprised in the objects of its incorporation, property not exceeding in value Three Million Dollars, or the yearly income derived from which shall not exceed Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand Dollars, notwithstanding the provisions of any special or general act heretofore passed, or certificate of incorporation affecting such corporations. In computing the value of such property no increase in value arising otherwise than from improvements made thereon shall be taken into account. The personal estate of such corporations shall be exempt from taxation, and the provisions of chapter four hundred and eighty-three of the laws of eighteen hundred and eighty-five, entitled 'An Act to tax gifts, legacies and collateral inheritances in certain cases' and the acts amendatory thereto, shall not apply thereto nor to any gifts to any such corporation by grant, bequest, or otherwise; provided, however, that this provision shall not apply to any moneyed or stock corporation deriving an income or profit from the capital or otherwise, or to any corporation which has the right to make dividends or to distribute profits or assets among its members.

"§ 2. This Act shall not affect the right of any such corporation to take and hold property exceeding in value the amount specified in section one of this Act, provided such right is conferred upon such corporation by Special Statute; 'nor affect any statute by which its real estate is exempt from taxation.'

"§ 3. This Act shall take effect immediately."

This last amendment is sublime in its impudently aggressiv robbery of the taxpayers. By its provisions the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to animals escape taxation. All the private hospitals, which charge high rates for patients, escape; and, in this city, it exempts the Bible House Society owning a whole block, from which it derives thousands of dollars annually in rentals of stores and offices; it lets out the Tract Society in Nassau street, which also reaps thousands of dollars revenue from rent of its stores and offices; it exempts the Young Men's Christian Association building at Twenty-third street and Fourth avenue, a large portion of which is likewise rented for large sums, and it deprives the state of the revenue heretofore collected from legacies left to benevolent societies—societies usually benevolent only to their officers! It is a colossal religious steal as it is, and it can and will be used to exempt dozens of buildings and thousands of dollars' worth of personal property now paying taxes, thereby adding to the burdens of the producing property, already taxed to what seems the utmost limit.

Both political parties are responsible for this gigantic theft. The city Democrats voted for it for its benefit to the Catholic church; the country Democrats and Republicans because it aids the Protestants. That the religious people asked for such an immense favor shows how strong they consider themselvs to be in politics. Never, since Puritanical times, hav the churches wielded such an influence in state politics as now, and never before in the history of the country hav they pulled so strong a wire in national legislation.

It is impossible to tell at present what this law will cost New York taxpayers. Already in the state over one hundred millions of church and religious property are exempt from taxation, and this will add an indefinit sum. Religious corporations will acquire vast amounts of realty, hold them without paying taxes, and reap the enormous profits of their speculation, only to reinvest and repeat the operation. The possibilities are almost limitless, and there can be but one result if churches take advantage of them—confiscation of such property by the state.

The Baptists of Rev. Mr. McArthur's church in this city recently held a "meeting to ratify the action of Congress in reference to closing the World's Fair on Sundays and to offer thanks to God for his overruling providence in the final settling of this important question." It is well that the Baptists see fit to "ratify" Congressional action; otherwise it might not be law.

The people of the Mosquito reservation, S. A., still believe in black art and necromancy, and hav laws punishing magicians. A short time ago Judge Thomas, of Bluefields, sentenced a man to pay a fine of $100 or go to prison for a year because a witness testified that he had seen the man, after taking a drink, knock a man down like dead, and on blowing some liquor from his mouth over the seeming dead man, he revived. The victim of this judicial medievalism said that the only reason the judge condemned him was because he was poor and his accuser rich, and this is probably true, for it seems impossible that a judge could really believe such evidence true.

A few weeks since we printed a Catholic complaint that the French Freethinkers hav usurped the church rite of baptism, and made it a civil ceremony. At the same time we said that it was probably not the Freethinkers but the Positivists who used the rite. It seems, however, to be a political rite more than a religious one, as the formula runs this way: "Do you undertake the moral and physical guardianship of this child? Do you promis to make him a good citizen and be a second family to him?" On receiving an affirmativ answer the celebrant will say: "In the name of the great principles of the French Revolution, I declare this child to be under the guardianship of Citoyen A and Citoyenne B." The formula was invented by M. Rochefort several years ago and the town of St. Denis appears to be the only place where the ceremony occurs.

An effort is being made to release Mr. Harman on a writ of habeas corpus, though on what grounds it is to be argued he does not state. In his last letter from prison, dated September 4th, the imprisoned editor writes cheerfully. He is allowed to see an occasional visitor, and receives such letters as are approved by the chaplain of the prison. He concludes his grateful acknowledgment of favors received by saying: "Quite a number of books and papers hav been sent me, but in most cases I know not whom to thank, as the name of the donor is not given. I would suggest that those wishing to send me anything by mail had better inclose a stamp for return of letter if rejected, and for notice that the book or other article is not admissible, if such should be the case. As a general direction I would say, don't send me daily papers, nor anything very radical in tendency."

Twelve out of thirteen of the board of women managers of the exhibit of the state of New York for the World's Fair hav protested against the action of Congress in deciding to close the Fair on Sunday. It would be interesting, says the World of this city, to know how women generally regard this matter—whether the twelve are alone in their opinion, or whether the women of the country stand as twelve to one in favor of opening the Fair every day of the week. The World has therefore opened its columns to a discussion of the matter by women, and we suggest that the Free-thinking women of the country add their views and record their votes. Send them to the World, New York city.

The Methodist ministers of this city, at one of their weekly meetings recently, discussed the question of eternal damnation. The general opinion of the old-time preachers was that damnation is eternal, while the younger ones thought it is not. The old fellows admitted that it was disagreeable for them to hav to preach so horrible a doctrin to their congregations; but, they said, it was not for them to say what doctrins they should or should not preach, so long as those doctrins were the teachings of Christ. They wanted no whitewashing of the word of God. A very young minister said he preached the doctrin of eternal damnation for the wicked because it was the teaching of his church, but he preached it just as seldom as he could, and when he had he took pains not to go much into details. He had not faith in eternal damnation himself, as applied to all sinners. "We on earth," he said, "who are civilized, look upon it as one of the cardinal principles of our civilization that in punishing evil-doers we take into consideration their responsibility for their evil-doing. That such a principle embodies justice and mercy none will deny. I believe that in preaching eternal damnation to the wicked, which means all who hav sinned, including infants, heathens, and the unfortunate poor of our great cities, who never hear the gospel, we make two skeptics to one convert. It is strange to me that, while we are always ready to find interpretations for other teachings of scripture which will put them in harmony with our idea of God, we refuse to take anything but the literal meaning of these passages in regard to infant damnation." When the Methodists begin to advance there is hope that the Christian world may some time entertain civilized notions!

In the East.

News and Notes.

It seemed at first as if "providence" was against me on Saturday night, September 24th, when I lectured at Meriden, for just at the hour of gathering it thundered and lightened and the rain poured; and as a consequence only a few were present. But the Turner Singers' Band helped us nobly, and inspired us, notwithstanding the storm, to keep the line of battle. A larger number were out on Sunday afternoon, and on Sunday evening a very good audience greeted me, and there is encouragement for the future. A goodly company, twenty-three in all, joined the Freethought Federation, and these will make a nucleus for work hereafter. Hitherto Mr. N. F. Griswold has had to take the responsibility. It is hoped that others will now come to his aid.

Outwardly Meriden is quite an orthodox place. They are the representativs of wealth and fashion, and are numerous. Yet there is a popular Liberal element. The reform party is here and doing good work, and the drift is to larger and better ideas. Meriden is a model New England city. It is a manufacturing center and is alive with business. It has many elegant structures, beautiful private residences, gardens, and lawns. On Sunday morning with Mr. and Mrs. Griswold I had a delightful drive, viewing from lofty hills the magnificent scenery. Meriden is encircled with splendid hights, and from these the city can be viewed in its picturesque variety—the massiv mills; the dwelling-houses from the little cottage to the superb mansion; the state reform school on a noble elevation, a group of beautiful buildings towering above the trees; the new hospital, a commodious and attractiv place which the women of Meriden hav recently purchased and devoted to its present uses. Beyond the crowded valley and wooded hights adorned with luxurious homes West mountain lifts its forehead to the sky—the first point, it is said, to be seen by the sailors as they voyage landward over the sea, which is eighteen miles distant. Prosperity is to be seen on every side, but here as elsewhere, in the midst of this apparent progress, are the battling forces of riches and poverty.

I was pleased to meet my veteran comrade, A. M. Dignam, who is a generous contributor to our cause. He was a soldier under the flag of the Union, and is equally ready for freedom's greater battle yet to come. Also, Mr. and Mrs. Feris, Mr. John Morse, Mr. and Mrs. Hale, and others, formed our pioneer corps. Mr. E. S. Todd and E. W. Parker were present from Marion, and I was glad to meet these comrades, who will no doubt be of excellent service.

Our Spiritualist friends under the lead of Mr. H. W. Hale are doing good work here helping on the era of humanity.

The Meriden Press, just started, is a vigorous reform journal, and means progress.

I must thank the members of the Turn Verein for the beautiful music which they furnished.

In the home of Mr. and Mrs. N. F. Griswold I found the true Freethought hospitality, and I enjoyed the campaign with its varying defeats and successes.

Oregon and the Proposed Sunday Law.

Oregon is one of the few states in which Sunday laws hav not become very burdensome yet. The Sunday-closing act which closes the doors of all legitimate business houses except drugstores is all the Sunday law now on the statute books. But the Women's Christian Temperance Union is going to make a desperate effort to get a rigid Sunday law through the next legislature, and it had $10,000 to back it as long ago as last April. Now, if an earnest effort is not made to prevent it they will get that law. I propose this: Let us canvass the state thoroughly and circulate petitions against it and asking for the repeal of the present closing law. Let us form clubs in every town and every schoolhouse, and all these clubs resolve against the present and the proposed law. Let us gather these petitions and resolutions together and hav them presented to the next legislature by a good lobbyist. Let us call a convention to meet in Salem one week after the legislature meets and try and come to Salem in such numbers and with such enthusiasm as will impress those solons with the idea that all Oregon is opposed to Sunday law and in earnest. This can be done by speakers going all over the state and organizing committees and furnishing them with petitions to circulate. The committees can send in the petitions to the central committee when all hav signed who will, and also such funds as they can raise to help defray printing, postage, and other expenses. The committees, too, can help agitate for the convention. The sporting men, speed-track men, and baseball clubs, for instance, can be stirred up, for their interests are to be attacked. The theaters, and other amusements, too, will help along substantially no doubt.

If the work is pushed on these lines we can undoubtedly defeat the proposed despotism. But something must be done and done with vim and determination or they will fasten this unholy ordinance upon the people of Oregon.

When has a Sunday law ever been repealed? Let us keep it from being enacted. I will try and be in Portland by the middle of October. It is not worth while trying to do very much until after the presidential election, for now that absorbs the attention of the public to the exclusion of everything else except prizefights.

Let us make the time between the election and the convening of the legislature a time of enthusiastic work.

THE Manhattan Liberal Club lectures for October are as follows. The Club meets at 220 E. 15th street:

October 7th, "Jeffersonian Democracy," Samuel P. Putnam.

October 14th, "The Heaven and Hell of Politics," Voltairine de Cleyre.

October 21st, "The Persistence and Utility of Fiction," Van Buren Denslow.

October 28th, "The Free-Banking Solution of the Currency Problem," Widden Graham.

W. F. JAMIESON is expecting to attend the Secular Congress at Chicago. For lectures address him at Mosca, Col.

THE next meeting of the Syrian Society will be held at the house of William McLaury, M.D., 244 W. 42d street, on Thursday, Oct. 6th, at 8 P.M.

The ——bath Day.

The religious painter who embellishes fences and sheds with scriptural sayings painted on a farmer's fence in western Massachusetts the injunction: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." Along came some Peck's bad boy, who easily changed it to: "Remember the bath day to keep it holy."

The Kansas Freethinkers' Convention.

We are indebted to Lucifer for the following report of the third annual convention of the Kansas Freethinkers' Association held at Ottawa, September 9th to 14th. Mrs. Etta Semple presided.

Saturday evening Mr. A. Rose, of Lawrence, occupied the platform, presenting arguments to tear down Bible superstition. A heavy rain kept the people at home, a very small audience being present.

Sunday afternoon J. E. Remsburg gave a strong address on the Sunday question, and in the evening lectured on "False Claims." A large audience was in attendance, which he held by r is eloquence.

Monday forenoon was spent in business session, and short talks by nearly all present on the subject of "Right Over Duty," being thoroughly handled.

Monday afternoon Lois Waisbrooker lectured to women on "Perfect Motherhood." After her lecture the audience, with one accord, asked a repetition of this able lecture. The request was granted. Mrs. Hodge, of Ottawa, followed with a paper on the "Theory of Christian Science."

Monday evening L. D. White, secretary, read a lecture on "Woman's Dangerous Friends," wherein she showed the fact that woman has many enemies among her pretended or so-called friends, the church being the worst enemy of all. Her appeal for Moses Harman, now in prison, was well received.

Tuesday morning was devoted to passing resolutions and electing officers. The resolutions adopted are as follows:

WHEREAS, the so-called Christian Sabbath has no foundation in nature nor in the inherent needs of man, nor even in the authority which the prevailing sects called Christian claim for it, therefore:

Resolved, That its enforced observance as a holy day is in direct violation of our natural, inherent rights, and that the closing of the World's Fair on th t day is not only an act of tyranny against the citizens of this republic, but an insult to the citizens of other nations, and presents a spectacle to the civilized world inviting contempt and ridicule.

Resolved, That we indignantly protest against all religious or governmental control in the realm of thought, discussion, and peaceable propaganda, as an unwarrantable interference with our liberties and a bar across the path of progress; that,

WHEREAS, It is considered a crime not to giv warning when a contagious disease makes its appearance, that proper precautions may be taken to prevent its spread among the people; and,

WHEREAS, We consider it equally criminal not to giv warning, and in language that the people can understand, when a moral disease, one which involves the physical life-center of the race, makes its appearance; and,

WHEREAS, Moses Harman, of Topeka, Kan., editor of Lucifer, the Light-Bearer, is now undergoing sentence in Kansas state prison for having given such warning, placing it in the hands of the people through the only channel at his command; therefore,

Resolved, That any law which tends to prevent the full and free discussion of whatever pertains to the physical and moral welfare and happiness of the people is in direct violation of our natural and inherent rights, and we earnestly urge the individual and united efforts of all lovers of liberty to secure the abrogation of all such laws now upon our statute books and to see to it that no more are passed.

Resolved, That the incarceration of Moses Harman demands the indignant protest of all progressiv men and women as unjust, invasiv, and tyrannical, as worthy of Torquemada, or the theocratic government of the Dark Ages.

Resolved, That in the imprisonment of a man whose integrity and personal moral worth hav never been questioned by his most persistent persecutors, this while thieves, murderers, and moral lepers who subscribe to and sustain the rule of the church as she acts through the state, are at liberty, we see foreshadowed, not only our own fate, but the fate of all who dare to oppose the superstitions of the past as embodied in the church of to-day, provided the church gains the power she seeks, which she is sure to do unless all Liberals are awake and activ.

The following officers were elected: president, Mr. Mayberry, of Burlingame, Kan.; vice-president, S. W. Day, of Ottawa, Kan.; secretary, Etta Semple, of Ottawa, Kan.; treasurer, M. Semple, of Ottawa, Kan. Letters were read from Prof. J. H. Cook, "Diana," E. W. Chamberlain, H. Harman, Voltairine de Cleyre, Annie E. Parkhurst, Ida Ballou, Governor Robinson, and Dr. A. C. Williams. A vote of thanks was tendered the Ottawa Republican for the report it gave of the convention.

Tuesday evening Lois Waisbrooker spoke to a large audience, combining her two lectures, "The Lessons of the Present Hour" and "Perfect Motherhood."

Sunday afternoon, in response to an appeal from the vice-president to consider ways and means of continuing the association on a solid basis, J. E. Remsburg gave some encouraging and practical ideas on the advantages and utility of organization, of which the members were not slow in taking advantage. Money enough to defray expenses of the next annual convention was pledged, thus removing the financial responsibility from one or two members who hav heretofore carried it, and insuring life and strength to the association. Mrs. Semple, who writes the report, concludes: "Pleasant acquaintances were made and renewed, and all went home feeling encouraged to come next year, working together in a common cause for truth, and to oppose error and superstition."

Waiting for the Coming Change.

'Twas once the man who marshaled mighty armies,
Who held a viselike grip on all mankind,
Who ruled by sword with valor's muscle wielded
The world and all its wealth and all its mind.

The despot dared to speak in voice of thunder
His mandates to the masses 'neath command,
And dared to march into the thick of battle
With unsheathed sword puissant in his hand.

'Twas then that chivalry elected rulers,
And monarchy paraded undisguised;
But now 'tis said the people choose their leaders,
And statecraft as high justice stands revised.

We question not the purpose of the people,
As spoken by the patriots years agone,
When in the Western world was planned a nation
Where noblemen and kings should not be born.

But still we question what the years are bringing;
We see proud monarchy regaled in lies,
And legislation and her legislators
The tools of crafty despots in disguise.

And now truth-speaking men can gain no station
To aid in making or unmaking laws.
The raptores, the cormorants of traffic,
Hold common manhood cringing in their claws.

The banker, the high priest of things financial,
Exacts his usury in tithes of gold,
And men bow down in worship to the dollar,
And gold is god—her priest the king of old.

'Twas armies once that were the slaves of despots.
'Tis labor's army now, the slaves of those
Who lobby through the laws of trade and money,
Far from the battle's front and safe from blows.

Far back along the paths of shipwrecked nations,
Their record this one simple story tells:
'Tis how the wealthy few gain all possessions
Until the frantic downtrod mass rebels.

As tower up the millions now fast piling
Within the coffers of the cunning crew,
To speak of sovereign people seems ironic
When bribes can buy a law to please the few.

I wait to see a change that fast is coming,
I wait to see the wealthy stronger grow,
I wait to see the downtrod mass uprising
To civilization's final overthrow.

When slaves are made of men whose narrow reason
Is bound by superstitious fetters strong,
Whose minds are groping in untutored darkness,
Blind to the rights that to all men belong,

When these are ground upon by heel of despot
Uprisings may be weak, at last extreme.
Long they forbear and fear and hope and tremble,
Intoxicate, hope on, submit, and dream.

But when intelligence beneath oppression
Is harder pressed, for a brief time she lies
Quiescent and obeys her lord and leader,
And strives by honesty in peace to rise.

But as the pressure on some strong explosiv
Increases, so intelligence must be
Beneath a despot pressure fast approaching
A point where every atom must be free.

A moment in the eons of oppression,
From peace to chaos, civilization's knell,
Down falls accumulated wealth of ages
Into the caldron of a self-made hell.

We walk beside a sea whose waves are growling,
But dashing harmless on a gilded strand,
We walk above a crater only rumbling,
Safe seems the shore, secure the solid land.

Around the world are little strikes recurring,
All vain are labor's throes of pain to right
The wrong accumulated in past ages,
By cunning craft made virtue in our sight.

How brave is he, the lordly law-upholder!
He who upholds a law to make him slave!
Hark to his pratings of our mighty nation!
His pen is mighty and his speech is brave.

He swears to execute all tyrant orders
That knaves hav purchased with the idol, gold;
He talks of independence when his language,
Yea, and his very manhood, has been sold.

And this is business; let the fool dare utter
An honest, manly thought urged not by gain,
Contempt, derision, scorn, becomes his portion;
Without his plot a man is deemed insane.

But still I wait to see a change fast coming,
I wait to see the wealthy stronger grow;
I wait to see the downtrod mass uprising
To civilization's final overthrow.

Cathlamet, Wash. DR. BOYNTON.

A Sweeping Challenge.

Nearly all, if not all, of the writings of the so-called fathers of the church, and most of the Latin classics, were fabricated after the revival of learning in the fourteenth century. ANTICHRIST.

Fact Less Prevalent Than Fiction.

The old saying made it "stranger"—doubtful in the minds of some, while the above statement can be questioned by no intelligent observer. How it has come to pass that fiction is the more popular, that error still has the upper hand of truth, may be one of the unsolved problems of our age. That it is so, however, is seen and lamented by all good Freethinkers and scientists; nevertheless consoled by seeing errors receding and facts gaining. In our age of wonderful material progress it is gratifying to see the mental and moral element likewise advancing. This being the climax of all that is good, it is humiliating to see it in the rear, exhilarating to see it moving to the front. Readers are exhorted to remember that this is due to our honorable workers—writers, readers, and lecturers. In the domain of Freethought there should be no "deadheads." The truths we learn should be taught to others. If appreciated, they will be disseminated. Neither reason, philanthropy, self-respect, nor respect for our fellows, can afford to let them lie dead. Truth, when rightly handled, is powerful and will prevail. Besides, the Latin saying should be verified, "Qui docet dicit"—he that teaches learns. Our only way to enjoy truth, to make it liv in us and us liv in it, is to use it, to spread it.

How often are we told by precept and example to let Christians alone, nor incur the displeasure of nominal believers in the Bible. Folly will it be said to incur the boycott of customers by disclosing your doubts on religion. To say that you do not know God, that you even entertain a doubt of his existence or wisdom, is dreadful. At once discretion becomes the better part of valor, and a virtual consent to radical error, assumption, and superstition results. Instead of doing what ought to be done for truth and reason, the compromising party is really doing all that religion could ask. In the days of Christ, as the Testament has it, evil spirits only asked to be let alone—all that the old slaveholders asked, all Jeff Davis and secession asked, and about all churches are now asking. Simply stop thinking, talking, lecturing, writing, and publishing, letting priestcraft alone, and we hav peace; agitate in behalf of truth and we hav war. Then comes the intolerance of superstition to spike the cannons. Wholly unable to stand fire, of which the cowardice of error is conscious, the dernier resort is brute force—the tar-and-feather argument of slavery, the revival of the Inquisition. Dreadful as once these were, they are no longer so.

But let us spend a few minutes on facts and fiction.

Is it not a fact that matter, in its ever-changing form, has always been and ever must be? The impossibility of annihilating it has again and again, time out of mind, been demonstrated.

The fiction is that in the beginning God created it from nothing. Before this beginning this unchanging God had been in eternity, the only possible existence, seeing nothing, knowing nothing, doing nothing. Nothing to see, nothing to know, nothing to do. Without variableness or the shadow of turning this God took a notion to create first the matter of our little world out of nothing, then the sun and moon to rule it out of nothing, and having a good bit of nothing left over, an infinit universe of suns and planets! This is the fiction prevailing over the solid science of facts.

At the same time he formed Adam out of dust, found him finally lonesome, put him to sleep, took out one of his ribs, and made him a wife. Then comes one variety of his snakes and induces the silly woman to eat an apple to gain knowledge, that she might know good from evil. Had Paul been there to hav her learn of her husband at home, it might not hav been that

In Adam's fall
We sinned all.

Then come their sons, Cain and Abel, the one a meat-eater, the other a vegetarian. Abel brought the firstlings of his herds, murdered them outright, offered their warm blood a sweet-smelling savor to his God; Cain came on with his vegetables and fruits, an insult to his blood-loving God, and was cursed and exiled to the land of Nod. There, however, he was consoled by courtship, marriage, and a large family of children. Where and how the wife and the prolific mother got there is another unsolved problem. Still, fiction being the most popular, at once it prevails over all stubborn facts.

Here we hav no more than the beginning, the A B C's, of the absurd and demoralizing fictions running through the tedious books bound into one big volume, called the Bible, sent broadcast into our civilized world under the outrageous fiction of being God-inspired. Go carefully and patiently through the whole domain of science in search of a single fact to sustain the book, and a flat failure results. On the contrary, every science, and every fact in every science, protests against the silly, obscene, and bloody volume.

The leading command in the Christian's Testament, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature, that he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned," is the floodgate of the Christ fiction. To teach that the human intellect can believe according to its wishes, and then bribe it with the offer of eternal life to believe a tissue of silly falsehoods, is to start an epidemic of insanity against all philosophy. W. PERKINS.

Party Principles.

In August Mr. Steenerson called me to account for some statements made in an article entitled, "Prohibition Party Principles," and asked me to point out some of the great men produced by the saloons.

My friend must pardon me for not being able to agree with him, and also for failing to make my meaning plain. I do not believe the saloons produce any great men, but I do believe the Prohibition ideas of taxes, revenues, etc., produce the saloons—that is, make it possible for saloons to exist. I look upon a Prohibitionist as a variety of orthodox; ready to cut off the head and tear out the bowels of him who differs in belief, and to the same class and kind of people we owe all the taxes, licenses, and revenue imposed upon the sale of spirits. This taxation I believe to be the cause of the social evil produced by the saloon. The saloon is bad because it is made a means of sociability, and treating is the means of leading young people into the habit of drinking. Take off the taxes of various kinds and we know that whisky would be so cheap that no retail liquor business could be carried on with any hope of profit. There would be no saloon. Liquor would be almost as cheap as water (and cheaper than water is in some parts of our state), therefore when we drank liquor it would only be when we wanted it. The old confirmed glutton would soon drink himself to death, perhaps, but the young man who has not acquired the habit would not be required to refuse the sociability of a friend or a dozen friends in order to keep sober. Two glasses of liquor would be worth .001, one mill, one-tenth of a cent, and the "good fellow" would hardly feel justified in "blowing in" one-tenth of a cent to show his sociability. The amount "blown in" would show his meanness if anything. Therefore he would take a drink of water without asking his friend to join him. There are many things stated which I believe, but there are many more which I do not believe. I hav read many books of science and many books of facts. When I read and find demonstrated a scientific fact I believe it, but when I read of a miracle performed two or three thousand years ago by faith and recited by a writer who does not sign his own name, or who signs the name of a second or third party who was deceased at the time, and who says of the demise and burial of the said deceased, "And no man knoweth of the place of his burial even unto this day," I can hardly believe the story, for reasons which are apparent, although the story itself may be clothed in such beautiful language as to almost produce the rustle of angels' wings. I believe that two and two are four, because by demonstration it proves to be so, and it takes no portion of faith to prove it. I do not believe that the genealogy of Joseph makes a proper pedigree with which to prove Jesus Christ is a descendant of the house of David. If it is true that he is the son of the Holy Ghost instead of the son of the aforesaid Joseph, there is no scientific fact to bear out such a proposition; and in order to believe such a statement it is necessary to plaster it over with faith to such a degree that what little truth there is in it is covered out of sight. Being compelled to doubt his "inspired" genealogy, compels me to wonder which part of the inspired history, if any, is correct. I do not believe that any God or family of gods created the world in six days, because the stratified rocks of the earth's crust plainly indicate that the earth was millions of years in process of formation. I do believe that to produce vegetable growth requires sunshine; therefore I cannot believe that God made the grass one day and the sun and moon and stars the next afternoon. It is not because I do not want to believe, but it is because it is impossible for it to be true. My faith is not strong enough to dispute demonstrated truth. I believe and know by seeing with my own eyes that the throat of a whale is not large enough to admit a whole live man into the stomach. Therefore I find it impossible to brace up my faith to that extent necessary to convince me that a whale swallowed Jonah, and that he wandered around in his belly for three days and three nights and was then puked up upon dry land, or upon any land, or at all. I do not believe the saloon ever produced any great men. Neither do I believe the Prohibition party ever produced any great men, and I hav never met any great men who hav helped produce the Prohibition party. I do believe the saloon has ruined great men, because I hav seen the fact with my own eyes, and I believe that the same people who compose the Prohibition party now hav been the means of taking spirituous liquors out of grocery and drug stores and calling into existence the saloon business. It requires no faith to believe this, because I hav seen it all. If the saloon is a curse to society, as I know it to be, and the Prohibition party is the direct cause of the saloon, then who should answer the indictment? The present components of the Prohibition party are proud to claim the honor of fathering all the laws made against (?) the use of spirituous liquors. That these identical laws made the saloon business possible—because profitable—requires no grain of faith to believe. Not even a rational Prohibitionist will deny it. I do not believe the members of the party in general realize the mischief they hav been and are working, but I believe the powers behind their throne to be those manufacturers of spirituous and malt liquors who are financially interested in keeping the price of liquor high enough to insure the financial prosperity of the saloon. Scientifically demonstrated, it requires a disordered organism to believe and acknowledge in convention assembled that "almighty God is the source of all true government." That is the old, played-out political doctrin of kings, emperors, and absolute monarchs. That is the source from which they get their authority to behead their subjects at pleasure. That is the source from which Christian religion always received its authority to place unbelievers upon the rack and sacrifice innocence on the altar of bigotry. That is the source of authority under which the Israelites murdered the people of whole cities and debauched thousands of pure maidens; and that is the authority which has bathed the world in blood time after time. By God we hav suffered enough, and the average American citizen and voter whose liver and heart and gall and mind are in a healthful state of activ operation does not recognize any such authority in our government. He recognizes a majority vote of his fellow-citizens and that alone.

If Jehovah, the Jewish God represented in mass convention by the Prohibition party, is to take a hand in our national politics it is time for Freethinkers to think freely. Follow his history back a few thousand years. You can easily follow it by the trail of blood left by the wars and murders authorized and ordered by him. You can follow his trail by the crimes committed in his name, by the smell of human flesh roasted at the stake and on the altar to appease his anger, and by the murders of innocent babes which hav been committed to please his vanity. My friend Mr. Steenerson may think I am too radical, but I do not like the idea of prohibiting, and I do not like the result of the work of these cranks who recognize no other authority than that monster of monsters who rules only by superstition and ignorance, murder, famin, scourge, and Prohibition. F. H. HEALD.

A Sure Cholera Preventiv.

When we learn that a certain infallible preventiv of Asiatic cholera has been in use for sixty years, obscurely at first, and later quite prominently, it astonishes us that wider publicity has never been given to it. One great cause of the neglect of it is the large number of remedies published, and another is the favor given to certain formulas by different medical schools. The remedy and preventiv referred to here is sulphuric acid diluted and made into a kind of lemonade. Sixty years ago it had been observed that men working in sulphur mines were exempt from cholera, although people were dying all around them of the said plague. Some years later experiments were made by single practitioners with marked success in the use of sulphur fumes on cholera patients. When it became quite certain that it is the acid of the sulphur which was the efficient remedy and preventiv, experiments were made on a large scale. Some thirty-five years ago, many crucial and most cruel tests were made. Thus, although morally certain that this acid was a sure preventiv and remedy if taken in time, yet in the same cholera hospitals patients on one side of the floor were treated with the acid, on the other according to custom by the use of other medicins. Also in communities where the cholera appeared similar experiments were made with the acid as a preventiv. To some, and these most exposed, it was given, while others were neglected. Never in a single instance did the acid fail, while thousands all around and among the favored patients died of cholera. And now, of late, since the cholera bacillus has been detected and isolated, it has been demonstrated that the approach of sulphuric acid annihilates it. The beverage is made by taking twenty drops of dilute sulphuric acid to four ounces of water with lemons and sugar ad libitum. Our government published in 1875 a Report on cholera visitations. Executiv Doc. No. 95, first page, 17, has a thorough report of some experiments demonstrating the certainty of the acid as a remedy and prophylactic. Also it givs a formula for making the sulphur acid lemonade, same as hereinbefore given.

If this is so, one may ask why it is not better known. But anyone who has made a study of such things will not be astonished. For instance, the free use of lemons in small-pox renders that disease almost harmless. It was that which saved Voltaire's life when abandoned to die by all the eminent doctors of Paris attending him. Then came one who said it was too late, but he would "try anyhow." It took sixty quarts of lemonade to save him, said Voltaire afterward.

Over twenty years ago, Dr. Moore, of Ironton, O., rediscovered this remedy, went out in the midst of a great epidemic of small-pox, feeding lemons to hundreds of patients; in the worst cases never losing one. He published widecast his discovery. Yet who knows anything about it? Some few doctors hav got hold of it and use it with unfailing success, but the mass never heard of it, or shrug their shoulders at "an old woman's remedy." That most splendid example of American literature, a true classic, Parton's "Life of Voltaire," givs an account of Voltaire's case. HOLT.

Religion and Revenue.

The priest intimidates the poor, and on their mites he grows fat. He flatters the rich, and with their gifts builds grand temples and pretty parsonages. While pretending to honor poverty, he never says, Enough.

It is estimated that in Mexico the churches possess fully one-half of the real property; and in Spain, Italy, and some other Christian lands, as great or greater proportion may be in clerical control.

Look up and down our own richest avenues and see at short distances apart gorgeous temples in which to worship a god so poor as not to hav had a place to lay his head. And the priests of these temples, as they do in all Christendom, exercise an oppressiv influence on our civil government. They build the most costly structures in the most desirable places, and then order the community to exempt them from taxation to pay for paving, flagging, and lighting their borders, and protecting them generally. Consequently taxes on all o her property are higher; and every person who pays tax or rent, or buys the necessaries of life, is forced to contribute support to the priest. Yet some folks, in face of this fact, consider themselvs free. Besides this great public favor, the poor believers hand in their weekly if not daily mites; and the rich often, after a lifelong support of stylish theological mansions here, bequeath vast sums to purchase the best seats in some mansion in the skies. By so doing they may wrong their children, but it pleases their God, saves them from a hell, and builds another church on the next corner.

Nearly all Christian denominations of any note succeed in getting money. Only those like the Universalists, that try to run a church without a hell attachment, fail; which proves that multitudes still are superstitious cowards, and that most of the enormous revenue is obtained through fear.

Now the man who, after church attendance for years at an annual cost of fifty dollars less or more, becomes convinced that the church is a fraud whether the priest knows it or not; that it is both absurd and expensiv to hire anybody to pray to the clouds, and stops payment therefor, does not feel a necessity of immediately devoting the fifty dollars to hire some one to knock out the priest. For a while at least he enjoys his freedom quietly, and recuperates his purse if not boycotted. Then he will patronize some Liberal literature at say one-fourth of his old church tax. Such a man very rarely bequeaths any sum to build Antichristian halls. Yet is he more generous than a believer in goblins, for he is not governed by fear. It is gratifying to know that persons of this class are rapidly increasing in numbers, in courage, in generosity, without fear of a hell. Hell is the best card ever played for raising revenue; but Freethinkers do not depend on it for their existence.

But there is now another and a larger class of free thinkers, or rather free actors, to be considered. Thousands of young persons, after attending church and Sunday-school for a few years, influenced by liberal surroundings, become emancipated from slavish fear and break away from the priest. Few of this class read the Bible enough to know the cruelties and immoralities there attributed to its God, or enough of history to learn the past horrid character of the Christian church, and to be prepared to combat the priest. They enjoy the precious freedom of belief without knowing its cost or value. They know little of the tyranny exercised by the church for centuries over the minds of men—rack, dungeon, fagot, ever ready to stop a heresy on the earth from going round the sun. There is nothing so effectiv to demolish the priest of to-day as the portraiture of the priest of the past.

Many of the most influential men of our Revolution were unbelievers. They had been party to a little church history themselvs, and were familiar with it. Most of the colonists had but just escaped from persecution; and as the believers were of many denominations, the unbelievers like Jefferson were able to keep their God out of the Constitution. We owe our present freedom to the divisions and animosities among Christians themselvs. But now, in this latitude at least, seeing their God and their devil, and their revenue, in peril of annihilation through free examination, Protestants and Catholics, with even some Jewish rabbis, are now plainly showing a disposition to act in concert for the reëstablishment of church domination.

History, so far as it goes, is a record of human experiences; and the young Liberal should study it to be better prepared to resist the priestly conspiracy. He will there learn that human progress has not been an unbroken ascent. At many a time and place has a little torch of freedom been lighted and after burning hopefully for a brief season been suddenly extinguished by an avalanche of fanatical bigotry. Many a cry for liberty has been silenced in blood. Human passions are as they ever were; and like causes bring forth like effects.

Granted that we are more intelligent than any who hav gone before. In her brightest days Greece was as much in advance of other nations as this country is in advance of others to-day; and could any cultured Greek then hav imagined it possible that his glorious country would ever be reduced to its present degraded condition? Are we conscious of the extent of superstition and bigotry still in the world? Without going to Asia or Africa, look at the peoples of Europe. Are they not governed by pope, czar, and emperor through their superstition and bigotry? The monarchs and bishops each claim divine appointment and stand united against individual liberty. They hav never yet fully acknowledged the French republic; and when, on the next European war, that republic is destroyed, the American may not feel quite so sure of the endlessness of his own liberty.

The study of man in his earliest conditions is very interesting. The book of geology is being gradually opened, revealing him as living in caves, cutting up and skinning his game with sharpened flint stones, and lodging amidst the refuse. Then he is found making scratches on tree and stone—his first attempts at drawing. In process of time he tries to record unusual events by suggestiv characters. And thus ages pass along.

Primitiv man, in his innocent savagery, imagins a god or a demon in every object; and he gradually evolves a vague system of supernatural powers. Not till he learns more of things natural does he lose faith in the unnatural. Superstition and fear constitute his entire being; and even now, through heredity, most persons are more or less subject to their baneful influences.

In early times each branch of the human races conceived a god or deity patterned after its own chiefs. Instead of a god making man in his image, barbarous man makes a god in his image. Many such gods hav been made. In process of time, a lot of Arabs, in their excessiv egotism, constructed a god which they proclaimed was above all other gods and could lick 'em all out. Arabian and Jewish chronicles record many of this lord-god's exploits, and tell of his spoils and his revenue.

The primitiv man should not be blamed. To him a volcano is proof of a hell; an earthquake indicates his god's wrath. But the willfully ignorant man of to-day, who through fear still fattens the priest, should be ashamed. Some allowance may be given the Catholic; but the Protestant, who claims the right to examin the Bible stories and the assumptions of the priest; who claims the right of private judgment; and then neglects to exercise such rights, and continues to hire a priest to stand between him and his god's wrath, is unworthy of the degree of liberty which this country affords. But the priest praises his piety and collects the revenue.

He who takes no interest in the conditions and habits of man in times past; no thought of his struggles for existence; his slow progress in knowledge; his perplexity in regard to every phenomenon; his contentions with the elements and with enemies; his fear of some terrible god and his readiness to sacrifice his life for the god, cannot half appreciate his own more happy condition.

On reading a History of Devils and Demonology, I am moved to parodize in manner following:

Should you ask me why I ponder
On the life of man primeval?
Why I linger in past ages,
Ages slowly bringing changes,
Making man a trifle wiser
As the cycles of time go by?
From the records I should answer,
That the freedom of the present,
Freedom from the priest and prophet,
All the knowledge, art, and science,
Tell the story of the races,
Tell the gains of generations,
Tell the sum of evolution.
Remember our progenitors,
How they struggled with the demons,
With the demons, the hobgoblins,
In the boundless past so full of myth;
How they peopled mount and woodland,
Vale and woodland, with weird phantoms;
Saw in lightning's lurid flashes
An angry God hurling vengeance,
Heard its voice in thunders frightful,
Felt its power in plague and tempest,
Held in thrall of superstition;
How followed blind the priest and seer,
Loyal to him who threatened them,
Kissing the hand that plundered them,
Believing him who sat enthroned
A power divine, to be obeyed.
How gods and priests commanded them
To be as slaves or suffer death.
Oh, prize the good evolved in time—
The progress made by humankind:
God with two o's! giv it the praise,
Not priestly prayers wrought it for us,
Nor victim's blood bought it for us,
Nor gods, nor heavens, sent it to us:
It comes with marks of toil upon it,
With marks of toil and strife upon it,
The outcome of all ages in it,
Evolution written on it.

An Open Letter to Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

CASS CITY, MICH., Sept. 9, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Having taken your paper for some time, and having never imposed upon you my opinion, I now ask you one favor: Inclosed find article written by T. Strickland Fisk, "An Open Letter to Col. Robert G. Ingersoll." If you will cause the same to be published in your valuable old TRUTH SEEKER you will confer a favor on D. P. DENNING, M.D.

DEAR SIR: This great American republic is to-day engaged in the most important political warfare ever waged by the subjects of this or any nation in the history of the world. A warfare by the wealth-producing, non-wealth-owning class, against the non-producing but wealth-owning class. A war for right and justice against injustice and wrong. After more than thirty years of dictation and rule by the political faction to which you ascribe allegiance, we find this a nation of millionaires and mendicants. We see that at least one-half of all the wealth of this nation is exempt from taxation, and the burden of supporting this government is heaped upon the labor, the productiv industry, the bone and muscle, of the land. At the close of this thirty years, we see on the one hand five million American paupers and nine million mortgaged homes, while on the other hand, clothed in white linen and pearls, is an army of eighty thousand millionaires. In fact, we hav to-day a nation of the millionaires, by the millionaires, and for the millionaires. Why this complete perversion from that which the beloved Lincoln desired this nation to be? It seems to me this should be the all-important problem, just at this crisis, for every American patriot who has love for humanity and sympathy for the oppressed.

My dear sir, I believe it was at Indianapolis, Ind., in the campaign of 1876, in one of the most eloquent speeches, in some respects, that ever fell from the lips of man, that you gave utterance to these words: "I hav a dream that prisons will not always curse the earth; that the shadow of the gallows will not always fall on the land; that the withered hand of want will not always be stretched out for charity; that finally wisdom will sit in the legislature, justice in the courts, charity will occupy all the pulpits, and that finally the world will be controled by liberty and love, by justice and charity." A more sublime hope never originated from the brain of any philanthropist. In that same speech you also made use of these words: "Probably no subject in the world is less generally understood than that of money." This is emphatically true when you reach the great masses of the Republican party, who hav been misled and deceived by the twaddle, sophistry, and rot of political speeches during the campaign. Continuing you said: "We are told that the government can create money. This I deny. The government produces nothing. It is precisely the same way with an individual as it is with the government. I say that he cannot make something out of nothing. The United States government cannot make money. If you go to buy a bushel of wheat, and you get 'fiat' money, the man can say, 'I will take $1 in gold for that wheat, but I want $5 if you pay me in "fiat" money.' Then if Congress says you must fix the price of wheat, it must fix the price of making a speech in a lawsuit; it must fix the price of every article or else it cannot make its money. If this government has the power to make money, why should it collect taxes from us? Why don't they make it and let us alone? If the government can make money, how much can it make? How will I get my share? The other day I told the principal gentleman on that side, whenever you can successfully palm off on a man a bill of fare for a a dinner, I shall believe in your doctrin; and when I can satisfy the pangs of hunger by a cook-book I shall join your party." No worse sophistry was ever uttered upon a political stump. As witnesses in support of this assertion, I will cite Jefferson, Jackson, Webster, Thaddeus Stephens, and Abraham Lincoln. I also refer you to the decision of the United States Supreme Court upon this question. And when the grand and gallant Weaver, the second Wendell Phillips in American slavery to-day, proves to the thousands and thousands who listen to him daily that we hav $400,000,000 less of legal-tender currency in circulation to-day than we had twenty-seven years ago, and declares that "we hav not money enough in this country," then it is that some weasel-faced, pin-headed country town lawyer, or Republican newspaper editor, will quote this from your sixteen-year-old speeches, and imagin that he is setting the world on fire with his political wisdom. I hav known several Republican Congressmen to quote or steal pages of these old speeches of yours, and the Republican country town papers would publish it, word for word, giving to their dear readers the great learning and wisdom of Congressman So and So upon the great questions of finance. I state these facts, my dear sir, to remind you of the gross wrong and the great amount of mischief you hav caused in the ranks of the silly and weak-minded Republican voters of this great nation.

A few days prior to the Omaha convention the public press reported Judge Gresham as having remarked that should he get the nomination he expected Colonel Ingersoll would take the stump in his behalf, or words to that effect. The empire plutocracy shook and trembled from one end of this continent to the other; in fact, the shock reached Lombard street, London, causing the old Jewish faces of the Rothschilds to quiver and turn pale at the thought that such a cannonade of holy truth and eloquence was likely to turn upon their unholy forts and arsenals of the stolen millions of the people's wealth. But when the electric flash conveyed the news that the judge had declined to enter the great conflict this unholy plutocratic band of brigands sobbed a sigh of relief.

My dear sir, not less than twenty million souls from the intelligent ranks of the tillers and toilers of this great republic would rejoice to see the powerful eloquence of truth from your great brain and tongue shoot into the ranks of plutocracy in their behalf, during the present conflict. One great speech in behalf of toiling humanity from the world's greatest living orator, from him who has said so many beautiful things concerning the farm, the home, the family, and the "liberty of man, woman, and child," would come, just at this crisis, almost as a revelation from the great beyond. It would go forth as a cherub and seraph on tireless wings, baptizing as with holy fire the best heart, conscience, and brain of sixty million of souls. It would go out as a cloud by day and pillar of fire by night, directing and leading the toiling millions into the great highway of prosperity, honor, and glory.

In the name of all that is dear and sacred in our national republic; in the name of her millions and millions who suffer and toil under the dreary yoke of debt and despair; in the name of all her soldiers North and in the name of all her soldiers South whose sufferings no language can portray; and in the name and by the virtue of a blessed union of the "blue and the gray," the sight and thought of which brings tears of eternal joy to the sparkling eyes of loving humanity, I beg of you to make one plea in support of the sacred principles set forth in that second Declaration of Independence called the Omaha platform. One plea for what you know to be just and right, one plea for the election of those great commoners, those advocates of equal rights, those champions of good government, those unstained and spotless leaders, Gen. James B. Weaver and James G. Field. Do this, and I venture the assertion that, if elected, General Weaver and cabinet will not treat you as did the Christian and godly plutocratic administrations of R. B. Hayes and James A. Garfield. Do this, and the sons of toil and the lovers of freedom, in generations yet to be, will revere your memory as they will the memory of him who said: "The world is my country, and to do good is my religion." Very sincerely and respectfully yours,

Waseca, Minn. T. STRICKLAND FISK.

The Freethought Federation of America.

Every age is necessarily one of transition, and that ours is preëminently such may be safely admitted, but moreover it is an age of compromise, it is an age of mental and moral dishonesty. On every hand we find that criminal misdeeds are the surest passports to worldly achievements. But as all reforms hav been won slowly, as each new movement inaugurated for bettering the condition of humanity started out at first with a few, and was opposed by the many, and as in course of time a few more willing hearts are found to rally round its standard, until at length the whole community accepts it, and it becomes universally adopted, may we not hope that with the inauguration of the Federation there has been commenced a movement that shall bring in a new era in political freedom? At least I hav great and increasing hopes that this will be the inevitable result of our efforts, and we shall leave nothing undone that will tend to make it such. On Sunday last I gave two lectures in Philadelphia before the Friendship Liberal League, where I was greeted by a magnificent audience of at least six hundred people, at the conclusion of which I was approached by several Freethinkers who expressed hearty sympathy for the movement, and wished us every success. One friend assured me that within the next month he would forward me a list of two hundred names for membership in the Federation, and all of whom would be voters, at the same time promising to help us financially to the extent of his power. In addition to this I hav received the following letter from a friend in Iowa:

FORT MADISON, IA., Sept. 25, 1892.

JNO. R. CHARLESWORTH, Sec. F. F. A.—Dear Sir: Inclosed please find $1 in interest of the Federation. I heartily approve of the organization, and will always be ready to giv it my support. I am well acquainted with S. P. Putnam, and consider him just the man to head the "procession," and shall be pleased to contribute to a fund to keep him in Washington as proposed in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Shall be in Chicago next month, and will try to see you at headquarters. I am fully in sympathy with your article, also Mr. E. A. Stevens in TRUTH SEEKER, and as I am getting to be along in life, I wish to be identified with "every good work and word for Freethought." Fraternally yours, J. R. TEWKSBURY.

The following is also another one received from a tried and trusted friend, and it speaks out in language that cannot be misunderstood. It also expresses fully the sentiments of many others who hav written to me upon the subject whose letters we cannot publish for want of space:

CANTON, KAN., Sept. 24, 1892.

MR. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Chicago, Ill., Dear Sir: Allow me to congratulate you upon the organization of the Freethought Federation of America and request that you enroll my name among the faithful.

I hav been an Infidel and Freethinker, lo! these many years, but this is the first organization, in my judgment, that has laid its foundations in such a manner that a superstructure equal to the object sought may be erected thereon. All other organizations of Freethinkers, so far as I hav been acquainted with them, hav either had a narrow and sectarian creed or had systems of dues, fees, and assessments attached thereto so as to make it burdensome for a poor man to belong to them. These things, I believe, deter many Liberals from joining these organizations who would be willing to join such a one as this and would be able to do many a thing to help the cause along in ways that cost no money, and most of them will giv something now and then when they would not feel like obligating themselvs for any stated amount to be paid regularly.

Please send me some constitutions and by-laws, and also some copies of yours and Mr. Putnam's articles as they appear in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 17th, if you hav them. I think I can enroll quite a number of names here, and when I return them I will see what I can do to help you out financially.

With best wishes for the success of the undertaking, I remain, Yours truly, CHAS. D. HILLABOLD.

The foregoing letters hav the true ring of Freethought about them. They are earnest and ardent in the sentiments expressed and will speak for themselvs to the Freethinkers of the country without any further comment from me.

J. C. Teeter, of Demorest, Ga., sends us a very encouraging letter, and wishes to be enrolled as a member of the Federation. F. D. Rexford, of Centralia, Ill., also writes approving of the Federation and wishing it success.

I hav noticed recently in the Freethought press several articles written upon the organization of this Federation, in which the writer imputes base and sinister motivs to us for engaging ourselvs in this undertaking. Such wicked insinuations could only emanate from an evil brain. They certainly cannot be the legitimate outcome of an earnest desire to bring about a more rapid advancement of Freethought principles, and it is certainly to be regretted that the writer has taken upon himself the fruitless task of trying to destroy the advantage we hav already gained. The Federation antagonizes no one. It was organized to accomplish a work upon lines that had never been laid down by any other organization. However, feeling satisfied that the Federation has the moral sympathy of the great mass of Freethinkers throughout the country, we shall still persevere in the work we hav outlined to perform, entirely unmindful of such puny attacks, which could only be actuated by selfishness and jealousy. We are Freethinkers, and as such we claim the absolute right to organize and establish any movement that we see fit, provided such movement shall be deemed an advantage to the cause, and more especially when we witness that there is a pressing necessity for it.

According to the promis in my last letter, I hav addressed to the presidential candidates at the forthcoming election an official letter asking them for their particular views respecting the principles and objects of this Federation. As yet I hav only received one reply, and that one from President Harrison, which will be published in my next letter. I preferred to let it lay over this week in order to giv other candidates an opportunity to reply to my letter, thereby publishing them altogether. I shall also endeavor to find out, if it is possible, the names of those representativs in the House of Congress and the particular districts they represent, who voted in favor of closing the Fair on Sundays, so that Freethought voters may know just who are enemies of liberty, and may use all the political power they possess against them, should they be candidates for reëlection at the forthcoming election.

Freethinkers are frequently charged with having no bond of union, and in illustration we are pointed to the obvious disinclination to union among many of them. On rare occasions, however, when some object sufficiently powerful and attractiv stirs them up they can be united enough; and right here I maintain we hav an object preëminently so, that is sufficient to draw into a united band even the most indifferent and apathetic Freethinkers among us. We must not forget that political preferment already begins to rest upon the creeds of candidates, who may erelong be powerless before the bigots' beck. Christianity and corruption would then hold high carnival in this American republic. Even if the enemies of truth were not already banded together it would still be our duty to diffuse our principles and attack their error by well-sustained efforts and with that unflinching perseverance which must secure success. And remember that upon success depends everything. Remember this and be assured in organization, in numbers, and in knowledge lies our only security against the church party and the inroads they are making upon the constitutional liberties of the American people.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH,
Sec. Freethought Federation of America.

Politics.

My father was a Democrat, and I thought that I was too, and never took the time or trouble to study politics until the Southern states seceded and the war commenced. Then I thought before I went to war and made widows and orphans of my countrymen's wives and children I wanted to be sure that I was on the right side, so that I could fight with an approving conscience.

When I commenced investigating politics I soon learned that I was not, and could not be, what was called a Democrat. I discovered that the so-called democratic party was a fraud, sham, and delusion; that it was plutocracy wearing the name of democracy, to catch the votes of ignorant and unsuspecting patriots. I hav not voted a so-called Democratic ticket since 1860, and that was the first vote that I ever cast.

I tried to work with the Republicans after the war, but I soon learned that there was no place for an honest, conscientious man in politics; that a free thinker, who had opinions of his own and honestly expressed them, could not get anywhere in politics.

I would not wallow in the political cesspool and soil my clothes for the sake of sharing the spoils of office.

So I hav held aloof from politics. But I hav been an onlooker, watching the antics and pranks of the politicians. I hav seen how the rival political parties use decoys to draw the people, and whips to drive them, into their lines.

I hav always approved the platforms of the Republican party, and hav been voting the Republican ticket, but now I am on the stand-off. The ecclesiastics hav brought religion into politics. The Catholic church now has the Democratic party under its thumb, and the party dare not kick or try to squirm out. Tammany controls the so-called Democratic party and the Catholic hierarchy controls Tammany. The Protestant ecclesiastics now hav the Republican party bridled and saddled and are riding it. Lincoln, Grant, and Garfield, the three best and strongest men that the Republicans ever elected to the presidency, were Secularists, and I voted for each of them. Now the American Reform Association has got in its work on the Republican party and caused it to make a president of a Presbyterian elder, and he has appointed a hypocritical Sunday-school teacher to the postmastergeneralship, and the Republican United States Senate has committed itself to religious legislation in violation of the national Constitution. I voted for Mr. Harrison four years ago because I regarded him as the least of two evils, but I will not do it again.

On the tariff question I was a student of Henry Clay and Horace Greeley. I believe the protectiv system has done much good, and might do good yet. But I hav learned that the manufacturing capitalists and others pursuing the protected industries will not divide profits with labor. They keep all of the profits derived from the protectiv tariff in their own pockets, and until they adopt the system of coöperation and share profits with labor I will not vote for a protectiv tariff any more.

I believe, with Thomas Clio Rickman, that "all associations, religious or political, are inimical to liberty, and effectual barriers to progress." And, as Colonel Ingersoll says, I want to hold the title-deeds in fee simple to myself. I belong to nothing except myself and my family. But if we Freethinkers do not surrender or suspend some part of our liberties and individualities, for the sake of organization in resisting the encroachments of ecclesiasticism upon our liberties, we are going to lose all. If the Freethinkers will organize for united action in politics and make the ecclesiastics take their own medicin I will go with them.

All of the other Infidels known to me in this country are holding on to the tail of the sham Democracy's kite with the tenacity of a Louisiana snapping-turtle, and it is very doubtful if they can be induced to turn loose. They are just as devoted and firmly attached to the sham Democracy as a Catholic is to the Antichrist which falsely wears the label of Christ. They are Infidels, but not Freethinkers or Liberals. A man who will cleave to a party name without investigating the principles and purposes of the party wearing the name is just as badly off as a man who will cleave to the name Christian without investigating the creed or the basis of the creed of a sect wearing the name of Christian.

I expect to go with the Federation of Freethinkers into politics. P. F. SHUMAKER.

Two Items of News.

From a California Paper.

DENVER, CAL., Aug. 23, 1892.

Last night during a thunderstorm Gutleif Myers, an Infidel, stood on the street corner with several friends commenting upon the electric currents. Looking skyward, he exclaimed: "There is no God; this fear is all folly."

He had hardly uttered the last word when a bolt of lightning struck him on the head, and in a few moments later his dead body was carried home.

From the Leavenworth, Kan., Evening Standard.

The Standard recently reproduced an item going the rounds of the press that Gutleif Myers, a Denver unbeliever, was killed by a bolt of lightning while uttering the words, "There is no God." A Leavenworth citizen clipped this item from the Standard and sent it to Prof. Wilbert E. Louis, manager of the Denver Music and Drama, who replied that no such name appears in any of the Denver directories, that he has inquired of many prominent citizens and officials and all express the conviction that no such event ever happened there in the past or is likely to occur in the future.

The Lord Not Good Backing.

In a Western town a small number of zealous people decided to put up a Young Men's Christian Association building. A committee was appointed, and they sent for a contractor to undertake the work. When he came, the first thing he did was to inquire, in a very worldly and matter-of-fact sort of way, into the financial resources of the organization. The president replied: "Never fear, sir; we are sure of funds; the Lord is on our side." "That is all very well," replied the contractor, "but I want some one that I can send the sheriff after if necessary."

Letters of Friends.

Thinks Pictures a Good Weapon.

ELMIRA, N. Y., Sept. 20, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I hav no time to write long letters. Mr. Henry Bird has forcefully expressed my sentiments and desires in his good, sensible proposition to bring out a large illustration of "Consternation Among the Reptils." Yes, Freethinkers can, with this "Real Rock of Ages," strike terror and death into the dens of Christianity's reptils, and this weapon of onslaught should be placed at their command. I heartily indorse the proposition, and herewith agree to contribute $2 for the purpose. A most useful lesson and one that will be remembered.

The Bible Is Like Scandinavian Fish Stories.

CHICAGO, ILL., Sept. 24, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I am a Swedish man, and I do not care who knows it. I read your paper every week, and I like to read it. I especially like the pictures. I think that Mr. Watson Heston takes pretty good photographs. I think he is a Swedish man by his name. I read lots of English books, good and bad, but the Bible is the worst for me to understand. It sounds too much like some of the Scandinavian fish stories to suit me. I think if all the stories it tells about Jesus Christ are true he was a bigger man than Mr. Jim Blaine or my friend Mr. Jonson the mind-reader, and he was a Swede.

I do not like the way some of the church people treat the Swedish man. My experience has been a bad one. When I came to this country I could talk no English and could not understand much, and went to work for a farmer up in Wisconsin for my board. He took me to church Sundays, and prayed just like a hypocrit, and I felt uneasy all the time. And sure enough he shut me out of my pay in the spring. He said, "You don't understand the contract." I said, "No"—but now I do, and understand his prayers too.

I work for an Irishman now. His name is Mr. Jim Cummings, Esq. He is a good man. He is no kin of that bad Jim Cummings that robbed so many men in Missouri. He says he was at one time in the church of Rome but he does not hav any use for it now. I think he can be a good man anyhow.

I hope you will put this letter in your paper for the Swedish men to read. I will quit you this time, hoping you will vote the right ticket. ABE GOUSORT.

Freethinkers Must Rouse.

Sept. 16, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I fear the great majority of progressionists, writers and speakers, are too apt to forget the herculean task which has been given them. They underrate the numbers and abilities of that mighty host of Superstition's following. Too often has defeat come to the flag of truth by the underrating of the enemy and the overrating of ourselvs. Agnostics, Materialists, and Spiritualists, hav you one champion, one devotee, in the Congress of the nation? Is there one Thomas Paine to espouse the cause of liberty for humanity; one Lincoln in whose soul is kindled the fire of charity for all; one Sumner who dared express himself on the side of the goddess of Freedom and her fair children? No, not one.

The Congress of the United States has placed the heel of dogmatism on the Declaration of American Independence. The hand of creed has torn the Constitution from the statutes of the nation, whilst the flag that Jasper perished to save is trailed in the dust. Has not the Congress of the United States brought into prominence, and thereby declared, that we, the American people, must observe and comply with the wish of the Roman church—that monstrosity of crime that is the synonym of evil and opposes every good?

I blush for shame as I read that part of the history of my country which refers to the acts of the last Congress. The flag of St. Constantine floating from the dome of the great building wherein are to congregate the multitudes who will be in attendance at the coming celebration! Yes, every seventh day the stars and stripes must be lowered and hid away as unfit to be kissed by the breeze of heaven, and another, the flag of the Seven-hilled City, raised to float in its place. Is it not true? Yes, too true. By that tyrannical act has the Congress of the United States heaped ignominy upon our country and insulted every patriot and lover of liberty. To make the act a perfect charter of diabolism, the president sanctions the movement, thereby disgracing and belittling us in the eyes of every republic on the earth. O shades of ye departed heroes of the past, how are your fair children ostracized and your memories dishonored! Truth has ever been like an oasis on the great arid desert of Sahara.

The election will soon be here, and it behooves every patriot to look well to his ballot before casting it. Vote for no man or set of men who hav been instrumental in that insult to our flag. He who thinks more of party than of country is not fit to be dressed in the garb of citizenship, and he or they who prefer creed and dogma to freedom and liberty are not entitled to the votes of free women and men.

G. H. MILLER.

Who Will Answer?

OAKDALE, CAL., Sept. 20, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: As a sincere inquirer after truth, permit me to ask preachers and priests, who profess to know so much, the following questions. By answering them they will not only confer a great favor on me, but they will prove to others that they do know something:

Was space created? If so, who created it? Where did he remain while creating it? Was time created? If so, at what time was it created? If space and time were not created, are they not eternal? If they existed before the creator, is the creator eternal?

Is God omnipotent? If so, why does he not subdue the devil and his angels? If God is omniscient does he need to hold counsel with any other god? If God is omnipresent, why do preachers ask him to come down and dwell in their midst while they worship him? If the Holy Ghost is omnipresent, why do they, the preachers, ask the spirit to enter into the hearts of sinners and convert them? Why send missionaries out to the heathen if the spirit is there already?

What is the distinction between soul, spirit, mind, conscience, and will? Are they not all life? And if life is extinct, are they not all extinct? What is the distinction between the soul, spirit, mind, conscience, and will of man and of the lower order of animals?

If the Holy Spirit proceeds eternally from God, is it not his son? And if the Holy Spirit is the father of Christ, is not Christ the grandson of God? If Christ was really God, could he die? If Christ was not God, could mere man make atonement for sin? If God is unchangeable, why pray to him? Will he not do his will at any rate? If God is pleased with Christian worship, why does he permit lightning to strike the houses of worship? If preachers are his agents sent into the world, why do they differ so much in their creeds? If they are his agents, why did all the preachers North take one side of the question and all the preachers South take the other side of the question in the late Rebellion? If they are his inspired agents endowed with superior wisdom, how does it come that they do not know any more than other people about the future?

If heaven is above us, where is it? Is the Chinese' heaven above them, the Russians' heaven above them, and the American heaven above Americans? If heaven is far up, is it not very cold up there? If there is a New Jerusalem up there why cannot we see it through the great telescopes?

Has a spirit form, color, weight, or density? If so, what form is it? Is the soul of a man larger than the soul of a baby? Is it not a great punishment to do nothing but play a harp for millions of years?

When these questions are answered I shall ask some more. S. B. MCCORMICK.

Silly and Tyrannical Sunday Laws.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Sept. 24, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: "Our father which art in heaven" and the editor of the New York World hav decreed that I shall take no part in the discussion of the question of closing the World's Fair on Sunday now going on in the columns of the World (for women only). Of course "our father" knew this when he decided that I should be a boy, but the editor probably did not think of me at all. I readily forgiv them both, not on the "Thy will be done" plan, but because—first, I am, all things considered, really glad that I am a boy; and second, I think it only right that the women should occasionally be given a chance to be heard. Besides, we hav THE TRUTH SEEKER, with all its readers, deeply interested in this question, in whatever form and by whichever sex presented. The last contribution to the World discussion is from a woman who, according to the editor's preliminary remarks, "takes high ground against the would-be Sabbath-breaker." She says in part: "Obedience to God's command in the past has made us a great people. If we refuse to recognize this agency of our national prosperity, we are denying God, and depriving ourselvs of what all history, as well as our faith, combine to regard as an essential element of growth, indeed, of any permanent existence."

Well, well, well! This is pretty high, isn't it? I think it's about seventeen or eighteen degrees too high for me, but if we could by any means get hold of it and pull it down, it would mean something like this: "Because a very small portion of us hav endeavored, with poor success, to obey a very few of the supposed commands of a supposed commander we hav become a great people." Now, we are conscious of being more or less great as a people, but many of us had heretofore supposed that the get-up-and-getness of our composition had more to do with this result than obedience or disobedience to God's commands. We think so yet. Query: If we are a great people because of semi-obedience to a few supposed commands, such as we could easily keep without inconvenience to ourselvs, what might we as a people expect had we striven to keep all the silly and tyrannical commands supposed to hav been given by the almighty? Answer: To be simply "out of sight."

Now, if by opening the gates of the Fair on the holy Sabbath we refuse to recognize this agency, etc., what will follow? We will deprive ourselvs of an essential element of national growth (in grace, not knowledge) and endanger our prospects of permanent existence.

If the permanent existence refers to another than earthly existence, many of us who are destined by the unchangeable plans of a merciful father to eternal torment will not object to a modification of the permanent part of the program. If, however, she refers to our existence here, we hav little fear that the opening or closing of the Fair on Sunday will either lengthen or shorten our career, as a people or as individuals. The lady says in conclusion, "There are other reasons of worldly policy against the Sabbath opening," but for some reasons she fails to mention any. It is not likely that she had in mind reasons similar to those of rumsellers and other disreputable business men of Chicago. She is probably honest, but too prejudiced by false religious ideas to see clearly what is apparent to the real truth seeker.

The peculiar and encouraging feature of the World discussion is that, notwithstanding the tendency of the fair sex to be governed by prejudice and sentiment, only two hav thus far voted in favor of closing, while up to date five hav voted against it. G. W. CASE.

No Free Trade.

Sept. 17, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In your paper of Sept. 3, 1892, in "Interesting Miscellany," by F. Y. Bach, he very justly condemns the local or state laws of a tax for the privilege of soliciting trade or disposing of any legitimate article of merchandise in any section of the country; but when he asserts, "I endeavor to take advantage of that unjust law," knowing when he is doing so that he is violating a legitimate ordinance (it being an unjust one does not justify him), he places himself precisely where any criminal does that allows himself to perpetrate a crime, liable to the penalty of indiscretion. He casts reflections on "ye rabid Republicans" for penalties he incurred himself for knowingly violating a law which he is pleased to term, in brackets, a "tariff;" but where application of the term of tariff has the least reference to his case, or to a local state or municipal tax or license ordinance, does not come within the comprehension of a Republican, or his knowledge of what a tariff is. That will hav to be left to the apprehensiv hallucination of a highly imaginary Democrat, to settle with himself, and when he is fully persuaded in his own mind, it will hav about as much foundation in reality as an orthodox has knowledge of a future state of existence, which is but an illusion. When he asserts that the tax is "absolute protection for the local merchant," it is an illusion far excelling the others mentioned.

His appeal for Mr. Ingersoll to explain how he might belong to the Republican party is too simple to require the talent of an Ingersoll to make a reply to.

If you are in favor of the prosperity of the country, the only source of prosperity is through the labor. You giv employment to the mechanic and laborer and it will insure brisk and prosperous results; whenever the working people are in demand everything is on the upward march; deprive them of what should be their inherited rights (labor), depression will be the result; supply the demands of the country with foreign manufactured articles, then our home manufacturer and mechanic are rendered idle, which would be the result of free trade. A high protectiv tariff is the only thing that will insure lively and prosperous times. It not only givs employment to the laborer of this country, but it taxes the inventiv genius likewise to produce machinery whereby more facilities are invented to increase the production, thus cheapening the cost of manufacturing; and the result is that we produce every article that we make under a protectiv tariff for less money than it ever was furnished at under free trade. To illustrate the above protectiv tariff argument I will refer you to one article first produced in this country under the highest protectiv tariff we ever had, that of 1842. The article is railroad iron. Previous to that date all the iron we had for that purpose was imported, at a cost of over $100 per ton; that tariff imposed a high rate of duties upon it; starting up rolling mills at home, giving employment to a large number of our working people, thus causing prosperity. The price of the iron was reduced to $35 per ton.

When that tariff was repealed in 1846 our rolling mills were broken up, and the price of railroad iron was doubled and remained so until our war tariff was enacted; and we are now producing steel rails for about $30 per ton. This is the way a high protectiv tariff increases the price of articles produced under it. There is no article that we produce under a protectiv tariff that is not furnished to the consumer at a less figure than it was ever under free trade. After the manufacturing becomes thoroughly established, it may be a little higher before the factories get in good working order. Our tin trade promises to be one of the most extensiv industries in the country, and it is advancing very rapidly toward that desirable end; then we will make a better article and at a lower price than under imports.

First and early youthful impressions are very apt to be firmly rooted in the brain. Mr. Bach acknowledges that by his early belief in the Roman Catholic religion he was imbued with faith in all rituals of that profession; Mr. George M. Davenport was successful in removing the cataract that obscured his vision on that subject. It is a pity it had not extended further and inspired him "to prove all things, and hold fast to that which is good." I think his free trade illusion would hav about as solid a foundation as did his religious illusion.

As to his inquiry of Mr. Ingersoll, "I would like him to explain how I might consistently belong to the Republican party," if what is herewith presented does not answer that question, I shall hav to locate him after the manner of Thoma Paine in the Crisis No. 5, addresse to Gen. Sir Wm. Howe, "To argue with a man who has renounced the use and authority of reason, and whose philosophy consists in holding humanity in contempt, is like administering medicin to the dead, or endeavoring to convert an Atheist by scripture."

Free trade defined is: Supply our markets with all we need, produced by pauper labor of Europe, thus throwing our mechanic and laborer out of employment, thereby making paupers of them, and bring ruin upon the country.

G. W. GORUM.

A Plea for Organization.

MOSCA, COL., Sept. 22, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: There are many valuable thoughts in that article by Brother Bradford published in THE TRUTH SEEKER September 3d, and I think he has most admirably stated why organization among Liberals, both Materialists and Spiritualists, has been, up to the present time, a failure: "The consciousness of Freedom and of growth was so delightful, that they resolved they never would allow the weight of a feather to be placed upon their intellects again."

That is it in a few words, and he clinches it when he says: "The remembrance of the old bondage of the church makes them afraid of joining any Freethought society, lest they suffer their individuality of character to be invaded and in some shape or other to be bound."

He might hav added that among Liberals there is a chronic aversion to work for the common good. For this reason no "missionary" enterprise has ever been successful among them, and the very word "missionary" is almost as hateful to them as the word "orthodox," which is little better than "hell."

There are thousands of Liberals who are among the noblest, and deeply do they feel, as Mr. Bradford pithily expresses it, that physical slavery, compared with mental bondage, was a "mere trifle"—"compared with the movement now on foot all over the civilized world to deliver mankind from the bondage of religious superstition."

How earnestly such men as Bradford yearn to see the hosts of superstition lay down their arms of opposition at the feet of Freethought!

I believe I am justified, after a whole generation of acquaintanceship, in saying that the grandest, greatest, broadest-minded people born on this planet are your thoroughgoing Freethinkers. Their philosophy makes them large and humanitarian. But the sad fact is that other thousands hold Freethought in one hand and an apology in the other! They are a clog to the success of the movement.

Last winter I circulated several thousand printed circulars describing these pseudo-Liberals, a few paragraphs from which I submit:

You may be sure I hav no mocking, bitter word for poor Liberals, men and women barely able to eke out a mere living. I hav found they do more, as a rule, for our cause, in proportion to their means, than the very rich. Still, some wealthy Freethinkers are proving themselvs genuin Liberals, good as gold, true as steel. We hav some splendid men and women who are opulent. Had it not been for them, Liberalism would not hav prospered as it has. Yet a generation shows that our principles hav only fairly taken root.

Mr. Standring, an English Secularist, says the "rank and file of our party are decidedly poor." But he adds, and let us mark it, "They are most laudably generous." "When will our middle classes," he says, "learn to be as self-sacrificing in the cause of truth as our poorer brethren are?"

Well and pointedly writes Mr. Ernest Mendum, the young publisher of the Boston Investigator: "A Freethinker ought to be proud of his freedom, and ought to do all he can to make others free. If Liberals worked and gave for their cause as Christians do for Christianity, every town and city would hav its Freethought hall, and we would hav scores of Liberal papers published and supported in the United States, instead of having half a dozen half-supported. Now, we believe that mental freedom is not going to be possessed by the great mass of the American people without work by somebody. It is going to take money to liberate men and women from the slavery of religion as it took money to free the negro from the slavery of avarice."

I do not see how anyone enjoying the benefits of Liberalism can be indifferent to its spread, yet it is sadly true that there are too many of this class. As Mr. Eugene M. Macdonald pertinently remarked, "To be frank, we rather like Miss DeCleyre's chastisement of those Liberals who, for one reason or another, giv annually more cash to the churches than to Liberalism. Of course, we recognize that a man has a right to spend his money as he pleases, but we submit that if it pleases a man more to help the church than to aid Freethought, he is more a Christian than a Freethinker." "Apathy . . . prevails in too many places."

Can we ever fully appreciate the blessings of liberty unless we employ our own freedom to free others? We ought to do as much for our cause as orthodox Christians are doing for theirs; as much in proportion to our numbers and means to rescue Christians from religious follies as the Christians are doing to convert the "heathen."

Once in a while you will meet with a Liberal so wrapped up in self as to say, "Let them get out of the theological prison as I did." Well, how did he get out? Was it by his own transcendent genius? Or was it because men and women of mind and courage and conscience generations ago, and down to the present hour, thought, spoke, struggled, sacrificed, suffered, that this class might enjoy mental and physical freedom? A poor return they make for this glorious liberty. Is there no more to do? Are all the battles won? Is there no more mental bondage? Are there no slaves of superstition left? How hav such apathetic Liberals paid their debt?

Some of my friends may think I will offend some by my plainness of speech. Shall I flinch in telling Liberals the truth while I never shrank from uttering my thought, when occasion demanded, in the presence of Christians? What! displease Liberals who can be cowed by Christians! Liberals who fear that an honest, manly expression will break them up in business! Lukewarms! do-nothings! I would not waste a two-cent postage stamp on a whole gross of them! This letter is not sent, knowingly, to such a limp, backboneless species, who liv in daily dread of having their Liberalism found out! Ostrichlike Liberals, who bury their heads in the sand and imagin Christians do not see them! No, no, I ask no favor from this class. They are out of the church to save pew-rent, and their neighbors know it. They lend a helping hand to nobody for the advancement of their principles. I hav more hope of converting ten orthodox Christians than one vapid Liberal.

The niggardness of a large number of so-called Liberals has done Liberalism more harm than all the sermons fired at it. To this add moral cowardice and you complete the picture of this best cause "betrayed in the house of its friends." The world is coming to find them out, and to estimate them at their true value (which is not much), and Liberals are establishing an unenviable reputation for illiberality, proving themselvs a penurious, grasping, selfish, sordid set, who shout, "One world at a time!" and do scarcely a blessed thing for it—not a tithe as much as the folks that believe in two, or more.

If it should be thought by anyone that my assertions are not according to the facts, let him carefully peruse what two veteran publishers hav had to say, one a Spiritualist, the other a Materialist:

"The late J. P. Mendum of the Investigator, on one occasion recited editorially his experience in publishing a Freethought paper, and remarked that while many liked to read, few cared to pay for the privilege. 'There hav been scores of low-priced Liberal papers published within the last fifty years,' he said, 'and there were Freethinkers enough to giv them a liberal support. Did they do it? No. The Investigator is the only paper that has struggled for fifty years, and still livs.' Then he proceeded to show some Wisconsin correspondent, who said the only objection made to his paper out there was its price—'too high'—that that is the very excuse men make when they do not care to help along a cause, but want others to support what they get the benefit of. 'So long as good, paying subscribers are willing to furnish them gratis with books and papers,' he said, 'they will not put out their own means to buy either.'

"Yielding to this oft-repeated objection, the price of the Investigator, he says, was reduced, but the act did not result in the hearty support expected. Such, at the time of making it, was the criticism of that veteran Freethought editor. What shall be said of certain Spiritualists who copy this action of the Liberals, so called, who, while boasting that they number by the millions, and while proving as eager as ever to peruse weekly the thoroughly prepared pages of the Banner, decline to send in their subscriptions to it, borrow rather than buy it for reading, and practice every scheme of evasion possible to invent in order to get rid of supporting the paper on which they steadily rely, and whose disappearance they would unquestionably regret? If they want a paper like the Banner, it is their duty to support it."—Banner of Light.

That the same thing is true to-day is corroborated by the present editor of the Boston Investigator, L. K. Washburn:

"The words of our lamented publisher, which are quoted approvingly by our Spiritualistic contemporary, are just as true and applicable now as when they were first published in these columns."

I was impelled also to remark:

If you do not do anything for your cause you will soon be out of love with it. Those who giv nothing year after year to support their principles, which ought to be dearer than life, lose the habit of giving, which is the prime secret of church success. We ought to giv, not through fear of God, but love for humanity. Is it possible that we Liberals, in spite of the word "liberal," will be obliged to confess to Christians, after all, that the fear of God, as an incentiv to benevolent deeds, is more potent than love for principles and our fellow-man?

Now, if Liberals are ten times as numerous as Christians, as estimated by our friend Judge Westbrook (and they are, according to this pattern, described by me last winter); and, as A. B. Bradford says, "Where the will of the people is the law of the land, the very first thing to be done is to raise money. A reformer can not budge out of his tracks without money. He cannot write a letter, or print a tract, or get candles for a night meeting in a schoolhouse without more or less money"—if this is all true (and who can successfully deny it?) the Liberal political organization is dead before it is born!

If we must hav an organization for the advancement of Liberalism, why not join our efforts with the Secular Union at Chicago, officered by as stanch Liberals as breathe? Do you not know that Mrs. M. A. Freeman, its secretary, is one of the best workers, if not the best, in the Liberal ranks? Furnish the Secular Union money, without which no organization can succeed, and it will show the world its splendid fighting qualities, "war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt."

I will save the rest which I hav to say for another letter. W. F. JAMIESON.

Finance.

Sept. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Frederick Koezly attempts a reply to my article on finance, and as to how far he has succeeded I am very willing to leave our readers to decide, but as I opened this discussion I hav a right to close. He agrees with me that figures will not lie when backed up "with good arguments and facts." I said on the authority of Porter, the census-taker, that there are nine million mortgaged homes. Now let us apply "good arguments and facts" to this case. Does anyone before they are applied realize the "facts?" The facts are that there are just five million over two-thirds of the inhabitants of this country under mortgage. "What, and only nine million mortgaged homes, with sixty-five million people?" Well, let us see.

All calculations are made on the basis of an average of five to the family the head of which is mortgaged. What does this mean? It means that forty-five million people's homes are in jeopardy. And yet Mr. Koezly, while admitting that all legislation of late years has been in favor of the rich, wants to continue the very foundation on which the whole fabric rests, viz., a money that is valuable, so they can hoard it and corner it so we Western farmers hav to pay six to thirty per cent for the use of it. This is like trying to root up an old stump by sitting on it.

Now let us examin his argument against paper money. He says, "In case of fire what would become of my saved paper?" In most cases banks hav fireproof vaults. Then, they generally hav the banks insured in several companies. Then you hold them responsible for your money. And besides, it is the law that if a bill gets destroyed, just by having the number of the bill and where issued you can get a new bill struck for less than the trouble of removing the debris and hunting around in the ashes for a melted conglomeration of copper, silver, gold, and iron, which the banker would claim the right to, and as you would not be able to prove your property you would be left out in the cold.

Paper money is much more convenient than metal, and most persons feel insulted if a banker pays them even twenty or thirty dollars in silver and gold. No one but a miser would prefer hard money.

Talk about money burning up—how many ever had any money burnt up? It is safe to say, not one in a million. Otherwise, paper will last a lifetime, or for all time if you want to hoard it. But it would be an argument in its favor if it did not, as that has been the ruination of our country—its hoarding money and refusing to loan it except at a ruinous rate of interest. "Money is a medium of exchange" and not a medium to hoard, and its value is not within itself as money, but what it will purchase.

Mr. Koezly confounds the meaning of paper as a commodity and as money. Paper as a commodity is very cheap and very regular in price. As money it depends on the government stamp as to how much it is worth. And the very small amount of paper that is used as money would not enhance the value, and hence it is less liable to fluctuate than any other material. He also talks as though people would not take it if they were not forced to, when the people much prefer it. And the people at large never ask for its redemption, not even those that advocate a redeemable paper. It is only a few money-mongers who make a speculation out of the transaction that ever ask for it.

He cites the Confederate money as fluctuating. It is not the word that he should hav used. He should hav used the word "depreciating" instead. And it is not fair to cite a government that ceases to exist.

He admits that paper is good just as long as what is back of it is good. Now, this is considered among the wealthiest nations on earth; and it is, in resources; and it is safe to say its existence as a government is perpetual, and this is a sovereign government by the consent of the people and not by "force." Now, its paper is perfectly good, and much preferred by its own people, and when it comes to foreign nations our money does not circulate there any more than theirs does here; and as long as our government's paper is good they will exchange their money for it, for the simple reason that they can exchange it back to us at par and there is no danger as to its permanency when it has the whole people to back it. No paper ever (in speaking of paper as money) becomes worthless until that which is back of it refuses to receive it. It may depreciate in time of war by a government's constant defeat, but in time of peace and permanency there is no reason why it should not remain at par.

My authority for saying that Venice issued paper money that was never redeemed for over six hundred years, and speaking of Catherine of Russia issuing her own money, is Senator Stanford, of California, and much more authority that I used in my first article, and I also drew largely from W. S. Morgan, a historian.

Now, as I believe I hav answered all of the important points that were raised by Mr. Koezly, and hav not attempted to bring in any new arguments, he will be satisfied to allow this to close the discussion on our part and giv others a chance.

Now, in closing, I claim to hav shown that an irredeemable paper money worked successfully in Russia, in this country through a company or companies, in Venice, and in France. And while I believe that an irredeemable paper money is best, yet after all, the great point to be attained is to hav enough of some kind to keep the bees in the hive of industry employed and so that no one will hav to go half clothed, half starved, or sell their manhood or womanhood for bread.

My views are not exactly in accord with those of any party in existence, and although the People's party comes near to them, I am not in love with my party so that I swallow with avidity anything its advocates may say whether right or wrong, nor am I bound to any creed either political or religious.

I did not think it worth while to raise an argument on what I said about ten pounds of gold. I was only showing by that point that we did not hav to recognize anything as money unless it had the fiat of the government stamp on it.

CATHOLICS are pushing their schemes of usurping the most prominent places in all the Columbus celebrations.

AT Harmonville, Pa., Wm. Lock in a typhoid fever delirium cut his child's throat believing that God had commanded its sacrifice.

HORACE BROADHURST, a fruit-grower of Bucks county, Pa., has been fined $50 for gathering peaches on Sunday. The complainant was a jealous neighbor.

THE cholera in Europe is abating. Professor Koch, of Germany, says that it will revive in Hamburg in the spring unless the authorities procure pure water.

SISTER MAXIMA, of the Agram convent in Austria, was a victim of religious mania, declaring herself the greatest sinner in the world. A few days ago she took poison, lay down before a sacred image, and died.

A PICTURE of the Virgin and Christ-child has appeared on a window of a Catholic church at St. Paul, Minn., from some unknown cause. Catholic papers are spreading the declaration that its origin was miraculous. Several invalids hav been cured by touching or looking at it.

A DENVER, Col., young man promised his pastor to accept the belief in the divinity of Christ if Gladstone would express confidence in that tenet. To a note Gladstone replied: "All I write, and all I think, and all I hope, is based upon the divinity of our Lord, the one central hope of our poor, wayward race. W. E. Gladstone."

IN all the Catholic churches of Illinois a pastoral letter has been read directing voters to procure repeal of the Edwards compulsory education law. It says: "The teaching of religion is a necessary accompaniment of secular education in order that the school may not turn out an inferior sort of men, and mere Materialists, Secularists, and the indifferentists must always be inferior."

SOME newspapers are printing that Wanamaker used the Grand Army gathering at Washington to boom a hymn-book compiled by himself and sold in his interest. His agents distributed to the veterans a prospectus of "Living Hymns: a Casket of Song Gems, by Hon. John Wanamaker." These prospectuses were inclosed in envelopes imprinted, "To the Postmaster ——," containing also a circular beginning, "Dear Postmaster," as if originally intended to be sent to the postmasters of the country.

RENAN, the famous French philologist and author, died on the 2d. When young he studied for a priest, but reported to his superior at St. Sulpice one day, "Father, I hav doubts." The answer was, "Wait awhile and pray." Two months later he announced, "Father, I hav prayed, and I believe still less," and abandoned sacerdotal studies. After a while he wrote a "Life of Jesus" and other Antichristian works which caused the clergy to procure his dismissal from the post of professor of Hebrew in the College of France.

ALDERMAN KNILL was candidate for lord mayor of London. His being a Catholic raised opposition. To questions publicly put he declared that he would not appoint a Church of England clergyman his own chaplain, but would appoint one chaplain to the office of lord mayor; and that he would not attend Church of England services on the customary and required occasions, but would appoint a substitute to do so. At the election in Guildhall he was elected amid commotion and cries of "No popery!" and "We don't want a disguised papist!"

EDITOR LYONS of the St. Joseph American on opening an anti-Catholic lecture at Cheyenne, Wyo., on the 25th ult. laid two revolvers on his desk and stated that he was prepared to defend himself. After he had talked an hour amid interruptions the turmoil grew so that he had to request the ushers and police to clear the hall. These officials tried but failed. Lyons then started for the door escorted by an armed body-guard who had been kept in hiding. Policeman Nolan attempted to take Lyons's revolvers, when a melée ensued in which thirty shots were fired and a knife was used. Several were wounded, some probably fatally. Lyons and his guard reached his hotel in safety. He has been arrested, and taken to Fort Russel for safekeeping from the Catholic mob, which is growing and threatens trouble.

Proctor, the well-known English astronomer, says of it: "Through false delicacy lads and youths are left to fall into trouble, and not a few have their prospects of a healthy happy life absolutely ruined. The little book before us is intended to be put into the hands of young men by fathers who are unwilling or incapable of discharging a father's duty in this respect; and as not one father in ten is, we believe, ready to do what is right by his boys himself, it is well that such a book as this should be available. If it is read by all who should read it, its sale will be counted by hundreds of thousands." The publisher will send 10 copies by mail, postpaid, for $2. Should anyone desire them by the 100 or 1,000 they can make satisfactory terms by correspondence.

Thomas Paine. Tells the Story of the Author-Hero's life, delineates the leading traits of his character and genius, and vindicates his name from the aspersions cast upon it. Tributes to Paine's character are given from more than one hundred noted persons of Europe and America, many of them written expressly for this work. Second edition, 160 pages, printed on fine tinted paper, neatly bound, and containing a handsome steel portrait of Paine.

The Apostle of Liberty. An address delivered in Paine Hall, before the N. E. Freethinkers' Convention, January 29, 1884. Price, 10 cents.

Gems of Thought.

THE vulgar imagin God to be a king, who holds his seat of justice in his court. Tender hearts represent him as a father who takes care of his children. The sage attributes to him no human affection. He acknowledges a necessary eternal power which animates all nature, and resigns himself to it.—Voltaire.

THE only security for public liberty is the absolute and unqualified freedom of thought and expression, confining penal consequences to acts only which are detrimental to the welfare of society. How does the proscription of a man in any way for obnoxious opinions differ from the most glaring tyranny?—Horace Greeley.

As a general thing, Christians hav manifested very little kindness, or candor, in their estimate of other religions; but the darkest blot on their history is their treatment of the Jews. . . . That the crucifixion occurred there was the fault of very few of the people. . . . The Christian fathers themselvs admit that the Jews were not aware of persecuting the Son of God; because both Christ and his apostles sedulously concealed his divinity. But . . . the fathers were accustomed to speak of all Jews, in all parts of the world, as "murderers of Christ;" and they were everywhere hated and persecuted. For nearly two thousand years has this rancorous hostility been perpetuated, though it rests on such an unjust and irrational foundation. And men who branded all the Jews as outcasts, who plundered and slaughtered them, for an offense committed by a small number of their very remote ancestors, were accustomed to quote, as their standard, the prayer which Jesus offered for those who were the immediate cause of his death: "Father, forgiv them; for they know not what they do."—Lydia Maria Child.

ARE there really no natural boundaries? Has not our life anywhere been founded on reason and necessity, but only on arbitrary customs? What is more important than food, yet in what human matter are there more arbitrary divergences of practice? The Scotch Highlander flourishes on oatmeal, which the English Sheffield iron-worker would rather starve than eat; the fat snail which the Roman country gentleman once so prized now crawls unmolested in English or American gardens; rabbits are tabooed in Germany; frogs are unspeakable in England; sauerkraut is detested in France; many races and gangs of people are quite certain they would die if deprived of meat; others think spirits of some kind a necessity, while to others again both of these are an abomination. Every district has its local practices in food, and the peasants look with the greatest suspicion on any new dish and can rarely be induced to adopt it. Though it has been abundantly proved that many of the fungi are excellent eating, such is the force of custom that the mushroom alone is ever publicly recognized, while curiously enough it is said that in some other countries where the claims of other agarics are allowed the mushroom itself is not used. Finally, I feel myself—and the gentle reader probably feels the same—that I would rather die than subsist on insects, such is the deep-seated disgust we experience toward this class of food. Yet it is notorious that many races of respectable people adopt diet of this sort.—Anon.

THE colors of flowers, the teleologist is wont to say, exist to delight the eyes of man. But how long did flowers blossom without being seen by a human eye, and how many are there that bloom at this day in inaccessible spots, or at the bottom of the ocean where no eye but that of the diver can light upon them? Moreover, it is in evidence that fully one-half of all the plants in creation possess no beautiful, many-colored blossoms; and Darwin, by his investigations, arrived at the remarkable conclusion that flowers as a rule are only gaily-colored in order to attract the insects which aid their fertilization, while those flowers which are fertilized by the wind are never bright-colored. Therefore no flower would be endowed with a beautiful color, if such color were not beneficial to the flower itself and had not been evolved, by way of predilection, in the struggle for existence. This calls to our mind the fact that very many flowers are so badly contrived that the conditio sine qua non of their fertility, i. e., the union of pollen and ovule, is either prevented or rendered difficult in every possible way, and that their propagation is rendered possible by mere fortuitous circumstances, such as rain, wind, insects, etc. Why is this? There are so many aimless or useless parts and organs in the vegetable world, that the famous botanist, Schleiden, was led to say: "The boldest imagination is paralyzed in the end, in seeking any definit conception of design in the manifold forms and configuration of plants."—Büchner.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress Assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, do hereby respectfully pray and memorialize your Honorable Body to repeal that portion of the Act entitled "An Act to aid in carrying out the Act of Congress, approved April 25, 1890, entitled 'An Act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by the holding of an International Exposition in the City of Chicago'"—approved August 5, 1892, which reads as follows: "That it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition, are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and it is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by the Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modifications of the rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

Also, to repeal that portion of the Act entitled, "An Act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes"—approved August 5, 1892, which reads as follows:

"And it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition, are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and it is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modifications of the rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

We ask the repeal of these portions of these laws for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago, who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you ought to decide is that of the public welfare.

5. It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

Life of Thomas Paine,

WITH A

History of His Literary, Political, and Religious Career in America, France, and England.

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY,

Author of "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," "George Washington and Mount Vernon," "Washington's Rules of Civility." etc.

To Which Is added a Sketch of Paine by William Cobbett.

No real biography of Paine has ever appeared. The so-called Lives of Paine have been mainly the controversial work of pamphleteers, turning chiefly on his religious heresies. Paine was in his fifty-eighth year before he published anything concerning religion, and before that time he had acted an important part in revolutionary movements in the United States, England, and France. But in the religious conflict initiated by him, his political services and military career hav been but inadequately considered. A certain historical ostracism has buried in the archives of various countries a large mass of documents containing records of paramount interest and importance. Mr. Conway has personally searched such records, in Europe and America, and has obtained from these fresh light, not only on Paine, but on various eminent figures in American and European history with whom he was associated. A large amount of unpublished correspondence has been included in the volumes.

Mr. Conway says in his Preface: "In the laborious work of searching out the real Paine I hav found a general appreciation of its importance, and it will be seen in the following pages that generous assistance has been rendered by English clergymen, by official persons in Europe and America, by persons of all beliefs and no beliefs In no instance have I been impeded by any prejudice, religious or political. The curators of archives, private collectors, owners of important documents bearing on the subject, have welcomed my effort to bring the truth to light."

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. Bennett and G. M. Mair, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. 2. Miracles and supernatural achievements have been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus. 3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history. Bennett affirms; Mair denies. This is an exhaustive discussion. Price, $1.50.

"In the Chain-Gang for Conscience's Sake."

The Seventh Day Adventists are appealing to the country to help them educate the people of Tennessee on the principle of religious toleration and freedom. The Adventists comprise but a small proportion of the religious population—some twenty-five thousand, probably—but the more powerful evangelical sects persecute them so relentlessly that they lead a very troublous existence, especially in the Southern states, where the church people are particularly bigoted, and resort to law and physical violence upon slight provocation. The increasing frequency and severity which characterize these persecutions, the Adventists say, indicate that they are not accidental manifestations of personal malice, but that they point to a deep-rooted determination to crush out a dissenting minority.

The cases which they cite are those of the Tennessee Adventists who hav been imprisoned for not observing Sunday. Our readers hav been informed of these outrages from time to time as they occurred, but the story in summary is one that rouses anew our indignation. As the Adventists themselvs say, it revives the memories of the religious persecutions of the Dark Ages. The facts are thus told by them:

At Paris, Tenn., July 18, 1892, four Christian men had been lying in jail since June 3, 1892, for the crime of following their "common avocations on Sunday, by working on the farm, plowing, hoeing," etc. The term of one having expired, the other three, after having lain in jail forty-four days, were Monday, July 18th, marched through the streets in company with some colored criminals, and put to work shoveling on the public highway. All three were men of families, one fifty-five and another sixty-two years of age.

As to the character of these men who were thus imprisoned and driven through the county-seat of their county in the chain-gang, let the prosecuting attorney in the case, Mr. A. W. Lewis, answer. In his argument before the court, May 27th, referring to their prosecution, he made the following statement:

"It is to be regretted because of the fact that otherwise [aside from their observing the seventh day as the Sabbath, and working on their farms on Sunday] they are good citizens."

These "good citizens" hav suffered this humiliating imprisonment and convict servitude, notwithstanding the constitution of Tennessee declares that "all men hav a natural and indefeasible right to worship almighty God according to the dictates of their own conscience; . . . that no human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience; and that no preference shall ever be given by law to any religious establishment or mode of worship."

In contradiction to this strong and explicit declaration of man's natural right to worship his God unmolested, the state of Tennessee has enacted the following law, which was handed down to her from the theocracy of England through the state-church period of North Carolina:

"Sec. 2289. If any merchant, artificer, tradesman, farmer, or other person, shall be guilty of doing or exercising any of the common avocations of life, or of causing or permitting the same to be done by his children or servants, acts of real necessity or charity excepted, on Sunday, he shall, on due conviction thereof before any justice of the peace of the county, forfeit and pay three dollars, one-half to the person who shall sue for the same, the other half for the use of the county."

Tennessee has another statute providing for a penalty of not more than $100 for maintaining a nuisance, and the courts of Tennessee hav decided that "a succession of such acts [Sunday work] becomes a nuisance and is indictable."

With this for a basis, the grand jury of Henry county found indictments against five members of the Seventh Day Adventist church who liv on small farms near Springville, Tenn. The cases were tried at Paris, Tenn., May 27, 1892, before Judge W. H. Swiggart. The defendants did not choose to employ counsel, but appeared in their own behalf.

Six witnesses were introduced by the prosecution, each of whom testified that he was not disturbed by the labor of the defendants on Sunday, and did not giv the name of any person who was disturbed. The testimony introduced proved that W. S. Lowry had been seen at one time cutting firewood, and at another, loading wood on a wagon, on Sunday; that J. Moon had been seen on one occasion cutting sprouts from his field on Sunday; that J. H. Dortch had been seen, on one Sunday only, plowing strawberries; and that James Stemm had followed his ordinary and common vocations on Sunday, no definit work on any definit Sunday being proved against him. Besides, in several instances their fields were not along any public road, and consequently a man could not be seen working in them, as the evidence proved, unless some one "chanced to pass that way."

Each one of the accused, when brought to trial, made a short statement of his position, and submitted his case to the jury. As an illustration of the defense of the accused, the statement of W. S. Lowry, whose case was heard first, is here appended:

"I would like to say to the jury, that, as has been stated, I am a Seventh Day Adventist. I observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath. I read my Bible, and my convictions on the Bible are that the seventh day of the week is the Sabbath, which comes on Saturday. I observe that day the best I know how. Then I claim the God-given right to six days of labor. I hav a wife and four children, and it takes my labor six days to make a living. I go about my work quietly, do not make any unnecessary noise, but do my work as quietly as possible. It has been proved by the testimony of Mr. Fitch and Mr. Cox, who liv around me, that they were not disturbed. Here I am before the court to answer for this right that I claim as a Christian. I am a law-abiding citizen, believing that we should obey the laws of the state; but whenever they conflict with my religious convictions and the Bible, I stand and choose to serve the law of my God rather than the laws of the state. I do not desire to cast any reflections upon the state, nor the officers and authorities executing the law. I leave the case with you."

As evidence that these prosecutions are in the nature of religious persecution, that they are attempts to compel obedience to church dogmas, protected and promulgated by the statutes and court decisions of the state of Tennessee, extracts from the plea of State's Attorney J. W. Lewis, before the jury, are herewith submitted:

"While the Constitution guarantees to him the right to keep Saturday, and protects him in his worship while engaged in that worship; and if in his church others should disturb him, he would hav the same safeguards thrown around him, and the same solemn protection given him in that worship that you hav in your own church, yet he must bow to the laws of the state of Tennessee; he must bow to the laws of this country; he must bow to the laws that hav been made and recognized and must be enforced by the courts of this country. And if he feels that it is his duty to keep Saturday, his honor will charge that the law makes him desist from his secular work on Sunday. It is not a question of fact at all; it is only a question of law; because he does not dispute that he follows his every-day avocations; but admits it; he does not dispute that he follows the work on Sunday that he follows during the week, but admits it, and givs as an excuse that it is a conviction of his church belief.

"The people of Tennessee, by the laws, designate and point out a certain day as the Sabbath, and they say that that day shall be kept holy, and around it they throw the safeguards of law, and they say that no man shall work on that day, unless it is a work that is absolutely necessary and cannot be foregone. . . . I cannot conceive how that a man who claims to be a peaceable, law-abiding citizen can go on disregarding the day openly in the face of the law, openly in the face of the protections that are thrown around the holy Sabbath, as we believe it and hold it, and protected by the laws of this state; and this is a question that I presume you gentlemen will not hav any difficulty in coming to a decision upon."

Comments would seem unnecessary, as the managers of the Inquisition, Bishop Bonner, or Cotton Mather never argued more plainly for a union of church and state, and the punishment by civil law of what the majority please to term heresy, than does this state's attorney.

"While the Constitution guarantees to him the right to keep Saturday," says the attorney, yet, "he must bow to the laws" that are "thrown around the holy Sabbath, as we believe it and hold it."

The state's attorney was correct in his statement to the jury that it was a question that he presumed they would "not hav any difficulty in coming to a decision upon," as the jury in none of the four cases remained out over twelve minutes before returning a verdict of "guilty." (One case was dismissed for lack of evidence.)

On refusing to pay their fines, these four men were lodged in jail, June 3d, where they remained from forty-five to fifty-three days each. The sheriff, Mr. Blackmore, a kind-hearted man, was loth to take them to jail, and remarked to the judge that the convicted were conscientious in the matter, to which the judge replied, "Let them educate their consciences by the laws of Tennessee." This statement is strangely out of harmony with the constitution which the judge is sworn to uphold, which says, "No human authority can in any case whatever control or interfere with the rights of conscience," and that "no preference shall ever be given by law to any religious establishment or mode of worship."

Their reasons for going to jail in preference to paying fines and costs are stated in the following extract from a letter received from J. H. Dortch, one of the defendants:

"We did not pay our fines and costs, which amounted to about $25 each, because we considered them unjust; and besides, if we had paid them and returned to our work, we would hav been re-arrested, and thus compelled to spend all the little property we own in paying fines."

The prisoners were allowed twenty-five cents a day for each day's imprisonment, in payment of fines and costs. Not satisfied with this punishment, the prosecution, after a diligent search among obsolete statutes and decisions, finally arrived at the conclusion that the county jail was the county workhouse, and consequently, on the morning of July 18th, three of them were marched through the streets of Paris in company with three colored criminals, and compelled to labor at shoveling on the streets.

Another proof that this is a religious persecution, directed against the observance of the seventh-day Sabbath, is the fact that violations of the Sunday law on the part of others are passed unnoticed. While these four men were under confinement, the Post-Intelligencer, the official paper of Henry county, contained the following announcement of a Sunday excursion from Paris to Hollow Rock:

"On Sunday next there will be a basket picnic at Hollow Rock. The P. T. & A. railway will giv an excursion rate of fifty cents for the round trip from Paris. The train leaves Paris at 9:45 A.M., and returning, leaves Hollow Rock at 5 P.M."

The train carrying these Sunday picnickers passed within less than a hundred feet of the cell containing the four Seventh Day Adventists in prison for quiet farm work done on Sunday. A letter dated "Paris Jail, Paris, Tenn., July 15th," written by J. Moon, one of the imprisoned men, to his brother, Allen Moon, Washington, D. C., presents the same fact—i. e., that these parties are victims of an odious discrimination in the matter of enforcing the Sunday law, as the following extract from the letter will show:

"While I am writing to you, it being Sunday, there is a train-load of workmen passing in the streets, not thirty feet from the jail, going out to work; and they hav done so every Sunday since we hav been here, and it apparently does not disturb anyone. But if a poor Adventist takes his hoe out in his field and labors on Sunday, it disturbs the people for miles around."

Surely "justice standeth afar off; for truth is fallen in the streets, and equity cannot enter."

These cases are not the first convictions of the kind under the Tennessee statute. In 1886, W. H. Parker, another Seventh Day Adventist, spent seventy-four days in the same jail for Sunday work. At the same time James Stemm, one of the four men recently imprisoned, and William Dortch, father of the J. H. Dortch recently imprisoned, spent three months in the same jail for doing farm work on Sunday; and in 1890, R. M. King, of Obion county, whose case was carried to the United States Supreme Court, but suddenly terminated by the death of the defendant, was fined $75 and costs by the same judge (W. H. Swiggart) for performing his usual farm work on Sunday. These persecutions, instead of destroying themselvs by their own venom, hav steadily increased in frequency and severity; and it now rests with the people of Tennessee to decide whether they will so adjust their laws as to make such persecutions impossible, or allow this outrage on the inalienable rights of industrious citizens to go on.

These persecutions, it will be noted, are of Christians by Christians. It is the old story over again; the Christians of the nineteenth century hav not lost the characteristics of those of the seventeenth. Ay, from the time of Constantine to the present day, the Christians have been relentless persecutors, and hav endeavored by one means or another to crush all differences of opinion in matters of faith. Catholics hav persecuted Protestants; Protestants hav pursued Catholics; Lutherans hav hunted Anabaptists; Episcopalians hav burnt Puritans; Puritans (Congregationalists) hav hanged Quakers; Calvinists hav tortured Unitarians, and now all the orthodox Protestant sects unite in the attempt to crush out a weak little sect of Seventh Day Adventists. And about the only ones who protest against the infamous work, aside from the victims themselvs, are the Infidels. We hav seen but two condemnations of such work from religious sources—one from the Church Bulletin, Baptist, which says:

"Let us be careful how we let in the camel's nose of religious legislation, lest the brute crowd his bulky form in and occupy the whole shop. If the law by which these men were legally imprisoned be a righteous law, then may any state, nation, or country set up a religious creed and enforce it; then France treated properly the Huguenots; Russia the Jews; and early New England and Virginia the Baptists and Quakers. Protestant America had better be careful how she lays foundations for other men to build upon. Rome has as good a right to build in her way as we hav in our way."

And the other is this from the Independent, which sometimes forgets to be a real Christian organ:

"We hav again and again, during the last few years, had occasion to express our profound indignation at the administration of Tennessee law as applied to some country farmers belonging to the Seventh Day Adventist body, who, after having carefully kept the Sabbath on the seventh day of the week, worked in their fields on the first day of the week. This prosecution has been renewed, and three men of families, one fifty-five and another sixty-two years of age, were convicted, and hav, during the summer and autumn, been working out their fine, being set to work with criminals at shoveling on the common highway. They refused to pay their fine, declaring that it was unjust, and that they were liable to be arrested again as soon as they were released. We hav said before, and we say again, that this is bad law, bad morals, and bad religion."

Looking over the field from early times, and noting the few splendid exceptions, there can be but one conclusion regarding Christians, which is that their religion makes them cruel persecutors. Ever since Christianity came to be a political power, early in the fourth century, it has shown the same illiberal, intolerant, and exacting spirit. It has been unwilling that any other creed should liv, and the powerful sects hav persecuted the weaker ones within its own fold. So far as it has had the power, the Protestant church has been as bad in this as the Catholic. But as the world has progressed not a little during the past three centuries, this progress has exercised a very modifying influence upon the newer sect, and persecutions for blasphemy and violations of Sunday laws now take the place of the gallows, the stake, and the torture chamber.

But Christianity must bear the infamy of the little persecutions no less than of the greater. We earnestly join with the Seventh Day Adventists in asking all lovers of liberty to work heartily in educating the people of Tennessee out of their barbaric condition.

Some Tennysonian Gems.

The late Lord Alfred Tennyson wrote some fine verses in his day, and one of the finest is this:

"Be mine a philosopher's life, . . .
Far off from the clamor of liars belied in the hubbub of lies;
From the long-necked geese of the world that are ever hissing dispraise
Because their natures are little. . . ."

There are other equally striking verses in that wonderful poem "Maud," and here are two from his good-natured reply to "A Spiteful Letter:"

"O faded leaf, isn't fame as brief?
What room is here for a hater?
Yet the yellow leaf hates the greener leaf,
For it hangs one moment later.

"Greater than I—isn't that your cry?
And I shall liv to see it.
Well, if it be so, so it is, you know;
And if it be so—so be it!"

And here is an "Afterthought:"

"Ah, God! the petty fools of rhyme,
That shriek and sweat in petty wars
Before the stony face of Time,
And looked at by the silent stars;—

"They hate each other for a song,
And do their little best to bite,
That pinch their brothers in the throng,
And scratch the very dead for spite;—

"And strive to make an inch of room
For their sweet selvs, and cannot hear
The sullen Lethe rolling down
On them and theirs, and all things here.

. . . . . .

"And I too talk, and lose the touch
I talk of. Surely, after all,
The noblest answer unto such
Is kindly silence when they bawl."

Open the World's Fair Gates.

Liberals and all people who are opposed to the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday should bestir themselvs to prevent the uncalled-for interference. Heston's cartoon in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 1st is immense, and started an idea which, as it seems to the writer, will meet with general approval. It is to reduce the center-piece in size, and set appropriate mottoes around it, as here shown:

THE WORLD'S FAIR
CLOSED ON SUNDAYS.

ENLIGHTENED AMERICA RULED BY BEER, BISHOPS, AND BRIBERY.

THE PEOPLE ASK FOR KNOWLEDGE: THEY ARE GIVEN RUM AND RELIGION.

then, after adding other suitable matter, to print the whole in leaflet form and scatter it broadcast over the land. Invite all who oppose the Sunday closing to send funds to be used in printing these leaflets. Supply every subscriber to the fund with as many as he or she wants for distribution. Ask for larger contributions to pay for printing in large quantities for general circulation. Let these picture-protests be seen everywhere, till every clergyman blushes to see himself fraternizing so lovingly with the saloonkeeper, and even the legislator becomes ashamed of his asinin hypocrisy. It is not to be supposed that a blush can rise to a saloonkeeper's face; but without the countenance and aid of the priest, his efforts to close the gates of the World's Fair would not be formidable.

What say you, Mr. Macdonald, and what say the friends of knowledge, art, and science, to this leaflet plan? E. B. B.

[We say to the above, Yes; a thousand times yes! It is just what ought to be done, and what we are willing and anxious to do, if the means are placed in our power. Every Congressman should hav the leaflet, as well as every World's Fair commissioner, national and local, and everybody else who opposes the opening of the Fair. They should be sent out with the petitions, inclosed in letters, and given away till the country is white with them. And we will do it if our friends will furnish the funds. The leaflets should be sent out before Congress meets, as well as during the session, and if the Fair is closed Chicago should be flooded with them. It is a great picture, and with the printed facts to go with it cannot fail to make a strong impression.—ED. T. S.]

J. E. Remsburg has already delivered over one hundred lectures advocating the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday. Since this question came before the public he has visited every state and territory in the Union except Montana, Nevada, and Alaska. He says that notwithstanding the successful efforts of the clergy to make Congress believe that the people want the Fair closed, if an honest expression of public sentiment could be obtained, it would be overwhelmingly in favor of Sunday opening.

Another Christian Lie Nailed.

The following was in the Saints' Herald:

"PUTNAM AND THE 'TRUTH SEEKER.'

"Brother Joseph C. Clapp, mentioned by Mr. Putnam in THE TRUTH SEEKER as the 'Mormon' that met him at Tulare City, Cal., last fall, states in regard to the matter under date of March 25th as follows:

"The statement that you read in THE TRUTH SEEKER is without a foundation in truth. I was not challenged by a Mr. Putnam (Infidel) to debate; and did not say as an excuse that I was under a two months' engagement to work for the Alliance.

"I will here giv facts as Brother Joseph Clark and Sr. Twaddle, who were both present, will testify.

"I was at the meeting where a Mr. Putnam, a representativ of THE TRUTH SEEKER, abused Christianity for nearly an hour and a half; and at the close I was called by many voices to the stand to reply, which I did in a speech of forty minutes, and if I am allowed to judge by the expressions of the large audience my reply was satisfactory.

"I told the gentleman there and then I was ready to 'break a lance' with him, as over five hundred people could testify. I had no other engagement, and never had an engagement that took me from my duty as an elder of the church for an hour. It is true I hav lectured a few times on political economy, and hav made many friends and had many places thrown open for preaching that otherwise would hav been closed against us by reason of it. While you are having cold winds and storms over there, we are having beautiful summer weather. All kinds of vegetables in abundance; no frost, no cold wind; all nature is smiling; but many of the people are frowning on account of hard times."

A letter of inquiry was sent to THE TRUTH SEEKER by a latter-day sinner:

"LOS NIETOS, CAL., June 19, 1892.

"EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: The inclosed clipping is taken from the Saints' Herald of April 23, 1892. It is a Latter-day Saint paper published at Samoni, Decatur county, Ia. In a manner it explains itself. What Mr. Putnam had to say about his meeting with Mr. Clark will be found in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 19, 1891. Please insert clipping in THE TRUTH SEEKER, so that it will be brought to Mr. Putnam's notice and oblige Mr. Carmichael, a Latter-day Saint of this place, and Yours truly, ELMER HOLLOWAY,

"A Latter-day Sinner."

In view of the above inquiry S. P. Putnam wrote to B. G. Parker, of Tulare, California, and received this reply:

"TULARE, CAL., Sept. 11, 1892.

"MR. S. P. PUTNAM, Dear Friend and Brother: Your letter of inquiry of the 3d inst. is at hand and contents noted.

"I hav seen Mr. Mansky, Mr. Forbes, Mr. Mackey, and others who were at the lecture. They say, as they understood it, you proposed to debate the question with Mr. Clapp. His reply was that he had engagements for the next two months with the Farmers' Alliance, but in the future he would cross lances with you with pleasure. Some of the friends went to see Mr. Clapp, but found he had just left for the Sandwich islands. His wife says he may return, and he may send for his family. So ends the debate, for the present at least. B. G. PARKER."

It will be seen that Mr. Putnam's statement was correct, and that Mr. Clapp did decline to debate, for the reason mentioned. Mr. Putnam is always ready at any time convenient for each to discuss religious questions with the Latter-day Saint Elder Clapp, or any other.

In the East.

News and Notes.

I journey to Boston by way of New Hampshire, and through the sunny golden atmosphere, the hills glimmering in the blue and the woods just putting on the gorgeous garniture of autumn. In a dreamy state of mind I voyage alongside my birthplace, which I had not seen for over a quarter of a century. There was the old meeting-house on the hill, white and silent like a corpse, and not a stir of life near it. The ancient horse-sheds had a dilapidated look, but they were the same shadowy structures as on the Sabbath noons of yore, when I was waiting for the sermon to begin. It seems an age since I listened from the lips of my own father to discourses on hell-fire that shook me with terror. I would not go back to those dreary days again. What a blight that orthodoxy was on the childhood, even amidst the beauty and grandeur of nature so charming on every side.

Boston welcomes with intellectual hospitality. The Investigator, the Paine Memorial, Washburn and Mendum, are here, and Sunday afternoon a fine audience greets the speaker. Boston grows more magnificent every time I visit it. The parks, the streets, the avenues, are ablaze with improvements.

Among my hearers was C. Fannie Allyn, well known for her strenuous labors and unflinching spirit. Also on the platform was our veteran comrade, seventy-five years of age, Mrs. Lucy A. Colman, and after my lecture she made a few eloquent remarks, which stirred us with oldtime memories.

At the home of the Tiltons it was a privilege to listen to our friend's reminiscences of the mighty battles for antislavery, the toil day and night, the wide and far journeyings, the rugged aspects presented of human nature, the varying fortunes, the hope and the victory. What an epic it is of human progress—what a story of darkness and of light, of marvelous transformation.

Dr. Noyes has just returned from his trip. He has looked upon the Old World with the eyes of Freethought and brings back a splendid picture to the mind's eye of its manifold presentments. After Boston comes New York, "another morn risen on mid-noon." Boston has indeed the quietude and amplitude and the splendor of the glorious afternoon; but New York has the morning's brilliance and bustle—everything is rushing on; it seems as if each one were just awake and on the move for business.

I lecture before the Liberal Club, and enjoy like a cold sea-bath the flood of criticism ready to flow at a moment's notice when the speaker has ended. It is delightful to watch the varying current of discussion. The way that "hobbies" dance along is exhilarating.

Old friends are here: Dr. Gunn; Dr. Weeks; Lawyer Chamberlain; Wakeman, ample in body and brain; Foote, alert and at the front; John R. Charlesworth, among our "captains of industry," and many others. All hail to the Liberal Club. It is a school of humanity.

I am at Larchmont again, the trees jeweled with the sparkling sea and preparing for autumn's gorgeous holiday. What a carnival of colors will capture all the hills and dales!

With Dr. Foote, Sr., I look again upon the Paine farm and dream of the time when it shall be a park—and the house on the hill preserve an illustrious memory. For the benefit of those inquiring I will say that the original Paine farm consisted of three hundred acres. Portions hav been sold off, and one hundred and eighteen acres remain. The Paine house is two miles from the station. New Rochelle is one of the wealthiest suburbs of New York. Its population has doubled within the last ten years. Four miles from the Paine farm is Pelham park, which one of these days will be the largest and most magnificent park of the New World. It contains one thousand seven hundred acres, wood and field, and the scenery of land and water is most attractiv. The drift of the population of New York is toward the Paine farm, and undoubtedly in a few years parts of it, near the monument, will be crowded with elegant residences. It is not decided yet whether the Paine farm can be bought for the purpose suggested in THE TRUTH SEEKER. An effort will be made, however, to secure a portion of this farm as a memorial to Paine, who found a home here after a life of such extraordinary activity.

The reports of John R. Charlesworth show that the Liberals of this country—the masses of them—are heartily in favor of the Freethought Federation. It has come to stay. It occupies an entirely new field. It is in opposition to no other Liberal organization. So far as I am concerned, I propose to fight the churches. I had no other idea when I helped to form the Freethought Federation. I did not expect to be attacked by Liberals for doing what had not been done before; I supposed that one had the privilege to do all he could for the Liberal cause, especially when the work is so great and the field so broad. I did not know there was a monopoly of the movement; that we must go in certain ruts, and be orthodox and conservativ, or be damned. Has it come to this, that there is a church in Liberalism, a creed, a priesthood? Has it come to this, that we must obey "the powers that be?" Well, I am radical to the core, and if I and a dozen others think that we can organize and do something for Freethought that nobody else is doing I guess we hav a right to do so. I guess if a thousand or ten thousand or one hundred thousand Liberals want to enroll their names for freedom, they hav a right to do so.

I am not going to quarrel with Liberals; I am not going to reply to any personal abuse; I am not going to engage in a newspaper controversy with those who should be supporters of the Federation. The Federation will do its work. It is ready to cooperate with any other organization that is devoted to the same purpose. There is plenty of room. A half-dozen organizations could be kept busy opposing the encroachments of the church. The danger is vast and imminent and we cannot hav too great a combination of forces.

Time will settle things better than wordy disputes. The Liberals of this country are independent thinkers. They will follow no man. They are not like a flock of sheep. They can and do act for themselvs.

The membership of the Federation is constantly increasing. From all parts of the country there are encouraging reports. Acquainted as I am with thousands of Liberals from the Atlantic to the Pacific, I know that many of them are ready for political action. It seems to me that an organization of this kind can exist without strife among Liberals. Let each choose his own method without seeking to destroy the methods chosen by others. This will be the policy of the Freethought Federation. It will attend strictly to business—namely, the business of grappling with the churches, and taking their clutch from the fair life of this republic. If those who should support attack us they will hav the fight all to themselvs. We shall combat the churches still, and there will be no retreat on the part of the Federation.

THE Manhattan Liberal Club lectures for October are as follows. The Club meets at 220 E. 15th street:

October 14th, "The Heaven and Hell of Politics," Voltairine de Cleyre.

October 21st, "The Persistence and Utility of Fiction," Van Buren Denslow.

October 28th, "The Free-Banking Solution of the Currency Problem," Widden Graham.

THE Boston Investigator says: "Promptly at 3 o'clock Mr. Wm. D. Rockwood called the first meeting of the Ingersoll Secular Society for the season to order. After a few opening remarks, in which he spoke of the urgent need of Freethinkers to support the cause they profess to love, he introduced to the audience a lecturer who needs no introduction to the Boston Liberals, Samuel P. Putnam. Mr. Putnam is a literary artist, a magnificent word-painter, and his lecture was a splendid heroic landscape in language. His subject was 'The Bible and Modern Thought.' He criticised the orthodox dogma of the Bible's divinity, showing that to maintain the integrity of this dogma it was necessary to establish four propositions; its genuinness; its authenticity; its inspiration, and its infallibility, neither of which he declared could be done. The lecturer claimed that before it could be proved that the Bible is the word of God it is necessary to prove that there is a God. He quoted Sir William Hamilton to the effect that God is unthinkable. He is simply an object of faith. He said: 'Theology does not explain the universe. We know nothing of the origin of things.' He sketched the history of the Bible, and showed how from two tables of stone in the time of Solomon it had grown to its present shape, which it assumed at the council of Trent. He criticised severely the teachings of Jesus and said he wanted no religion that pronounced a benediction on poverty. The lecture was filled with good points and the lecturer was most heartily applauded. Mr. Putnam is full of enthusiasm for the Freethought cause, and believes that, with the help of the Secular press, Congress can be induced to reverse its vote closing the gates of the World's Fair on Sundays. He says he shall work for the next year to influence public sentiment in favor of Sunday opening. Mrs. Lucy N. Colman, the veteran reformer, sat on the platform, and after the lecture made a short address, in which she declared that the priest was more the enemy of the poor man than was the capitalist. At the close of the meeting Mrs. Colman held a reception on the platform, everybody being anxious to take her hand and hear a word from her lips."

Kissed His Own Head.

I recently came across a little history of St. Denis, the patron saint of France. This history was not a burlesque, but was evidently written in good faith by a man named Samuel Ireland. The saint, it will be remembered, was beheaded, after which he walked from Rheims to Paris. This miracle Mr. Ireland emphasizes in the following striking way. He says: "During this and other peregrinations of the good St. Denis, he carried his head under his arm. He took as much care of it as if it were to him the most precious thing in the world, and frequently he would sit down by the roadside, and taking his head in both hands lift it to his lips and kiss it with much affection."—X.

Mr. Joseph Cook and His Precious Hell.

From the Boston Evening Transcript, Feb. 20, 1892.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRANSCRIPT: May an anxious inquirer hav a little space in some early issue of your admirable paper to submit to the early attention and judgment of Boston's great lecturer the following "speculativ census of the population of hell?"

Do these "returns," which I take from the New York Sun, tally with his, or are they too small?

In round numbers the earth has a population of 1,300,000,000, of which 300,000,000 are professed Christians, the other 1,000,000,000 being Mohammedans, Buddhists, Jews, and heathen. The whole race was condemned to eternal punishment for the sin of Adam. This was the fall of man, from which there was and is no redemption save through the death of Christ. Biblical chronology givs the earth a period of about 6,000 years. From Adam's time to Christ was 4,000 years, during which period no human souls were saved. The population may then hav averaged 1,000,000,000. Three generations, or 300,000,000, pass away in each century. Forty centuries, therefore, consigned 120,000,000,000 of men to eternal fire, and, for all we know, they are there now. In 1,900 years that hav elapsed since the birth of Christ 57,000,000,000 more of human beings hav lived and died. If all the Christians, nominal and real, who hav ever lived on the face of the earth hav been saved, they will not number more than 18,000,000,000. Now, if we deduct this latter number from the grand total of 177,000,000,000, we find 159,000,000,000 of souls who are suffering the torments of hell fire, as against the 18,000,000,000 who hav escaped. But this is not the whole truth.

Nobody believes that more than ten per cent of the professed Christians are saved. Calvinists say that the elect are few. If this is a fact, heaven contains but 1,800,000,000 against a population in hell of 175,000,000,000!

Perhaps the above is a grim piece of satire on the popular belief, and it is horrible enough to make one's hair stand on end. But what if it be true? As one who cannot call himself anything else than a poor miserable sinner before that all-surveying eye that looketh not on the outward appearance, but seeth the heart, and Mr. Joseph Cook's, I would like to know of that erudite and tender-hearted gentleman and God almighty's confidential friend, if the chance of my not being saved and not burning eternally, and that of my wife and my children, is only as 18 to 175, or rather, to come nearer to the figures, as 18 to 1,750! Woe, woe! J. Y.

COMMENTS ON THE FOREGOING, REJECTED BY THE TRANSCRIPT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRANSCRIPT: What food for thought is contained in "J. Y.'s" letter. And when one contemplates the possibility of there being—according to "J. Y.'s" computation—175,000,000,000 of souls burning in hell, it is, as he says, "horrible enough to make one's hair stand on end;" and when one further reflects that of the 1,300,000,000 of human beings living in the world at the present time, all but a fraction of them are doomed to swell the ever-increasing population of God's eternal penal establishment; and that millions of beings yet unborn will hav to share a like fate—when we dwell on this, the subject becomes of such stupendous and awful import to the human race that, if the doctrin of eternal punishment be true, all other questions sink into utter insignificance. Therefore, as one who gropes about in the dark in search of a small ray of light, I should like to giv expression to some of the meditations that "J. Y.'s" "census" of the population of hell has brought forth.

It is true that "advanced" Christians are getting ashamed of their old dogmas and are retiring hell from their creeds. Not too much hell, but just hell enough, seems to be the new idea. But so long as Mr. Joseph Cook believes in the Bible, he is entirely consistent in preaching the doctrin of everlasting hell. If all the world and his wife are going headlong to perdition, then we ought to hav the truth told to us.

Wesley and Whitfield believed in the old-fashioned fire-and-brimstone hell, and proclaimed the awful truth from the highways and by-ways. They were believers in the Bible, and were honest in their belief. And so was the late Mr. Spurgeon. Not a year ago, he and a devoted following of Baptist brethren signed a manifesto declaring that the Bible is the word of God from beginning to end; that reverence for the New Testament, accompanied by skepticism as to the Old, is absurd; that the two must stand or fall together; that Christ's verdict concerning Moses and all the prophets should be taken in preference to higher criticism, and also "the hopeless perdition of all who reject the savior according to the words of the Lord in Matt. xxv, 46, 'These shall go away into eternal punishment.'" And now we hav Archdeacon Denison and other evangelicals in England who hav just signed a manifesto guaranteeing the infallibility of the Bible. No juggling with the letter and spirit of the scripture for them. The Bible means just what it says, and says what it means; whereas the "advanced" Christians, by a process seemingly satisfactory to themselvs, find that they need not believe the letter of the Bible—that is, what it really says; but must accept the spirit—that, is, something it does not say. But every earnest thinker will ask, What warrant hav these Bible reconcilers and harmonizers of the new-fashioned and milk-and-water heterodox Christianity for gradually accepting Thomas Paine's heresies of a hundred years ago, while they continue to cling to their fetich—which they still profess to believe—in a vague sort of way, seeing that Paine logically repudiated the Bible altogether as God's word, as well as other alleged holy books? Why not throw the Bible overboard altogether?

But to return to Mr. Joseph Cook's orthodox hell. "J. Y.'s" figures are based on the present estimated population of the earth, and that of course does not include infants who die directly after birth, so that to the number of the damned he should hav added the millions of babies whom the Christian's God has permitted to draw but a few breaths on earth before consigning them to eternal torments in hell, and whose brief existence in this sinful world would seem to hav served the sole purpose of qualifying them for becoming victims of the divine wrath.

Of the professed Christians that are saved, "J. Y." puts the number as low as 1,800,000,000, or ten per cent of all the Christians, in name, who hav ever lived since the time of Christ, numbering 18,000,000,000. This is a very liberal percentage, and an estimate of one per cent, or 180,000,000, would seem to be even more than some Christian sects would be willing to concede. An article on New England Puritans, in Blackwood's Magazine for December last, speaking of their theology says: "Beyond the little circle of the elect and privileged was a living hell of foredoomed horrors and despair. The most just living of the heathen, who walked straight according to their lights, had nothing of course to hope for beyond some tempering of the penal fires, and even the innocent children who died in infancy paid the heavy penalty of their fathers' sins. Although their immediate progenitors had been among the redeemed, they might still be answerable for the sin of Adam, and be the victims of the seductiv sophistries of the wily serpent."

The divine edict, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire," has been a source of satisfaction and self-congratulation to each one of the numberless Christian sects, as applying to every sect except itself, and as providing its own chosen few with an exclusiv heaven. So that my estimate of one per cent does not seem to be unreasonable.

Referring to the hymns of the Puritans, the article in Blackwood's says: "These advanced Calvinists seem to hav agreed with the cynical Rochefoucauld in thinking that seeing the pain of our friends givs piquancy to our pleasures. The poet indulges himself with a foretaste of the joys of the saved, representing them as gloating over the agonies of the lost. A single stanza in that vein will suffice:

> "The pious father had much rather
> His graceless son should lie
> In hell with devils for all his evils,
> Burning eternally."

It was quite a common thing for Christian saints and divines to declare that the tortures of the damned will enhance the joys of the elect. Dr. Isaac Watts in his hymns was wont to dwell with complacent satisfaction on the dead hosts that had gone down to hell. He sings:

> My thoughts on awful subjects dwell,
> Damnation and the dead.

And again:

> Hopeless immortals! how they scream and shiver,
> While devils push them to the pit wide yawning,
> Hideous and gloomy to receive them headlong
> Down to the center.

And in another sacred lyric he positivly delights in picturing the countless lost ones that the devils hav "pushed down to the center" of the pit:

> There endless crowds of sinners lie,
> And darkness makes their chains.
> Tortured with keen despair they cry,
> Yet wait for fiercer pains.
> Not all their anguish and their blood
> For their old guilt atones,
> Nor the compassion of a God
> Shall hearken to their groans.

And numbered with these legions in hell are—if the Bible and orthodoxy be true—some of the noblest, wisest, and purest spirits that hav walked this earth. Let us mention a few of them: Charles Darwin, whose memory all men delight to honor, and of whom Grant Allen in a tribute to the great thinker says: "Of Darwin's pure and exalted moral nature no Englishman of the present generation can trust himself to speak with becoming consideration. . . . 'an intellect which had no superior' was wedded to a 'character even nobler than the intellect.'" But Darwin renounced Christianity, and at the last avowed himself an Agnostic, and he has his part in "the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death."

John Stuart Mill was a man of such high moral character and purity that Mr. Gladstone was accustomed to call him the Saint of Rationalism. Yet Mill was an unbeliever in Christianity. He said, referring to the Christians' God, that it was impossible to adore such a being without a frightful distortion of the standard of right and wrong. And again he said: "I will call no being good who is not what I mean when I apply that epithet to my fellow-creatures; and if such a being can sentence me to hell for not so calling him, to hell I will go." If belief is necessary to salvation—and the Bible says, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned"—if belief is a sine qua non—then John Stuart Mill did go to hell, and is there now.

Harriet Martineau must also be counted with the doomed in hell. She proclaimed her unbelief up to the time of her death, yet judged by her life she was better deserving of heaven than thousands of believers who base their salvation on the vicarious sacrifice of a divine redeemer.

Prof. William Kingdon Clifford went down to hell in 1879, if the Bible is true. He was a skeptic of the most pronounced type, as the following utterance of his will show: "How well and nobly soever a man shall hav worked for his fellows, he must end—according to the popular legend—by being either the eternal sycophant of a celestial despot, or the eternal victim of a celestial executioner. If this horrible story be true, the noblest thing left for us is to "curse God and die." And yet Clifford's career, though brief, was marked by the highest personal qualities and virtues.

Ralph Waldo Emerson rejected so-called revealed religion and must therefore be counted with the unsaved; yet who needs to be reminded of his pure and noble qualities of heart and intellect?

George Eliot was an unbeliever in Christianity, though not an aggressiv one, and she must keep Harriet Martineau company in the bottomless pit. But George Eliot was a queen among women and whose heart was filled with gentleness and love and generosity, and whose aim was the welfare of humanity.

David Hume, philosopher and historian, whom Professor Huxley styles "the most acute thinker of the eighteenth century," was an uncompromising enemy of orthodoxy, and in his "Natural History of Religion" he has shown that religion has its roots in the "ignorance and stupidity of mankind." All who knew him testified to his high personal character, his benevolence of heart, and his integrity of life. Dr. Adam Smith, author of the "Wealth of Nations," wrote of him: "I hav always considered him, both in his lifetime and since his death, as approaching as nearly to the idea of a perfectly wise and virtuous man as perhaps the frailty of human nature will permit." And this great and good man has been sentenced by Christianity to everlasting agonies in hell.

Charles Bradlaugh, who died a martyr to the cause of civil and religious liberty, was one of nature's noblemen, an earnest seeker after truth, a sympathetic, justice-loving, manly man, of whom Mr. Moncure D. Conway says: "In the course of a long personal acquaintance with him, during which I witnessed some of his most trying experiences, I found in Bradlaugh a womanly tenderness. He was an affectionate husband, a kind father, a faithful friend, and most scrupulously polite to all who treated him as what he was—a gentleman at heart." Yet Bradlaugh was a lifelong unbeliever in, and an aggressiv opponent of, the tenets of the Christian religion and of all other forms of superstition, and he died as he had lived—an avowed Atheist; so that, if the Bible is true, he is now roasting in hell.

And so one might go on, extending the list indefinitly, if space permitted, and such names as Giordano Bruno, Humboldt, Thomas Paine, Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, Prof. John W. Draper, the poet Shelley, and a host of others readily suggest themselvs.

If such exalted natures and resplendent intellects as these hav been doomed by a so-called loving and merciful God to spend all eternity in hell, the question arises, Of what kind of characters is the Christian's heaven largely composed? Who are the fortunate few who, robed in garments of spotless white and with crowns upon their heads, march on floors of jasper and amid the gates of emerald, sapphire, jacinth, and other gems; forever twang their harps of gold and sing their selfish songs of praise around the throne of white? Who are they? When on earth some of them were the vilest, most abandoned and degraded of mortals; monsters in human shape; murderers, cutthroats, seducers, inhuman persecutors and oppressors, and the worst class of criminals; men who, while on earth, outraged every moral precept and principle; men whose lives hav been so notoriously bad that society, for its own protection, has been forced to rid itself of such enemies to its welfare by shutting them up in prisons, and in many cases by summarily taking away that life that they themselvs had forfeited. But nearly all of those criminals were orthodox believers, and the gallows has served as a bridge over which the murderer has traveled to everlasting bliss, while viewing the soul of his victim hopelessly lost in the dark and seething waters below. Let us take one example from thousands of such cases. The other day a man was hanged in England for the murder, under circumstances of peculiar atrocity, of a young woman whom he had previously criminally deflowered. After his death-sentence he professed to hav found the consolations of religion and spent the remainder of his time in singing hymns and writing letters to his relativs and friends telling them of the salvation he had found and how sure he felt of going to heaven, for had he not the divine assurance that though his sins were as scarlet they should be made whiter than snow? Then this model candidate for a mansion in the skies would giv them a sermon, telling them how they were to liv and what they were to do in order to meet him in heaven! Perchance, unless he had committed his horrible crime, he would hav been numbered with the lost; and if his relativs would make sure of meeting him in heaven, perhaps they might better attain their purpose by outraging and murdering somebody, too. Thus, eternal bliss in heaven is the reward of the greatest crime a man can commit against human society.

Not a word of pity for his murdered victim had this merciless wretch. Not a word of regret for having blasted and cut off a young life when budding womanhood gave promis of a career of usefulness, of honored maternity, and of a ripe old age when loving children and grandchildren should tenderly make easy the pathway to the grave. No word of concern as to the eternal fate of the victim of his cruel stroke, and whom, for aught he knew or cared, he may hav plunged into the lake of everlasting fire. No, it is all self, self, self!

And if such as he wear the crowns and play the golden harps, what decent man or woman or innocent child would care to spend eternity in such infamous company? And what a vile place such a heaven must be.

Ye saints of the Lord, ye ransomed of God,
Ye Christians, ye orthodox few,
Imagin a life in this kingdom of God,
If the Bible is true!

Dorchester, Mass. DANA HERBERT MARSHALL.

The New England Labor Reform League.

He who steals from a private person ends his days in chains and fetters; but he who steals from the public ends them in gold and purple.—Cato.

The New England Labor Reform League held a two days' special convention in Commercial Hall, 694 Washington street, Boston, September 25th and 26th. John Orvis, an old Brook Farm labor reformer, was made president; Jay Chaapel, of New Haven, secretary; committee on resolutions, William J. Melvin, J. W. Harris, Josephine S. Tilton, E. H. Heywood, and Jay Chaapel; committee on finance, C. L. Swartz and Josephine S. Tilton.

This League originated in Worcester, Mass., in September, 1867, under the name of the Labor Reform League, taking its present name in Boston in January, 1869.

The opening address, in 1867, was made by Amasa Walker, of North Brookfield, Mass., a professor in Amherst College and a Republican member of Congress from the Worcester district. Since that time many vigorous and illustrious minds hav voiced their thoughts from that always free platform.

On taking the chair that bright September Sunday morning Mr. Orvis, whose seventy-six years seem to hav touched him very gently, so far as appearances signify, said it stirred him with youthful emotions to again appear and preside over an audience devoted to freedom of speech and where all, of whatever sex, color, or opinion, could freely discuss any and all questions they deemed of use to the happiness and progress of the race.

Mr. Heywood was the acting, moving spirit of the convention. His health and vigor has improved greatly since the infernal fangs of a vicious and vulgar government released him from prison last May. He was the first speaker, and spoke with oldtime fire and logic, somewhat at length, against the idea that we need any authority. The American people need to come to a realizing sense of what truth and justice are. What is particularly needed at this time, he said, with a smile but with great emphasis, is three funerals—first that of the Republican party, second that of the Democratic party, and third that of the government itself.

E. C. Walker, formerly of Valley Falls, Kan., now of Boston, who for following his own sense of right was imprisoned, with Lillian Harman, by Kansas bigots, followed Mr. Heywood.

Jay Chaapel then read the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That, since labor is the source of wealth and the true basis of exchange, all interference with, or restrictions on, trade are blows at production, tending to cripple enterprise and rob service of its earnings.

2. Resolved, That effort to remove duties on raw materials and free the necessaries of life from class taxes is a step toward opportunity and reciprocity, wherein government helps labor and business chiefly by getting out of their way; that as the main industry encouraged by tariff is "the election of a protectiv president," so the pretense that labor can be helped by government control of land, money, railways, telegraphs, or any other protectiv interest, is kin of the cohesiv power of public plunder sustained by compulsiv taxation and serves to enlarge the chief business of politics—stealing according to law.

3. Resolved, That while property risked in productiv enterprise always helps labor, power to extort tribute in the form of rent, interest, dividends, or profits—plot for increase without work—device to get something for nothing—capital—is always intentional and usually actual theft; so the object of this League now, as in the past twenty-three years of its work, is the abolition of usury by repeal of all power to get wealth otherwise than by actual personal service.

4. Resolved, That since credit restriction, which makes interest on money possible, is one of the main means of labor's subjection, we second most heartily the Democratic party motion to repeal the prohibitory ten per cent tax on state bank issues and gladly help to put that great protectiv swindle, the national bank monopoly, with tariff fraud, in course of ultimate extinction.

5. Resolved, That as possession of land in usufruct, tenure of the soiler's means of subsistence, like air and light is the inalienable right of every human being, we seek the immediate death of the parent of rent, property in land, and we insist that tenure of ownership shall remain where natural equity places it, in the cost of improvements; that the land-tax craze is an old device to promote economic robbery and assure honesty by legalized equality in stealing.

6. Resolved, That while associativ thrift is always serviceable, so-called organized labor, founded on monopoly of pretended skill, is effort to limit honest purpose; is war upon the poor, which makes the non-unionist, the "scab," freedom's martyr, an object of deserved sympathy, an exponent of fruitful order, and moves all disinterested observers to assert and maintain the chief guarantee of progress, impulse to acquire and impart knowledge.

7. Resolved, That as at Homestead state bayonets accomplished what Pinkerton rifles failed to do, iron- and coal-workers should now face the fact that intrusiv violence has no more right to regulate wages than to impose rent, interest, or tariff extortion; that armed tyranny to collect dividends and trades union conspiracy against service are alike hostil to natural freedom wherein things beneficently do themselvs in the common impulse to liv and let liv.

8. Resolved, That in the decease of Arad H. Wood, ex-president of the League; of J. H. Swain, L. S. Putnam, and S. C. Fay, we lose members whose steadfast devotion to right and tireless activity in many fields of progress consecrate their names in the memory of all lovers of freedom, and their work remains an imperishable power in advancing order.

9. Resolved, That since the discovery and proclamation of truth is indispensable to progress, freedom of conscience, speech, press, and the mails is the soul of civil order; and the imprisonment of Moses Harman for words uttered in printed debate is an outrage on citizen right, resented by all intelligent observers, which should doom the persons and party instigating it to utter extinction.

In the afternoon and evening increased audiences assembled and various types of mind gave voice in respectful but earnest tones to their ideas touching the resolutions, and the many problems that so agitate the political, religious, and social world.

Mrs. M. H. Merrifield, Mrs. Martha Avery, Mrs. Lydia M. Warner, E. C. Walker, Geo. James, Jay Chaapel, Rev. D. W. P. Bliss, and E. H. Heywood spoke on the resolutions. Mrs. Avery and the Rev. Mr. Bliss were the only ones that took issue with them. Mrs. Avery is an effectiv speaker, with broad and scholarly attainments, and not much afraid, if any, to speak her thought. She made a vigorous plea for Socialism in opposition to Anarchy. The Rev. Mr. Bliss, of the Episcopal church, a fine-appearing, rapid-speaking, middle-aged man, differed radically with the resolutions and sent several mental bombshells into the Republican and Democrat camps, advising people to vote for the People's party; opposed individualism and said we were not yet ready for the Socialistic party; talked of faith and the sovereignty of God, etc. Jay Chaapel followed Mr. Bliss, taking decided issue with him, especially so far as the fatherhood of God was concerned, and attempted to prove that the beginning of all tyranny was in the belief of a God.

Monday many of the same speakers again gave voice to the laboring question, trades unions, etc., etc. Many people were present who had never before been in a Radical meeting. One woman from Philadelphia, belonging to the church, with a very intelligent and cultivated mind, dropped in to listen at some radical sentiment touching the Comstock law and its tyrannous workings. She said to me after the meeting that she did not know whether it was her duty to leave the hall or remain. She, however, remained, and came again at the succeeding sessions.

At one of them I took up the imprisonment of Bennett, Harman, and Heywood, and others, and discussed the vulgarity, obscenity, and barbarous tyranny of a society and a misnamed civilization that sustains and tolerates such iniquities. I did that for the especial benefit, at that hour, of this Philadelphia woman, who is the daughter of a deceased judge, an old Abolitionist.

It is sadly astonishing how many persons there are that know nothing of the cruelty inflicted by the Comstock statutes in the name of purity. I meet many persons of wealth and intelligence who hav all their time for reading and study who never heard of Harman, Heywood, or Bennett.

The meeting was a success in many ways and many letters were received from persons regretting that they could not be at the convention.

John E. Russell, ex-Congressman, free-trader, and one of the best speakers in New England, wrote: "I feel honored by your request to speak at the Labor Reform League on some of the conditions of labor, but I cannot now say if it will be possible. I am subject to the order of the national Democratic committee. I hav been absent so much lately that I could not see you and congratulate you on your freedom. How much you must enjoy this beautiful weather!"

Hon. Geo. M. Stearns, writing from Nantasket, Mass., said: "Thanks for invitation to address the meeting of your League. If possible I shall be glad to be present and listen to those who can discuss the subjects more intelligently than I could."

J. Wesley Pratt, of West Hanover, Mass., wrote: "I should be glad to be with you at the convention, but consumption of purse prevents, but across the intervening space I will be with you in spirit. No manufacturer dares to employ me. 'Scab, Anarchist, free lover, and crank,' are the pet names hurled after me; all of which I gratefully accept. I cannot if I would, and I would not if I could, be otherwise. I do not understand why I am out of jail. The town of Hanover has not taxed me in three years. I propose as a sentiment, the Grand Old Party, otherwise the G. O. P.—may its shadow grow small by degrees and beautifully less until it ceases to exist."

L. V. Pinney, former editor of the Winsted, Conn., Press, wrote a long, scholarly letter, along with many others which you hav no room for.

Biographies of Prominent Foreign Freethinkers.

In the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER there hav from time to time appeared short biographical sketches of prominent foreign Freethinkers, and it is the intention of the writer to introduce to the readers of this journal such of our foreign friends as hav, through their work for Freethought, earned a reputation which extends beyond the borders of their nativ state. The more intimate connection which has been brought about between Freethinkers of this country and those of foreign lands by the accession of the Freethought Federation of America to the International Federation of Freethinkers makes it still more interesting to Americans to know something about the life and achievements of our foreign friends. Let us follow the maxim of the immortal Thomas Paine, "The world is my country," and remember that above all we are Freethinkers, and as such must regard a Freethinker, no matter what his nationality is, as a friend and brother.

C. CILWA, THE FRENCH INGERSOLL.

In the foremost rank of French Freethinkers stands C. Cilwa (Clemetshaw), who was born Sept. 14, 1866, at Sutton Valence, near Maidstone, in England. Mr. Cilwa, Sr., being an ardent disciple of Voltaire, while his wife was a member of some Christian sect, it is to be supposed that religious controversies were the order of the day; at any rate the young Cilwa had several difficulties with his parents caused by religion. Getting tired of this, he followed the advice of the American Freethinker, the late Horace Greeley, and went West and landed, at the age of thirteen years, in New York, where he remained for two years.

During this time he acquired some knowledge of the French language, and in March, 1881, he returned across the ocean and went to Paris, where he secured employment in the United States legation, remaining there until May, 1885. Our pious vice-president, Morton, who at that time was our embassador, evidently did not know what Freethought monster he sheltered. After leaving the legation our friend entered a commercial house in Paris, where he is yet employed. Still, the duties he has here are not sufficient to keep him quiet. While yet a mere youth, and following his natural inclinations, he associated himself with Parisian Freethinkers, and became a member of the group Garibaldi of the Anticlerical League. His eloquence and ardor in the cause won him numerous adherents, as his amiability and unselfishness gathered for him a host of friends and admirers. He soon became prominent in local circles, and was elected president of the League and delegate of the literary department of the League for the Propagation of Republicanism (White Masonry). At present he is delegate for the Brotherhood of Freethinkers of ward VII of Paris, of the Society for the Propagation of Cremation, of the Society Light, and one of the founders of the circle of Friends of Public Secular Education, and its present vice-president.

But not alone by speech and action does he work for our grand cause; his contributions to the Freethought press are numerous. Besides being founder and editor of Le Danton (1888), now La Raison, he is a regular contributor to L'Echo, of Romilly; Le Libre Pensuer, of Angers; La Semaine Anti-Clericale, of Paris, and several newspapers. He is also the author of a Republican almanac, in which the names of saints are replaced by those of heroes and martyrs of Freethought. The almanac, which was first published in 1887, has since run through five editions. In the same year he was elected delegate of twelve French societies to represent them at the International Freethought Congress at London. In 1889, when the Congress was held at Paris, he, as representativ of six groups, took an activ part. April 20, 1890, he was elected a member of the central committee of the French Freethought Federation and headed the ticket with Pasquir, the latter being elected president of the Federation. In 1891 Cilwa became a member of Comité D'études Morales, and at a recent meeting he was appointed one of the delegates to represent Parisian Freethinkers at the International Freethought Congress at Madrid. He is also a translator from both the English and Spanish languages, the evidences of which are to be found in several excellent translations, among which we will but mention articles and lectures by Col. R. G. Ingersoll and Mr. Foote, president of the English Secular Union. We cannot close this article with a better wish than the one that our friends in France may yet for many years be benefited by his work for the cause. And for ourselvs, we hope to meet him and his at the next International Congress, to be held at Chicago in 1893, and that he in person will see to it that we receive La Raison more regularly than we hav of late. GUSTAVE NELSON.

In Memory of a Liberal.

Mrs. Abbie J. Clark, wife of W. B. Clark, of Worcester, Mass., died on Saturday, October 1st, at the age of forty-four years. She was born at Northfield, Mass. Her parents were of the Unitarian faith, and from this gentle creed she passed into the clear light of advanced Freethought. She has constantly been in sympathy with her husband, who has been one of the most radical and fearless workers for Freethought. Mr. Clark has never concealed his convictions. As a prominent business man in a somewhat orthodox community he has openly avowed his Liberal belief, even though by so doing he might suffer loss. Mrs. Clark has ever been with her husband in his unflinching advocacy of unpopular ideas, and calmly in the truth and light of this noble living she has met the inevitable doom, not with fear but with courage and beautiful resignation. She leaves behind, with her husband, three children, Walter, Mabel, and Gladys, and a large circle of friends, by whom her memory will be deeply cherished. In proof of her devotion to human liberty and progress, in her last moments she left bequests to the Freethought journals, THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, the Freethinkers' Magazine, and the Independent Pulpit. Both Mr. and Mrs. Clark hav always been generous supporters of the cause, and hav given freely to advance its work.

The funeral services were held at the residence of Mr. Clark, 45 Park street, Worcester, on Tuesday afternoon, October 4th. In accordance with the wishes of Mrs. Clark no clergyman was present, and there were no religious services of any kind. It was a Secular service conducted by H. L. Green and Samuel P. Putnam. Mr. Green came all the way from Buffalo to do honor to the memory of one who has been so true to the duties of human life, who has been a wife, mother, friend, and neighbor in the inspiring atmosphere of liberty and reform.

Mr. Green spoke of the true value of life—that it was not in any creed, in any church, in any Bible, it was in humanity itself. It was in good deeds. It was in love and friendship for one another. It was in helpfulness, in kindness and generosity. It was in mental freedom, in earnestness of purpose, in devotion to truth itself. The story of the good Samaritan, as told by Jesus, was one of universal interest. This touches the common heart. Christian and non-Christian alike realize and applaud the beauty of the action. This is the essence of the Liberal philosophy; this is its morality, its hope; and in the presence of death, in the shadow of grief, it givs us courage and faithfulness. We cannot make death other than it is, but we do not fear it. We will meet it with the blessings of human sympathy to shine amidst its sorrow.

Mr. Putnam said: Our friend has passed away. We cannot recall her to our living circle. But the flowers of memory shall be radiant over her grave. Love shall not perish.

All life is one. The life in the farthest star is not different from the life that is in this world. We are all bound together. We come from the same fountain. We flow to the same sea. The same sun is over us. The same warmth and glow are in heart and brain.

We are ignorant of what is beyond. But death is not a chasm—it is not a miracle. It is nature's course. It is an evolution, it is an unfolding—and what we do of good and beautiful abides. We giv an inheritance to humanity. The harvest is gathered; the fruit blooms.

Farewell, dear friend, wife and mother, noble and true. Not with fear and trembling, not with cringing heart and blinded brain, but with fearless reason, we giv the benediction at thy grave. Over thee shall grow the flowers. The sunshine shall fall upon thy rest. Thy virtues will not be forgotten.

No failure; the fruition sweet
Was in thy life and in thy task;
There was a glory none can speak,
Which death shall evermore unmask.

The crown is with thee, though unseen,
In faithful service day by day;
The seed is planted and from thence
Thy rose shall bloom to perfect ray.

The body was taken to the cemetery at Westboro, Mass., where two of her children are already buried. The casket was covered with flowers, and in the midst was wreathed the word "Mother."

To our brave comrade W. B. Clark, and to his children in this sad hour, we tender the sympathies of many friends and the honor and regard of his fellow-Liberals.

The Cause in Washington.

Attention, Liberals of the state of Washington! "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." Watch the teachers of your public schools!

We hav a subtle, persistent, and unscrupulous foe to contend with. Christians are great sticklers for the letter and spirit of the law so long as it can be used to promote their schemes of self-aggrandizement, but when the law or any provision of the constitution in the least conflicts with their interests they do not hesitate to wantonly disregard it, and even teach its violation.

The Washington Secular Union, after long, arduous labor, forced the state superintendent of public instruction to seek the opinion and decision of the state attorney-general as to the right of teachers to hold devotional or religious exercises, to repeat or recite or sing the so-called Lord's prayer, or to read texts of the Bible or to impart any religious instruction in connection with school work.

So early as June 19, 1890, Superintendent Bryan announced: "The supreme courts of other states where the provisions of the constitution and law are similar to ours, hav decided that religious exercises cannot be conducted in connection with school work, even to the repeating of the Lord's prayer."

Early in October, 1891, the state superintendent of public instruction wrote to the attorney-general of the state for his official decision on these questions. The following is an extract from his opinion:

HON. R. B. BRYAN. State Superintendent of Public Instruction, Olympia, Wash., Dear Sir: I am in receipt of your communication of recent date submitting for my official consideration the following inquiry: "Can a teacher employed in the common schools of this state, without viclation of any law of the state, or any provision of the constitution, conduct devotional or religious exercises at the opening of the school day, or during any part of the school day, as prescribed by law, by the singing of hymns or other sacred music or by reading passages from the Bible, without comment, or by repeating or causing to be repeated, without comment, what is usually known as the Lord's prayer?"

Sec. 4, Art. IX, of our constitution says: "All schools maintained or supported, wholly or in part, by the public funds, shall be forever free from sectarian control or influence." If the whole vocabulary of the English language were exhausted it would be difficult to frame an expression which would indicate on the part of the people of the state more clearly and emphatically an intention to abolish everything which had even the slightest taint of sectarianism from the public schools.

Yet in spite of this opinion of the highest law officer of the state, in the city of Tacoma, and I fear in some other places, the teachers, with the pious admonition, "We ought to obey God rather than man," indulge in devotional and religious exercises and read or repeat the Lord's prayer during the sessions of school.

The board of directors of the Washington Secular Union hav received complaints in regard to seven different teachers in the city schools of Tacoma. The secretary promptly wrote each of the law-breaking teachers, the principal of the several schools where the offense was committed, and the city superintendent of schools. The latter is a miserable no-account fanatic and panders to the religious element in hope to obtain political preferment. He had the audacity to demand that the secretary of the Washington Secular Union make all communications with the city teachers through him.

The following item I clip from the Seattle Telegraph under date of September 27th:

TACOMA NEWS.—At to-day's meeting of the Ministerial Alliance, a committee of four was appointed to take into consideration the laws of the state relating to Christianity. The movement is made in response to the demand of the Secularists that the Lord's prayer be not said in the public schools. The committee of clergymen will look up the law to see if this is legal.

The clergy will doubtless make a determined effort to defeat the provisions of the constitution, but the Washington Secular Union is fully prepared to enforce obedience to the just, wise, and equitable provision of the law, and proposes to compel these "law and order people" to themselvs comply with the law. But we need the activ coöperation of every Liberal of the state, not to incur any responsibility or expense, but to watch the schools of their district and in every case of any violation to immediately notify the secretary of the Washington Secular Union, giving the name of the offending schoolteacher, name of the schoolhouse, or its number, and names of the school officers of the district.

LECTURES AT TACOMA.

We are in the fifth month of our regular Sunday evening lectures at Germania Hall and the interest is admirably sustained in spite of election excitement, exposition, theater, and other attractions. The attendance keeps over seven hundred at the lowest, and the most earnest interest is manifested alike in the lectures and in the asking and answering of questions after each lecture. At the regular Tuesday evening meetings of the Tacoma Secular Union our attendance runs from forty to seventy—one full third, and sometimes one full half, ladies. The society weekly meetings are held at Macaulay Hall, 1,117 Tacoma avenue.

Last Tuesday evening we gave our third monthly literary social and ball. The following is a copy of the program. Our worthy president, who is determined never to miss an opportunity of impressing the lessons of Secularism, had printed on the program, under the title of the society, "Church and state must and shall be separated:"

LITERARY PROGRAM.

Piano solo.....La Petite Robinson.
Recitation, "Ship at Sea".....Miss Fredda Wilde.
Song.....Mr. Robert Howden.
Reading.....Mrs. M. B. Brooks.
Duet, "Fly Away, Birdling."...Mrs. Robinson and Mrs. Angus.
Recitation, "The Dead Doll."....Little Stella Langdon.
Recitation, "Woman's Wrongs."...Mrs. O. S. Robinson.
Reading.....Mr. Jas. H. Tillotson.
Duet, "I Would That My Love."...Mrs. Angus and Mrs. Robinson.
Recitation, "Morning After the Ball."....Little Stella Langdon.

DANCE PROGRAM.

Waltz. Lancers. Polka. Comas. Quadrille. Waltz. Schottische. Newport. Waltz Quadrille. Polka. Lancers. Waltz.

At our regular Tuesday evening meetings business is dispatched with all possible expedition and followed by music, songs, duets, quartets, readings, recitations, and debates of questions of interest. We hav a dramatic class, and our first pieces for public performance are under rehearsal.

TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY.

Multifarious duties hav prevented the earlier completion of the pamphlet, the "Taxed and the Untaxed," showing the injustice of all exemptions from taxation of church property; but it is now nearly ready for the printer, and an edition of ten thousand copies will be judiciously distributed throughout the state to educate the people on this great question.

Our indefatigable president, Dr. D. M. Angus, has written private letters to every candidate for the state legislature and ascertained just where they stand, and 2,610 avowed Liberals, and all others who can be influenced or express themselvs favorably to the cessation of the exemptions of church property from taxation, will be asked, for the cause of justice and Liberalism, to lay aside their party affiliations, at least so far as to quietly vote only for those candidates for our state legislature who are earnestly in favor of or pledged to vote and work for equal rights for all and especial privileges for none.

The distribution of so large a number of pamphlets will occasion a great deal of hard work, and the expense for postage will be considerable. Will all members examin their certificates, and if in arrears for dues, promptly remit? All who can help in this great and good work by contribution to the free pamphlet fund are requested to send money to Dr. D. M. Angus, president Washington Secular Union, 759 E street, Tacoma, Wash.

C. B. REYNOLDS,
Sec. Washington Secular Union.

P.S.—I hav just received word that the Tacoma Ministerial Alliance are about to make united and determined efforts to override or set aside the opinion of Attorney-General Jones, and fight through the courts for the right—as they falsely term it—to hav the scholars instructed in religious duties and to repeat the so-called Lord's prayer at opening of school.

We hav the constitution, the law, reason, right, and justice on our side and will hold ourselvs prepared for any and all attacks of the enemy.

The Freethought Federation of America.

On Sunday afternoon last I lectured before the Liberal League of Newark, N. J., to a very fair audience. There are many pleasant memories for me attached to this thriving Jersey town. It was the scene of my first conquest upon the Freethought platform in the United States. It was here that I held my first debate in public, with a Roman Catholic; it was here that my first friendships and associations were formed.

According to my promis, I append here below the letter I hav received from President Harrison, in answer to my queries respecting his views upon the principles of our Federation. In my letter to the president I stated that our chief objects were "to secure a total and complete separation of church and state;" also that we asked for no party favors or privileges, but that our only desire was to see our legislativ enactments carried out upon American principles and methods, and in strict accordance with the Constitution of the United States. The following is the reply.

EXECUTIV MANSION, WASHINGTON, D. C., Sept. 29, 1892.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, ESQ., New York City, My Dear Sir: The president directs me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th instant, and to say upon the subject of which you write, both the Republican platform adopted at Minneapolis and the president's letter of acceptance recently published, speak explicitly, and if he were to write further upon the subject he could not say anything different or additional to what he has already said. Very truly yours, E. W. HALSTED, Private Secretary.

Up to the time of writing I hav received nothing whatever from the other candidates, and although there is nothing definit in the president's answer, yet he is the only one who has deigned to notice us at all; if I should receive anything from the other candidates, their letters shall immediately be published in these columns.

The Federation is marching along with a rapid growth. Every day I receive a batch of names from some enthusiastic friend to add to our already large and increasing membership which plainly show that we hav not been extravagant in our expectations. Among the letters that I hav received since my last report is the following from A. G. Briggs, of Lamine, Mo.:

LAMINE, MO., Oct. 4, 1892.

MR. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Dear Sir: I see through THE TRUTH SEEKER there is a Liberal political organization called the Freethought Federation of America, which I heartily indorse. Colonel Ingersoll has said too much thought, too much knowledge, for the church to regrasp the sword of power, and I believe that this Freethought organization, if conducted right, is all that will save us, for the church is fast coming into power, and unless we call a halt we are forever lost. I will herein giv you my name with two others for membership of the Freethought Federation of America, all good substantial Liberals. Yours with respect, A. J. BRIGGS,
D. M. BRIGGS,
D. W. BRIGGS.

All of Lamine, Cooper co., Mo.

We will as soon as possible donate something to the cause.

Also the following from a stanch and stalwart Freethinker in Ocala, Fla.:

OCALA, FLA., Sept. 24, 1892.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, 345 West Randolph street, Chicago, Ill., Dear Sir: From the report of the proceedings of the Federation in Chicago, September 4th, I was highly gratified. It will stimulate all true lovers of liberty to renewed exertion. In THE TRUTH SEEKER for April 18, 1891, you can see a short notice of John E. Remsburg speaking in Florida. I made arrangements for the lecture in Ocala, and hav been thinking of getting up some kind of a state union of Freethinkers. What do you think of it? I shall send you in some names very soon, and shall call attention to your organization in our local papers. We hav a good number of Liberals in this section and more throughout the state, but we hav no means of knowing each other. I want some of your literature as soon as published, as I wish to distribute it here and in other parts of the state. Let me know the cost of the literature, as you cannot send it out free. I remain, Yours truly, GEO. B. TYLER.

P. F. Garret, of Uvalde, Tex., sends us the following encouraging letter:

UVALDE, TEX., Sept. 26, 1892.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Sec. Freethought Federation of America, Chicago, Ill., Dear Sir: There are several Liberals here in Uvalde and its vicinity. I wish to do what I can for the Freethought Federation. Is there any printing, like headings over lists of signatures of members, copies of constitution, resolutions, etc., which you can supply me with? If not I can do the best I can by making manuscript copies of necessary documents.

Please reply with as little delay as possible, and I will send you list of names for membership and subscriptions.

Yours for truth, P. F. GARRETT, by M. A. H.

Again we are favored with such assistance as is found below:

WATSON, MINN., Oct. 4, 1892.

MR. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Sec. Freethought Federation of America, Dear Sir: I hav not time nor perhaps the ability to write as I feel regarding the recent move of Freethinkers in organizing the Freethought Federation of America. It is a timely move in the right direction. I will be with you in spirit and financially. Inclosed find check for $5 for the use of the Federation. Our village is small—full of churches—but also of Freethinkers. You will hav more applications for membership soon. Send me what campaign literature you can spare, a few petitions for opening the World's Fair. Please accept my name as a member of the Freethought Federation of America. Yours for freedom, OLE EIDEM.

In addition to these, we tender our sincere thanks to those friends who hav written me sending in a list of names and tendering financial assistance, but whose letters we cannot publish for want of space.

We hav now several thousand copies of our constitution printed with blanks attached for signatures. These are now ready for distribution and may be had upon application to me. Within the next two weeks we shall also hav ready a quantity of campaign literature which we desire to distribute wherever possible. I would also request that our friends throughout the country would cut out the heading for petitioning Congress to open the gates of the World's Fair on Sundays, to be found on the last page of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and when completed to forward the same to me as early as possible, to enable me to prepare them for President Putnam to present them to Congress at the next session.

The session opens at the beginning of January; and, to giv me ample time to get them in proper shape, they should be sent to me at least one month previous.

With the printing we hav had done, and other work which we hav been compelled to perform, it has involved us in a considerable outlay, which we are unable to bear ourselvs. I therefore appeal to every Freethinker who desires us to carry on this work successfully, who may wish to see the Fair opened on the first day of the week, to help us financially and send a donation to the treasurer.

Colonel Ingersoll Talks to Chicago Reporters.

From the Daily Papers of October 9th.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll arrived in Chicago yesterday and is at the Grand Pacific. The lecturer is accompanied by his wife, and daughter, Miss Maud Ingersoll. Colonel Ingersoll does not agree with that other well-known New York colonel, Elliott F. Shepard, in the matter of opening the World's Fair on Sunday. The latter colonel has come to Chicago to giv thanks on account of the action of Congress in this regard. Colonel Ingersoll is here for the first time to deliver his new lecture on Voltaire. Colonel Ingersoll, however, has some positiv ideas about the merits and demerits of the interference of Congress with the Sunday question, and emphatically expresses himself when his opinion of the action of Congress is solicited. He said:

"Col. Elliott F. Shepard is one of the biggest fools on earth. His influence in favor of the Sunday closing of the World's Fair doesn't amount to a snap of the finger. His braying cuts no figure in such an important controversy.

"You didn't know, did you, that I hav been converted by Colonel Shepard's prayers? Just hear me talk! Of course the Fair is the enemy of the church, and the church ought to hav it closed every day as well as on Sunday.

"People looking at the Apollo Belvedere will be in danger of forgetting Abraham and Joshua. Those who look at the Venus de Milo will cease for a moment to be a part of hell. Beautiful landscapes will woo the mind from the day of judgment and the contribution-box.

"One look at a landscape by Corot will make the average Chicago church-member forget the last sermon he heard. Besides, after looking at the wonderful machinery on the ground, the poor workman who toils all the week will be in danger of putting inventors above parsons, and may think a good manufactory will help a town more than a poor pulpit.

"By all means let the Fair be closed on Sunday so that faith and superstition can flourish. Giv the world over to creeds and in a few years there will be no fairs because there will be nothing to show.

"That is the gospel according to the Shepard. As a matter of fact, Congress, in its cowardice, deliberately violated the Constitution in order to curry favor with these hidebound bigots. The members of Congress who voted for the Sunday-closing provision did so in open violation of the Constitution and against the best interests of the masses.

"Why, it is a notorious fact that more than half the signatures to the petitions were literally forged. Every man, woman, and child whose name had ever appeared on the church rolls were made to appear as signers. Thousands and thousands of them were dead, and most of those who are still living are wishing they were dead.

"If the doctrin of these people is correct, people having pictures in their houses should cover them up on Sunday. The women should put their old clothes on statues. Musical instruments should be made dumb.

"According to their belief God is a constant violator of the Sabbath, for on Sunday the sun will shine, the grass will grow, the brooks will sing, the birds will warble, the flowers will burst into blossom. Surely that shows that God is not a Christian or he would hav stopped all this activity of nature on the Sabbath.

"He would hav covered the sun with a tarpaulin and cut the clouds square on that day. I want to know what the Sunday-closing people hav to offer as a substitute for the beautiful creations of art, of science, and of genius, which may be seen by the working-people at the World's Fair on Sunday.

"Do the priests and parsons offer any better attractions? Will the churches contain any such exhibits of the marvelous creations of man, and of the tangible evidences of the world's onward march from barbarism to the highest degree of intelligence and brotherhood of man? I fail to hear a reply.

"Colonel Shepard tells us that he is making arrangements to ship poor people and workingmen from the East to the World's Fair in trainload lots at a dollar or so apiece. Such a proposition is an insult to the poor and an insult to humanity.

"From what I can learn, they will be shipped like cattle and fed like brutes. The trip will be a privation and hardship from beginning to end. The suffering the people who are carried by Colonel Shepard must endure is fearful to contemplate.

"Yet he proposes this and denies the right of the workingman and his wife and children to visit the Fair on Sunday and spend the day in learning the noblest object-lessons in the world."

It was evident, adds the Sun reporter, that Colonel Ingersoll's opinion of Colonel Shepard had been acquired by more than casual observation. One of the stories told of the editor illustrates Colonel Ingersoll's contempt of Shepard. At a social event in New York recently a prominent society man escorted Mrs. Shepard to dinner. Colonel Shepard followed with another lady. As the party entered the dining-room Mrs. Shepard's escort stopped to introduce her to a friend, saying: "Mrs. Blank, let me introduce Mrs. Elliott F. Shepard." Before the usual salutations could be exchanged Colonel Shepard, who was close behind, craned his neck between them and added: "Formerly Miss Vanderbilt, Mrs. Blank."

When asked about the outcome of the political contest in November he said: "Some men vote one way and bet another way. Some men believe one way and prophesy another. I cannot look into the future and anticipate the result. I believe the Republicans ought to win. Sometimes what ought to happen does happen."

When asked about Judge Gresham, Ingersoll's close friend, and his determination to vote for Cleveland, all the orator could be induced to say was: "I do not know what Judge Gresham intends doing. He is a high-minded and honorable man, and what he has done he believes to be right." It is impossible to enthuse Colonel Ingersoll in political topics. He does not follow the "ice wagon" and its driver with any degree of earnestness, but says he is going to vote for Harrison because the Republican party is better than the Democratic party.

What We Demand.

NAUVOO, ILL., Sept. 30, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In this country religious opinion is free and entire religious equality is the rule of the land. So long as the laws of morality and public decency are not violated, the World's Fair at Chicago must remain open on Sundays.

GEO. ALEX. RITTER.

Tell the People How to Vote.

MONUMENT, ORE., Sept. 26, 292.

MR. EDITOR: Please inform S. P. Putnam that it would be better for our country and its people if the Freethought Federation should teach our people for whom to vote in coming elections than it is for the churches to succeed in destroying liberty and murdering justice. Doubtless there are thousands of others like myself that hav a vote but know not how to use it conducivly to freedom and justice tempered with mercy. HENRY BURSTOW.

Christians Being Lectured Into Better Ways.

GIBBON, NEB., Oct. 3, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals of Gibbon hav just had one of those seasons which help to make life worth living and in which we hav had our "spiritual strength renewed," so to speak, and also in which the seed of Freethought has been liberally scattered, plowed deeply into the soil of bigotry, and where, if perchance there is a particle of the generativ functions of reason left, it will spring into life and relieve the accursed monotony of theological barrenness. To Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel we award our thanks, and to her belongs the glory of whatever results may follow. She gave, to full houses, three lectures that were enjoyed by our people with strict attention, apparently appreciated by the masses, and with an ominous silence tolerated by the Christians. Mrs. Krekel is doing a good and promising work. Her blows are not charged with iconoclastic thunder, but her fateful arguments are so tempered with fairness and the spirit of peace and so full of invincible truth that the theological fortress is undermined before the enemy's presence is detected. May her calls be many and the sphere of her influence be greatly enlarged, is our earnest prayer. C. PUTNAM.

Is About to Confute a Preacher.

INDUSTRY, KAN., Sept. 26, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find the sum of twenty cents, for which send me two copies of the pamphlet, "False Claims," by J. E. Remsburg, as we hav a sky-pilot by the name of H. B. Vennum in our village that has been telling the people in his sermons for some time that Infidelity has never done any good in the world, and I want to giv him one to read to inform him that he is sadly misrepresenting Infidelity. And if after reading the pamphlet he does not recant in the presence of his congregation what he has said about Infidelity, then I shall certainly expose him as a willful falsifier. But then, they think they hav a sacred right to lie about Infidelity, or anything else that is not in harmony with their way of thinking. To prove my assertions, look up the sacred scriptures where God in olden time inspired men to lie and deceive for the honor and glory of his cause. Therefore for inspired lying see 2 Thess. ii, 11, 12; Rom. iii, 7; Ezek. xiv, 9; Jer. xv, 18; Jer. iv, 10; Jer. xx, 7; 2 Chron. xviii, 22; 1 Kings xxii, 22-24. J. B. WISE.

Wanted.

ILION, N. Y., Sept. 27, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Having had the valuable opportunity to read your paper for about one year, and having been an Agnostic myself for a number of years, and an outspoken one at that, I am consequently on the black list of the Christian hypocrits in this vicinity, and the consequences of this, again, are often very trying. But we know surely that this is pure Christianity and is in lovely accordance with the Christian deity's record and also the records of his followers. And for my part I could stand it very easily hitherto, although I am an employee, and so far dependent on these hateful and persecuting Pharisees. It has often been my sincere wish to find an employer who was a Liberal, and now, as this place is getting very disagreeable on account of my Liberal views, and the controversies these naturally create, I thought I would try to write your paper and ask if some one kindly can and will send me the address of any merchant tailor who may be favorable to the Freethought cause or a supporter of it. I would then beg leave to advertise in your paper for a situation as custom cutter. I hav the very best recommendations as to ability, sobriety, etc. N. NELSON LUND.

A Death in a Distant Clime.

PORT OF SPAIN, TRINIDAD, Sept. 23, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I hav to record the death of a co-worker—my brother, Joaquin dos Santos, a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. He died in the prime of life, being only thirty-two years of age, and to the last moment he held the views which he strongly and unflinchingly advocated. He died fully conscious, and neither the fear of hell nor the reward of heaven marred his peaceful and tranquil death.

Although a strong advocate of an unpopular cause, his death was a nine days' wonder, more so on account of there being a burial without ecclesiastical rites. Thousands followed his remains to the place of interment, and many were the words of sympathy expressed and conviction that it would be difficult to find another like him, one whose life was so devoted to the cause of suffering humanity.

Send me a cabinet photograph of Colonel Ingersoll, another of the colonel with babe on his knee, a copy of D'Holbach's "System of Nature," and Tom Paine's Great Works in morocco. The balance you will kindly accept as a donation to help THE TRUTH SEEKER along.

EMANUEL DOS SANTOS.

God Has Gone Abroad.

VANCOUVER, WASH., Sept. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I received the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Textbook" all right, and think it excellent. My position is such that I come in contact with people of nearly all religious beliefs and professions, and I circulate the book pretty freely. Some condemn it, others think it too severe; but nearly all of them, even some professed believers in religious institutions, admit that it tells the exact truth. Some of my Christian friends tell me that I am kindling God's anger by reading such literature, and that he is liable to call me to account for it at any moment. I tell them I hope he will make himself manifest to me in some way so that I can call him to account for turning a deaf ear to all the prayers and supplications that hav been offered up to him for the last eighteen hundred years, but I fear he has gone abroad for his health. I sought very diligently for him for over a year and spent quite a large sum of money in the search. The more I shouted "Hallelujah!" and the harder I prayed the deafer God got. I gave up the search in despair about ten months ago, and I think it would be quite a surprise, not only to me but to God himself, if he should appear on the scene at the present time. I hav been a victim of the greed, selfishness, superstition, and persecutions of the church bigots. They threw out a very tempting bait. I bit and caught the contagion. But the germ of the disease has been entirely eradicated from my system externally, internally, and eternally. Now I propose to do what little I can to drive the hydra-headed monster from the universe. F. J. AFFHAUSER.

Catholics Stealing the Credit of Columbus.

NEW YORK, Sept. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Next month, October 12th, the four-hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America will be celebrated in all parts of the world. All citizens of the United States hav reason to rejoice on that occasion, because that discovery opened up this great and glorious country to the oppressed and downtrodden of all nations.

It is curious to note the efforts which Rome is making to turn the celebration into a Roman Catholic pageant. The pope (the old fool) writes an encyclical. The bishops write pastoral letters. The Roman press catches up the cry that Columbus was a Roman Catholic; that the discovery of this country was prompted by religion, and an attempt has been made to put Columbus's name on the church calendar of saints.

Not wishing to undervalue the haracter of Columbus or to depreciate his great undertaking, we dissent from his sanctity and his zeal for the spread of the holy church.

The church in those days managed to get its fingers into almost everything that was going on, as it tries to do to-day, but, in the light of history, we must conclude that Columbus had other and more personal motivs to urge him on than zeal for the spread of the church and the conversion of pagans. Justin Winsor, of Harvard College, in his History of Columbus says that although Columbus was a great man, far in advance of his age, he does not appear to hav been a very good Christian, though he may hav been a Roman Catholic, if we may judge by a few facts recorded in history. Concerning Columbus's reputed zeal for the extension of the church, it is curious to find that no priest accompanied him on his first voyage. Columbus was evidently a high-spirited adventurer, ambitious for distinction and gold.

That the discoverer of America was a man of advanced ideas, and that he possessed the courage to carry out a perilous undertaking, and deserves all honor for the success of the effort, although that success was very different from what he had anticipated—for this all Americans join in the praise and glory with which the world covers his great name. But the effort to make him out a Roman saint, actuated solely by zeal for the conversion of the heathen and for the spread of the holy church, is so ridiculous that it causes one to smile at the presumption of the old fool at Rome and his satellites in America. S. R. THORNE.

GILLESPIEVILLE, O., Sept. 21, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: As my former letter was not consigned to the waste-basket, I would like to again communicate with my TRUTH SEEKER friends, if you hav a vacant corner and I do not crowd my friends.

I wish, in the name of liberty, freedom, and humanity, to thank Putnam, Charlesworth, and others, for taking their stand for the right, for upholding the cause of freedom and downtrodden humanity. Perhaps it may encourage them in their mighty struggle to know that even one, however humble, is watching their career with a zealous eye, sympathizing with every success and deploring every failure. "Thank all the powers that be," we hav some warriors equal to an emergency and capable of restoring order out of chaos. The Freethought Federation of America! What a free, true ring it has. To coming generations it will sound as sweet as the name of home and mother. Its success means liberty and freedom and all the rights that humankind hold dear; its failure means slavery, dungeons, and clanking chains.

O friends, I implore you, awaken from your apathetic sleep, come out of the dreamland of repose, and face the realities of our position! Can you not, like the war-horse, scent the blood and danger from afar? "Can you not lift the veil of futurity for a moment and read on the page of coming years?" Can you not behold the thin, subtle net, whose every silken thread is as strong as an iron band, closing around us? Just stretch your imagination to the closing of the net. The fiendish, remorseless grip of the church will close round our necks; we will be beggars, slaves, and outcasts.

Perhaps, friends, you think the bigots, tyrants, and fiends all dead or out of existence, because we are journeying in the nineteenth century and call ourselvs enlightened, emancipated from barbarism. If you hav these illusions dispel them immediately. We are almost persuaded that nature has reversed her operations in their favor. Mayhap they hav been with Haggard's "She" through the regenerating fire in the bowels of the earth. Anyway, we know they liv. They are like Colonel Ingersoll's Christian lies, they come up with the grass and like ugly weeds choke the choicest flowers.

Let church and state unite and we will hav a summerland, but not the kind the Spiritualists tell us of. It will be a death-knell to freedom, a long, long farewell. But our cause will liv and prosper and its adherents become as numerous as the sands on the seashore if our Liberal friends will just come out of their shells. And we think the closing of the World's Fair (or rather the extreme probability of it) brought some of us out at a faster pace than a "snail's gallop." We thought the Christian cause declining, did we not? Old veterans are always better than raw troops—more wary, not so bold and certain of success. They hav taught us they were not born yesterday, if we were. If we hav idled, rested on our oars, or paddled along in the shady nooks, they hav not. They hav scored every available point for the master (more consistent if they said masters). But we need not criticise their mode of warfare; we had better emulate it. Patience and perseverance are a necessity in our cause. They hav practically closed the World's Fair in our faces. That proves they are neither dead nor dying.

We are just about as well equipped to fight the church as the Americans were to fight the British. All the power is on one side; nor can we boast of having all the valor. Some hav donned their armor and are arrayed in battle, but unless they receive a speedy reinforcement the flower of our little army will perish.

We hav no accommodations, straggling over the world unorganized, without either buildings or funds. We appear like the meek and lowly Jesus, who took no thought for the morrow. Why do we not organize and then emulate the Christians, so far as their example is good, and hav fairs, festivals, etc.? Our lecturers must be weary of poor accommodations and indifferent receptions. Our cause should be as dear to us as the Christians' is to them, and we never find them off duty. Many of us are not outspoken, and, to tell the plain, unvarnished truth, we are either afraid or ashamed to own our cause.

We were talking with a Liberal recently who said he did not believe the Bible or in religion; but, then, he added, it was considered so much more respectable to belong to the church. The "gods" forbid that we ever get longing for Christian respectability. For our part, we would not consent to help mother such honors for a kingdom. We do not object to the epithet "Infidel"—we could even stand the name "pagan" without wincing much—but we would object loudly to "Christian," or "hypocrit," and "hypocrit" is the name for those who conceal their views. There are others who fear to show themselvs in their true colors lest they injure their business. Well, we do not believe in selling all we hav and giving it away, as did the Jewish God. Money is a very comfortable thing to hav (we wish we had plenty). It is not to be disparaged. To be well clad and hav a well-filled purse givs one more ease, dignity, and self-possession, than all the grace of God that can be stuffed into you. We do not believe our business is endangered by being loyal and true. Respect will increase instead of diminishing.

Then let us be loyal and true, striving to emulate the example set us by the noble men and women of our cause. Let us assist instead of retarding their progress, so that the banner of light, liberty, and freedom may wave over our land.

HERRISSA MARIE CRYDER.

Notes on Spiritualism.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Sept. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: For seventeen years I hav read the pro and con of Spiritualism in THE TRUTH SEEKER and refrained from expressing in public the many impressions made thereby. Warren Chase published his "Forty Years in Spiritualism," and I could now write, if able, forty-four years of my thoughts and experience. For thirty years—from 1848 to 1878—I read a vast amount of Spiritualistic matter in books and papers, beginning with A. J. Davis's "Nature's Divine Revelations." I sat in and sang to many "spirit circles" East and West in many places, and had many happy times with mediums and lecturers, male and female. I gave some of the first lectures in the Mississippi valley. I was often persecuted and in danger of my person from Christian believers in that immortality I was then trying to prove and confirm to them. In one Baptist church in Massachusetts where I had been invited to lecture, in March, 1854, my hat was kicked outdoors and the mob spirit arose and I was in danger. I lost many dollars, present and prospectiv, in various ways, because I was a Spiritualist. I gave many lectures, wrote many articles, held several discussions—all "without money or price," with a sincere desire to know and propagate the truth. I saw much and various phenomena, most of which I could not explain then without the spirit hypothesis, but can now—i. e., I can for myself explain much of it without the spirit hypothesis. In all this time a shadow of doubt as to the source of all I saw followed me; and as I studied man and nature—the human brain and nature subjectivly and objectivly—and their relations, I at last was compelled to believe that continued individual life beyond the body, up in the air, was a scientific impossibility. I admit the genuin phenomena, but wait for time and further knowledge to giv me explanations compatible with nature's program. Such is my present attitude and mental status. But I hav lost none of my humanity and love of truth thereby.

Some one sent me the Better Way of August 20th. Under the heading, "Notes From Onset Bay," I quote Mr. F. A. Wiggin as saying, "Animals hav a dual existence as well as man: and that man will hav his pet dog, cat, or horse in the spirit sphere! This companionship will, however, only exist in the lower sphere, and there is evolution in spirit as well as in material life." This is an important statement, which confirms my convictions for years that if human spirits, as individuals, ascend to liv in higher spheres, then all animals must and will, from the highest to the lowest; and, as plants and animals are closely related and interdependent, all individual plants, trees, flowers, all fauna and flora, will graduate into the second sphere. This is the inevitable conclusion from spirit hypothesis and premises. The highest animals hav as much, and often more, soul, spirit, or mind, than many millions of the lowest human type. This is one of the chief factors of my skepticism. It proves that we are now in all the spirit world we shall ever see; or it proves too much—ergo, it proves nothing. So it looks to me. Again, Mr. Wiggin says, "The animal spirit having served its purpose" cannot ascend to the "celestial sphere." I would ask, If the dog, cat, or horse spirits can get up from earth one sphere, why can they not go up to the "celestial sphere?" They were necessary in the second sphere to enjoy their own life and gratify man, their companion and associate. But he, man, will not suffer in parting with his pets, for he leaves behind that part of his spiritual—brain, mind—that was related to and gratified by the animals, like a rising balloon casting off too much weight to prevent its rising. The human spirits go onward and upward from the "celestial" to the "angelic sphere" "through progression" and "are the equal of any God in the universe"—i. e., as there are no Gods that I know of, the "angelic spirits" are equal to nothing. On their upward flight to where Shakspere's "airy nothing" has a "local habitation" and a name" they hav metamorphosed from something to nothing. Leading Spiritualists say that a spirit has the form of the material man, but Mr. Wiggin leaves off the back and lower head and body—the animal parts—in his spiritual ascent up to the higher spheres. I can imagin how a "celestial or angelic" spirit would appear when it came down and was "materialized" to be recognized by its mundane friends and relativs: the back and lower (animal) head and body gone, and only the upper body-front and upper brain to be seen! Perhaps, as the spirit comes down through the animal sphere it will be greeted by its lonely and mourning pets and take on, or take back, in some unexplained way, the parts of its head and body it has left behind.

Truly, Mr. Wiggin is the most spiritual, the most knowing, far-seeing and high-seeing, the most wonderful man and logician I ever heard or read of. But I may be too stupid and incredulous to comprehend him.

Agan, it seems he believes in "gods," or else he would not say that "angelic spirits" "are equal to any God in the universe." How large his universe is I know not, but has he traversed it, to see and know all the gods there may be in it? If so, he must be omniscient, omnipresent, infinit, and can tell me where and what the spirit world—the summerland—is. A. J. Davis once located it in the Milky Way, if I remember. Professor Hare, I believe, located it sixty miles above the earth. Longfellow says it "swings like an atmosphere around the earth." So I think, if it swings anywhere.

Again I ask you, all-wise and far-seeing F. A. Wiggin, If those pet animal spirits hav the capacity to go up to the next sphere above earth-life and maintain their identity and individuality, why can they not accompany their human spirits, who pet them, up to the "celestial" sphere? Why cannot the dog spirit write on slates, move planchets, move hands to write, and materialize? Do the dog, cat, and horse spirits remain eternally in the next sphere above this? Are they then still carnivorous? Do they chase, worry, and devour the mouse, rabbit, and squirrel spirits? Or can they subsist on nothing?

Again, Mr. Wiggin, I ask you if the process of materialization is a mechanical or chemical process. A spirit is matter in its most refined, invisible state, so all Spiritualists believe. Is that matter condensed, like the gases, or changed to coarser or tangible visible form, or is it the same matter that composed the body the spirit once occupied? But you know (?) that is absurd and impossible. Or is the beholder only hypnotized by the spirit or some power?

If a spirit is so superior to a brain, nervous system, and body, why can it not write on a slate on the outside and untouched by the medium or any human organism? If human contact with the slate be necessary, then how do you know that the writing is not all the result of incarnate and mundane agencies, the same as Edison's wonderful phonograph reproduces the voices, tones, of living actors thousands of miles away? But theories come thicker and faster, and I must stop. Science must, in time, confirm or refute the spirit hypothesis independent of human credulity, skepticism, feelings, or desires.

Spiritualism has done much good and was a great step in human progress; but it has done very little for humanity that A. J. Davis used to tell us the spirits could and would do. He used to picture the great congress of spirits up in the air with Dr. Franklin as leader. They seemed to look down upon the diseased, oppressed, and enslaved, and, we were told, were soon to bring us mortals great relief and emancipation.

Well, I am of but little account, and will stop.

J. H. Cook.

The Alarming Attitude of the Church.

Salida, Col., Sept. 24, 1892.

Mr. Editor: The letters you publish from different parts of the world are valuable contributions. They giv a general idea of the progress of Freethought, and the feeling of the churches also. They are not only a source of useful information, but a consolation in giving us to know that a spirit of freedom exists, which cannot be induced to cower in the presence of the dominant faith and intolerant religion.

I wish to add a word of encouragement to the Freethinkers' Federation lately put into motion by Mr. Putnam and other great luminaries, whose beacon-lights hav illuminated the Pacific states, and made it possible for the craft that bears the weal of human destiny to steer clear of reef and shoal, and make its mooring in a free and independent sea. There is need for action, owing to the attitude of the Christian churches, and the political influences they wield, which has been so plainly indicated through the action of Congress in passing a law that will compel the people coming from all parts of the world to observe certain religious forms while visiting at the Exposition in 1893; causing its gates to be closed on Sunday; establishing a religion in plain violation of the Constitution, and in the face of an earnest protest from one-half of our own citizens; fixing a religious standard whereby all other religious adherents must be governed, who outnumber Christianity ten to one, and who are equally interested in the World's Exhibit, while each of their religions has fixed as sacred a different day, requiring them to observe it as a religious duty, and they are as zealously attached to their faith, and hav as full assurance that it descended to them from an infallible source, as the Christians with their rights and ceremonies. Congress shall pass no law establishing a religion. So says our Constitution. In this outrage upon a free institution, made sacred by patriots and statesmen in a long and sanguin conflict, struggling with all the power and zeal of an oppressed and liberty-loving people, who turned the iron yoke of despotism and declared themselvs free from the tyrannical rule of the British government, which under the immediate guidance of the Protestant church ignominiously trampled upon every right of her infant America, now the serpent reappears upon the grounds of the World's Fair. A sacred day has been set up. And to our shame this act of intolerance comes from the American Congress.

And this has been done without a single Bible passage to show that either Christ or his immediate followers in any way indicated that this day should be observed. The charge made by the Jews against Christ was, that he was a Sabbath-breaker. But this so-called Christian Sabbath was first observed in Christendom from an edict passed by the emperor Constantine in the fourth century ordering its observance, and was borrowed from the pagan religion, being the Day of the Sun, or Sunday. Constantine, being the first Christian emperor, and of pagan extraction, thought by this order he would reconcile paganism and Christianity. It was a stroke of political policy, and very materially strengthened Christianity. And when we state that this same emperor caused the death of seven of his near relativs, and otherwise most freely wet his sword in fraternal blood, we only state a historical fact. So much for the sacredness of this unbiblical day.

And so much for the wisdom and patriotism of the American Congress, donating $2,500,000 of the people's money as a bribe to the World's Fair commissioners, that they may close their gates on Sunday, and favor a special religion, thereby withholding from the gate receipts double the amount of their subsidy, forcing an acceptance of the Christian religion upon all other religious adherents and all unbelievers, giving financial aid not only to the churches but to theaters and to drinking and gambling hells, drawing from the pockets of the poor who hav only this one day of rest or leisure in which to view the grand display of art brought together for the purpose of elevating, refining, and harmonizing the views and tastes of the vast human family. It is alarming to consider the power and influence of this dominant religion, which has drawn its mantle of divine protection over such an august body of men as constitute the American Congress, who, having violated their moral, patriotic, and Constitutional obligations by crawling and cringing to the power of priestcraft, filching from the hard earnings of the poor, adding more filthy lucre to their ill-gotten gains, doffing hats to the winning smiles of the autocratic money gamblers, slabbering the blind voters at election times, drink slop from the swilltub of superstition in order to ride the waves of public credulity and maintain political supremacy, thereby uniting church and state.

Then, as the text suggests, why should not all true and independent voters who hav fairly considered the history of the past, and learned the present by what has gone before, organize for political action and for self-defense, and guard the state from the encroachment of the church, as well as from the grasping hands of the money-sharks? Protect each and all religions in their legitimate rights, but do not extend such rights so far as to infringe upon or impair the rights of others. Take the Golden Rule as the maxim, and then there will be no laws enacted in favor of special religions. Protect the believer in his belief, and gage the unbeliever by the same measure. This is all we ask. Tyrants only ask more. Place no gag reins upon the people in order to draw them into the religious harness and subjugate their mentality.

All of the religionists' worry and rant and scolding to force down Secular or skeptical literature; all of their efforts (which are a power in the land) put forward to stamp out free inquiry, are so much weight thrown upon mental liberty. By their fruits ye shall know them. What are the fruits of Christian teaching upon this all-important question, religion? Educated as they are, what do they know? Absolutely nothing but what has been forced upon them. Only one side is permitted to be seen, and that not full or fair. They are scared, dogged, belabored into a belief, without facts, without investigation, and left without a knowledge that the truth has been turned up to view—the truth, that which they hav paid to know, and know not, but hav the assurance that they do know. And they are satisfied it is sufficient, and sacrifice upon the altar of credulity the highest and most ennobling principle of their nature, the highest manhood of man. So the people move on, forced by the blighting wind of superstition, being driven like a herd of swine before the dominant churches, and intolerant religion, which comes rushing with furious force and biting all opponents in its path. There is no free inquiry as to the truth or falsehood of its claims. I appeal to the intelligence of all fair-minded persons if this is not strictly true of our Christian teaching and early education which shapes the rising man, bending the twig which distorts the adult body. We are a great nation. We think that we are greater and more wise than we are. And as a matter of fact our morals are no better than, and often not so good as, those of supposed much lower peoples. It is appalling to note the ignorance and bias of the Christian world upon this all-absorbing question, religion. Why is it so? It is because Christianity everywhere condemns all teaching or literature not in harmony with its own mystic views, using epithets the most bitter against all doubters and all skeptical literature. The truth receives the first and most scourging denunciations. It is the sharp points of truth which create such consternation in the Christian ranks. Truth cuts deeply and is to be dreaded.

We want no Gods in the Constitution. And surely we should not receive them with favor into our laws, not warranted by the Constitution. History everywhere warns us to beware of and guard against the approach of the Gods toward statecraft. Gods hav never understood the true needs of men. They may be very useful in administering spiritual consolation to the sisters, but they hav never made a success in administering a republican form of government. A ruler in the skies, leaving all of his affairs in the hands of a few agents, professing much and knowing little—this is church and state, and always has been.

The money power of our government has grown to be a monster. The cobweb spun over the people by shrewd and wily politicians has reduced the larger part of our citizens to serfs, and raised a small part to immense nabobs, who stand in with all of our legislation, turning large sums of money over to unscrupulous politicians, who will ride into office upon the oil coatings of their tongues, by which billions hav unjustly passed from the many into the hands of the few. This is a tremendous and dangerous influence upon liberty. But it will be lost in obscurity when compared with the blighting evil of a supernatural religion when it becomes fully established at the head of our government. Supported as it is, and as it always has been, by the ignorant and excitable mass, who blindly pay their money to be led or driven, mental liberty would soon be wiped out. And then to doubt the infallibility of God's vicegerents, who would head all public business, would be a capital state crime. The serpent of old is gradually coiling its cunning and deadly form around American politics. It has already encircled the national capital, and struck its poison fangs into American legislation. Fellow-Liberals, what little I can do, and so long as I liv (and this is the great object of my life), I shall ever continue to do by placing obstructions in the path of superstition, which is the dogmas and absurdities of the Christian religion, endeavoring to force intolerant authority upon the people of this country. Keep it out of state affairs and it is not to be feared. Reason will demolish it. But if it gets a solid hold upon the government, we are gone.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A True Story.

In little Daisy's dimpled hand two bright, new pennies shone;
One was for Rob (at school just then), the other Daisy's own.
While waiting Rob's return, she rolled both treasures round the floor,
When suddenly they disappeared, and one was seen no more.
"Poor Daisy, is your penny lost?' was asked in accents kind;
"Why, no, mine's here!" she quickly said. "It's Rob's I cannot find."

Across the Atlantic.

Homeward Bound.—Getting Under Way.—Predicting a Stormy Passage.—Amusements on Shipboard.—In Sight of Land.—A Pretty Legend.

On the evening of August 24th we left the smiling little village of Keswick for Glasgow, en route for home and nativ land.

At Penrith a part of our company left us to go to Liverpool to return to America by the Cunard line.

At 9 P.M. we were at Carlisle, where we had a stop of eight minutes. After that we settled down to sleep or our reflections. In our compartment were Mr. E. Brookings, Mr. Robert Adams, Mr. A. Godfrey, Mr. Cooley, Mrs. and Miss Emerson, Miss Grace Brackett, Miss Fay, Miss Mahoney, Mrs. Bethia M. Wixon, and your correspondent. Miss Fay kindly offered the use of her corner for a nap, but, being already in the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER, her generous offer was declined with thanks.

Miss Fay is an artist of unusual talent, as was shown later in the views she took of the "sleeping beauties" in the car. About midnight we were glad to hear human voices and to see the gleaming lights of Glasgow.

We found comfortable quarters again at the Central Station Hotel, and the next afternoon, August 25th, we rode down to Greenock in the train, where a lighter took us off with a crowd of passengers to the steamship City of Rome. There was the usual scampering, running, bustling, and general confusion attendant upon getting under way. After finding our luggage we had dinner, and were tired enough to immediately seek our bed in room 103.

Next morning we were nearing the Irish coast, the waters were rough and the ship was saucy.

At Moville we halted to take on more passengers, and several of our party would hav been delighted to hav gone ashore and taken a ride in an Irish jaunting-car, but the purser did not think it advisable, so we had to be content to simply look at the rock-bound "Emerald isle."

On Sunday, "divine service" ("surface," one lady called it) was held below in the dining-hall, but I noticed that in the prayers there wasn't a word said for the crowd in the steerage and second cabin, nor for the president of the United States. I knew, however, that they'd get along just as well. I went down on the lower deck and had a good time listening to the singing of the steerage girls. There were fifty-seven clergymen on board, and the sailors predicted a stormy voyage. "We always hav nawsty weather when we carry so many o' them fellers, and there's enough here to sink the ship," said one of the bold sailor boys. As it was, we had a thick fog a good part of the way. "They fetched it," said the old sailor; "they're in it all the time—you needn't tell me."

We had two very enjoyable concerts on board ship, in which several ladies and gentlemen took part—Miss Evelyn Street, of Toronto, Can.; Miss Sinclair, Miss Condit, Mr. Wood, Professor Porter, Col. E. C. James, of New York city; Rev. J. McEwan, Rev. W. W. Landrum, of Richmond, Va.; Mrs. H. N. Ralston, of Washington, D. C.; Professor Webster, and others.

Colonel James recited "The Wreck of the Prairie Bell," and some of the good, pious brethren and sisters took exceptions to "such a fellow as Jim Bludsoe" being held up as a type of a noble man simply for doing his duty, and remarked that he had too many wives for one thing. "How about that wise old man, Solomon, who is reputed to hav had some seven hundred, besides three hundred questionable attachments?" was asked. There followed an ominous silence. "Well," said one, "good deeds can't take anybody to heaven, or bad ones to—t'other place!" "No? What then?" "Only belief on the Lord Jesus Christ—on his atoning blood—can save sinners!" A snicker followed this announcement, and somebody sneeringly said, "Too thin!"

One day when we were nearing land, a clergyman on board, speaking of his little children, said, "I can hardly wait, I want to see them so. I could crunch their bones in my ecstasy!" "Pretty deep love!" was remarked by one near by. "Yes," said the genial minister, "but there is one I love more." "And who is that, pray?" I questioned. "My wife," was the unexpected reply. "I supposed you would say 'the Lord J.C.,'" said I. "Well—well—now—that is quite a different kind of love, you know!" "Yes, I thought so," I replied, laughing, and wondering how much of all the nonsense in the world is due to ignorance, and how much to folly. Said Shakspere, "Ignorance is the curse of God, knowledge the wing with which we fly to heaven." I thought of all my eyes had looked upon over on the other side, of the great cathedrals and the ruined abbeys, of the labor represented there, the toil, the struggle, the sweat, the agony, the pain and distress—and for what? Well did Shelley say: "Religion makes demons on earth, puts men in hell, and peoples heaven with slaves."

And yet the old superstitions are still promulgated, still fastened upon the people. Will it ever be different? Will the people ever see the truth as it is, and be wise enough to put error in the place where it belongs? It is hard to break the bands of an ignorant faith, and even when they are broken, the old fabric, like the ruined abbeys of the old countries, is clung to and admired for the make, the architecture, if for nothing else.

It is to be hoped that in the time to come people will stop taking the ipse dixits of those who know no more than themselvs, let reason work, and see that "science is the sum of all we know, religion the sum of all we do not know."

It was a happy hour when we steamed in sight of our own beloved land, "sweet land of liberty," on September 1st. Everybody was jubilant, until the news of the terrible ravages of the cholera came to our ears. We were all well and could go to our homes, but we felt sorry for those on the plague-ships in the harbor of New York.

We were glad to see our nativ shore again, and it seemed to us we knew the heart-leap of joy and reverence that Columbus experienced when he knelt and kissed the green earth.

The next day was Sunday, and in company with friends we visited Riverside park; the tomb of General Grant; Washington bridge, a marvel of construction across the Harlem river, and its equal we did not see over yonder in all our travels; the art museum in the Central park, and other places of interest, which led us to conclude that there are very many beautiful objects of interest in our own country which it does not do to overlook. Besides all,

THE LAND IS FREE.

From end to end, from cliff to lake, 'tis free;
Free as the torrents are that leap our rocks,
Or plow our valleys without asking leave,
Or, as the hills that wear their caps of snow
In very presence of the regal sun.

I think I hav not mentioned to you that I had a very interesting interview with "Saladin" in London. He is an earnest gentleman, of noble aims and large heart. I am quite convinced he is doing much good in the cause of human rights. I also saw Mr. J. S. Dryden, a scholarly gentleman whose aim is for the advancement of scientific truth. I regret exceedingly that I did not see Mr. Foote, of the Freethinker, but as he is one of the busiest of the busy, writing, lecturing, publishing, his time is entirely full.

One thing, there are very few idlers across the Atlantic. Everyone is busy, and one gets into the rush and bustle himself without being aware of it.

Well is it, perhaps, that this rushing, bustling life of ours does not continue on forever.

There is a pretty legend that in a certain lake in Munster, Ireland, there are two islands. Into the first, it is said, death could never come, but age, sickness, weariness of life, and paroxysms of fearful suffering were all known there, and they did their own work till the inhabitants, finally tired of their immortality, learned to look upon the opposit island as a haven of repose, and presently they launch their barks upon its gloomy waters—they touched its shore and they were at rest.

So it seems to me, after all the pain and struggle, sorrows and shadows, of life, the island of perpetual rest must be the rose-crown of life. SUSAN H. WIXON.

N. B.—You might want to know if we did hav serious weather as predicted. The fog was the worst and most dangerous, and all put their trust (ministers, too) and their lives into the keeping of the gallant commander, Captain Young, on the top deck, and the engineer belowstairs. Then we had a few heretics on board, notably Colonel James, who is a warm admirer of Colonel Ingersoll; Dr. McLane, of Detroit, who carried for reading matter Conway's "Life of Paine," an admirable work of great value. I had the pleasure of reading it on the ocean, and feel that it cannot be too highly praised. So, with these gentlemen and a few others on board as ballast we managed to steer clear of rocks and dangerous shoals, escape the cholera and quarantine, and reach our homes in safety. S. H. W.

Correspondence.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER.

Geraldine and Portia are sitting at the table reading your beautiful books. Geraldine is reading "All In a Lifetime," and Portia is reading "The Story Hour." Both are particularly interested, and Geraldine is anxious I should read them. Indeed, I intend taking that pleasure tomorrow. Mr Broadbelt is only too glad to buy the books from the Truth Seeker Company. He tries to help the good cause all he can. He finds the greatest pleasure reading "The Fall and Rise of Empires," by Volney, and he just read "Life of Thomas Paine," by Conway. He heard Conway speak the same evening he heard Colonel Ingersoll.

Portia and Geraldine are well and send their very best love to you and sister. Mr. Broadbelt sends his kindest regards and well wishes to you and your sister. I will write you again soon.

JANE L. BROADBELT.

GOLDTHWAITE, TEX., July 18, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I take the opportunity of dropping you a few lines to let you know that this is my second attempt to write to the Corner. I hav read a great many letters in the Corner. I am not going to school at present, for the free school is out; and I was very sorry. The local board of school trustees met Friday and selected teachers for the next term of the public free school, to begin about Sept. 1, 1892. Six teachers hav been employed for the ensuing year, as follows: J. M. Skinner, principal; Miss Mary Horton, first assistant; Miss Mary Graves, second assistant; Miss Lula Janes, third assistant; Miss Iola Bryce, fourth assistant; Miss Lily Grant, primary department. Well, that is about all I know about the school.

Well, it is very dry here. We havn't had any rain since about the last of June. But the cotton looks very well so far.

Well, I will close, hoping to see this in print. Your Liberal friend,

ROSA MCPHERSON.

ARCH BEACH, June 22, 1892.

MISS SUSAN WIXON, My Very Kind Friend: I was pleased to see my letter in the Corner, and it is with much pleasure that I write again.

We liv in a canyon. It is a pretty place. Our house is surrounded by tall mountains. The ocean is only half a mile away, and we hav fine times in summer bathing and hunting shells. In summer there are always lots of campers on the beach.

Everything looks green and pretty now, but most of the wild flowers are gone. I am going to send you one that I pressed.

I hav a cute little sparrow-hawk. My brother found it when it was very small and gave it to me. I gave it young birds to eat. He said birds were mostly what it lived on. I know you will think I am cruel to kill one bird for another, but the birds are so numerous that they eat all our fruit up and we hav to kill them anyway. I named him Ned, and every time I call him Ned he knows what I mean. But the young birds are getting grown now and I can't find anything to feed him with. If you or any of the readers of the Corner know what sparrow-hawks eat besides meat I would be very glad to hear.

Well, my letter is getting pretty long. Hoping you will always prosper, I am,

Ever your little friend,

CHARLOTTE THURSTON.

[Thanks for wild flowers.—ED. C. C.]

News of the Week.

Tennyson died on the 6th.

At the tenth annual convention of Faith Curists one hundred persons testified to having been cured by faith.

Notwithstanding the dissatisfaction expressed with the strict Sunday law in Germany, the emperor is determined to maintain it.

A great pilgrimage to Argenteuil, France, has been made, to venerate a tunic worn by Christ, similar to the Holy Coat of Treves.

The annual pilgrimages to the miracle-working shrine of Lourdes, France, are being prepared. Thirteen special railway trains hav been chartered.

The right to compound and sell the medicins by which, with the aid of prayer, Father Mollinger worked miraculous cures, is being contested in Pennsylvania law-courts.

Mildred Brown, a thirteen-year-old negress, was hanged at Spartanburg. S. C., for murdering a child because its father reproved her. Her last words were: "I'm going home to die."

Marks Jacobs and Gussie Jacobs, of New York, were married by an alderman. Recently the husband insisted on a second marriage ceremony by a rabbi, and because his wife refused left her.

The London Times says: "Cholera is doing just what it has always done formerly—creeping quietly onward and sowing the autumnal seeds in new ground over a wide area, which will burst forth luxuriantly with the advent of summer."

Monseigneur Persico, who was made secretary of the Catholic propaganda, will probably be cardinalized. He won the pope's favor by effecting the arrangement by which the Catholic schools of Savannah, Ga., became a part of the public school system of that city.

It is said by public observers that India has "no more right to send us cholera than to send us a piratical fleet to devastate our coast cities," that nations "should be compelled to keep clean," and that they should be made "to pay dearly for the spread of epidemic diseases, as was England for the depredations of the Alabama."

Germans of Jersey City are indignant at scandalous attacks by a clergyman on their Sunday meetings of their Turn Verein. He says: "It is on account of their loyalty to the Master that Americans hav been so prosperous. We hav no wars. Plagues never visit our shores. God has blessed us, and we should not allow Sabbath-breaking customs to obtain a foothold here."

Leo XIII. has issued an encyclical saying: "We hav to deplore the establishment of schools for the training of the mind and the study of the arts in which the name of God is not mentioned or is vituperated. We hav to deplore the license—daily growing bolder—of laying everything whatsoever before the populace by means of publication, of raising every sort of cry offensiv to God and the church."

Stephen Maybell and his wife, both of whom are generals of the Army of Heaven at Hand, hav begun establishing a branch of that organization in New York. They are from San Francisco, where they married themselvs on a theater stage before five thousand people. They wear blue military uniforms. They purpose to "turn the world upside down" and reform it by carrying religion into politics, and by fighting if necessary.

Monseigneur Hirth repeats his descriptions of the persecution of Roman Catholics in Uganda last winter. Catholic converts are being maltreated and murdered, Hirth says, and the outrages against them multiply from day to day. King Mwanga, who was replaced on his throne after giving up the Catholic faith, is relentless in his persecution of his coreligionists. A Catholic caravan of fugitivs, Hirth says, was attacked just before he wrote, the men were dispersed, and the women were carried off.

The following notice has appeared in a number of London papers: "All true Protestants who object to a declared Roman Catholic, owing allegiance to the pope of Rome, being lord mayor of London, are invited to communicate with Beaufoy Moore, King's Bench Walk, Temple." The call issued by Moore means that the Protestants hav declared a religious war on the new lord mayor. It means also that if this course is persisted in there will be a riot on November 9th, when the new lord mayor goes in state through the principal streets of the city and into the eastern end of the metropolis.

Gems of Thought.

DARE to be true; nothing can need a lie.—Herbert.

No man can possess knowledge of every kind, but everyone ought to learn what pertains to his duty.—Confucius.

O, SIR, the truth! is't in the skies,
Or in the grass, or in this heart of ours?
But O, the truth, the truth!
—George Meredith.

INDIVIDUALS who are true to their own convictions are always helping the public conscience to rise to a higher plane.—Lydia Maria Child.

THE church still talks about "evidence," about "reason," about "freedom of conscience" and the "liberty of speech," and yet denounces those who ask for evidence, who appeal to reason, and who honestly express their thoughts.—Ingersoll.

THE greater part of what my neighbors call good I believe in my soul to be bad, and if I repent of anything, it is very likely to be my good behavior. What demon possessed me that I behaved so well? You may say the wisest thing you can, old man,—you who hav lived seventy years, not without honor of a kind,—I hear an irresistible voice which invites me away from all that. One generation abandons the enterprises of another like stranded vessels.—Thoreau.

SOCIAL unrest is a sign that the masses in civilized countries are thinking for themselvs and working out their redemption from ignorance and torpor. Universal suffrage and free education are mighty agencies which are turning the world upside down, but in the long run they make for progress. Social unrest is not an unmixed evil. It has its good side. It is an indication, not of disease, but of life, activity, and mental development on the part of working communities. It is a more hopeful sign of the times than that stolid content with the hard conditions of life which denotes social paralysis and death. If it be an age of unrest, it is also an age of progress. There could not be one without the other.—New York Tribune.

ONLY lately a book has been published giving a detail of excellent provender of the kind we habitually overlook—nasty morsels of caterpillars and beetles, and so forth. And, indeed, when one comes to think of it, what can it be but prejudice which causes one to eat the periwinkle and reject the land snail, or to prize the lively prawn and proscribe the cheerful grasshopper? Why do we sit on chairs instead of on the floor, as the Japanese do, or on cushions like the Turks? It is custom, and perhaps it suits with our other customs. The more we look into our life and consider the immense variety of habit in every department of it—even under conditions to all appearances exactly similar—the more are we impressed by the absence of any serious necessity in the forms we ourselvs are accustomed to. Each race, each class, each section of the population, each unit even, vaunts its own habits of life as superior to the rest, as the only true and legitimate forms, and peoples and classes will go to war with each other in their assertion of their own special belief and practices, but the question that rather presses upon the ingenuous and inquiring mind is whether any of us hav got hold of much true life at all.—Anon.

MEN hav a poor eye for the truest heroes round about them in their own day; their hero-worship is concerned chiefly with the past. Emerson said of Webster, at the time of the Fugitiv Slave law, when Garrison and Phillips and Parker and Whittier were waging their great fight: "He knows the heroes of 1776, but cannot see those of 1851 when he meets them in the street." However severe this view of Webster may be, the same is true of a thousand thousand men. It is as common to-day as it was in Christ's time and before Christ's time, for men who busy themselvs in painting the tombs of the prophets to be just as busy in stoning the prophets sent unto their own generation. Carlyle himself, the greatest of all our hero-worshipers, whose name rushes to our lips at the very mention of heroes and heroism, had but a poor eye and ear for the heroic figures and voices of his own epoch. He never caught Mazzini's vision, he hardly understood what Mazzini was about in the world, even when he had him for his neighbor and went in and out with him day by day. There had been no considerable exhibition of heroism in England, according to his vision, for two centuries—no real body of heroes since the Puritans. It may well be doubted whether, had he been the contemporary of Cromwell or of Luther, whom he celebrated so well, he would not hav been found their enemy and counted them malcontents, busybodies, and disorderly fellows.—New England Magazine.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress Assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, do hereby respectfully pray and memorialize your Honorable Body to repeal that portion of the Act entitled "An Act to aid in carrying out the Act of Congress, approved April 25, 1890, entitled 'An Act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by the holding of an International Exposition in the City of Chicago'"—approved August 5, 1892, which reads as follows: "That it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition, are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and it is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by the Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modifications of the rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

Also, to repeal that portion of the Act entitled, "An Act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes"—approved August 5, 1892, which reads as follows:

"And it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition, are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and it is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modifications of the rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

We ask the repeal of these portions of these laws for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago, who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you ought to decide is that of the public welfare.

5 It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

Life of Thomas Paine,

WITH A

History of His Literary, Political, and Religious Career in America, France, and England.

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY,

Author of "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," "George Washington and Mount Vernon," "Washington's Rules of Civility," etc.

To Which is added a Sketch of Paine by William Cobbett.

No real biography of Paine has ever appeared. The so-called Lives of Paine have been mainly the controversial work of pamphleteers, turning chiefly on his religious heresies. Paine was in his fifty-eighth year before he published anything concerning religion, and before that time he had acted an important part in revolutionary movements in the United States, England, and France. But in the religious conflict initiated by him, his political services and military career hav been but inadequately considered. A certain historical ostracism has buried in the archives of various countries a large mass of documents containing records of paramount interest and importance. Mr. Conway has personally searched such records, in Europe and America, and has obtained from these fresh light, not only on Paine, but on various eminent figures in American and European history with whom he was associated. A large amount of unpublished correspondence has been included in the volumes.

Mr. Conway says in his Preface: "In the laborious work of searching out the real Paine I hav found a general appreciation of its importance, and it will be seen in the following pages that generous assistance has been rendered by English clergymen, by official persons in Europe and America, by pers ns of all beliefs and no beliefs In no instance have I been impeded by any prejudice, religious or political. The curators of archives, private collectors, owners of important documents bearing on the subject, have welcomed my effort to bring the truth to light."

Two vols., royal oct., gilt top, portraits, $5.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. Bennett and G. M. Mair, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. 2. Miracles and supernatural achievements have been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus. 3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history. Bennett affirms; Mair denies. This is an exhaustive discussion. Price, $1.50.

The Opportunity in Washington.

The trouble over the teaching of religion in the public schools in Washington, to which Mr. Reynolds alluded last week, will not be settled very easily, and will probably lead to a determined effort on the part of the Christians to change the constitution of the state. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer and the Tacoma Daily News furnish further information regarding the matter, and it appears that the Secular Union has already accomplished much good. The following from the News is very interesting:

"At one building in the city a teacher who had been in the habit of opening her school with the Lord's prayer ceased the practice but continued to read to her school from a child's book of Bible stories printed in words of one or two syllables, and she also continued to sing a simple hymn, the most sectarian clause of which was:

"'Guide us, O heavenly father.'

"This came to the ears of the Secular Union and a second notification was sent yesterday to the young lady informing her that she must cease the use of these in school upon pain of dismissal. She was also summoned to appear before Superintendent Roberts and submit the hymn and Bible stories to inspection, lest they might contain some taint of sectarianism.

"Now the teachers wonder what they will do when they come to those lessons printed in the readers prescribed by the state law which contain religious references and Bible quotations; they wonder if in the city course of study containing this clause, 'Memorize mottoes, proverbs, and stanzas such as will tend to refine and ennoble the thoughts,' they may not hav recourse to the proverbs of Solomon and the grand moral precepts of the Bible. They are beginning to wonder if, inasmuch as they are supposed to teach morals, they may not refer occasionally to the Ten Commandments. They want to know how they are going to carry out this provision of the course of study without reference to the teachings of the Bible.

"'Manners and morals.'—Instruct pupils in love for others, respect and reverence, obedience, gratitude, honesty, courage, patriotism, honor, reputation, character, self-control, etc., by means of stories, illustrativ examples, memory-gems, and maxims. Manners in society, at church, at places of amusement, in stores and public places, in traveling, in borrowing. Respecting rights of others, to respect property rights of others, injuring, defacing, or destroying property, grounds, etc. Against evil-speaking, profanity, vulgar conversation, etc.

"They are seriously considering whether or not it would be proper to sing the national hymn, 'America,' because of the words,

"Protect us by thy might Great God our king."

"The natural conclusion is, if it is sectarian to read Bible stories written in simple language without purpose of influencing childish beliefs, it must be sectarian to mention the word God in school.

"Said one teacher to a News reporter: 'I presume it will be necessary to let the child grow up in utter ignorance of the existence of a God, a Bible, or a religion, for fear that its beliefs may be directed into some sectarian channel. We must permit our children to reach that painful stage of Secularism of the woman in Arkansas who, when told that Jesus died to save sinners, exclaimed: 'Laws me, ye don't say so! Didn't know he was sick.' And all for fear the child may be influenced in its religious beliefs. I want to know if the ignorant and superstitious are not the blindest sectarians. I want to know if Mr. Reynolds's knowledge of the Bible and the Lord's prayer ever hurt him any. I wonder if he would ever hav become the thorough Infidel that he is if he had never studied the Bible. I wonder if he does not find that the blindest and most unquestioning followers of any faith are those who hav learned the least about it. If that is so, then why does he try to prevent the youth of the country from studying the Bible?'"

The News backs its reporter with this editorial:

"The trouble raised over the mention of the name of God in the public schools, which is related in this issue of the News, certainly shows a spirit of narrowness which is unbecoming in those who boast extreme Liberality. How the children in our schools can be injured by the reading to them of such stories as that of the prodigal son, it is hard to see. Reverence is one of those qualities in which the child of the present day is too lacking, and that which inspires him with a love of the good, the true, and the beautiful is religious in the highest sense. There is no better literature, looked at from that standpoint alone, than parts of the Bible, and no purer lessons are taught than those which the parables of Christ inculcate. This is not a question of religion but of common sense."

The Post-Intelligencer says:

"Reynolds claims the honor of having connived to slip the antisectarian clause into the constitution. He has sent notices to the public-school teachers, warning them not to open the school day with the Lord's prayer or readings from the Bible. One teacher, who refused to obey the Agnostic's order, was summoned to hav the hymns and Bible readings, thought to hav some shade of sectarianism, inspected by the superintendent of schools. Reynolds claims to be liberal in his views. He is now publicly arraigned for being narrow-minded, inasmuch as he objects to children reading simple Bible stories or singing hymns, which beget reverence and good conduct."

A special dispatch to the same paper also says that the minister of the state thinks the constitution is altogether too unsectarian, and adds:

"Apostles of 'Bob' Ingersoll in this state are to be subjected to a systematic attack by orthodoxy. The trouble has been precipitated by the clause in the state constitution which in substance declares that no public school or other public institution shall receive any state funds if religious exercises of any kind whatsoever are permitted. A Beattie Agnostic, C. B. Reynolds, claims the honor of having slipped this clause into the constitution at a late hour during a rush of business, pending the final adoption of the constitution by the constitutional convention. Members of that convention who now repent of their action favoring the Reynolds' clause say they understood it was intended simply to prevent state funds going to sectarian and parochial schools. Also that they considered its object was to defeat any attempt to secure state funds in supporting Roman Catholic institutions.

"The Rev. Mr. Cherington, of the first Methodist church, says the clause has prevented the legislature from securing a chaplain, or the state penitentiaries or insane asylums from employing a minister of the gospel. Besides, and this is the most important question now agitating the Ministerial Alliance here, the so-called Reynolds' clause prevents prayer being offered or the using of the Bible in the public schools of the state.

"For months Mr. Reynolds has been very activ in denouncing the scriptures as untrue and denying any evidence that Christ ever lived. His denials of the truth of biblical statements hav been very bold. From time to time local Protestant ministers hav taken notice of his attacks on the Bible and orthodoxy. This only served to giv Mr. Reynolds more opportunity to apply Mr. Ingersoll's arguments.

"The Ministerial Alliance has finally decided to test the strength and meaning of the Reynolds clause of the constitution, and if necessary, arrange to alter it so that religious services in public institutions will not deprive them of public funds. All of the presiding elders of the Methodist conferences will pass upon the matter.

"The Agnostics are also arrayed against any interpretation of the constitution allowing public institutions to conduct religious exercises. They will also oppose any constitutional amendments. The Catholic clergy take no interest in the matter, because they say no matter what is done, their church will not be benefited. All action in this direction they say will be adverse so far as the Catholic church is concerned.

"It is said the so-called Reynolds clause is the only one of the kind to be found in all the state constitutions of the United States."

The comments of these papers would be amusing if it were not so serious a matter. The very best argument against the continued use of religious books and phrases and songs is the fact that these editors, because of similar early training, cannot see that the reading of a book as an authority is bound to make the children think that it is different from other books. Teaching that there is a "Great God, our king," forces the youngsters to believe that there is an authority somewhere higher than parent or government. Of course the teachers explain that the authority, or God, is a big Person who made the world, as we "know from the Bible." Any story read from that book, then, appeals to the child with additional force. That is why the religious people hav worked so hard to hav the school reading-books contain so many biblical and religious selections. They desire to warp the minds of the young.

Religion is a matter which should be left entirely to the individual. The state has no right to teach it even in the shadowiest of shadowy ways. If the pious teachers of Washington desire to conduct infant revivals let them start Sunday-schools. They are paid by the state to do public work, not to exploit their particular religious hobbies.

The Secular Union has undertaken a great and useful work. We hope there will be no faltering, and that every Washington Liberal will sustain it to the extent of his power. Washington can become the banner state for Freethought if the fight is waged persistently. The law as interpreted is on the right side, there are thousands of Freethinkers in the state, and many of the prominent officials are men of breadth of mind. The Liberals then should hold up the hands of the Union for all they are worth.

God.

There are many things found in the scriptures which look inharmonious and impossible, and when a test is applied to demonstrate their truthfulness the result is not satisfactory. The Bible teaches that Jehovah is all-wise; that he knew everything from the beginning, how everything would be before he made it; that he is absolutely all-powerful, thus having the ability to create everything just as he wished; and further that he is all-merciful, as well as omnipresent. The question, how to harmonize these different attributes, staggers one's understanding.

If we believe that God has both infinit wisdom and infinit power we must believe he created everything to his liking and should accept of creation as we find it. But we fail to see where his mercy appears. If an earthly father loves his children, certainly our heavenly father should love us more. As only he has the foreknowledge and power to create us perfect and shield us from danger, something an earthly parent cannot do, we certainly can expect nothing but mercy. Yet we see the world filled with sorrow and death on every hand. Yes, say our pulpiteers, but this is caused by our own sinfulness and disobedience to God. But did not God make us, and did he from his infinit store of knowledge forget to make us perfect, and leave open one possibility by which we could fall? What would be thought of an earthly parent who, after taking his innocent child aloft in the house, should leave open a trap-door through which it could fall to destruction, saying nothing of eternal destruction? Would not such a parent be censured as careless and unthoughtful? It is said that God counts the very hairs of our head; but does he protect them? A falling sparrow escapes not his notice; but does he keep one from falling? While he shows wisdom and mercy in creating the wolf with strength and fleetness to catch and devour the innocent lamb from the flock for a morning repast, does he show much infinit mercy in protecting the lamb?

We are told that we must not question the ways of deity or dictate what he should do, or how do it, but accept of everything in the Bible as inspired, and ask no questions. But as the Bible is full of obscurities, and as God has endowed us with an inquiring mind, how can we help but question its authenticity and seek whether it is possible to know God in his purity that we may love him the more?

If we should accept of the plan of redemption, and that God aimed to make us perfect and we hav since fallen of our own free will, we should say that God was not much of a judge of perfection (for perfection could not hav fallen), that he was not omnipotent, that he had not the foreknowledge to see what our condition would be, or that he was not merciful. What earthly parent with the same attributes ascribed to Jehovah would or could be mean enough to bring children into the world to suffer? Were we God with all the greatness of his constitution, not one tear would be seen on an innocent cheek.

Do we not belittle the deity when we teach the plan of salvation? Do we not show our poor opinion of God and show how little he thinks of us, when we assert that his infinit anger could be appeased only by the shedding of blood and the sacrifice of human life? It is said that God made the sacrifice through the death of his own son, in human form (and then condemned the Jews for killing him). If this be true God is not so much to blame, for if he erred in allowing us to sin, was it but just that he should die, if death was necessary to repair his mistake? Certainly God could not blame man for what the devil had done, when, seemingly, his satanic majesty had nearly equal power with God, and overturned his good intentions by leading his "perfect" children astray and so angered God that he must wreak out his vengeance on man. Why did not God kill the devil as the sacrifice?

In reading the scriptures there seems but one choice in the matter: if we accept of the Bible as true, we must accept of Jehovah as a brute and one beneath our love or admiration; or we must dispense with the notion of any God at all.

It is no wonder men sin and are licentious if born of a being that devours its own, with parental disgrace stamped on its young, and instructed from youth to believe that another can pay the penalty of our own misdemeanors. Belief that God has failed to do as well as he might hav done (when there were three of him, or them, to do it), that he has made us with evil natures and then will condemn us to everlasting punishment for following the instincts of those natures—the story is nauseating to human reason and has a ruinous effect on humanity; is a hindrance to civilization and a curse upon the name of Nature.

The Cholera and Canadian Catholics.

There is great indignation among the pious and science-hating populace of Three Rivers, Quebec, at Mr. Nicholas Smith, the United States consul. This indignation was excited by that cause so certain to wake the ire of true Christians—an attempt to benefit them. Mr. Smith, not being raised in their parochial schools and therefore not looking for defense against cholera to ecclesiastics instead of to sanitationists, expressed his notions in a letter to the board of health, which reads in part:

"As I hav before reported, the collection of vital statistics has been discontinued in Three Rivers, the dominion and provincial governments being at variance as to which of them should pay for the service. The pettiness of the quarrel—the maximum cost could not exceed $25 per annum—assures its continuance. . . .

"The town is built on a sandy peninsula of slight elevation, and as there are few sewers and no gutters, there being no paved streets, it is almost wholly dependent upon the immediate thirst of the soil for drainage.

"Of its two thousand houses, fifteen hundred at least are cottages of not more than three rooms each, without yards, and banked up to the window sills with sand.

"Seven persons and a pig, which is made to feel at home, constitute the average family.

"For six months of the year the necessity of economizing heat is so great that a draft of fresh air is rarely admitted to their rooms.

"Soap, as a detergent, is practically unknown, and a thrifty housewife would as soon think of tearing the boards from her house for fuel as of bathing her offspring in winter.

"If emaciation and pallor can be accepted as the evidences of innutrition, a large proportion of the people go to bed hungry every night in the year.

"Now, the best thing known concerning cholera is that its favorit subjects are those who from poverty are badly fed, and who from sloth neglect their persons and liv in dirty, ill-drained, and badly ventilated houses.

"Yet, notwithstanding the unhealthy conditions I hav described, and the presence of the cholera at their gates, the authorities of Three Rivers are only now beginning to move. It has seemed next to impossible for them to realize that if the city was to be protected from the plague it was they and not the clergy who were to be the means of saving it.

"The long habit of attributing the pestilence to divine wrath, and looking to the church for deliverance, appeared to hold them in its fatal spell. But the bishop, a really great man, who practically rules the community, intimated to them that eternal vigilance is the price of safety, in time as well as in eternity, and that in emergencies like the present, action is prayer, and they hav gone distrustfully to work.

"With the usual sagacity, however, of municipal bodies, they hav begun by setting gangs of men to digging in the streets, turning over earth that for two hundred years has been saturated with slops, so that if by any chance the citizens escape the cholera in October, they may die of typhus in November.

"A board of health has been appointed, but like everything else in Three Rivers, it requires eternities of time and space to move in, and long before it settles down to business the nimble little bacillus may leap the quarantine and revel in our vitals."

From the above we obtain an interesting glimpse not only of what we hav to expect of the Catholic provinces of Canada in helping to exclude the cholera from our continent, but also of their general sloth and incompetence. Such has been the character of society in every country under Catholic control.

And the reception of the true counsels in this case was such as the like advice has ever met in religious lands. The various bodies of the authorities met and denounced Consul Smith's letter. There is talk of requesting the Dominion government to demand his recall. His consulate was twice assaulted by mobs who smashed its windows, and is now guarded by the police. Certainly, smashed windows are an encouraging modification of the oldtime smashed bones or burnt flesh. But withal, perhaps the cholera will be allowed to enter upon us.

Talmage in describing his interview with the czar says: "When I said to the emperor, 'Your people, to all appearances, are the most religious people I ever saw,' he replied: 'You ought to see them in the country districts, in order to understand their complete devotion. In our cities there are more things to divert the attention of our population from the observance of sacred duties than in the rural districts.'" The Brooklyn buffoon never wearies of praising the Russian despot. There is a strong affinity between the two, and between the two causes which they represent. Colonel Ingersoll has frequently connected Jehovah and his hell with the czar and his Siberia.

A London letter to the New York Times, after drawing an appalling picture of the imminent wars either revolutionary or international, reflects thus: "While the nations are thus sullenly pondering, hand on hilt, whether to strike down their own rulers or draw the sword on one another, one would think from reading the inside pages of the London papers that the chief question now in this best of worlds was whether the Grindelwald conference be held yearly or once in three years. The Times must hav printed over a hundred columns of correspondence on this momentous subject with its allied topics, and I suppose it would be hard to find in all the files of periodical literature such another compendium of bigotry, vanity, incapacity, and general woodenheaded blatancy as these clerical writers hav managed to get together. Certainly there has been no other such proof in our generation that the pulpit no longer gets its share of brains and personal worth, and is hopelessly out of running with all other intellectual, civilizing forces of our time." This is well reflected and boldly said, and if more persons everywhere had the like penetration to discern real worth or worthlessness, and the same outspokenness, the worst class of impostors that the world has ever suffered under would be ousted and disgraced.

We gave considerable space last week to the persecutions of the Adventists of Tennessee by their fellow-Christians. The evil work is not yet over. A letter from one of the persecuted Adventists to his church organ, from Springfield, Tenn., relates: "There were eighteen men and boys summoned from this neighborhood to appear before the grand jury at Paris for the purpose of ascertaining who had been at work on Sunday. The attorney-general was in the grand jury room all day, and questioned the witnesses very closely. He asked nearly every witness if they saw John Dortch at work on Sunday, and even asked some of our brethren what kind of meeting we had the night after I went home from jail, and if I advised our brethren to be faithful, regardless of the law. Said he wanted to get the leaders. The attorney-general asked them if they saw any of the sisters at work, and what they were doing. I guess he thinks he will be as good as his word. He told C. P. Bollman he was going to prosecute every man, woman, and child till this thing was stopped." An editorial paragraph in the same paper adds: "Latest information is that some six of our brethren are again indicted. And the inquiry is even beginning to be raised what the women are doing in their houses on Sunday. As usual, it is only observers of the seventh day who are molested. Brethren are not only summoned to testify against brethren, but even children are summoned to testify against their own parents. Thus the work takes on a deeper shade of outrage and disgrace all the while." As no one but an Adventist is molested for laboring on Sunday, the conclusion is irresistible that the prosecutions are religious persecutions.

A proposal has been made to the British public that it subscribe four thousand pounds for purchasing a tomb at Jerusalem alleged to be that of Christ. The spot, the petitioners recite, is that "lying outside the Damascus Gate at Jerusalem, which is commonly known as 'Gordon's Tomb,' from the fact that General Gordon, among many others who hav made a special study of the question, believed it to be the actual sepulcher of our Lord. This question of identity is one of the deepest interest, and although all archeologists are not agreed, and in the existing state of our knowledge a complete solution of it cannot perhaps be looked for, the probability that this tomb may be the Holy Sepulcher renders it very desirable that it should be preserved from destruction or desecration. . . . The following gentlemen, in addition to many others, without committing themselvs to any confident opinion as to the identity of this tomb with the Holy Sepulcher, hav expressed their cordial approval of the purchase of the site, and in many cases hav already subscribed to the fund." Here follow the signatures of the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops of Salisbury, Rochester, Ripon, and Cashel, and others. But real scholars in Eastern antiquities emphatically declare that this tomb can not hav been Christ's, its structure and symbols denoting an origin in the twelfth century. One person remarks that if four thousand pounds is to be given for these worthless acres on such representations wily speculators will be securing options on all the likely tombs in Palestine, and working them off at fancy prices on susceptible Britishers. This is true enough. And already too many millions of money hav been squandered on bogus relics, bogus miracles, and bogus revelations. Would that our children of forty years and upward could some time reach adultness.

The following story was last week sent from Chicago to the papers of this city:

"CHICAGO, Oct. 12th: Brother Maurelian, secretary and manager of the Catholic Educational Exhibit, and Colonel Ingersoll were brought into unpleasant contact at the Grand Pacific Hotel last Saturday. Brother Maurelian has felt keenly the treatment he received at the hands of Colonel Ingersoll.

"In explaining the manner in which he was made the object of Colonel Ingersoll's levity, Brother Maurelian said to-day that when he asked the hotel clerk if Bishop Spalding had arrived he received an affirmativ reply, accompanied by the statement that the bishop would be engaged until after 12 o'clock.

"'I then requested that my card be sent,' Brother Maurelian said, 'asking at what hour an interview would be convenient. The colored boy returned and informed me that the bishop was in room 33 and that he desired me to call at once.

"'On entering room 33 I found a number of persons. One of the gentlemen arose, and after mutual greeting, I asked if Bishop Spalding was in the room, to which he replied:

"'No, sir, Bishop Spalding is not here.'

"'I then remarked that there must hav been a mistake, for I was told that Bishop Spalding awaited me in room 33. This same gentleman, without giving me a moment's time to excuse myself and leave, then continued:

"'"But I am a bishop—I am a pope—I am Col. Robert Ingersoll. Don't you see the danger into which you hav fallen?"

"'This was said in a loud tone, with all the emphasis and sarcasm possible, and it naturally provoked a laugh at my expense among the ladies and gentlemen present. I felt that, even with such a deliberate and gross insult, coming, as it did, from persons so very pretentious of elegance, culture, and refinement, I should be superior to the occasion, and always act the gentleman. I simply made the remark that I trusted they would excuse the stupid mistake made at the office in directing me to room 33, and politely bowed myself out.

"'The insult offered to me personally and through me to those I represent and their cause is perfectly in keeping with the ridicule, the blasphemy, and the extravagant and gratuitous twaddle which, in his lectures, Colonel Ingersoll has for years heaped indiscriminately upon the church and upon every denomination of Christians.'"

We will wager a two-cent marble against "Brother" Maurelian's head (to make the odds even) that he is an untruthful person. Any Liberal having this ill-mannered story brought to his attention can deny that Colonel Ingersoll ever greeted the priest in any such manner.

Columbus and Liberal Integration.

Blessed be Columbus! For to him we owe not only the discovery of America, but this holiday which givs us Liberals (and me in particular) time and chance to say what his careers mean to the Freethinking people of America.

Note the word careers; for there were two of them: One as an explorer, under the influence of Science and the desire to know; and another career as a churchman, under the influence of Pope and King, during which he devastated the Islands he discovered by fire, sword, slavery, and cruelty unspeakable—and joined in the sordid hunt for gold with falsehood so unblushing that it even disgusted his employers, who in their disappointment subjected him to a part of the punishment he deserved for his crimes to others.

It is only this first career, as a bold Navigator and persevering Discoverer, that enables any American with a particle of humanity in his nature to regard with sympathy or even patience the glorification that is now being made over and about him. For his second career, as a "Child of the Church" and Agent of the State of his time, and under their Christian influence, was so void of humanity or of any noble purpose or sentiment, that its lesson to us amounts to a fearful admonition to stand up solid against the further extension of that Church and State in our Republic to-day. Now that is just what is not being done! Not only the Church, but the Churches, and their allied plutocracy, are making us do honor to this "Christian Navigator," as if a demigod or a saint, or at least a worthy man. The Romanists are parading their "parochial" children and "Catholic societies" as against the children of the Common Schools and our civic societies, and telling us, as their Pope is now telling the Liberals of France, "Wait a little and the Republics of the world will be ours; we are going to run them henceforth!"

The chief spokesman of this Columbian Apotheosis is our brilliant exponent of Orthodoxy and Monopoly, Chauncey M. Depew. But brilliancy often makes a dangerous adviser in serious matters. Dr. Depew amusingly, but no doubt truthfully, told the Nineteenth Century Club (see his report of this address near the end of his book of published speeches) that he believed his orthodoxy because his "mother told him so" when he was a little boy at Peekskill. That what he believes about Columbus rests on about the same historical authority is shown by his recent speeches, of which take this clipping from to-day's New York Sun as a specimen:

> If there is anything which I detest more than another, it is that spirit of incredulous historical inquiry which doubts everything in a modern spirit, which destroys all likeness of the heroes which hav been the inspiration of heroism through all these centuries. —Dr. Depew.

It has attacked successivly William Tell, Pocahontas, and Christopher Columbus. There is no length to which its audacity will not go. Dr. Depew may hav noticed, however, that up to date there has been no marked depreciation in Columbus stock.

All of which means that "a lie well stuck to is as good as the truth," and may be a great deal better—for stock purposes. Even "Columbus stock" may rise, under this theological method of orthodoxy, for a time. But then people will read "The Real Character of Christopher Columbus," in the October Arena, and the other recently published Columbian lives and documents, every one of which, particularly the life by Mr. Justin Winsor, goes far to sustain that article; and then the morning after his champagne dinner of Columbian oratory will be too dismal for even Dr. Depew's nursery theology and romance to relieve. How can we help feeling that the man who thus publicly disavows his allegiance to truth has naturally drifted into the profession of the "cap and bells" before the lords of "plutocratic vested interests?" Doubtless he is happy there. But he will not giv the American people the lesson of this hour—he cannot. Let everyone ask in the first place: Who is to get any good out of this Columbian Apotheosis and Columbian Fair? For whom are the United States and the people thereof, including the city of New York—i. e., Tammany Hall—putting up all this money? Evidently for the Papacy, the Sabbatarians, and the Railroads! There is no other practical unity of result or profit in it. The Pope and the Romanists come to the front as the originators and patrons of America and of the whole affair! Their Political and social prestige, if not supremacy, is to become the dominant fact by their taking this leading position. Uncle Sam is simply an underling who pays the money. The orthodox Sabbath Protestants are next to be made happy, because they can close the Columbian Fair on Sunday! And Dr. Depew and his Railroads are sure to be supremely happy—for there are "millions in it" to them! But where do the three-quarters of the American people (forty-five millions) who are not Romanists, nor orthodox Protestants, nor Railroaders (except as passengers) come in?

Certainly "we are Americans all!" But when Webster so said, he meant citizens of these United States whose patriotic Secular political coöperation is their safety and wealth, because it kept us free and independent of Foreign and Papal domination. But the Americanism that extends from the North Pole to Terra del Fuego is as impalpable as an aid or a defense, and as valueless, as the Aurora Borealis. But suppose we go around the globe instead of from Pole to Pole, and say, We are all inhabitants of the world, and this is "the World's Fair" at Chicago! As citizens of the world we hav no common interest at Chicago, and to take things away out there and then pay to go there to see them "on a rush," is not good economy, nor will it enable us to see them to any advantage. Better go to see things worth seeing where they are, or in more convenient places where they can be and often are collected to be studied at leisure. This Columbus business is a waste of good time and money.

Of course we honor the great Navigator Columbus as we do the great Astronomer Copernicus. We rejoice in the discovery of our half of the world. But there is no good reason for the enormous extent and expense of this Columbian furor. It is being overdone in the religious and financial interests of the parties we hav named and who do not deserve well of this country. For if the Papacy and Plutocratic Monopolies cannot be repressed, the days of our republic are already practically numbered; the name may be continued, the reality is gone forever!

There is but one way out of these dangers. The Freethought elements out of which, by the aid of Paine, Jefferson, Franklin, and Washington, our Republic was born, must be revived and brought to the front. All of the Liberal, Secular, and Patriotic Societies must become integrated by meeting in one Congress with the common purpose of resisting the aggressions of Theological Bigotry and superstition upon the people, and for the education of the people so as to make that resistance effectiv.

The officers of the American Secular Union hav done well, therefore, in calling a general Secular Congress to meet at Chicago on the 23d inst. to commence anew this work of Liberal, Secular integration. The Liberal organizations of the United States hav become divided and lessened in effectivness, for the evident reason that every Liberal feels a delight in freedom from every restraint of organization, and only regards a nucleus as necessary for a call to any necessary practical action. Many such associations exist in this Country, notably the American Secular Union above-named, of which Ex-Judge C. B. Waite is the president, and Mrs. M. A. Freeman is secretary; also the Freethought Federation, of which Mr. Samuel P. Putnam is president and John R. Charlesworth is secretary. These hav their headquarters in Chicago, from whence the new integration should emanate through the Congress which has been called, and in which every society in the country which has any tendency toward Freethought should be represented. There are such societies in every city and nearly every large town in every state, and now they should make their existence known by writing to some of the officers at Chicago above-named. The independence and multiplicity of these societies, if they can meet once a year in a common congress, may be an advantage. For instance, those who wish to organize Secular societies to take the place of the churches can find their field in the American Secular Union. Those who wish to express their Liberalism by individual action, especially in politics, will find Mr. Putnam's "Freethought Federation" the thing. Those who wish to oppose "Comstockism" and maintain Secular as against Sectarian administration of the laws will support the Defense Association under Dr. E. B. Foote in New York. Those who wish to further education by discussion and literature, will promote the Liberal Clubs, as they exist at New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, Milwaukee, etc., etc. Now, the point and the lesson of to-day is that, great and good as all of this multiplicity may be, and every Liberal may well belong to every one of these societies, there must be one point of unity—of integration, in one Annual Congress for the common defense of Secular government, institutions, and education.

That Congress for this year meets at Chicago, October 23d, as above stated, which is also about the time of the opening preparations of the World's Fair itself. That Congress must begin its work by insisting upon the opening of that Fair on Sundays, and by sturdy opposition to the Religious influences, Romanist and Protestant, which this Columbianism has already been used to foster. Then and there the work of separating the church and state must be begun again. Let every friend of Freethought and of a Secular Republic be there in person or by his representativ, or by his cash.

Nothing New Under the Sun.

A recent note in THE TRUTH SEEKER says: "In England prayer is about to be tried for what is perhaps a new purpose, the influencing of elections."

It is not new; for be it known that for several years past, here in the favored city of Ithaca, right under the droppings of Cornell University, the Women's Christian Temperance Union on the advent of every election day when a Prohibition ticket was in the field hav held an all-day prayer-meeting to importune God to take a hand in the election on the side of Prohibition; and the truth must be said, he has rarely taken a hand, and liquor continues to flow freely.

FACT.

An English Secularist Meeting.

[Mr. Charles Watts sends us the following account of one of his meetings in the Birmingham town hall, written by the Weekly Mercury's "Own Visitor," with the request to publish. It will amuse if not instruct his friends in this country.]

The meeting was preceded by an hour's organ recital, and at a quarter to 7 Mr. Perkins was knocking off some singularly jolly and jiggy composition, which may hav been nominally sacred, but which certainly sounded secular, if not Atheistic. The open doors and the pealing organ attracted a large concourse of people, most of whom were apparently casual passers-by, with nothing better to do. The audience was estimated at two thousand five hundred, and this was probably very near the mark. Most of the men kept their hats on, and many were reading the Sunday papers, not the pious examples of Lord's-day literature, but such as giv especial prominence to racing, foot-ball, and prize-fighting. There was much conversation anent Sullivan and Corbett, and one enthusiast, whose entire outfit would hav been dear at tenpence, was heard to say that he would gladly hav given a tenner to see the "mill." Another gave to an eager audience the details of a fight in a railway carriage running between Birmingham and Leamington, and mournfully detailed how he was compelled to pay for a broken window. "Cost me ten bob to see only two rounds," he sighed. But the music ceased, and Mr. Charles Watts appeared, accompanied by Mr. Daniel Baker. The readers folded up their hebdomadal illuminators, and greeted the Baskerville Hall celebrities with hearty applause. The sporting fraternity were deeply anxious to become acquainted with the "Religion of the Future," being, perhaps, already deeply imbued with the Religion of the Present and the Past. Mr. Baker assumed the chair, and opened the proceedings with a neat expository speech, concluding with a very orthodox announcement as to the collection. "We shall take up the offertory before the lecture," said Mr. Baker, "because there might be a stampede immediately afterward, and the rush might be inconvenient to —ahem—such of our friends who may be disposed to aid the good work. And now, gentlemen, let me suggest to you the advisability of sitting uncovered, if you please." The Secularist Mæcenas sat down, and the gentlemen in the pit took off their hats. Mr. Watts came forward, coughed, and took a drink, while the audience again applauded—and having thus cleared his throat and strengthened his heart, launched boldly into the discourse, which Mr. Baker had earnestly recommended the audience to "mark, learn, and inwardly digest"—affirming that their reward would be sure and certain, and that the new religion would make them freer, better, nobler, happier.

Mr. Watts, the missionary of the National Secular Society, is a cultured, comfortable Englishman, of genial manner, portly of mien, rosy of complexion, of softened angles, of rounded curves, of insinuating address, a practiced speaker, an admirable tactican, an able debater. He stands about five feet ten in his boots. His fighting weight is about thirteen stone. He looks like a church-goer and psalm-singer, with serious views on Apostolic Succession and the Divine Right of Kings. He might pass for a prosperous churchwarden, and would carry the coppers with dignity, although, like Capulet Sampson, he might decline to carry coals. He conducted his attack on Christianity with artful strategy, bearing in mind the possible succeptibilities of his audience. His method proceeds by a circumbendibus. Not direct assault, but rather an undermining. He does not brain you with an Atheistic club, but rather attempts to upset your moral constitution by pleasant injections of morphia. He said that his tenets were misrepresented, that it was difficult to speak of religion without giving offense; that reckless statements were made both by believers and unbelievers. The religions of the past and present were neither all good nor all bad. Everything that had emanated from the mentality of the human race was worthy of consideration. Orthodoxy could be improved upon. The Bible itself, from time to time, had been improved by human reason. The believers in orthodoxy erroneously thought that they alone could liv noble lives and die happy deaths. Evolution had destroyed this principle. Goodness, as defined by the highest intellect, had no connection with any right or doctrin. Here Mr. Watts quoted the definitions of Max Müller and others—and alluded to Tom Paine as the greatest thinker of the nineteenth century. New truths were shunned because they were new. Theology was only accepted because it was fashionable. People put their thinking out to be done for them.

What had Christianity done? It had prevailed for two thousand years. Century after century men had knelt before the cross, and yet what triumphant iniquity! The savior was there, but where was salvation? The advance of mankind was not the advance of theology, but an advance in the conception of justice. Christianity had possessed every advantage. It had the command of armies, the control of the people, the best assistance of science and art. And with all this, it had completely failed to regenerate the world. It was a religious creed, and not of deed. We required a religion more in accordance with the genius of the nineteenth century. Thousands, both in and out of the church, could not accept the creeds of our forefathers. Now was the time to separate the truth from the error. The old religion could not satisfy the mental aspirations of to-day. The best members of society were without religion of any kind, wandering without a guide, unable to believe the teachings of orthodoxy. The speaker then proposed to base a satisfactory religion on reason, science, and morality. These terms were defined and expounded at length, with much illustration and a wealth of quotation from Bishop Butler, Chillingworth, and the "judicious" Hooker. Reason must be guided by experience and lighted with the oil of wisdom. The emotions must be recognized as useful. Orthodoxy relied on credulity, allied with fear. He did not deny the existence of a supreme judge, nor the immortality of the soul. It was impossible to deny that which no man could know. He did not deny the truth of the Bible. It was the error of the Bible he fought against. No one could dogmatize as to the future life, if any. The parsons professed to know all about it, and yet the clergy were notoriously ignorant of the present life. John Bright, speaking of a clergyman, once said: "It is odd that a man who knows so little of this world can tell us so much about the next." Was it not better to lead noble lives in this world, without worrying ourselvs about a possible next? This life, at any rate, was real, and if we did the right thing in this world we should hav good credentials for the next, if there be any. "One world at a time," said Colonel Ingersoll "is enough for most people, too much for many." Let us realize the fulness of the light we already hav. There was a wonderful change of opinion during the last two hundred years. Only thirty years ago, during the visitation of cholera, the people relied on fast-days and prayer-meetings four times a week. Now they relied on science. A deputation of Scotch clergymen asked Lord Palmerston to appoint a fast-day, a day of general penitence. "Better go home and look after the drains and whitewash the walls. Don't bother God to do for you what you can do for yourselvs," replied the great man. That was the proper view. Science is the modern providence. The parsons had forgotten the whitewash. Parsons of to-day who wished to escape the ravages of the electric fluid preferred the lightning-conductor to any amount of prayer. And notwithstanding the grandeurs of the celestial city, they clung to life as long as they could. This earth was a howling wilderness, and the joys of heaven were ineffable. But heaven was a long way off. "'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view." The clergy professed to know all about morality. They said it was God's will. But so very many wills were ascribed to God! If they looked in the Bible they would find that murder and adultery had been sanctioned by God. We could not accept intuition as a conscience. It was merely a mental condition, and differed not only in individuals, but also in the same individual under different circumstances. The most conscientious people had done the worst things, had committed the most infamous crimes in history. Look at the Piedmont murders, the massacre of St. Bartholomew's day, and the Crusades. The morality of orthodoxy was a poor thing; mostly put away with the Sunday clothes. Was there no immorality, no injustice, on the week-days, nay, on every day in the week? How about death? Whatever we think true will be a comfort to us. Why such a horror of death? Because in the morning of life theology had disclosed a scene of never-ending pain. The old religion professed to teach how to die. The new taught how to liv. If you know how to liv you would know how to die. Now was the time to make up your mind. Delay was dangerous. Religious people said that to die happy you must hold this or that creed. This was rank blasphemy. Each clung to his own little sect, and rejected the other ninety and nine. He went one better, and rejected the whole hundred. Suppose there were a great judge of all the earth. What would be his test? Creed? No, but conduct. Did they think that such a being would ask poor mortals whether they had been Methodists, or Quakers, or Roman Catholics, or Mormons, or Particular Baptists, or Baptists who were not very particular? No. Such a being would ask if you were true to yourselvs, and therefore, true to others; if you were faithful to the light within you; if you lived so that the world had no just cause to upbraid your memory. Concluding, the lecturer affirmed that the religion of Christ could not be found in the world, although much orthodox churchism and ecclesiastical despotism. Parsons were always running down human nature, which was supposed to be "born in sin." He agreed with Whittier, who said, "In human nature, still, I find more good than ill," and with the bard who said, "What a piece of work is man." Mr. Watts concluded quite in the religious revivalist style with a brilliant emotional peroration, which may hav been modeled on the sermon conclusions of his clerical father. The lecture was well received, and the audience rapturously applauded the finish, wherein Mr. Watts stated that he hoped to leave the world better when he was gone. To what extent his absence will benefit the world is somewhat uncertain, but the people heartily agreed with him.

Mr. Baker again addressed the crowd, which punctually executed the expected stampede, shying like nervous horses at the collecting-boxes held at the doors for the encouragement of late comers or enthusiasts who wished to contribute twice. The Secularists are said to chuckle over their success in obtaining the town hall (by kind permission of the mayor), and they boast that with increasing education their supporters become more and more numerous. The platform and orchestra were occupied by well-dressed people, many of them women and children, whose appearance would hav done no discredit to a conference of bishops, and whose conduct was conventionally perfect, save for one eccentric individual, who showed his approval by continually shaking his head, as if surprised to find how little there was in it. The meeting was in many respects highly suggestiv, and gave rise to the consideration of strange possibilities of which, when I reached home, I saw a long vista, vaguely visible in the clouds emanating from the judicious hookah.

The Columbian Ode.

So it is not enough that success be endangered by the bigots' demand that the coming Fair be closed on all Sun's days. We are asked to sing a Columbian ode besprinkled with Adam, crosses, angels, and gods. Miss Monroe's poetic gilt evidently has been warped and narrowed in the conventional Sunday-school.

A very little history informs us that Columbus himself entertained the idea that India's eastern shore could be reached by sailing westward; that the priests held this theory to be contrary to revelation and church teaching; that the priest-ridden governments successivly from Genoa to Portugal piously repulsed his appeal for aid. The Spanish court at first refused to aid the scheme; but on soon learning that the rich, beautiful city of Granada had fallen into its hands, and that the Moors were entirely conquered, then it was that, venturing to ignore the priests, Columbus, whose "hope grows sere while all the angels wait" (what on earth are angels, anyhow?), was called back, and "a woman fair brings him a jeweled key, and lo! a world is free."

And now comes the ubiquitous priest in 1892 and claims Columbia as a find and prize of the cross of his Christ; and his offensiv shadow is all over the adopted ode. Even "Italy, in fair hues blazoned, bids thee win the kingdom of the soul." If the papacy is not here meant, what else in logic can be?

The invaders of this hemisphere carried the cross, the priest, the sword. Were the Mexicans made free by the builders of the Inquisition? Were the nativs anywhere made free? Let their mutilated, plundered remains answer. This Christian ode is consistently selfish and heartless. It has some forty lines pertaining to the aborigines, but not one word of sympathy. They are made to say, "Who dares profane our God's wild reign we torture and trap and slay." Why not? Does the Christian do less when his home is invaded by heretic or by a brother believer? And is the Mosaic God less cruel or more civilized than the god of the Mohawk?

The ode kindly informs us that Columbia was "left by the years safe with God till man grew wise enough to be sped into the West by the breath of God;" and till "lo! God stoops from his supernal spheres and bares the glory of his face." Now, if this does not mean that Columbia is God's face, what on earth can it mean? This may explain the lines, "For lo! the living God doth bare his arm; no more he makes his home of clouds and gloom." Now his face and arm at least are in sight.

We are informed also of "Columbia! men beheld thee rise a goddess from the misty sea," and as "a lady of joy, sent from the skies." This is a little misty as to whether she came up or came down. "And the purpose of God was fulfilled." What insight into the nowhere!

If God was kept out of the Constitution, he succeeded in getting himself thickly spread on this ode. And Columbia is invoked to sail "On! to God's time-veiled strand," wherever that is, and get stranded at last.

Our light-weight poet soars so far away into the misty realms of gods and angels as to lose all sight and remembrance of Columbus. Now, how can any honest umpire award the honors and damages between these parties? Certain it is they acted inharmoniously, and that brave, patient Columbus passed his last days in Christian chains. Liberals can honor the memory of Columbus, and be glad that the Christian's God is now not quite so powerful in the torture business as he or it was in 1492. L. G. REED.

Letters to Workingmen.

UNEARNED INCREMENT.

What I hav endeavored to do, the one important object of these letters, is to impress the idea that government is a myth and all the so-called functions of government are simply the actions of men toward and in obedience to the supposed will of this imaginary thing. A falsehood as a basis of action will tend to demoralize unless intelligence outgrow the superstition. We hav seen this in religion, where the actions of men were endeavoring to conform to a central and supreme will. Intelligence has to a very large degree overcome the tendency to this evil. Very few intelligent minds really believe in a supreme deity even while allowing their habits to conform to the ideas and seeking to perpetuate them in their children by instructing them in what they doubt themselvs to be a reality; and while acknowledging the doubt seeming to think the falsehood essential to the moral action of the child. As though morality was dependent upon a falsehood. It is allowing habits of thought to crowd out intelligent reason that causes men to do this. It is allowing superstition to dominate the mind to the exclusion of right principle. "The truth shall make men free" has been sung in the interests of the greatest of falsehoods. But the saying in itself is false. It is not the truth but the doubt of what has been accepted as the truth, the investigation of the merits of every assertion—this and this only is essential to mental liberty. Accepting a truth without doubt and investigation is the very essence of mental slavery. Accept no man's truth but your own, and even then some grains of doubt should mingle with your faith. The trouble is, we regard it so much easier to allow others to do our thinking, to solve our problems. It is so much easier to follow the blazoned path of others than to hav one of our own. It is so pleasant to be assured of safety if we but conform to the teachings of others. It is easier to follow precept and example than to think out and act out our own. But believe me, friends, that which shall make us free is to break the chains of habit. To shape our actions on lines of our own thoughts. And remember all true investigation depends upon doubt. To get religion we are told we must believe beforehand, and to get the true idea of the functions of the government we must believe beforehand in the existence of, not God, but sovereignty. If we can only discern the divinity that surrounds the priest and the Bible; if we can only look upon them as holy, as sanctified; charge all evil actions to the man, all good actions to the office; submit to all his rulings because "power is given him of God," we may hav "Christ in the heart," and be candidates for heaven, even though we do not subscribe to any written creeds. In like manner we can look upon the officer of the government as a representativ of that immaculate idea; we can believe that there is something about the written laws of men that partakes of another something called sovereignty or supreme authority; that a respect and consideration should be accorded to the office that is denied to the individual man; that the rulings of the officer should be obeyed even if reason tells us that it is wrong, because our refusal would be rebellion against this something behind or above the man. Watson Heston has ludicrously illustrated the idea by surrounding the hideous features of the brute with the aureola of divinity. Our pugilist, sneak-thief, and wrecker of virtue to-day, shines forth to-morrow in the uniform of a policeman and

There thou might'st behold the great image of authority.

I say, if we can but discern the divinity "that doth hedge the king" we may be a good governmentalist, although we may not "follow the fife and drum of some party;" or, if we cannot really discern it, we may allow our thoughts and actions to follow the line confirmed by habit emanating from those who believed they could see this divinity. This is illustrated by those who claim that religion, true or false, should be inculcated because it "brings up the young in the way they should go." And here is a thought I wish to impress upon those Liberals who deny this in religion yet adhere to it in politics. For instance, we hav men declaring that they care nothing how the monetary value of gold became established so long as it is here and working so satisfactorily to them. They will not entertain any idea that it has a basis in superstition, in ignorance and falsehood, and that it underlies many if not all the evils of political society. Let a man who has, by years of patient investigation and research, ascertained the facts, declare what the true value of gold is according to his computation and he is denounced at once as a madman. Yet what is in this gold that it should be so honored and preferred? I tell you, friends, it is superstition confirmed by habit, and, like every other superstition, it is bound to work us woe. I cannot blame the man whose surroundings enable him to unconsciously reap the benefits arising from this fictitious value. We are surprised that one who is making a financial success should bother himself about the currency. It is said with much truth that "necessity is the mother of invention;" and it is also true that the cause and cure of poverty must emanate from the lower walks of life. The lowest cannot think, the highest hav no cause to think. Our well-fed theologians and after-dinner orators giv us the rounded periods, the poetry of thought, but the real truth seeker shall find the meat of the cocoanut in the work of the student who "burns the midnight oil." Liberty with such is a principle and not a word to conjure with. But in descanting upon the priestcraft of habit, I am wandering from the subject of my story.

The monetary value of gold which is denied all other wealth, like the fictitious value paraded under the name that heads my essay is the result of grounding in habit a superstition, a false idea, until it has the appearance of truth.

A Liberal writer and valued correspondent writes: "It has long puzzled economists how poverty, misery, and discontent increase as wealth increases. I believe it is solely because of the increase of this unearned wealth and its maldistribution. What is it? It consists of the values created by new opportunities or added to original ones—opportunities of making money in brief. Lands, mines, fisheries, and the like are original ones. Transportation, including mail, telegraph, and express service, the monetary service, the lighting and watering and car service of cities, are examples of new ones." Now, while this is perfectly true, and under economic freedom might develop a slight advantage and giv rise to a small economic rent, there is a factor which our liberal writer fails to recognize, but which distorts this unearned increase, making it assume such gigantic proportions that men are justified in denying its existence. And this factor is government, or more properly, legislation. And here is where the economists are puzzled. They cannot conceive of any other conditions than those which hav developed under government. They always begin their investigations with the premis, "Government is and of necessity must be" and by "government" is understood "sovereign authority." The above writer farther says, "The mail service luckily developed before the age of bonds and shares, else it too would be administered by corporations." The fact is that the mail service was monopolized in the start by the government. While yet government was simply the reign of a chief it was a function of great importance and is generally recognized to-day as a feature indispensable to government. But if our writer should post himself in regard to the expenses entailed upon the people by the government administration of the mail service—not only this, but the dangerous character of this supreme monopoly, making it a vehicle to farther the aims of puritans or politicians, establishing a censorship as obnoxious as dangerous—he might qualify his assertion, "Every family is made better off by the cheap facilities of the mail service." And if he would thoroughly consider the conditions which would prevail under economic freedom where no supreme authority could license men to do that which inherent equality and natural justice would forbid, he might be brought to believe that the mail service, as well as every other service, would be performed at cost, enabling him to make the above assertion with more truth and better understanding. He would reduce all service to cost, such as is monopolized by individuals or corporations, by giving government the contract. He ignores the fact that government, as it is, is composed of individuals and corporations. He is thinking of this "something," this "sovereignty," which of itself would work for righteousness. And he would feed this "something" on this "unearned wealth" in exchange for such services. He says: "This unearned wealth arises out of the presence of the people. A man buys a bit of ground for $100, suppose—a body of navigable water is on one side, a great town grows up on the other—the bit of ground is soon valued at millions of dollars." Now it is not supposed that the bit of ground has of itself any more value than when purchased. It is because the locality has become so desirable for residence or manufacturing purposes that men can be found to giv thus much money. But whence comes the value? Is it really from the "presence of the people," or from the fact that the owner is holding it out of use? Would it be any different to suppose that a boat, for instance, worth to-day a few dollars, might be a thousand to-morrow, because the necessity for its use might induce a man to offer that amount for it? A careful study of the foundation principles, I believe, will convince our friend that it is not the people, but this "something" called sovereignty, this license granted men, that enables individuals and corporations to grasp and hold out of use and for speculativ purposes these natural opportunities. He will discover that all real wealth arises from labor and that free competition would soon demonstrate that such increase as he describes has no real existence, and that services now monopolized would be rendered at cost, and from the cost would be eliminated the fat salaries of countless officials. Under free competition reciprocity would soon become the law of the individuals. The only title to property would be occupancy and use.

The reason our Socialistic friends so inveigh against competition is the same that troubled the economists mentioned. They cannot conceive of other conditions than such as hav developed under government. And free competition is simply impossible under government—what the state does not monopolize she farms out to individuals and corporations. The greenbacker clearly sees that the gold god is his enemy and he fights to annihilate it, but the government god he hopes to make his friend. The Liberal as clearly sees that religion's God is an enemy and would rid the human mind of its presence. But the government god he hopes to make his friend. But, friends, all gods are the enemies of man and none can be made his friend. Gods and slavery are synonymous. Liberty must down them all. The government god may be the last to fall. But not till then can liberty hope to reign. A. L. BALLOU.

The Authority of Congress to Close the World's Fair on Sunday.

The first question that strikes the observer is, Wherefrom does Congress derive the authority to order the closing? Who or what is Congress? To the ordinary mind Congress is absolutely nothing else than an aggregate of men delegated by the several states of the Union, through the votes of certain individuals, to represent the latter in a convention commonly known as "Congress."

Congressmen, therefore, though arrogating to themselvs an autocratic pride and apparent czar-like manner, are nothing more nor less than pure and simple servants of the people. Would the master of a house permit his servant to close the house against his will? That Congress has the power to appropriate money to further exhibit the progress made by the United States and to invite by participation the nations of the world, no one will deny. But that the people should be told by its servants, We will return you some of the money you hav contributed to the support of our government, to further the interests of our World's Fair, provided you close that Fair on Sundays, is the hight of preposterous propositions and the most contemptible evidence of Congressional effrontery that is equaled only by churchianity. I deposit my money in a bank. The bank agrees to pay my check if I do something totally disconnected with the contract of depositee and depositor. What gall! Congress has appropriated the people's money, and while Congress is compelled to return that money for purposes of public improvements—and the World's Fair partakes of that character—still Congress can find no Constitutional authority to annex such a saintly provision to shut out thousands besides the writer from visiting the genuin wonder of the world—the World's Fair.

The directors in charge run no risk in keeping the gates open on Sundays. It is a question of the people, by the people, and for the people, and not fizzles in the shape of churchianities and horrors known as coffee-houses, saloons, beerhouses, and other dives of prostitution. It is proper that Liberals, Freethinkers, and the Freethought Federation of America should adopt vigorous means to compel the opening on Sundays. However, as the proviso is a Constitutional question, the matter should be tested in the courts, and by all means hav it decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. In so far as I am concerned I shall do all I can. JOSEPH MAILLE.

The Freethought Federation of America.

The present century has been an eventful one in many of the civilized parts of our globe. In it nations hav grown and flourished, revolution after revolution has taken place—revolutions by physical force and revolutions of the mind—everywhere and on every hand we see change, constant change; and, with the dawn of the coming century, it is not at all improbable that we shall witness the rise of a new era, wherein man shall be free from the customs and practices that hav cramped his surroundings to such an extent that progress beyond a given point in his intellectual development and improvement has been rendered impossible.

I say that this is not at all improbable, because the present age appears to be the fulcrum or the turning-point upon which are pending the future destinies of the human race.

And who knows but what by combination of effort we may attain to such hights of success that erelong the whole face of society shall be changed? Great and lasting reforms hav been won by movements which at first started out with a smaller following than we hav to-day.

It is with pleasure, though, that I can truly state that the Federation is destined to become a gigantic success. Each day a large number of letters are pouring upon us containing lists of names for membership and financial assistance. Each day adds some new soldiers of freedom to the glorious cause of human liberty.

The following speaks conclusivly that the Freethinkers were eager to see such a movement inaugurated and will gladly avail themselvs of each and every opportunity to use their political powers in favor of Freethought:

NUNACH, CAL., Oct. 1, 1892.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Sec. Freethought Federation of America, Dear Sir: We saw the call for a Freethought Federation of America published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Would say we are heartily in favor of such an organization and will put our principles to a practical test when it comes to voting in November. You will find inclosed $1 as a help to defray necessary expenses, etc. We will probably send in some more names in future, when we hav time to talk it up among the people.

Yours truly, H. SANDBERG,
ALBERT SANDBERG.

Again, the note following this shows that not only will the avowed Freethinkers use the suffrage with us, but all who recognize the injustice of religious legislation:

ARKANSAS CITY, KAN., Sept. 19, 1892.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Chicago, Ill., Dear Sir: I want my name enrolled among the members of the Freethought Federation of America. I am with you heart and soul. C. H. ROGERS,
Pastor All Souls Unitarian Parish.

Michael Johnson, of Vale, Ore., sends us a list of five names for membership, and D. Millard, of Leonidas, Mich., writes as follows:

LEONIDAS, MICH., Sept. 23, 1892.

MR. J. R. CHARLESWORTH, Dear Sir: I herewith send in my name as a member of the Freethought Federation, together with P. O. order of $1 as a donation, and hoping in time to augment that amount by $10, if not by $100, and meet with you in Chicago next year. You will please send me such publications as the association may hav to spare, as I intend to spread and encourage Freethought in this vicinity as far as is within my power.

Yours for human advancement, D. MILLARD.

Geo. P. Dreisbach, of Glen City, Pa., an earnest and willing Freethinker, sends me a very nice letter full of praise and encouragement, at the same time inclosing $1 to help along the Federation.

From inquiries that I hav made respecting the publication of the names of those Congressmen who voted in favor of closing the World's Fair on Sundays I find that it is impossible to discover just who they are and where they are from, many of the Congressmen themselvs exhibiting a large degree of cowardice in the matter, being afraid lest their action should be made known to their constituents. It is stated that one of them asked whether or not their action would be made public, and, as far as I can learn, no record whatever has been taken of the individual votes cast.

Many of our friends hav written to me asking if we hav a platform or a national ticket in the field at the forthcoming election, stating that if we had they would vote the straight ticket and get others to vote for it also, regardless of party politics. Others hav written asking for instructions how to vote at this election. In answer to them and for the convenience of others who may contemplate writing me upon the same subject I can only say, that every Freethinker must be guided solely by the exigencies his particular district presents. We hav no ticket nor any platform to present to the people other than our Nine Demands, embodying the principle of the separation of church and state.

I realize more and more the pressing necessity for each and every Freethought voter to utilize the suffrage in a way most beneficial to our cause. Therefore I would advise those who are willing so to do to propound the following questions to each candidate for office in the pending elections.

1. Are you in favor of opening the World's Fair on Sunday?

2. Are you in favor of taxing church property upon an equality with other property?

3. Are you in favor of maintaining our secular schools system, and to keep them entirely free from religious influences?

And if the candidate for Congress be one who is seeking reëlection, then the following question should be put to him pointedly:

4. Were you in your place when Congress voted upon the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday? If yes, did you vote in favor of such closing?

This last question is an important one and should be put to them by all means. And then giv your political favors according to the answers you receive from the candidates.

If the Federation keeps on increasing at its present rapid rate, we may be enabled ere another four years hav passed to draw up and formulate a platform of our own. Anyway, we shall know our strength by that time and be able to compute upon our chances of success.

Send on your names, and do not forget your donations. We are engaged in the noble fight for human freedom. We are fighting against those priestly knaves who reach forth with greedy grasp over men's heads trying in vain to subdue the light of glory streaming forth from the giant intellect of a loftier humanity, sparkling and glimmering through the darkness of evils that were.

Bradlaugh Birthday Celebrations.

We hav just been celebrating in London and the provinces the birthday anniversary of our late great Freethought leader, Chas. Bradlaugh. In London, the first of these celebrations was held at the South Place Institute on Monday, September 26th; the second at the Hall of Science on September 28th; while a service in commemoration of Mr. Bradlaugh's birthday was held in Birmingham on the 26th.

At the South Place meeting a bust, which is to be placed upon Mr. Bradlaugh's grave at Woking, was on view. Of this, Mr. Robertson, editor of the National Reformer, who presided at this meeting, said: "The bust, I should explain, had to be executed by Mr. Verheyden, whom I am glad to see present to-night (applause), solely from photographs, a drawback the importance of which can be best appreciated by artists. He has nevertheless succeeded in making a striking likeness—the best, I think, of the attempts to reproduce Mr. Bradlaugh's head in statuary. The South Place meeting was in every way a success. The hall was crowded in every part with admirers of the late Mr. Bradlaugh, and many came from a great distance, such as Manchester, Southampton, Ipswich, Readine, and other provincial towns, to mark their respect and admiration for the great dead. Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner, the daughter of the great Freethought hero, was on the platform, and among the speakers were Mr. George Jacob Holyoake; Mr. J. H. Levy (a gentleman who formerly contributed articles to the National Reformer over the signature of "D."); Mr. Dadabbai Naoroji, M. P.; Miss Colenso (daughter of the late Bishop Colenso); Mr. Bonnerjee, who, like Mr. Naoroji, spoke on behalf of Mr. Bradlaugh's Indian admirers; Mr. Geo. Standring; Mrs. Annie Besant; Dr. Drysdale, and Mr. Robert Forder.

The second London meeting was in connection with the National Secular Society and took the form of a concert and dance in addition to speech-making. At this meeting the speakers were Mr. Geo. Wm. Foote (president of the National Secular Society), Mr. Geo. Jacob Holyoake, Mr. Touzeau Parris, Mr. Arthur B. Moss, Mr. Geo. Standring, Mr. Robert Forder, and Mr. Chas. Watts. This meeting, though not so numerously attended as the one at South Place, was a very successful gathering and brought together a host of people who had been associated with Mr. Bradlaugh in his Freethought labors for many years. It is interesting to note the marked change that characterizes the press to-day in dealing with the character of Mr. Bradlaugh.

Years ago it was the custom of leader-writers in certain popular journals to describe Mr. Bradlaugh as a "demagog." Toward the close of his career, however, the same writers began to recognize in him "a wise and prudent politician." It was not Mr. Bradlaugh, however, that changed, but the journalistic scribes.

Religious writers also were wont to call Mr. Bradlaugh "a mere Iconoclast," and "a preacher of barren negations;" but now the great Freethought orator and reformer is dead they recognize in him a man who did his best to purify religion of some of its grossest errors and superstitions. Time, indeed, is the great avenger of most wrongs: in a few years a new estimate will be formed by the masses of the character and career of the late Chas. Bradlaugh. In the eloquent words of Mrs. Besant, "In times to come when people look back over the centuries to the struggles of to-day they will see the figure of Chas. Bradlaugh stand out, grown greater still by distance, as men learned to measure him better as one who helped in his day and generation as few could do, and the memory of whose life of duty and self-sacrifice was enshrined in the hearts of men."

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

A Firm Freethinker.

On Saturday, Oct. 8, 1892, Mrs. Sophia Galpin breathed her last at her home, No. 1 Yeaton avenue, in this city. Mrs. Galpin had been a fearful sufferer for over a year from kidney and heart trouble.

During the writer's connection with the Secular Union she and her husband were regular attendants and Mrs. Galpin was an activ participant in all its social entertainments. Her husband, Thomas Galpin, is of THE TRUTH SEEKER family and one of the firmest Freethinkers of this city. There are few who, at a time of bereavement, possess the moral hardihood to withstand the proffered blandishments of the church, as well as the entreaties of relativs and friends who protest against having a "heathenish funeral." To his everlasting credit, Mr. Galpin remained firm to his determination that the presence of no priest or preacher should desecrate his wife's funeral, provided he could prevail on some Freethinker to officiate.

During his wife's illness he had employed an Irish Catholic nurse, who, knowing that Mrs. Galpin had been brought up in Romish superstitions, worked upon her distracted mind and body to allow a priest to see her. When Mr. Galpin learned this, he politely but firmly informed the priest there would "not be a dollar in it for him," and, of course, his pious interest for the preservation of her immortal soul ceased instanter.

When I learned of this outrage of the priestly vampires, I consented to assist him in his resolve and make the funeral address the following day.

The night before, I had listened to Colonel Ingersoll's inimitable arraignment of the Romish church and his impassioned eulogy of Voltaire. How true even of the nineteenth century! His ringing words graphically described the attitude of the church, not only then, but through all time. Permit me to quote:

Now and then a man of genius, of sense, of intellectual honesty, has appeared. Such men hav denounced the superstitions of their day. They hav pitied the multitude. To see priests devour the substance of the people—priests who made begging one of the learned professions—filled them with loathing and contempt. These men were honest enough to tell their thoughts, brave enough to speak the truth. Then they were denounced, tried, tortured, killed by rack or flame. But some escaped the fury of the fiends who loved their enemies and died naturally in their beds. It would not do for the church to admit that they died peacefully. That would show that religion was not essential at the last moment. Superstition gets its power from the terror of death. It would not do to hav the common people understand that a man could deny the Bible, refuse to kiss the cross, contend that humanity was greater than Christ and then die as sweetly as Torquemada died after pouring lead into the ears of an honest man; or as calmly as Calvin after he had burnt Servetus; or as peacefully as King David after advising, with his last breath, one son to assassinate another.

The church has taken great pains to show that the last moments of all Infidels (that Christians did not succeed in burning) were infinitly wretched and despairing. It was alleged that words could not paint the horrors that were endured by a dying Infidel. Every good Christian was expected to, and generally did, believe these accounts. They hav been told and retold in every pulpit of the world. Protestant ministers hav repeated the lies invented by Catholic priests, and Catholics—by a kind of theological comity—hav sworn to the lies told by the Protestants. Upon this point they hav always stood together, and will as long as the same falsehood can be used by both. Upon the death-bed subject the clergy grow eloquent. When describing the shudderings and shrieks of the dying unbeliever their eyes glitter with delight. It is a festival. They are no longer men. They become hyenas. They dig open graves. They devour the dead. It is a banquet. Unsatisfied still, they paint the terrors of hell. They gaze at the souls of the Infidels writhing in the coils of the worm that never dies. They see them in flames—in oceans of fire—in gulfs of pain—in abysses of despair. They shout with joy. They applaud. It is an Auto-dâ-fé presided over by God.

Then coming to the approach of Voltaire's death, the matchless orator said:

Toward the last of May, 1778, it was whispered in Paris that Voltaire was dying. Upon the fences of expectation gathered the unclean birds of superstition impatiently waiting for their prey.

So, too, in Chicago, the vultures had good reasons to try and capture the heretical Mrs. Galpin. Her husband is the owner of considerable property, and it doubtless appeared an unpardonable sin to the priestly pirates that they could not secure a large slice of it.

As Mr. Galpin concluded to hav the address I delivered printed entire for circulation among his friends and acquaintances, I do not wish to burden your columns with it. At Mr. Galpin's express request, I alluded to the attempt of the priest to invade the Freethinker's home, by the following words: "We cannot but pity those who would attempt to turn the last moments of such a life into a time of anguish or mental torture. When in intellectual and physical vigor—when free from bodily pains or pangs—that is the time, if any, to devote to calmly reasoning out what our profession of faith or belief might be. We may then be able to distinguish fact from fancy, and by the illumination of the torch of reason disperse the clouds that darken our path to the altar of truth. Then only are we able to giv such matters our best thought. Is it human, is it civilized, to conjure up before the feverish brain of one already in the mental delirium of death, the tortures to which orthodoxy would assign every heretic? Is it likely that unbiased reason will then hold sway? The hereafter is a momentous question, but one about which the most learned know as little as the most ignorant. Any meddlesome interference at such times deserves our strongest condemnation."

Our London Letter.

The pilgrimage to Lourdes has, according to the account given by its promoter, been quite a success, the number of pilgrims having been greatly in excess of those in previous years. It has also caused an animated discussion in some of the English newspapers, some of the letters being of a very entertaining nature. Those writers who hav taken a common-sense view of the alleged miracles hav met with considerable abuse at the hands of devout believers, the whole of the latter, however, being apparently unable to prove that any miracle has taken place, though as usual there is plenty of hearsay evidence. One individual, who was considered important enough to be interviewed by a newspaper man, and asserts that he is of a very skeptical nature, which seems rather a doubtful acquisition in an avowed papist, givs his account of the affair, and while not having witnessed any miracle himself, was told that they had occurred repeatedly, and was consequently cured of his very mild skepticism, and returned a devout believer, which is not greatly surprising. He argued that as miracles were common enough centuries ago, there is no reason why they could not occur at the present day, which is no doubt logical enough, but as there are some a little more skeptical than himself, who very much question any such thing as a miracle ever having taken place, the skeptical Catholic will scarcely convince anyone but himself that the miraculous ever takes place at Lourdes. At the same time I can not understand how anyone accepting stories of miracles in past times can doubt those of the present, as one is quite as likely to be true as the other; but professing Christians, particularly members of the Protestant sects, are the most illogical beings in existence.

Even in Protestant Germany it does not seem safe to ridicule Romish miracles and pilgrimages to so-called relics, as the publisher and author of a pamphlet making fun of the "Holy Coat of Treves" hav found to their cost—the former having been sentenced to three and the latter to six weeks' imprisonment. This is not a pleasant thing for the persons in question, but it is one more proof that ridicule is a more potent weapon than argument with which to attack superstition.

The statement recently made by the archdeacon of Babylon and Jerusalem that he has discovered the sources of the rivers Euphrates and Tigris and, more important than this, that he has seen with his own eyes the veritable ark of Noah on Mount Ararat, has not caught on with the religious press. A good outspoken lie of such magnitude is rather too much to take in at the present time. The discovery should hav been made and published earlier in the century, when it would most probably hav gained considerable credence. The only people who can swallow such a tale now would be the members of the "Christian Evidence Society," and they are ignorant enough to believe anything in this line.

Matters are somewhat lively at Spurgeon's tabernacle. In this particular instance the Holy Ghost, who is supposed to settle such difficulties, is apparently standing one side for the present to let the congregation fight it out among themselvs. I believe it is rather a good situation for a sky-pilot, the emoluments being pretty heavy, and consequently there are several applicants for the job, sections of the congregation favoring their own particular fancy. There are four candidates, the brother and son of the late apostle, and two Americans—Dr. Pierson and Moody the evangelist. The son and the doctor appear to be the favorits at present, and it has been proposed that the best way to settle the matter is for these two to run it as a joint concern, but then they would only get half-pay each, which causes another hitch. It has been prayerfully submitted to the Lord, but as each party claim to hav him on their side, it looks as if a settlement will hav to be arrived at in some secular manner. I should suggest a friendly toss-up for it, but not being a supporter of the cause, I fear such a simple solution would not be accepted. J. D.

The Future and the Past.

The heart is like a river
  Wherein two currents flow—
One to the future leading,
  One to the long ago.
On both the banks are roses,
  On both the sun is cast,
But the current which is smoothest
  Flows ever to the past.

Upon ebbing river
  Our thoughts like vessels go—
Some to future sailing,
  Some to the long ago—
Bringing in their returning
  Relics we dearly prize,
Brought from those distant islands
  Bound by youth's sunny skies.

Strange the past remaineth
  Shut in the heart for aye—
Strange we are never willing
  To say to the past good-bye.
The future is a shadow,
  A cloud whose golden sheen
Makes every cloud look golden
  That's in the distance seen.

The past so full of pleasure,
  A rainbow bright whose bow
Connects the present moments
  With those of long ago.
A bridge we oft are crossing,
  Passing the friends of old
With faces fair and youthful
  And hair as bright as gold.

Strange that the gold must vanish,
  And of the sunny hair
Strange that the silver spinneth
  Nets for the old to wear.
Strange that the wrinkles trample
  Out the young face's bloom
Like shadows that in evening
  Over bright pictures come.

Intrinsic Value.

The error of those who assert that money pieces must hav intrinsic value arises from the mistake made by them in confounding such pieces with the real money. This is a common error with respect to some other things as well as with money. For example, it is customary to speak of deeds to land as titles. Lawyers, who are trained to accuracy of speech on all matters professional, rarely make such a mistake as to papers. They call deeds, etc., evidences of title. So as to the money signs or evidences. Very many things are used as money signs, and anything that the public will accept as such answers the purpose. Must the thing hav intrinsic value? In one sense, Yes; in another, No. To explain: There is no such thing in the universe as intrinsic value, aside from our belief. Opinion makes us regard one thing as precious, another as worthless. Shakspere truly said, "Naught is worth, but as 'tis valued." Surely no one can dispute this. The money sign must hav this opinion as to its worth, else it can never be used as such. In our country every person will accept a $10 bank bill as readily as a $10 gold piece. Why? Because of our faith, trust, or credit in the paper, which is at least equal to the same confidence had in gold or diamonds. Intrinsic value, due solely to opinion, then, rests in the paper as much as in the gold, silver, or nickel.

Therefore, irredeemable paper made by our government a legal tender has the same intrinsic value as gold or silver, etc. And truly that opinion which givs the paper that intrinsic value has a better basis in common sense than our opinion of its value given to gold and silver. It would prolong this to go into that.

But I will end this by saying that good paper money evidence has the same intrinsic value that gold, silver, or anything else has—that even bread would be worthless if we all believed it to be so; that belief is trust or credit in, and that money is a form of confidence or credit put into circulation and represented or evidenced by the money signs and that there is no possible or conceivable service as money that can be done by metal coins which cannot be done just as well (or even better) by good paper evidences. Make paper the sole lawful tender and it operates just exactly as does gold when so made—one dollar being ever one hundred cents, no matter how much over-issued.

And speaking of intrinsic value in the sense in which the expression is used, meaning a substantial value for use, the substance paper has more of it than has gold. Were it seriously proposed to the enlightened world whether gold and silver should be totally abolished, or paper of all kinds, the response must come almost unanimously, "Leave us the use of paper." Hence, even as a substance for use paper has the greater value. Yes, I agree with Mr. Koezly, your correspondent, money signs must hav intrinsic value, and paper has it, above all other kinds. CLARKE IRVINE.

A Stupendous Political Change Proposed.

The church is digging its own grave, and Comstock, Harrison, and Wanamaker are hacking away at its throat. Awake, O Liberals, and be ready to bury the rotten old thing by electing R. G. Ingersoll as president, and T. W. Braidwood, of Vineland, N. J., for vice-president. One-half of the churchmen will vote with you, for they may be sure that they will hav two honest men at the head of the government, and each one can cast in his vote without others knowing whom he votes for; and if they are elected there will be such a change in the government in one year that each one, whether Christian or Infidel, will be glad he voted for them; and if you fail in electing them you will show your strength and prepare the way for something better at a future election. J. HACKER.

"Pushed by Unseen Hands."

From the Hartford, Conn., Times.

Helen Gardener is the author of a number of popular books which hav attracted a good deal of attention and awakened a good deal of thought. She has also lectured on social and moral topics, and is somewhat widely known as a reformer—but one of a quiet and rather original kind. Ten stories are included in this little volume, no one of which is like any other in this or in any other book. The unusual, abrupt and unexpected endings come like the slamming of a door, which in a sort compels the one concerned to find a way out, either by getting the door open, or by trying a window. That is to say, the tales are not "loaded" with a "moral" all written out so plainly that the blind almost can see it. The meaning of each story is wrapped up in the nature of the suggestiv occurrences related—if, indeed, there is any especial significance, which is not the case with every story, as for example the droll and unique little account of "Mr. Walk-a-leg Adams." . . .

Letters of Friends.

An Indelicate Practice of the Church.

EL PASO, TEX., Oct. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Regarding your inquiry as to the location of the church in which the kissing-bee and its attendant row occurred, the Chicago Herald may be quoted: "A lively row is in progress at Burns, a little town about twenty miles from Buffalo, growing out of a new money-raising scheme introduced at a church social held in the Lutheran church parlors there."

ANNA L. MOORE.

This Paper Is the Heavy Artillery.

NEW YORK, Oct. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: My letter printed in your paper of to-day contained the sentence, "He begged not for mercy, for he could not feel himself a criminal." It is regrettable that the word "money" was substituted for that of "mercy," which makes nonsense of an admirable sentiment.

Thank you for granting me a little space occasionally. Your paper is the heavy artillery in the battle with priestcraft. At every discharge a breach is made in some ecclesiastical fortress, exposing a nest of lies.

L. G. REED.

The Dead Brother Set a Good Example.

STEUBENVILLE, O., Oct. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I send you a clipping from the daily paper of this place of the death of one of the friends of Freethought. Some of our very goody people when they saw it held up their hands in holy horror as they always do when one of nature's noblemen dies if he does not belong to the church. They cannot get it into their small minds that a man can be good outside of the church. Oh, no, you must believe. But then, I am saying more than I intended to say, but will just say I miss him very much. Many pleasant hours hav I spent with him.

Hoping the cause he so nobly defended will triumph, I remain truly yours,

JOHN PHILLIPSON.

The Campaign Against "Howlers" and "Chicken-Eaters."

POMEROY, O., Sept. 28, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I did try to get a subscriber or two but failed. There are only two real Liberals here that are not afraid to speak out in public. There are others that will agree with us in conversation, but the moment I ask them to take a Liberal paper or help to hav a lecture from some Freethinker they then back out, afraid of the Methodist howlers and their ilk. I was speaking to one of them recently about a chicken-eater. He warned me not to do so again or they (the church-members) would disown me. I am now a Liberal nigh seven years and hope to be for the future. I can truly say that Freethought has made a man of me. When I was a Christian I was always in hot water, but God and son had to wash my sins away.

From now on I will spread THE TRUTH SEEKER, after reading it myself, in every business house in town. I hav a four years' collection to distribute.

I am for liberty and humanity,

HENRY HARTENBACH.

Up, Yeomen!

MEMPHIS, TEX., Oct. 5, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 1st has gladsome news, the return of Miss S. H. Wixon. While well appreciated in Europe, she has indeed been lost to the little Cornerites at home. There is no woman in America that holds the affections of as many bright, truthful, little boys and girls as Miss Wixon, and may their glad welcome echo throughout the land deep and long. And ere the echo slumbers let us up and battle with those petitions now and forever. Up, yeomen, and gather our forces! Our name is legion. Up and on till this land is freed from Jack Shepard's and Wanamaker's gangs of imbecils! Yes, on to the battle, fill the petitions for a repeal! If they heed not, giv influence at the polls till they beg for quarter! Repudiate the gift which robs us of our birthright! I am one who will giv a dollar and share that glory with a million more to place the Columbian Exhibition beyond the necessity of accepting the gift of Congress so contemptibly withheld. With seventy-eight names to the petition,

UNCLE JACK.

Pleasing Liberal Sister.

BEEBE, Sept. 19, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just received our Declaration of Independence contained in your paper. It is a glorious move. To do efficient work here in getting names for the "Federation" I must hav them understand what the call is for, so please send me at least six copies of this number. I hav already a very few dollars promised for the Federation. My husband and son will be on that list of honor as soon as they return from abroad, which will be in about two weeks.

In Article VI of the constitution of the Federation it says, "All persons," etc.; does that mean to include our sex? Probably not, as we are not voters, although there never were more faithful workers than the few who comprise that number, but we are so glad to help that even to stand in the background of a cause so noble is a happiness to us Liberal mothers.

Yours for Liberty, MRS. ED. ABBEY.

P.S.—The twenty-five cents extra is for the papers, a contribution.

A True Friend of Humanity's Cause.

BOULDER, COL., Sept. 27, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Some time since I sent you two names as subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. They both keep public houses, and I think it would be very useful to hav them get the papers before the public. Inclosed find $6 for two more subscribers. The two latter names I pay for myself as a present to the parties in gratitude to them for paying their medical bills. I think if you had one thousand subscribers that had done no better than I hav you would now hav at least ten or fifteen thousand, or in that proportion, and if you would suggest the latter to them it could be very easily done. The way I do is to work it in on trades, or a present for favors done. The paper does not cost more than a box of fair cigars, and I think will do far more good. I am a lover of the weed myself. There are a thousand and one ways to work it. One is, when I board with a man long I generally manage to get him to take the paper for part pay, and so on.

Success to you, and may your shadow never grow less. Yours, L. Z. COMAN.

Push the Petition.

SCHUYLER, NEB., Oct. 8, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 1st I notice that you ask the readers of this paper to cut out a petition for opening the World's Fair and attach it to a sheet of paper and procure signatures. I think you will be surprised to find that a petition for the same purpose as the one you mention in THE TRUTH SEEKER has been handed around this city over one month ago, which I noticed was largely signed by the citizens of this locality. It is needless to say that I signed it with both hands. The petition referred to I understand was got up and started on its course of good by the World-Herald Printing Company, of Omaha, Neb.

The wild and woolly West is filled with millions of broad-minded Freethinkers who will not tolerate the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday; you may bet your last dollar on it.

The World-Herald Printing Company may hav got the idea of starting said petition from THE TRUTH SEEKER; but it matters not, the good work is progressing, and if the World's Fair is not open on Sunday to admit the miners and cowboys they will make Rome howl. J. A. R.

[The Chicago Herald also circulates a petition, and perhaps other papers do so. Ours is different from the others and we hope it will be pushed, because it is the Freethought petition.—ED. T. S.]

Freedom in Trade and Everything.

RUTLAND, VT., Sept. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Delmont Jones, Sr., asks for some pointers on the tariff. He says: "I hav always been a Republican, voting that ticket, thinking it right, and thinking by doing so that I was keeping up the wages of workingmen, but I, with thousands of others, hav begun to think that we are only helping the capitalist and not benefiting the public and ourselvs."

Mr. Jones has made a good start, inasmuch as he has begun to think for himself. Keep on, my dear sir; freedom is born of Freethought. Protection is but one of the methods by which the thoughtless wealth-producer is mulcted of the products of his labor. These methods are numbered by the thousands, and are sanctioned by professed Christians as morally right, and by a Christian government as legally legitimate; and it is considered no wrong to cheat, steal, or defraud, even to the extent of causing millions of our fellow-men to suffer poverty, misery, and death, if these things be done according to the last act of Congress.

Productiv labor is the only producer of wealth. Means has to be taken from the products of the productiv laborer to pay all needful labor and expense of government, all of which is legitimate and right.

All idle millionaire monopolists, protected manufacturers, idle weak-brained dudes, and gay butterflies of fashion hav to be supported by the productiv laborer. All unnecessary labor, the salaries of useless government officials, and all unnecessary expense of government is a tax upon productiv labor which has to be paid out of the products of the productiv laborer; all of which is nothing less than legal robbery. Nothing is given in return for such a tax, consequently the world is no better off for it. The person who pays the tax is made that much the poorer for it, and the person who receives the benefit of it is made that much richer, nothing more.

A protectiv tariff is a bit of political thimblerig that beats the footpad all hollow. A tariff is a tax upon the products of labor which compels the productiv laborer to pay to the beneficiary of the tax a certain amount that never was produced; that is, it amounts to about that. For after the wealth which the article contains has been produced, a fictitious value is added which must be paid out of the wealth which labor has produced, and which is paid to a person who has produced nothing. This beats the footpad, because the robber has had the robbery made legal.

How can a tax benefit labor, when labor has to pay it?

Let us keep on thinking for ourselvs. We hav only started on the road to freedom when we hav mastered the tariff question. I am for free thought, free speech, free trade, free land, free men, and free women. A. A. ORCOTT.

A Noble Schoolteacher.

CODORUS, PA., Oct. 2, E.M. 292.

MR. EDITOR: I enjoy THE TRUTH SEEKER. I liv in such a hot-bed of an orthodox church community that I cannot at present secure any subscribers. However, I shall endeavor to bring up my family in the paths of science and truth by giving them only chaste and sound literature to read.

"To do good is my religion." I keep all days as near alike as I deem safe in this church-, clergy-, and priest-fettered country. Thus far I hav not been molested, but some of the very pious hav intimated that a dose of God-in-the-Constitution law might do me good. The only thing that keeps them back is, they can find no flaw in my character as regards my dealings with my fellow-men.

I commenced teaching last week in the same room I occupied last term. As I told you last winter, I refused to read the Bible in my school. I taught without the Bible and made a complete success, every patron of the district requesting the directors to secure my services for this term. At a meeting of the school board prior to the beginning of the term I so far influenced the board that they passed a resolution giving the teachers the liberty to use the Bible or not.

As we hav positivly no truthful knowledge of any other world than the one we now occupy, and are only sure of the life we now enjoy, let us as Liberals fully enjoy this life. Nature, which brought us into existence, will provide for our demise and hereafter, no matter what that hereafter may be.

Keep THE TRUTH SEEKER on a strictly Liberal basis; abuse no one; keep in the path of truth. I am a subject of evolution. Long ago I was a Methodist and tried very hard to obtain what was called the "Holy Ghost," but failed completely, because I was then, as I am still, a seeker after truth. Being a good speaker, I was induced by the clergy to thoroughly study the Bible, which I did with the aid of Bible helps and commentaries. Instead of becoming a sky-pilot I became a Universalist, then drifted into the Unitarian faith, and one more turn of the wheel of evolution made me a follower of Thomas Paine. I hav never been ashamed of Universalism or Unitarianism, but cannot say as much of Methodism, for there was I taught to worship a God with whom I never became acquainted enough to be social.

If I should visit the church's (World's) fair at Chicago next summer, I hope that some provision will be made by the Liberals so that I can enjoy myself on Sunday, for I can find no enjoyment in such brothels as churches and saloons.

Maybe the members of Congress in this grand and glorious country of ours will see the unconstitutionality of the work done by the last session and reconsider the matter and giv us a free World's Fair for all nations and religions and thus save the honor of the United States of America.

Talk about inspiration. I believe that Mr. Heston is inspired in the work he does. Nature has inspired him. May he long giv us pictorial truth.

J. W. F. COPENHEVER.

A Spirit Communication Impugned.

MARCELINE, MO., Sept. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: On page 185 of "Nature's Divine Revelations," by Andrew Jackson Davis, Galen, the supposed or alleged spirit control, says, speaking of the satellites of Jupiter: "This planet having four satellites, which are three less than the number of Saturn's," etc. This is bad astronomy, coming as it does from the spirit of a Roman scientist who has been a resident of "the other side" for some sixteen centuries!

From my daily paper I see that Professor Barnard has discovered a fifth satellite of Jupiter's. Why did Galen overlook the two moons of Mars? He says nothing about them, but if Andrew Jackson Davis had had his cataleptic fit after Professor Hall had made the discovery we would probably hav seen it embodied in "Nature's Divine Revelations." Now, Galen, old boy, there is no excuse for those errors, for you descant learnedly concerning all the other moons belonging to our sister worlds.

Will W. H. Burr please rise and explain, and tell us of just one little fact, one scientific fact, which we did not know before being told by supposed spirits? Rev. Minot J. Savage in the Religio-Philosophical Journal thinks that it must hav been almost an archangel who was the control of Davis when he gave this work to the world, ditto other leaders in the Spiritualistic fold. I mention Mr. Burr's name for the reason that I saw an article by him in THE TRUTH SEEKER about a year ago in which he quotes from "Nature's Divine Revelations" something regarding our own satellite, and I imagin he considers that work reliable. As the work of a diseased brain, what is the difference between it and the "Book of Mormon?" Veritas Liberabit Vos.

Respectfully, E. D. HICKS.

Why He Will Not Vote With the People's Party.

NUNACH, CAL., Sept. 22, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Emboldened by the appearance in your columns of my views regarding the Prohibition party, I would like to tell the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER why I will not vote the People's party ticket the coming election. I am a young farmer just starting in to pioneer it on a piece of Uncle Sam's domain and am fully aware of the needs of reform in the laborers' field, and the farmers' in particular, yet I will not vote the party's ticket which is pledged to better our condition. As is well known, the real founder and mainstay of the People's party is the Farmers' Alliance, a body laboring for the temporal betterment of their own condition, who yet think it necessary to hav as one of their officers a chaplain, who opens and closes their meetings with prayer. I think the main reason of the farmers' hard lot is their ignorance, for which they are not to blame, not having the advantages of their city brethren. The "honest farmer vote" has become a maxim in politics. I think it should be changed to the "darned fool farmer vote." That the Prohibitionists should draw most of their votes from the country, which certainly does not experience the evils of drink as much as the cities, seems strange, to say the least. Yet the reason is not far away, either. The farmers, as I said before, not having the advantages of city people, are far more gullible, and it is a very easy matter for the sky-pilots to persuade them that they are righteous in the sight of God in voting the Prohibition ticket. The Prohibition party having failed to make the advance that the National Reform Association, for instance, would like to see it make, its leaders hav turned their faces to fresher fields and greener pastures, and lo and behold! the ever-verdant farmer comes to the rescue. I claim that the men that are leading and controling the Farmers' Alliance and People's party movements are the same set that hav tried to get God into the Constitution for the last ten years. They dodge about the bush considerably, those fellows, and a superficial observer would hardly think anything was wrong. These God-in-the-Constitution fellows follow the Jesuit maxim, "The end justifies the means." Being an ex-member of the Farmers' Alliance, or rather a member in bad standing—not having paid my dues since finding out the pious leaning of the body—I am not at liberty to divulge any of their secret work, but I can say this much, that a member to join must take an oath that he believes in a supreme being; at the same time he is assured that his religious belief shall not be interfered with (taking it for granted that he has one), when, by taking the above oath, his religious belief has already been interfered with. The Farmers' Alliance convention at Ocala, Fla., a year ago, unanimously favored the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday. Think of it, ye clodhoppers who hav brushed the hayseeds out of your hair and allowed the gray matter some exercise.

The female-suffrage plank of the People's party platform, like that of the Prohibition party, was put in for what purpose? You say, To giv women the same chance as men—perfect equality and so forth. I say not. It was put in for the express purpose of getting voters from the religious ranks. And right here let me say I cannot understand why so many gifted Liberals like Mr. Putnam and others wish the women to vote. The women that want to vote claim an equal amount of gray matter with the men, I believe. I will not argue on this point, but it seems to me that the very fact that the membership of our churches is composed of two-thirds women speaks rather against their having as much of that destroyer of superstition and priestcraft, viz., reason, as men. To a religious person duty to God is higher than duty to man, and I think that most women would vote with the Women's Christian Temperance Union, which goes the Prohibitionists one better and declares that not God but Jesus Christ is the head of all government. Reason being essential to break from the fetters of superstition, I think the very fact of there being women in the Freethinkers' ranks conclusivly proves that these women hav more brains than their sisters whom they hav left behind. But what would the Liberal woman's vote amount to in a presidential election. It would cut about the same figure that the Prohibition party's vote does at present. These are a few straws which show which way the wind blows. I could pick up many more straws which are all going in the same direction, but these will suffice at present.

ALBERT SANDBERG.

Freethought Organization.

COUNCIL, IDA., Sept. 16, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The question of organization is being discussed on all sides and all see the necessity of the same, but as yet there has been but little accomplished, and we should look into the reasons of this failure.

Political organization as outlined by Mr. Putnam and others is possible, and an absolute necessity. Let some leader, or existing society, after getting up our Demands and having them published, secure at each post-office at least one Freethinker's name and mail a copy of these to each one in the country districts. Also call for names through the press, which has already been done. Let all members sign a pledge to vote as the central organization directs, or for candidates only who will support our demands. Each member should take a Freethought paper, and agree to work for the Federation by securing as many members as possible. Then the whole organization may be manipulated through the press so as to secure our rights politically. If the Liberals are in earnest they will do this without delay, and few can realize the amount of religious legislation we can defeat.

But there is another phase of organization, that has been much discussed, which is a deeper subject to understand, but not so vitally important. Mr. Bradford and others advocate local societies as a means of Freethought propaganda. Such I believe is the basis of the Secular Union, and has been tried for many years. So, also, we hav the Brotherhood of Moralists, and the Patriotic Sons of America, and so on. These societies are possible in large cities where people naturally and without much trouble congregate together. But in the rural districts, where will be found a very large per cent of our element, such societies are not practicable, and I fear that the intellect of the Liberals now engaged in seeking some way to a closer social organization of Freethinkers will not be rewarded, and in expressing my thoughts upon the subject per invitation, I beg leave to take the unpopular side.

I am very sorry to think that the Sun's view of Freethought societies is nearly correct even for large cities. It cannot be otherwise. It requires faith to bind people together and make them stay, and since this article is known to Atheists and Agnostics only by its absence, the consequence is obvious. Spiritualists and Adventists are already well organized.

But the assertions that we are a cold-blooded set will not do. We are not foolish enough to make martyrs of ourselvs that others may believe as we do; neither are we continually pouring our doctrin into unwilling ears, because we do not care to hav theirs always ringing in ours. Hence we are said to care nothing for mankind. I suppose if we had our shops everywhere and held forth weekly with open arms and a pint of holy water, asking all to come and cast their dimes with us, we would be called philanthropists. If we would starve the body and mind to feed the soul, and take the food from our children to feed some filthy, superstitious Russians, or pay some missionary to teach the crazy dervish or other benighted fanatics the healthful and refreshing principles of Liberalism, we would be considered as loving all mankind and would dazzle the world, as the church has done. But such is not our propaganda, and I am glad of it. We seek to convince no one that we are right, except by way of seeking after truth. There is no excitement, no rustling of wings, no rushing together of trembling spirits seeking protection from some imaginary foe.

There is an element in the mental make-up of the Freethinker that is opposed to martyrdom. He sympathizes with all mankind, with birds and beasts, but he is not altogether in favor of dying for them, especially man, who is expected to know enough to need no one to die to teach him a truth. But let some follower of Jesus be found torturing a dumb beast, or ill treating some castaway child, and a heavy hand is often laid against his ear, either mentally or physically. The only sentiment common to Freethinkers is sympathy.

I hav often thought of Hugh O. Pentecost's words of resignation, as he left his post as a leader of the Freethought ranks. Having left the ministry accustomed to fine organization, plenty of cash in the contribution-box, and, thousands of zealous fanatics eager to follow a brilliant leader, he entered the Liberal ranks expecting the same zeal and financial support. But even he, with his fiery denunciations of church and tyrants, could not command the submission and support of the Liberals as he had formerly controled church-goers.

Christians will giv a minister a fine salary to stand in the pulpit Sunday after Sunday repeating his story—the old, old story—with the monotony of a parrot. The "love of Jesus" and the "blood of the lamb" are like wine to them, the older the better. But you cannot feed Infidels on that kind of stuff. Even the gifted Ingersoll has another occupation besides lecturing to earn a living. He knows that an Infidel will not pay to hear anything that neither informs nor amuses; that is only a stale repetition of what he himself already knows, for, unlike the Christian, he does not need his faith renewed at intervals. The thought of tying to some written creed, what some printed book may advocate, or walking in the submissiv column to hear some person who knows no more about it than they do themselvs tell them what they should think and do, is like putting fetters on the brain and clipping the wing-feathers of thought.

Political organization is practical and necessary, but the mental-social organization of Freethought to correspond with the organization of the church is, and always will be, a failure. What does "Universal Mental Liberty" mean? That we are to huddle together like sheep and be herded together on the mountains of thought and hav no individuality, only the numerical value of our noses? Not much. It means that each one has climbed alone, with great exertion, the hills toward the realm of truth, and that each employs no guides. It means that we, though our hoofs are split, are not a gramnivorous lot. J. T. TOWNLEY.

Pleasant Chat.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., Sept. 30, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find stamps for which please send Paine's "Age of Reason," with which I shall try to enlighten my orthodox friends, just as I am doing now with my old TRUTH SEEKERS, which I hav now received for about two years, not as a direct subscriber, but through one of your agents, delivered by the carrier each Monday. For several months past I am supplying the two barber shops situated to the right and left of the Magnolia street car station (at which place I am starter) with my old TRUTH SEEKERS free of charge, and I intend to continue doing so in future, although I found them to be terribly disfigured in the beginning and the cartoons torn to pieces. I now find them better preserved and only a little worse-looking from handling, when I replace the old one with another on Saturday. Occasionally the barbers inform me that the last paper has not yet been returned, so one or the other of their customers has asked permission to take it along that he may show it to a friend, or take it home to be able to read it undisturbed. So you see, gradually, slowly but surely, is the light of truth and reason throwing its rays into the darkest corners of superstition, and the day will come when gods and prayers, priests and their temples, will be considered as relics of our superstitious forefathers. But these theologians hav spread so many books and publications in ever so many languages all over the world concerning their "religious truths," and hav forced them upon the people, assisted by fanatical and tyrannical rulers, that it takes time—yes, and very much at that—patience, and perseverance to enlighten the masses on their folly, to teach them that to do their own thinking and reasoning is no longer considered a crime.

Lately I hav had a few discussions with a young Protestant schoolteacher, a very pleasant gentleman. I like him because he never loses his self-control, no matter how much we differ. He admits he respects Freethinkers because he finds them to be honest and sincere, although he can not share their views; but I hav some hopes he will turn out all right some future day, for he is willing to investigate and study. He asked me for a few copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, "so that I may study them," said he, "and hurl back at you some of those rocks." Well, that's right. So I gave him some TRUTH SEEKERS, Volney's "Ruins," and some Ingersollism. We hav met and argued several times since, but so far I hav had no need to call on a physician to hav my wounds bandaged owing to the rock-hurling. At our last little meeting at his house he told me he thought the only thing that could convert me was the Bible; as far as his influence was concerned he gave it up. I assured him that it was more that immoral book than anything else which caused me to shake off the yoke of mental slavery, and I was sure that if he would study it carefully it would hav the same effect upon him. My friend has marked off several publications of THE TRUTH SEEKER which he will send for later on.

Several gentlemen here are endeavoring to organize a Freethought society. Mr. Jos. Maille, a prominent lawyer, is taking much interest in the move, which, I hope, will soon be crowned with success; only I regret very much that owing to my confining position I am unable to take an activ part therein; nevertheless I am working for our cause on the quiet, and I hav already the names of four others who hav promised to join.

The organization of the Freethought Federation of America is a proper step in the right direction; Messrs. Putnam and Charlesworth deserve much praise. I shall send my name to the secretary within a few days, accompanied with a small voluntary initiation fee. It is the duty of every honest and liberal-minded person to encourage these gentlemen and offer their assistance morally and financially. We must not submit to a union of church and state. It is high time to let the priest-ridden servants of the people know that such a union is contrary to the Constitution of the United States, that in this free country we will not submit to the dictation of the church, that the church must not form a state within a state in order to force their unjust and tyrannical rulings upon the people. Priestcraft will only then weaken, when the masses hav been enlightened on the rights of nature and of man.

The church should be treated as any other private institution, be taxed and pay its pro rata for the benefit and protection it receives in return; and if its members are unable to thus uphold it and prevent it from destruction, why, let it burst and the sooner the better and more beneficial for all mankind. Therefore, to accomplish this, we must organize. Freethinkers, fall in line and join the Freethought Federation of America.

If you will hav the "Rock of Ages" chromos made, one of them shall surely ornament the walls of my humble but happy home, for my better half is also an admirer of this great and noble teacher of liberty and humanity, the friend of all mankind—Ingersoll.

Speaking of Ingersoll, some three months ago my neighbors, a young couple, became the happy parents of a bouncing boy; two weeks later he was brought to church, had some oil poured on him (whether coal oil, sweet oil, or St. Jacob's Oil, I don't know), and was given the name John Leo—Leo in honor of the man with a three-story hat in Rome. "Well," said I to my wife, "competition is the life of trade, and if ever we shall become the happy parents of another boy, I move we call him Robert Ingersoll, in honor of that noble man who has won respect, love, and admiration all over the continent, whose name will liv in the hearts of the people when popes will be but relics of a superstitious age." All those in favor of this motion will please say Aye, aye—contrary——; the ayes hav it by the sound—so ordered.

Yours for light, more light,

ERWIN AUFFURTH.

P.S.—Inclosed also find clipping of "Labor Department" of the Daily City Item, this city, in regard to the injustice of the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday. It affords me much pleasure to be informed that members of several labor organizations will hav my communication read at their next regular monthly meeting with the intention of having resolutions passed accordingly. News of the Week.

AT Quincy, Ill., parochial school children were shut out of the public school parade.

CATHOLICS in England are pleased at the conversion of Lord Donington, a Protestant, to Catholicism.

AT Chicago on the 7th six thousand persons met to offer thanksgiving that Congress had closed the Fair Sundays.

MONSEIGNEURS Satolli and O'Connell, papal delegates, hav left Rome for the United States to consider the school problem.

THE Russian government has forbidden Jews giving their children names identified with the Christian religion, such as Matthew, Mark, Paul, etc.

DURING a storm at Cascina del Pero, Italy, lightning struck a church and injured five persons, two fatally, among them being the chaplain and his assistant.

AN outbreak of the messiah craze among the Indians is feared, as they hold to the promis that the messiah should appear after two springs, which would be next spring.

IN Muskegon, Mich., Protestants are indignant at the gift of $200 to St. Mary's Catholic church by John Moon, a Republican candidate for Congress, with the promis of much more if he is elected.

A CURÉ of Les Aubiers, France, established a sort of clerical table d'hote for those wishing to take communion, who had to dine and pay. Three young women who were refused communion because they did not dine appealed to the courts and obtained damages.

AT the German Catholic congress at Newark, N. J., Monseigneur Schroeder said: "The robbery of the pope was a robbery of God! It was a horrible sacrilege! At the head of our demands there is and always will be this—the restoration of the temporal power of the pope."

THE pope, on account of his new friendship with the French government, does not wish to see an increase in the army of France's enemy, Germany. Consequently the Catholic wing in the German parliament will obstruct military bills until bought off by concessions to its church.

THE latest of the miraculous cures reported as occurring at the shrine of St. Anne de Beaupre, Canada, is that of Daniel O'Brien. He was helpless from rheumatism, but while he was praying before the holy relic his infirmity disappeared and he threw down his crutches and walked off a whole man.

IN an Indiana law-court Mrs. John Clarke pleaded that she was but partly the cause of a black eye which her husband exhibited as her work. She had, she alleged, got on a chair to pray to God to remove John, and in a gesticulation her fingers merely grazed his face. "I know," said she, "that the Lord smote him through the cracks of my fingers."

THE election of the Roman Catholic, Knill, as lord mayor of London, has stirred up sectarian animosity throughout England. At the opening of a church congress at Folkestone the archbishop of Canterbury and scores of bishops and clergymen of the Established church came out in their robes and marched to the various churches. To the end of this procession a crowd of Low Church people, as adverse to ritualistic High Churchism as to Catholicism, attached themselvs, with a banner picturing Latimer and Ridley burning at the stake, and the words, "No popery. Withstand idolatry, priestcraft, and ritualism." In a struggle to lower the banner it was torn to shreds.

SECRETARY FOSTER of the American state department has written Cardinal Rampolla at Rome: "Most Eminent Sir—I am directed by the president of the United States to express to your Eminence his very deep satisfaction on learning of the warm interest which His Holiness, Pope Leo XIII., takes in the approaching Columbian Exposition at Chicago. . . . The intimate association of the Holy See with the Columbian enterprise and its results has so linked the memory of Rome and her pontiffs with the vast achievement of Christopher Columbus and his comrades and competitors in the work of discovery and colonization and exerted so marked an influence on the destinies and progress of the New World they revealed, that an exhibit such as, by the president's direction, I hav the honor to suggest could not fail to be among the most noteworthy contributions to this international celebration of the four-hundredth anniversary of the discovery. By coöperating to this end His Holiness will manifest for our country a regard which will be highly appreciated, not only by the managers of the Exposition, but by the American people at large."

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.

Proctor, the well-known English astronomer says of it: "Through false delicacy lads and youths are left to fall into trouble, and not a few have their prospects of a healthy happy life absolutely ruined. The little book before us is intended to be put into the hands of young men by fathers who are unwilling or incapable of discharging a father's duty in this respect; and as not one father in ten is, we believe, ready to do what is right by his boys himself, it is well that such a book as this should be available. If it is read by all who should read it, its sale will be counted by hundreds of thousands." The publisher will send 10 copies by mail, postpaid, for $2. Should anyone desire them by the 10 or 1,000 they can make satisfactory terms by correspondence.

Gems of Thought.

WE should never believe evil of anyone without positiv proof.—Chinese Author.

MENTAL resistance to change is as strong as the principle of inertia in mechanical science.—Lydia Maria Child.

TRUE happiness consists in the most disinterested and impartial action of the mind and in the practice of all the social duties.—Aristotle.

IF mankind could be got to act up to this last principle [not to say that one knows what one is aware he does not know] in every relation of life, a reformation would be effected such as the world has not yet seen: an approximation to the millennium, such as no supernaturalistic religion has ever yet succeeded, or seems likely ever to succeed, in effecting.—Huxley.

I SOMETIMES despair of getting anything quite simple and honest done in this world by the help of men. They would hav to be passed through a powerful press first, to squeeze their old notions out of them, so that they would not soon get upon their legs again, and then there would be some one in the company with a maggot in his head, hatched from an egg deposited there nobody knows when, for not even fire kills these things, and you would hav lost your labor. Nevertheless, we will not forget that some Egyptian wheat was handed down to us by a mummy.—Thoreau.

MAN is wont to look upon himself as the culminating point of creation, and to consider the earth, with all that livs and moves therein, as created by a beneficent power for his use and dwelling. A glance at the history of the earth and the geographical distribution of the human race might teach him rather more modesty. How long did the earth exist without him! how long did all the beauties of sky and earth shine without there being a creature gifted with reason to behold and admire them! Why should all those endless pre-human ages hav rolled away, if man were actually the be-all and the end-all of creation? "Man," says Helmholtz, "is wont to measure the greatness and wisdom of the Universe by the duration it promises to his own race; but the past history of the globe shows how brief a spell in its duration is the existence of the human race."—Büchner.

WHEN, by chance, a Christian minister, having a mind unwarped by theological bias and a sublimer confidence in the sacredness of truth and the method of free discussion than, unhappily, is usual, dares to transgress the bounds of custom, and givs to the public the plain facts of history and the results of the critical judgment of the best and most reverent scholars upon these topics [the origin of Christianity], he does but demonstrate by his experience that intellectual liberty is rarely possible within sectarian boundaries, even though the body with which he communes may be the most cultured and liberal of all the sects—may assume indeed to be no sect, but the church universal. As far as the enlightenment of the public is involved in the event, it does not seem to matter much whether the voice of truth is silenced by the rack and thumb-screw, as of yore, or by the friendly request of an assistant bishop, as at the present day. Silenced it is for the moment, and that effectually; while in the ears of the eagerly waiting people rings the old-time query, never more forceful or pertinent than to-day, Why seek ye not, even of yourselvs, what is true?—Lewis Janes.

ALL the varying sects, a long while tolerated by the emperors, or concealed from their observation, had no power to persecute and proscribe each other, as they were all equally subject to the Roman magistrates. They possessed only the power of disputing with each other. When the magistrates prosecuted them, they all claimed the rights of nature. They said: Permit us to worship God in peace; do not deprive us of the liberty you allow the Jews. All the different sects existing at present may hold the same language to those who oppress them. They may say to the nations who hav granted privileges to the Jews: Treat us as you treat these sons of Jacob; let us. like them, worship God according to the dictates of conscience. Our opinion is not more injurious to your state or realm than Judaism. You tolerate the enemies of Jesus Christ; tolerate us, therefore, who adore Jesus Christ, and differ from yourselvs only upon subtle points of theology; do not deprive yourselvs of the services of useful subjects. It is of consequence to you to obtain their labor and skill in your manufactures, your marine, and your agriculture, and it is of no consequence at all to you that they hold a few articles of faith different from your own. What you want is their work, and not their catechism.—Voltaire.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress Assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, do hereby respectfully pray and memorialize your Honorable Body to repeal that portion of the Act entitled "An Act to aid in carrying out the Act of Congress, approved April 25, 1890, entitled 'An Act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by the holding of an International Exposition in the City of Chicago'"—approved August 5, 1892, which reads as follows: "That it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition, are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and it is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by the Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modifications of the rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

Also, to repeal that portion of the Act entitled, "An Act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes"—approved August 5, 1892, which reads as follows:

"And it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition, are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and it is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modifications of the rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

We ask the repeal of these portions of these laws for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago, who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you ought to decide is that of the public welfare.

5 It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

Life of Thomas Paine,

WITH A

History of His Literary, Political, and Religious Career in America, France, and England.

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY,

Author of "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," "George Washington and Mount Vernon," "Washington's Rules of Civility," etc.

To Which is added a Sketch of Paine by William Cobbett.

No real biography of Paine has ever appeared. The so-called Lives of Paine have been mainly the controversial work of pamphleteers, turning chiefly on his religious heresies. Paine was in his fifty-eighth year before he published anything concerning religion, and before that time he had acted an important part in revolutionary movements in the United States, England, and France. But in the religious conflict initiated by him, his political services and military career hav been but inadequately considered. A certain historical ostracism has buried in the archives of various countries a large mass of documents containing records of paramount interest and importance. Mr. Conway has personally searched such records, in Europe and America, and has obtained from these fresh light, not only on Paine, but on various eminent figures in American and European history with whom he was associated. A large amount of unpublished correspondence has been included in the volumes.

Mr. Conway says in his Preface: "In the laborious work of searching out the real Paine I hav found a general appreciation of its importance, and it will be seen in the following pages that generous assistance has been rendered by English clergymen, by official persons in Europe and America, by persons of all beliefs and no beliefs In no instance have I been impeded by any prejudice, religious or political. The curators of archives, private collectors, owners of important documents bearing on the subject, have welcomed my effort to bring the truth to light."

Two vols., royal oct., gilt top, portraits, $5.

The letters from Rome alone are worth the price of the book. With a steel-plate portrait of the author. 350 pages. $1.50.

The Semitic Gods and the Bible. Treating upon the Gods of the Semitic nations, including Allah, Jehovah, Satan, the Holy Ghost, Jesus Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the Bible. To the latter 230 pages are devoted, showing that book to be a very inferior production for a first-class God. 333 large pages. Paper covers. 60 cents; cloth, $1.

Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism examined historically and critically. It is thought to be the most damaging exhibit of Christianity that has appeared. 500 large pages. Price, $1.50.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate on Christianity and Infidelity between D. M. Bennett and Rev. G. H. Humphrey. This book has had a very large sale, and is a splendid work for Freethinkers to loan to Christian neighbors. 550 pages. Price, $1.

Bennett-Teed Discussion. Between D. M. Bennett and Cyrus Romulus R. Teed. Jesus the Lord God Creator of Heaven and Earth. Paper, 30 cents.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. Bennett and G. M. Mair, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. 2. Miracles and supernatural achievements have been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus. 3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history. Bennett affirms; Mair denies. This is an exhaustive discussion. Price, $1.50.

Trial of D. M. Bennett in the United States Circuit Court upon the charge of depositing prohibited matter in the mail. This gives a full history of this celebrated case, and shows what monstrous injustice was perpetrated upon Mr. Bennett. Price, cloth, 75 cts.; paper, 50 cts.

Cholera and Christianity.

We are not through with our conflict with the cholera yet. The statement is a melancholy one to make, but let the truth be told. Perhaps the ravages of the dreadful monster over the three great regions of Asia, Europe, and America are but beginning. In previous cases of the epidemic its germs hav often lain dormant over winter and inflicted in the next spring and summer destruction exceeding that of the preceding year. The recent cholera news from abroad means that seed is being sown over a vast area in central Europe ready for a death harvest in 1893. The news from Grodno means that western Russia right up to the Prussian border and beyond is infected; the news from Odessa means that the seed is sown in the Black sea littoral and the Danubian provinces; the news from Buda-Pesth means that the isolation of Galicia was an utter failure, and that Austria and Hungary are involved, while the news from Spandau means that the waterways from Berlin to the river Oder are infected. Scattered cases of the disease in the Netherlands tell the same tale. If precedent is of any value, all those districts and also Poland and France will break out into a blaze in 1893.

The very dispatches that bring us intelligence of the temporary diminution of the plague also contain passages that unconsciously convey assurance of its revival. We mean such as this sentence in a message from Hamburg, Germany: "Services of thanksgiving to God in the churches were attended by half the respectably dressed persons in the city." For where the disease is to such an extent as this action indicates attributed to God, there is slight chance that sufficient attention will be paid its true cause to effect its stay.

Everywhere we find religion the propagator of the cholera and Rationalism its adversary. In each land we find other-worldliness the cholera's friend and fosterer, and this-worldliness its opposer and barricader.

Attention was lately called to what seemed the curious fact that the famous cholera years in India consisted of every twelfth one, viz., 1756, 1768, 1780, 1792, 1804, 1816, 1828, 1840, 1852, 1864, 1876, 1888. It was soon made known that this fact is due to the religious festivals held at Hurdwar, in Hindostan, every twelfth year. In that year upward of three million pilgrims visit the town, who, when the celebration is ended, carry with them the germs of cholera and spread it everywhere. These festivals are held in the years preceding the great outbreaks of cholera.

From Persia come truly dreadful reports of what scienceless and superstitious ignorance has done in permitting the disease to destroy unopposed whole populations of men, women, and children. The Persians seem unable to discover that pilgrimages to holy places and prayers before holy shrines do not put a stop to the plague. They began this sort of thing when the cholera broke out among them a year ago; they are keeping it up yet, while the pest has never stopped its ravages. At least a quarter of a million of them hav fallen before the destroyer within a year; and for months past tens of thousands of corpses hav lain unburied in cities and villages. The shah has fled from his capital, and the great people hav sought refuge in the mountains, where they still hav not escaped the enemy. The scenes of misery in many places, as described by writers on the spot, are frightful. A dispatch to the News from Paris says: "The French consul at Teheran reports that cholera cases in Persia hav always proved fatal in a single day. The governor and the government hav fled, and a whole regiment of soldiers has deserted. The dirt and the stench from the unburied dead, he says, are frightful. The consul had to bake his own bread. Pilgrimages were resorted to as a means of getting rid of the scourge, the pilgrims, however, dying on the road. The French consul at Tauris, where five hundred persons died daily, lost his sister, a daughter, and his son's tutor." Another informant, a returned traveler, predicts that the cholera will spread more extensivly in Persia than it has done, and work much greater destruction, "for the reason that the people oppose no intelligent obstacle to the progress of the pestilence. They believe in prayer as the chief remedy, but do nothing to help themselvs. They are unclean in their habits and surroundings, they eat rotten fruit, and drink water in which the bodies of the victims of cholera hav been washed for burial."

Coming to Russia, we find the populace who hav so long assisted their czar and priests to smother free thought and science, reaping a bitter harvest from this sowing. Such of the Russians as are left alive, emerging heart-shaken and distracted from that hideous train of terrors—famin, influenza, typhus, and cholera; racked by landowners and scared by priests; tyrannized by local authorities or exiled by the czar, present a spectacle of the effects of centuries of genuin Christianity that is nothing less than terrific. A dispatch says: "The ingrained fatalism of the Orthodox peasantry who regard as impious any attempts to avert evils ordained by heaven, and their equally ingrained filthiness of habits and surroundings, would render the situation almost a hopeless one to handle, even if there were plenty of able doctors assisted by enlightened officials. But with these both nonexistent, the outlook is blackness itself."

Tidings from Poland are as dismal as from other parts of the Russian empire. The Great Death has been there, and the people hav fallen down before him like the trees of a forest before the breath of a tornado. The first chapter of the story is told in an article in the London Times from the pen of Hall Caine, who describes the situation of the desolate people when the shadow of the new calamity first fell on them. We giv two pictures which he draws of scenes in one of the larger Polish towns:

"I visited one of the prayer-houses on Saturday morning. No Christian, and perhaps no Jew who knows the Jews' worship only by what may be seen at the great synagogs of London and Berlin, with their touching, beautiful, and inspiring services, can hav more than the remotest idea of the wild scene in one of these Polish prayer-houses when the great death has terrified the worshipers. The room was small, perhaps fifteen feet square, and some eighty men and boys were crowded into it. In the middle there was a deal table with the tora stretched over it. Three or four men stood about the table, and one of them was reading aloud. The rest of the worshipers were not listening, but each was praying from his own prayer-book in varying tones. Most of them were standing, and many were twisting and bowing and stooping as they cried and sang or even shouted and shrieked. A few were sitting and mumbling by the wall, with their books on their knees and their heads on their hands. One old man in the corner with his face to the wall was beating his forehead against the bricks, clapping his hands, throwing out his arms, turning up his face, and casting it down again. The Babel was terrible. The atmosphere was sickening to western eyes. There was no solemnity in this worship, but much that was fanatical and almost barbaric. It was a wild crying out, an importunate appealing to God, a sort of tearing down of heavenly mercy as if by force. I describe the scene as I saw it, not as an illustration of any form of ordinary Jewish worship even among the least enlightened and most 'orthodox' of Hebrew devotees, but as an example of the lengths to which the solemn and stately ceremonials of Israel can go under the terrifying influence of the Shadow of the Great Death."

And this scene he beheld at the Catholic service in the same town:

"The church was crowded, and the congregation trailed out through the open porch into the churchyard and against the walls as far as to the shrine on the eastern end and round again to the western door. Old men and women who were late lay under the open windows, with their sticks and crutches stretched out beside them. The rest outside were all on their knees, following the service as it proceeded within, clasping their hands, making the sign of the cross, giving the responses, and joining in the singing. The service was almost over before the easing of the crush near the door enabled me to push into the interior as far as to the inner door. A prayer was being said, asking for the cessation of the plague that was near at hand. It was said in Polish, and only the substance was made known to me, but its effect on the congregation was a thing that required no interpreter. From porch to chancel they bent forward on their faces with their foreheads as near to the earth as their close crowding would permit, and then they began to sing. I hav never heard such singing. There was no organ, and if there was a choir its voices were lost in the deep swell of the melancholy wail that rose from the people. When we came out again into the open sunshine the lame with their crutches, the sick, the infirm, and the overflow congregation were lying prone on the ground around the church, singing in voices that were like groans to a tune that was like a moan."

After this picture of the application of the priest-misguided people to an imaginary source of their affliction, note what Mr. Caine has to report as to its true origin:

"The usual health of the town is bad. The sanitation is horrible, and in nearly every courtyard there is an open cesspool for household refuse, upon which the infants and young children play. Round the town there is a waste of marshy land that breeds a plentiful and unfailing autumn crop of ague and low fever."

We will next touch upon Spain, the country that is of all those in Europe most dominated by Roman Catholicism. Over the larger part of this land Freethought dare not raise its head, science lies dormant, and naught is known but the priest and his dictations. Dr. W. T. Van Vredenburgh, of the medical board of the New York Life Insurance Company, visited this land in 1885 for the purpose of studying the cholera then prevalent. He spent several months in Madrid, Toledo, Aranjuez, and Valencia, and subsequently made an official report to the United States government touching the causes and effects of the disease. He said a few days ago that had the measures of the New York health officers prevailed in Spain at the time of the outbreak of the disease its progress would hav been checked, if not wholly abated. As it was he found in Spain all the predisposing causes of cholera, especially those of environment, existing to such a marked degree that his surprise was that the epidemic was not much worse. The doctor continued:

"Rules that govern the health of people of other countries are strangely absent in Spain. In most villages, towns, and cities, the lanes and streets, public and private, are made the receptacles for excremental pollution. This fact, together with the uncleanliness and overcrowded condition of the lower classes, the imperfect drainage and sewerage, the proximity of cesspools and sewers to wells and other sources of water supply, and the use of contaminated water for drinking and other purposes, are the most potent factors in the distribution of the poison of cholera as I found it in Spain. All of these predisposing causes, both personal and environing, may exist and be favorable to the development of other of the so-called 'dirt diseases,' such as typhoid fever and diphtheria, as they are to the development of cholera; but these previously existing conditions cannot of themselvs cause or produce cholera.

"I am of opinion that the ravages of cholera in Spain were due to three causes, one of which or all of which may yet result in spreading the epidemic on this continent. These causes were excrement-polluted earth, excrement-polluted air, and excrement-polluted water. I found sheets and other bedclothing on which cholera-stricken persons had reclined exposed for days on lawns and fences, the wind distributing far and wide poison that had come from the bodies of the patients. In Toledo, in two instances that I recall, the bedding and furniture of patients who had died of cholera were bought by second-hand dealers, put into their shops, and offered for sale, each of these shops thus becoming new foci from which the cholera spread.

"Another frequent source of propagation of the bacilli in Spain is the porous material of which the two sets of reservoirs, drains, and water supplies are built. I am told this condition does not exist to any marked degree in New York, but in Spain the reservoirs are so imperfectly constructed that the liquid contents of the cesspools easily escapes into the surrounding subsoil, and thence into the adjoining water supply."

As to America, the first thing that strikes us is that it is very doubtful that the Columbus Exposition, upon which so many hearts are fixed, can be held in 1893. Even if it is not, it will still be impossible, probably, to keep the plague out of our country. Holy Russia has sent New York city a batch of the kind of humanity that she produces, in the shape of hordes of Russian Hebrews of the lowest type who hive filthily in a certain east side district and present a perpetual menace to the health of the whole city. The Jewish Messenger calls attention to "the Ghetto of New York, due wholly to the enormous increase in Russian immigration," and reminds us that it was there the typhus fever broke out last spring. It then speaks in this way:

"To-day the danger signal is raised again. May God avert the epidemic from our city; but if the cholera makes its appearance, where will it take firmer root than in the crowded tenements and unsightly purlieus of the east side downtown, where Jews of Russian and Polish nationality predominate in the mass of mongrel population which has drifted to our shores of late years? The situation is perilous for the immediate future. The flame can burst forth at any moment. As long as we permit a Ghetto, with all its surroundings and peculiarities, the element of danger is there. If we endure a Russian atmosphere in our city, we cannot be surprised at the consequences."

When will the last foul curse that follows in religion's train hav passed and its shadow hav lifted from a miserable race?

"Brother" Maurelian an Incorrect Reporter.

Colonel Ingersoll has written the following letter to the Sun regarding Priest Maurelian's distorted account of his accidental interview with the great Agnostic:

"To the Editor of the Sun, Sir: My attention has been called to the grievance of 'Brother' Maurelian, who seems to think that he was badly treated by me at the Grand Pacific Hotel.

"The account given by 'Brother' Maurelian, as published in the Sun, is not quite correct as to the language used by me, and as to my manner toward him, it is altogether wrong.

"A card was presented to me on Saturday, the 8th of the month, at room 33, Grand Pacific Hotel, and on this card was either 'Brother Maurelian' or 'Father Maurelian'—I think 'Father Maurelian.' I told the waiter bringing it to show the gentleman up. In a little while 'Brother' Maurelian appeared and asked for Bishop Spalding. Of course I instantly saw that a mistake had been made, and the situation struck me as having in it at least a spark of humor. Think of a Catholic 'Brother' calling at my room for Bishop Spalding! And so I said to the 'Brother' pleasantly as it was, or is, possible for me to say anything, 'Bishop Spalding is not here; but I am a bishop, and I hav been called a pope, although I am not. My name is Ingersoll, and now you see the danger into which you hav fallen.'

"The gentleman excused himself, and I said, 'It is not your fault; it was a mistake at the office,' bade him good morning as politely as I could, and wished him good luck.

"That is the extent of the insult. I never treated anyone better in my life. My tone was perfectly kind, and while I was saying what I did, I looked as pleasantly as I could at the reverend 'Brother,' it never occurring to me that he could take the slightest exception to what was being said. Unconsciously I paid him the compliment of taking it for granted that he had sufficient perception to know that all was said without the slightest intention of wounding his pride or shocking his religious convictions or sentiments.

"I do not attack persons. I do not denounce Catholics, but Catholicism. I do not deride Protestants, but I do attack their creeds.

"There are thousands and thousands of good men who believe the Bible, and when I attack the dogma of inspiration I am not attacking them. This is a distinction that many fail to make. I hate no one because he is a Catholic, I hate no one because he believes what I think are superstitions. I hav no prejudice against any human being based on color, race, or creed, but with every drop of my blood I hate the superstitions that enslave the mind and seek to giv to organized credulity the control of this world.

"'Brother' Maurelian, filled with 'the charity that thinketh no evil,' allowed himself to feel insulted by words of pleasantry and kindness, but I hope that some time he will forgiv himself. Hoping that you will hav the kindness to publish this statement, I remain yours sincerely, R. G. Ingersoll.

"New York, Oct. 19, 1892."

Sectarians Embroiling a Nation.

Our readers are aware of the late precious doings of the antagonist sects of Protestantism and Catholicism in the country of Uganda, Africa. Now that the Protestants in England hav succeeded in instigating the butchery of several hundred Catholic men, women, and children, and in planting the seeds of a rancorous enmity whose end none can see, they are thrown into disappointment by the statement of Captain Lugard that the British government must abandon the land. The Protestants, he says, could not withstand the attacks of the more numerous and better-armed Catholics, who are represented as eager to avenge the wrongs that they hav suffered at the hands of the former. Should the government get out bag and baggage, it is said Monsignor Hirth, in the interest of the Roman Catholic church, would at once hoist the French flag and declare a French protectorate.

Meanwhile, this Monsignor Hirth, who is the head of the Catholic missions in Uganda, is urging the French government to demand redress for the injuries inflicted on its colonists. He has also written a letter to the board of French-African missions, in which he says that the position of the Catholic missionaries in the Victoria Nyanza district is heart-rending. The persecutions against them are as violent as ever, in spite of the treaties made in April, which should afford them protection. Thousands of Catholics, the monsignor adds, are destined to die or hav already been killed. The British are trying to protect them, but confess that they are powerless. Monsignor Hirth, in his letter, describes the torture inflicted upon Princess Sara to induce her to abjure Catholicism. He says the king abjured the faith and was again placed upon his throne. He then joined in the persecutions of the Catholics but allowed Princess Sara to rejoin them. The Catholics recently started out of the district, taking with them three hundred women. Before they had proceeded far the caravan was attacked and captured by Protestants, who abducted all the women. An attempt was made to recapture them, but only a few were recovered.

The whole course of Christian conduct in Uganda is well summarized by the New York Sun thus:

"A people who were prosperous and happy before missionaries went among them came to be divided into religious factions. The Protestants were taught that Catholics were idolators. The Catholics were taught that Protestants were Antichristian. Religious differences were carried into politics, each faction seeking to grasp the best offices and the greatest power. Mohammedans and the unconverted sought to reap advantage from the bitter strife, and drove out both Christian parties. Plenty of powder and ball, brought up from the coast, reinstated the Christians, who, having vanquished the common enemy, fell upon one another. Then Lugard's machine-gun mowed down the Catholics and brought about a great Protestant victory. Now, with bitter hatred rankling in the breasts of nativs once brothers and united, and with the country impoverished by years of civil war, England talks of shaking the dust of Uganda off her feet, and Lugard says the land is not worth keeping. The bigotry and criminal mismanagement that hav brought such woes upon Uganda are a scandal of which the last has not yet been heard."

We desire all beholders of the scene above described to reflect that such has ever been the result of the people's giving their earnest and undivided attention to Christianity. This condition was that of all the European countries during the many centuries preceding the rise of Infidelity and Science a few generations ago. It is prevented from being the condition of Europe and America to-day only by the persistent efforts of scientists and Freethinkers and all who are disposed to ignore vagaries as to another world and attend to this. And these countries are ready at any moment to slip back into that old condition of superstition and embroilment; the majority in them are bent in that direction and will carry the nations back at the first relaxation of the Rationalists' counter-strain; that they may not do so these few Rationalists must look to it that their efforts never cease.

Christian Doctrins Killing Folks.

We continually hear of the occurrence, in various parts of the country, of cases of ill persons being placed in the hands of Christian Scientists, and dying under their treatment, when the services of physicians would hav saved certainly a part of their number. The two latest instances are as follows:

In Toronto, Ont., Robert J. McCausland, a prominent citizen, falling ill submitted himself to two Christian Scientists, Charles Longheed and John Stewart. He died, and they were arraigned in court, but acquitted on the ground that he had voluntarily committed the treatment of his case to them.

At Boston on the 10th a gasoline stove in the sitting-room of the Cate family so exhausted the air of oxygen that it became unfit to breathe and the family began to stifle. When the wife and three children had become unconscious, Mr. Cate's mother, whom the fumes had not subdued, repaired to the factory where her son was employed and notified him that his wife and children were "in belief," a term used by Christian Scientists to convey the idea that a person imagins himself to be ill. Mr. Cate immediately accompanied his mother to his home. To use his own words, "I found my family in belief, and immediately proceeded to demonstrate with them according to the teaching of the Christian Science." While he was trying by faith to bring his wife and children back to consciousness his aged mother fell under the influences of the stifling atmosphere. Carrying her into another room, Mr. Cate sought to "demonstrate" with her. He had just begun to see signs of improvement on the part of his patient, when he became "in belief" himself and lost consciousness. The whole family was in this state and probably would hav died but for the fortunate appearance of a grocer's clerk, who entered the house on his daily rounds. The clerk dragged all the unconscious sufferers into the open air. Four physicians answered the call and applied restorativs and succeeded in bringing back to life all the members of the stricken family except the four-year-old boy. This boy had been trained by his father to place entire belief in Christian Science, and when the little fellow was gasping for almost his last breath the father, who was still firm in opinion that the young life could be saved, bent down and whispered in the boy's ear: "Is there any sensation in matter?' The answer came faintly: "No; all is mind."

Then the boy died—"passed on," as Mr. Cate expressed it. Cate has been a believer in Christian Science eighteen months, and has thrown away fifty-two bottles of medicin.

We may subjoin to these a case not of Faith Cure but resembling that as being one of superstition as to the nature of disease. In Pickens county, South Carolina, a young white man named Bolling was a sufferer from kidney disease, and he alleged that his illness was caused by his having been bewitched. Consequently a "witch doctor" was called in, and he alleges that he found Bolling suffering from the spells of a witch. He makes the statement, which is believed in the neighborhood, that he removed several frogs and lizards from the patient. After Bolling had died and been buried, the excitement grew so that the coroner had at last reports decided to exhume the body and hold an inquest. Bolling's friends grimly await the result, vowing vengeance on the witch if she or he can be detected.

These cases of superstition in regard to disease should be utilized by people as aids in representing to their imagination the times of a few centuries ago, when the like occurrences were not, as now, scattered, but were invariable in all cases of illness. Now Freethought has secured in some degree a hearing which has resulted in the discrediting of these superstitions to the extent that they are put into practice only here and there; but two or three centuries ago they passed unchallenged and were practiced universally. It should be reflected that these crazy and injurious practices are as ready to spread into general observance now as ever, should the discouraging influence of Freethought criticism be suspended. And therefore we must never relax our endeavors against them and their parent Christianity.

That acute cosmopolitan observer, Max O'Rell, in his latest book, "English Pharisees and French Crocodiles," remarks: "There is no place for the poor at the banquet of life in England. For them, beer and the Bible. They take beer." The English will not open their museums on Sunday, says this satirist, but "meanwhile the London taverns remain open, which proves that the English bigots consider gin and beer more powerful moral stimulants than the masterpieces of great artists."

From a London dispatch to the Catholic Press Association we reproduce the following unagreeable intelligence: "The church has won for itself more than toleration in England. It has on many points the coöperation and aid of the official machinery of the government. There is, indeed, among what are left of the bigoted Protestants of the old school a constant, but unsuccessful agitation about the payments annually made out of the treasury, or the local taxes, to Catholic schools and colleges, to priests and nuns, and the treasurers of Catholic institutions. . . . The Catholic soldiers in the barracks of London are marched to mass on Sundays at the nearest Catholic church. It counts as a parade, and if they fail to appear in their places at mass they are liable to punishment."

It is remarked by a Tribune reviewer that the Italian scientist Lombroso in his late work on Genius fails to distinguish insanity from eccentricity, and indeed it would be easy to deduce from his book the false conclusion that everybody who differed in any important particular from all the rest of the community must be insane. "That, indeed," continues the Tribune reviewer, "has to all practical intents been the theory of the masses during long periods of the world's history. The people hav usually resembled the sheep of Panurge, and those superior men who exhibited marked individuality, who insisted on living their own lives, whose perceptiv and imaginativ faculties exceeded those of the common herd, hav been regarded with dislike and suspicion, and either dubbed insane or charged with the practice of sorcery and magic."

As disgusting as any piece of business going on in this ill-devised world just at present is the coercing of the British Parliament by Christian bigots into intruding missionaries and religion upon foreign peoples by force. On one instance of this the English National Observer very fitly says: "It is nonsensical that a set of powers should be able to bully any empire whatsoever into Christianity; and if the Chinese authorities chose to forbid the Exeter Hall propaganda, it could not be any part of Lord Salisbury's duty to interfere, except for the protection of the lives and property of British subjects. We are prepared to go further, and declare that so long as the missionary zeal is a source of danger and difficulty to our traders, the zealots must be induced to imitate the Irishman who drew in his horns and took a back seat. The missionaries must retreat." At present, to please bullying bishops and feed corkbrained theological graduates, taxes wrung from a starving people must be spent, and brave and useful men be slaughtered, to force a truthless religion upon people whose own faiths were hoary in age and majestic in dominion ages before Christianity, their own degenerate offspring, was born.

News and Notes.

I don't think any ancient pilgrim, even with the help of angels and the Holy Ghost and the seven-leagued boots, ever traveled a greater space or covered more territory than my Secular body did going from the Liberal Club of New York Friday night to the Ohio Liberal Society of Cincinnati Sunday night. I traverse nine different states and the District of Columbia. I leave the Empire city Saturday afternoon, glide over the resplendent Hudson, sweep through New Jersey to the Quaker metropolis, fly by Baltimore, and reach the gleaming Capitol an hour before midnight. Then through Alexandria the train thunders on. When morning gilds the sky it climbs the mountains of West Virginia, and at noon plunges into the valley of the Ohio, and with sunset's sheen reverberates along Kentucky's shore, and just at dark reaches the cavernous deeps of the Grand Union station of Cincinnati, Ga. E. Light, the Infidel torchbearer, Andrew Hogg, and Samuel Silverman make my far wanderings end with a glorious handshake. The Gibson givs a royal welcome. I had rather be at the Gibson than in any heavenly mansion. Mr. Dunbar, of this magnificent hotel, is a stanch Liberal, and his hospitality is freely given. After an hour's rest I reach the hall of the Liberal society, which is crowded to its utmost capacity with a most appreciativ audience, and I discourse on "Freethought and Morality." The subject is thrown open for debate, and various ideas are elucidated relevant to the lecture. The audience remains until the very close, near 10 o'clock, and shows that interest in this vast question is unabated. It was a keen and earnest discussion.

The Ohio Liberal Society is in better condition than ever. This first meeting of the season was most auspicious. The membership is increasing, and the funds are not lacking. Contributions are generous. This society is organized on a broad basis. It welcomes debate on any subject. It givs everyone a chance to speak who has something to say. Its platform is wide as the universe. It is destined to be a great power in this community. Its leaders are unflinching but comprehensiv in their methods.

I was pleased to meet among our allies here Mr. and Mrs. E. P. Foster, editors of the Golden Rule, a radical reform paper. Mr. Foster was once a clergyman, and a most successful one: but he was altogether too humanitarian to suit the deacons. He had a class for the study of political economy in his church parlors, and large numbers of working-people attended. A grand and noble work was being accomplished, but what did the rich Christians say? Why, that the carpets were being injured by these people and it was too bad. Mr. Foster, in his earnest endeavor to aid the world, especially to ennoble labor, couldn't help seeing the humbug of Christianity, and he determined to be an independent man, and his wife, emancipated with himself, determined to be an independent woman. And now, free from the shackles of the church, they are doing a great service for labor reform. But they realize that labor can only be dignified and clothed with its noblest rights and possibilities by the power of Freethought. It is curious to note that the first swerving of Mr. Foster from strict orthodoxy was on the point that possibly an unbaptized infant might be saved. The president of the Presbyterian college where he was located was horrified at the hint of such a thing, that there could be any salvation for an unbaptized child, and he roundly denounced Mr. Foster for heresy. Who would think that to-day a president of a college would teach that unbaptized infants are damned? It was a real pleasure to meet these Liberal and progressiv people of Cincinnati, men and women of culture, of brave spirit, of advanced thought. I must especially thank Mr. and Mrs. Dunbar, of the Gibson House, for their cordial entertainment and splendid Liberal spirit and deed; Dr. Wilson, cutting to the heart of Christianity with the scalpel of a physician; Warren, at the "Old Bookstore;" Ward, president of the society, and many others—a crowd of them. I was glad to meet with such a bright and inspiring outlook for future achievement.

I leave Cincinnati on Tuesday afternoon and speed my way to Louisville the same evening and spend an hour or two along its brilliant streets. But I hav to hie away on the early morning train on Wednesday, and until late in the afternoon travel through the somewhat fantastic and brilliant scenes of Kentucky. The colors of the variegated forest mingle with the dull gray of vast acres of corn; the houses appear of a curious make, with chimneys on the outside and rambling porticoes, and a kind of "careless desolation" in the yards and fields, as if the people took things in a free and easy fashion. Yet withal the sceneries were lovely and the dwellings homelike, the women pretty and stately, and the men of a stalwart appearance.

In the golden evening light with rolling volumes of smoke Paducah stretches its handsome array. There is a big political demonstration here. The Democrats are out in full force with music and banners and torches and Cleveland hats. There is a large mass-meeting addressed by Senator Blackburn. I like the Senator. He is a first-rate speaker. He made some good points. He talks right on without many flourishes of oratory. He keeps the attention. There was an alarm of fire in the midst of his discourse, but no one that I could see left the crowd. This is a pretty good test of a man's mastery of his audience. Blackburn has a rich, strong voice, skilfully used. He has clear-cut, somewhat severe features, and makes a fine impression with his stately figure. He is a born Southerner, and the heart that beat beneath the gray flashes forth. I understand that the Senator voted to open the World's Fair on Sunday, and is therefore a Liberal statesman and worthy of the position he occupies. I didn't indorse all he said, but I liked his manly fashion of talking.

I leave Paducah on this Thursday morning, October 13th. It takes two hours on the slow train to reach Murray, forty-six miles distant. At Murray I am still twenty-one miles from Golden Pond, my place of destination, toward which I hav been drifting for the last two days. Golden Pond is a little bit of a village between the Tennessee and Cumberland rivers. I must hire a team to get there, or walk. A team is rather an expensiv luxury for a Liberal lecturer, but I conclude that I had rather foot the bill than the road. My pocket-book can stand the strain better than my back. Ingersoll says, spend your last dollar like a king, and I did this time and had a carriage all to myself, though perhaps if I could hav drafted an ass and the foal of an ass, as did Jesus, I might hav mounted them. As it was, however, I had to put on more style than the son of God.

I had a lovely drive through the oak forests, alongside the tobacco and corn fields, the quaint farmhouses, the school with its happy children, and the graveyard in the depths of the wood; the gypsy camp, with its mystical and grotesque appearance; the rough descent to the river—the broad Tennessee, with its green islands and beautiful shores. The crossing of the ferry was quite enchanting. Far up and down shone the limpid stream like a vast mirror from horizon to horizon, set between splendid banks painted by autumn's trembling but deft and glowing hand.

Over the river, through the delicious woods and winding ways, the quick steeds take me to Golden Pond, ornamented with flags, a cosy hamlet that breathes of ancient romance. In the stately dwelling of Bogard I find refreshment and rest. I find there is a debate on hand. Mr. Hall, who debated with Mr. Remsburg, is to be here to-morrow. The people are aroused. Christians and Infidels are coming from afar. They will most of them bring tents and provisions with them and camp out. The battle will last three days. It looks as if I should hav a lively tale to tell next week. Never before has a Freethought lecturer penetrated these remote scenes, and they are wondering what kind of a mortal he is.

Golden Pond, Ky.

The Decline of Bibliolatry.*

My memory, unfortunately, carries me back to the fourth decade of the nineteenth century, when the evangelical flood had a little abated and the tops of certain mountains were soon to appear, chiefly in the neighborhood of Oxford; but when, nevertheless, bibliolatry was rampant; when church and chapel alike proclaimed, as the oracles of God, the crude assumptions of the worst informed and, in natural sequence, the most presumptuously bigoted, of all theological schools.

In accordance with promises made on my behalf, but certainly without my authorization, I was very early taken to hear "sermons in the vulgar tongue." And vulgar enough often was the tongue in which some preacher, ignorant alike of literature, of history, of science, and even of theology, outside that patronized by his own narrow school, poured forth, from the safe intrenchment of the pulpit, invectivs against those who deviated from his notion of orthodoxy. From dark allusions to "skeptics" and "infidels," I became aware of the existence of people who trusted in carnal reason; who audaciously doubted that the world was made in six natural days, or that the deluge was universal; perhaps even went so far as to question the literal accuracy of the story of Eve's temptation, or of Balaam's ass; and, from the horror of the tones in which they were mentioned, I should hav been justified in drawing the conclusion that these rash men belonged to the criminal classes. At the same time, those who were more directly responsible for providing me with the knowledge essential to the right guidance of life (and who sincerely desired to do so), imagined that they were discharging that most sacred duty by impressing upon my childish mind the necessity, on pain of reprobation in this world and damnation in the next, of accepting, in the strict and literal sense, every statement contained in the Protestant Bible. I was told to believe, and I did believe, that doubt about any of them was a sin, not less reprehensible than a moral delict. I suppose that out of a thousand of my contemporaries, nine hundred at least had their minds systematically warped and poisoned, in the name of the god of truth, by like disciplin. I am sure that even a score of years later, those who ventured to question the exact historical accuracy of any part of the Old Testament and a fortiori of the Gospels, had to expect a pitiless shower of verbal missils, to say nothing of the other disagreeable consequences which visit those who, in any way, run counter to that chaos of prejudices called public opinion.

My recollections of this time hav recently been revived by the perusal of a remarkable document (Declaration on the Truth of Holy Scripture. The Times, Dec. 18, 1891), signed by as many as thirty-eight out of the twenty odd thousand clergymen of the Established church. It does not appear that the signataries are officially accredited spokesmen of the ecclesiastical corporation to which they belong; but I feel bound to take their word for it, that they are "stewards of the Lord, who hav received the Holy Ghost," and therefore to accept this memorial as evidence that, though the evangelicalism of my early days may be deposed from its place of power, though so many of the colleagues of the thirty-eight even repudiate the title of Protestants, yet the green bay tree of bibliolatry flourishes as it did sixty years ago. And, as in those good old times, whoso refuses to offer incense to the idol is held to be guilty of "a dishonor to God," imperiling his salvation.

It is to the credit of the perspicacity of the memorialists that they discern the real nature of the controverted question of the age. They are awake to the unquestionable fact that, if scripture has been discovered "not to be worthy of unquestioning belief," faith "in the supernatural itself" is, so far, undermined. And I may congratulate myself upon such weighty confirmation of an opinion in which I hav had the fortune to anticipate them. But whether it is more to the credit of the courage, than to the intelligence, of the thirty-eight that they should go on to proclaim that the canonical scriptures of the Old and New Testaments "declare incontrovertibly the actual historical truth in all records, both of past events and of the delivery of predictions to be thereafter fulfilled," must be left to the coming generation to decide.

The interest which attaches to this singular document will, I think, be based by most thinking men, not upon what it is, but upon that of which it is a sign. It is an open secret that the memorial is put forth as a counterblast to a manifestation of opinion of a contrary character, on the part of certain members of the same ecclesiastical body, who therefore hav, as I suppose, an equal right to declare themselvs "stewards of the Lord and recipients of the Holy Ghost." In fact, the stream of tendency toward naturalism, the course of which I hav briefly traced, has, of late years, flowed so strongly, that even the churches hav begun, I dare not say to drift, but at any rate, to swing at their moorings. Within the pale of the Anglican establishment, I venture to doubt, whether, at this moment, there are as many thorough-going defenders of "plenary inspiration" as there were timid questioners of that doctrin half a century ago. Commentaries, sanctioned by the highest authority, giv up the "actual historical truth" of the cosmogonical and diluvial narrativs. University professors of deservedly high repute accept the critical decision that the Hexateuch is a compilation, in which the share of Moses, either as author or as editor, is not quite so clearly demonstrable as it might be; highly placed divines tell us that the pre-Abrahamic scripture narrativs may be ignored; that the book of Daniel may be regarded as a patriotic romance of the second century B.C.; that the words of the writer of the fourth gospel are not always to be distinguished from those which he puts into the mouth of Jesus. Conservativ but conscientious revisers decide that whole passages, some of dogmatic and some of ethical importance, are interpolations. An uneasy sense of the weakness of the dogma of biblical infallibility seems to be at the bottom of a prevailing tendency once more to substitute the authority of the "church" for that of the Bible. In my old age it has happened to me to be taken to task for regarding Christianity as a "religion of a book" as gravely as, in my youth, I should hav been reprehended for doubting that proposition. It is a no less interesting symptom that the state church seems more and more anxious to repudiate all complicity with the principles of the Protestant Reformation and to call itself "Anglo-Catholic." Inspiration, deprived of its old intelligible sense, is watered down into a mystification. The scriptures are, indeed, inspired; but they contain a wholly undefined and indefinable "human element;" and this unfortunate intruder is converted into a sort of biblical whipping-boy. Whatsoever scientific investigations, historical or physical, prove to be erroneous, the "human element" bears the blame; while the divine inspiration of such statements as by their nature are out of reach of proof or disproof, is still asserted with all the vigor inspired by conscious safety from attack. Though the proposal to treat the Bible "like any other book," which caused so much scandal forty years ago, may not yet be generally accepted, and though Bishop Colenso's criticisms may still lie, formally, under ecclesiastical ban, yet the church has not wholly turned a deaf ear to the voice of the scientific tempter; and many a coy divine, while "crying I will ne'er consent," has consented to the proposals of that scientific criticism which the memorialists renounce and denounce.

A humble layman, to whom it would seem the hight of presumption to assume even the unconsidered dignity of a "steward of science," may well find this conflict of apparently equal ecclesiastical authorities perplexing—suggestiv, indeed, of the wisdom of postponing attention to either until the question of precedence between them is settled. And this course will probably appear the more advisable, the more closely the fundamental position of the memorialists is examined.

"No opinion of the fact or form of divine revelation, founded on literary criticism [and I suppose I may add historical or physical criticism] of the scriptures themselvs, can be admitted to interfere with the traditionary testimony of the church, when that has been once ascertained and verified by appeal to antiquity" (Declaration, article x).

Grant that it is "the traditionary testimony of the church" which guarantees the canonicity of each and all of the books of the Old and New Testaments. Grant also that canonicity means infallibility; yet, according to the thirty-eight, this "traditionary testimony" has to be "ascertained and verified by appeal to antiquity." But "ascertainment and verification" are purely intellectual processes, which must be conducted according to the strict rules of scientific investigation, or be self-convicted of worthlessness. Moreover, before we can set about the appeal to "antiquity," the exact sense of that usefully vague term must be defined by similar means. "Antiquity" may include any number of centuries, great or small; and whether "antiquity" is to comprise the council of Trent, or to stop a little beyond that of Nicæa, or come to an end in the time of Irenæus, or in that of Justin Martyr, are knotty questions which can be decided, if at all, only by those critical methods which the signataries treat so cavalierly. And yet the decision of these questions is fundamental, for as the limits of the canonical scriptures vary, so may the dogmas deduced from them require modification. Christianity is one thing, if the fourth gospel, the epistle to the Hebrews, the pastoral epistles, and the Apocalypse are canonical and (by the hypothesis) infallibly true; and another thing, if they are not. As I hav already said, whoso defines the canon defines the creed.

Now it is quite certain with respect to some of these books, such as the Apocalypse and the epistle to the Hebrews, that the Eastern and the Western church differed in opinion for centuries; and yet neither the one branch nor the other can hav considered its judgment infallible, since they eventually agreed to a transaction, by which each gave up its objection to the book patronized by the other. Moreover, the "fathers" argue (in a more or less rational manner) about the canonicity of this or that book, and are by no means above producing evidence, internal and external, in favor of the opinions they advocate. In fact, imperfect as their conceptions of scientific method may be, they not infrequently used it to the best of their ability. Thus it would appear that though science, like nature, may be driven out with a fork, ecclesiastical or other, yet she surely comes back again. The appeal to "antiquity" is, in fact, an appeal to science, first, to define what antiquity is; secondly, to determin what "antiquity," so defined, says about canonicity; thirdly, to prove that canonicity means infallibility. And when science, largely in the shape of the abhorred "criticism," has done this, and has shown that "antiquity" used her own methods, however clumsily and imperfectly, she naturally turns upon the appealers to "antiquity," and demands that they should show cause why, in these days, science should not resume the work they did so imperfectly, and carry it out efficiently.

But no such cause can be shown. If "antiquity" permitted Eusebius, Origen, Tertullian, Irenæus, to argue for the reception of this book into the canon and the rejection of that, upon rational grounds, "antiquity" admitted the whole principle of modern criticism. If Irenæus produces ridiculous reasons for limiting the gospels to four, it was open to anyone else to produce good reasons (if he had them) for cutting them down to three, or increasing them to five. If the Eastern branch of the church had a right to reject the Apocalypse and accept the epistle to the Hebrews, and the Western an equal right to accept the Apocalypse and reject the epistle, down to the fourth century, any other branch would hav an equal right, on cause shown, to reject both, or, as the Catholic church afterward actually did, to accept both.

Thus I cannot but think that the thirty-eight are hoist with their own petard. Their "appeal to antiquity" turns out to be nothing but a roundabout way of appealing to the tribunal the jurisdiction of which they affect to deny. Having rested the world of Christian supernaturalism on the elephant of biblical infallibility, and furnished the elephant with standing-ground on the tortoise of "antiquity," they, like their famous Hindoo analog, hav been content to look no further; and hav thereby been spared the horror of discovering that the tortoise rests on a grievously fragil construction, to a great extent the work of that very intellectual operation which they anathematize and repudiate.

Moreover, there is another point to be considered. It is of course true that a Christian church (whether the Christian church, or not, depends on the connotation of the definit article) existed before the Christian scriptures; and that the infallibility of these depends upon the infallibility of the judgment of the persons who selected the books, of which they are composed, out of the mass of literature current among the early Christians. The logical acumen of Augustine showed him that the authority of the gospel he preached must rest on that of the church to which he belonged.* But it is no less true that the Hebrew and the Septuagint versions of most, if not all, of the Old Testament books existed before the birth of Jesus of Nazareth; and that their divine authority is presupposed by, and therefore can hardly depend upon, the religious body constituted by his disciples. As everybody knows, the very conception of a "Christ" is purely Jewish. The validity of the argument from the Messianic prophecies vanishes unless their infallible authority is granted; and, as a matter of fact, whether we turn to the gospels, the epistles, or the writings of the early apologists, the Jewish scriptures are recognized as the highest court of appeal of the Christian.

The proposal to cite Christian "antiquity" as a witness to the infallibility of the Old Testament, when its own claims to authority vanish, if certain propositions contained in the Old Testament are erroneous, hardly satisfies the requirements of lay logic. It is as if a claimant to be sole legatee, under another kind of testament, should offer his assertion as sufficient evidence of the validity of the will. And, even were not such a circular, or rather rotatory, argument, that the infallibility of the Bible is testified by the infallible church, whose infallibility is testified by the infallible Bible, too absurd for serious consideration, it remains permissible to ask, Where and when the church, during the period of its infallibility, as limited by Anglican dogmatic necessities, has officially decreed the "actual historical truth of all records" in the Old Testament? Was Augustine heretical when he denied the actual historical truth of the record of the creation? Father Suarez, standing on later Roman tradition, may hav a right to declare that he was; but it does not lie in the mouth of those who limit their appeal to that early "antiquity," in which Augustine played so great a part, to say so.

Among the watchers of the course of the world of thought, some view with delight and some with horror the recrudescence of supernaturalism which manifests itself among us, in shapes ranged along the whole flight of steps, which, in this case, separates the sublime from the ridiculous—from Neo-Catholicism and inner-light mysticism, at the top, to unclean things, not worthy of mention in the same breath, at the bottom. In my poor opinion, the importance of these manifestations is often overestimated. The extant forms of supernaturalism hav deep roots in human nature, and will undoubtedly die hard; but, in these latter days, they hav to cope with an enemy whose full strength is only just beginning to be put out, and whose forces, gathering strength year by year, are hemming them round on every side. This enemy is science, in the acceptation of systematized natural knowledge, which, during the last two centuries, has extended those methods of investigation, the worth of which is confirmed by daily appeal to nature, to every region in which the supernatural has hitherto been recognized.

When scientific historical criticism reduced the annals of heroic Greece and of regal Rome to the level of fables; when the unity of authorship of the Iliad was successfully assailed by scientific literary criticism; when scientific physical criticism, after exploding the geocentric theory of the universe, and reducing the solar system itself to one of millions of groups of like cosmic specks, circling, at unimaginable distances from one another, through infinit space, showed the supernaturalistic theories of the duration of the earth and of life upon it to be as inadequate as those of its relativ dimensions and importance had been—it needed no prophetic gift to see that, sooner or later, the Jewish and the early Christian records would be treated in the same manner; that the authorship of the Hexateuch and of the gospels would be as severely tested; and that the evidence in favor of the veracity of many of the statements found in the scriptures would hav to be strong indeed, if they were to be opposed to the conclusions of physical science. In point of fact, so far as I can discover, no one competent to judge of the evidential strength of these conclusions ventures now to say that the biblical accounts of the creation and of the deluge are true in the natural sense of the words of the narrativs. The most the modern reconciler ventures upon is to affirm that some quite different sense may be put upon the words; and that this non-natural sense may, with a little trouble, be manipulated into some sort of non-contradiction of scientific truth.

My purpose, in the essay (XVI) which treats of the narrativ of the deluge, was to prove, by physical criticism, that no such evnet as that described ever took place; to exhibit the untrustworthy character of the narrativ demonstrated by literary criticism; and finally, to account for its origin, by producing a form of those ancient legends of pagan Chaldea, from which the biblical compilation is manifestly derived. I hav yet to learn that the main propositions of this essay can be seriously challenged.

In the essays (II, III) on the narrativ of the creation, I hav endeavored to controvert the assertion that modern science supports, either the interpretation put upon it by Mr. Gladstone, or any interpretation which is compatible with the general sense of the narrativ, quite apart from particular details. The first chapter of Genesis teaches the supernatural creation of the present forms of life; modern science teaches that they hav come about by evolution. The first chapter of Genesis teaches the successiv origin—firstly, of all the plants; secondly, of all the aquatic and aërial animals; thirdly, of all the terrestrial animals which now exist—during distinct intervals of time; modern science teaches that, throughout all the duration of an immensely long past, so far as we hav any adequate knowledge of it (that is, as far back as the Silurian epoch), plants, aquatic, aërial, and terrestrial animals hav coexisted; that the earliest known are unlike those which at present exist; and that the modern species hav come into existence as the last terms of a series, the members of which hav appeared one after another. Thus, far from affirming the account in Genesis, the results of modern science, so far as they go, are in principle, as in detail, hopelessly discordant with it.

Yet, if the pretensions to infallibility thus set up, not by the ancient Hebrew writings themselvs, but by the ecclesiastical champions and friends from whom they may well pray to be delivered, thus shatter themselvs against the rock of natural knowledge, in respect of the two most important of all events, the origin of things and the palingenesis of terrestrial life, what historical credit dare any serious thinker attach to the narrativs of the fabrication of Eve, of the fall, of the commerce between the Bene Elohim and the daughters of men, which lie between the creational and the diluvial legends? And, if these are to lose all historical worth, what becomes of the infallibility of those who, according to the later scriptures, hav accepted them, argued from them, and staked far-reaching dogmatic conclusions upon their historical accuracy?

It is the merest ostrich policy for contemporary ecclesiasticism to try to hide its Hexateuchal head—in the hope that the inseparable connection of its body with pre-Abrahamic legends may be overlooked. The question will still be asked, If the first nine chapters of the Pentateuch are unhistorical, how is the historical accuracy of the remainder to be guaranteed? What more intrinsic claim has the story of the Exodus, than that of the deluge, to belief? If God did not walk in the garden of Eden, how can we be assured that he spoke from Sinai?

In some other of the following essays (IX, X, XI, XII, XIV, XV) I hav endeavored to show that sober and well-founded physical and literary criticism plays no less havoc with the doctrin that the canonical scriptures of the New Testament "declare incontrovertibly the actual historical truth in all records." We are told that the gospels contain a true revelation of the spiritual world—a proposition which, in one sense of the word "spiritual," I should not think it necessary to dispute. But, when it is taken to signify that everything we are told about the world of spirits in these books is infallibly true; that we are bound to accept the demonology which constitutes an inseparable part of their teaching; and to profess belief in a supernaturalism as gross as that of any primitiv people—it is at any rate permissible to ask why? Science may be unable to define the limits of possibility, but it cannot escape from the moral obligation to weigh the evidence in favor of any alleged wonderful occurrence; and I hav endeavored to show that the evidence for the Gadarene miracle is altogether worthless. We hav simply three, partially discrepant, versions of a story, about the primitiv form, the origin, and the authority for which we know absolutely nothing. But the evidence in favor of the Gadarene miracle is as good as that for any other.

Elsewhere I hav pointed out that it is utterly beside the mark to declaim against these conclusions on the ground of their asserted tendency to deprive mankind of the consolations of the Christian faith, and to destroy the foundations of morality; still less to brand them with the question-begging, vituperativ appellation of "Infidelity." The point is not whether they are wicked; but whether, from the point of view of scientific method, they are irrefragably true. If they are, they will be accepted in time, whether they are wicked or not wicked. Nature, so far as we hav been able to attain any insight into her ways, recks little about consolation, and makes for righteousness by very roundabout paths. And, at any rate, whatever may be possible for other people, it is becoming less and less possible for the man who puts his faith in scientific methods of ascertaining truth, and is accustomed to hav that faith justified by daily experience, to be consciously false to his principle in any matter. But the number of such men, driven into the use of scientific methods of inquiry and taught to trust them, by their education, their daily professional and business needs, is increasing and will continually increase. The phraseology of supernaturalism may remain on men's lips, but in practice they are naturalists. The magistrate who listens with devout attention to the precept, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv," on Sunday, on Monday dismisses, as intrinsically absurd, a charge of bewitching a cow brought against some old woman; the superintendent of a lunatic asylum who substituted exorcism for rational modes of treatment would hav but a short tenure of office; even parish clerks doubt the utility of prayers for rain, so long as the wind is in the east; and an outbreak of pestilence sends men not to the churches, but to the drains. In spite of prayers for the success of our arms and Te Deums for victory, our real faith is in big battalions and keeping our powder dry; in knowledge of the science of warfare; in energy, courage, and disciplin. In these, as in all other practical affairs, we act on the aphorism "Laborare est orare" (To labor is to pray); we admit that intelligent work is the only acceptable worship; and that, whether there be a supernature or not, our business is with nature.

T. H. HUXLEY.

Was Paine a Preacher?

Was Thomas Paine in his youth a preacher? Mr. Conway, in his "Life of Paine," says:

> There is a tradition at Sandwich that he collected a congregation in his room in the market-place, and preached to them "as an Independent or a Methodist."

The only authority for the "tradition" is a lying government clerk named George Chambers, who under the assumed name of "Francis Oldys, A. M. of the University of Pennsylvania," wrote the "Life of Thomas Paine" (sic) with a review of his writings, particularly of "Rights of Man." This false and libelous biography was published in 1792, in London, and the author was paid £500 for his wicked work. Mr. Conway has repeated the words of Oldys almost verbatim. Oldys meant to disparage Paine by making him a preacher. Mr. Conway, who evoluted out of Methodism and became a Unitarian clergyman, seems glad to find a prototype in Thomas Paine and accepts the allegation of Oldys with gusto.

According to Oldys, as repeated by Mr. Conway, Paine applied in 1767 to Mr. Noble, principal of the academy in which Paine had been employed as usher, for a certificate of qualifications as a candidate for ordination by the bishop of London, but was told that being only an English scholar, he could not be recommended. Mr. Conway adds:

> Oldys says that Paine without regular orders preached in Moorfields and elsewhere in England, "as he was urged by his necessities or directed by his spirit." Although Paine's friendly biographers hav omitted this preaching episode, it is too creditable to Paine's standing with the teacher with whom he had served a year [Mr. Noble, at Goodman Fields, in 1766], for Oldys to hav invented it. It is droll to think that the Church of England should ever hav had an offer of Thomas Paine's services. The Quakerism in which he had been nurtured had never been formally adopted by him, and it offered no opportunities for the impulse to preach which seems to mark a phase in the life of every activ English brain.

Mr. Conway may believe that Paine at twenty-two years of age preached at Sandwich, and eight years later "in Moorfields and in various populous places in England," as Oldys declares, but I do not, for the following reasons:

Why hav all the later biographers of Paine omitted to mention this preaching episode? Oldys was the first to tell the story, and one hundred years later Mr. Conway repeats it, unsupported by further evidence save the following flimsy fragment quoted from Notes and Queries, Dec. 29, 1866, purporting to come from one Weedon of Glynde:

> Old John Berry, the late Colonel Hays's servaut, told me he knew Paine very well when he was at Dover—had heard him preach there—thought him a staymaker by trade.

Paine worked as a staymaker at Dover nearly a year, whence he removed to Sandwich and there set up as a master staymaker. At Sandwich (not at Dover) Oldys says "it is certain that he practiced other arts," and he adds: "There is a tradition that in his lodgings he collected a congregation, to whom he preached as an Independent or Methodist."

What kind of theology could Paine hav preached? He tells us in his "Age of Reason," that at the age of seven or eight years he rejected the doctrin of the atonement, "making God almighty act like a passionate man that killed his son when he could not revenge himself in any other way." And in 1776 when John Adams rallied him upon his grave argument in "Common Sense" to prove from the Old Testament that monarchy was unlawful in the sight of God, Paine replied: "The Old Testament! I do not believe in the Old Testament."

Paine was doubtless baptized and confirmed in the Church of England. He could therefore consistently call himself a Christian. But when at eight years of age he rejected the doctrin of the atonement he probably became a Deist and so remained during all his life. His Deism, it is true, did not differ from Theodore Parker's Theism; but would Deistical preaching by a youth of twenty-two hav been tolerated in England one hundred and thirty-three years ago?

Thomas Rickman was a most devoted friend of Paine. He knew him at Lewes from 1768 to 1774; he set some of Paine's songs to music; he named his first-born son Thomas Paine; he was a bookseller in London in 1792, and Paine abode at his house; in 1811 he had written a "Life of Paine," which he published in 1819; in it nothing is said about Paine's preaching at Sandwich or anywhere else. Furthermore Rickman says that Paine "was no public speaker."

Laboring to prove that Paine was a devout Christian Mr. Conway again says:

What he used to preach at Dover and Sandwich cannot now be known. His ignorance of Greek and Latin, the scholastic "humanities," had prevented his becoming a clergyman, and introduced him to humanities of another kind. His mission was then among the poor and ignorant. Sixteen years later he is in Philadelphia attending the English church in which he had been confirmed. There were many Deists in that church whose laws then as now were sufficiently liberal to include them.

Mr. Conway has drawn on his imagination for Paine's attending the English church in Philadelphia. The churchmen of that city were ranker tories than the Quakers to whom an unsigned epistle was addressed by the author of "Common Sense." The Rev. Dr. William Smith, president of the University of Pennsylvania, a churchman and a Scotch tory, undertook to answer "Common Sense," signing himself "Cato." Paine replied, signing himself "Forester." "Cato," having a bad case and being no match for his adversary, resorted to personal abuse. The evoluted Quaker-churchman was not at a loss how to handle such an antagonist. He said:

Remember, thou hast thrown me the glove, Cato, and either thee or I must tire. I fear not the field of fair debate, but thou hast stepped aside and made it personal. Thou hast tauntingly called me by name, and if I cease to hunt thee from every lane and lurking hole of mischief, and bring thee not a trembling culprit before the public bar, then brand me with reproach by naming me in the list of your confederates.

Frequent instances of this style of invectiv are found in the Letters of Junius. Addressing Lord Mansfield, he said:

At the intercession of three of your countrymen, you hav bailed a man, who, I presume, is also a Scotchman, and whom the Lord Mayor of London had refused to bail. . . . I affirm in contradiction to YOU, LORD CHIEF JUSTICE MANSFIELD, that, by the laws of England he was not bailable. If ever Mr. Eyre should be brought to trial, we shall hear what You hav to say for Yourself; and I pledge myself, before God and my country, in proper time and place, to make good my charge against you.

To David Garrick, only a few days later, Junius addressed, through his publisher, Woodfall, this private note:

I am very exactly informed of your impertinent inquiries, and of the information you so busily sent to Richmond, and with what triumph and exultation it was received. I knew every particular of it the next day. Now mark me, vagabond. Keep to your pantomimes, or be assured you shall hear of it. Meddle no more, thou busy informer. It is in my power to make you curse the hour in which you dared to interfere with Junius.

Garrick having been told in confidence by Woodfall that Junius would write no more, straightway sent the information to the king at Richmond; and this caused Junius to break his resolution.

Mr. Eyre, on the day preceding Junius's challenge to Lord Mansfield, surrendered himself at the Old Bailey, pleaded guilty of stealing (he could not do otherwise, having been detected in the act, with the goods upon him), and was sentenced to be transported. He was an Englishman, related by marriage to Scotchmen, and was bailed by three Scotchmen.

The controversy between "Cato" and "Forester" resulted in ousting President Smith from the university and driving him from Philadelphia. Four years later that same university conferred on Thomas Paine the degree of master of arts.

It is no disgrace to hav been a youthful preacher, but the alleged preaching of Thomas Paine seems to me unsupported by evidence and incompatible with the known facts of his life. "Forester" in 1776 professed to be a member of the Church of England, and Junius in 1771 claimed to be "a Christian upon the most sincere conviction—a true and hearty Christian, in substance, not in ceremony;" but he was careful to add that he could not agree with the "reverend lords, the bishops, or with the head of the church [George III.], that prayers are morality, or that kneeling is religion."

Many years ago Mr. Conway stepped down from the pulpit; he has since declared that Christianity is down. I do not believe it is, and I discredit the tradition that Thomas Paine was ever a preacher.

W. H. BURR.

The Freethought Federation of America.

The bitterness of the countless conflicting sects in the United States that are contending for preference and power, the ill will, the discord and enmity of pious Christians toward each other, are not only a great calamity to themselvs but also to the community at large, who are compelled to be passiv onlookers to their frequent squabbles and imbroglios. In the coming political struggle the church, as usual, has declared itself on the side of the money power—the power which organized it and which supports it for its own protection. The masses are but as chessmen in the hands of these powers, who forever play a winning game into each other's hands. In the midst of this it is time for Freethought to assert itself, for Freethought is the soul's life-blood and the very pulse-beat of our civilization. To restrict reason and to fetter thought is to wage war with nature and to oppose the best interests of the human race. Thought must be free; it must never be confined within a fashionable cage, for to do so would be to eclipse the light that illuminates our social life.

On Sunday, the 16th inst., I lectured once more in the orthodox, priest-ridden, and church-cursed city of Pittsburgh. Here it is a crime to sell a glass of milk to a thirsty traveler on the so-called Sabbath day. Here, instead of having Sunday bright, open, and free, it is a day of pious gloom and oppression, controled by priestly monopoly for the sole purpose of self-aggrandizement. Every day do I realize more and more the absolute necessity for political action upon the part of Freethinkers; every day do I realize that the Federation was a pressing requirement and, as many of our friends hav declared, "supplies a long-felt want." I was pleased indeed to meet our gallant little band of Freethought heroes in Pittsburgh once more. We hav some old Freethought veterans in this city, many of whom hav promised me their individual support in the work we hav undertaken. I was greeted by a good audience, and I was pleased to see many new faces among them—a good sign of progress. Several of the audience took blanks for petitioning Congress to open the World's Fair Sunday, thereby aiding us all they can in that direction.

I would add right here that I hav a few thousand blank petitions on hand at this time which may be had upon application to me. No answers hav yet been received by us from the other political candidates for the presidency, consequently nothing can be said concerning them. For fear they should not hav received my letters, I will address them once more upon the subject; and should they reply their letters will be published at once, so that Freethinkers may judge in what direction to use the suffrage.

The Federation is still rushing forward. It has found universal favor in the eyes of the great mass of Freethinkers. The mass of correspondence that I hav received during the past two weeks has been almost overwhelming. Every day a long list of names are sent and added to our roll of membership. The financial support—which we must hav, if we are to accomplish anything—has been very satisfactory, and a statement of our standing in that direction will be published in my next report. As an illustration of the truth of these statements I append the following letter from an enthusiastic friend in the far Western state of California:

PERKINS, CAL., Oct. 7, 1892.

MR. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Dear Sir: Please set my name down a member of the Freethought Federation of America. I hav sent $4 to pay G. L. Robertson, treasurer. Yours truly, OWEN THOMAS DAVIS.

Another friend, from the Puritanical state of Pennsylvania, writes as follows:

MCKEESPORT, PA., Oct. 11, 1892.

J. R. CHARLESWORTH: Put my name upon the list of membership without fail. The Freethinkers of this country should not let this grand opportunity go by default. I say grand because it is one of the greatest, and properly engineered will accomplish more good for Liberalism than any other organization in existence. Also $1 as a mite for expenses. Yours respectfully,

JAMES FULTON.

Texas also comes to the front, and when it finds our liberties in danger is not found wanting in any effort to defend them, as may be instanced by the following:

MARSHALL, TEX., Oct. 19, 1892.

MR. J. R. CHARLESWORTH, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find $1 toward defraying expense in the Federation. You may enroll me as a member. Long liv the Freethought Federation. I am, respectfully yours,

M. H. GOLDOWSKY.

N. Chaddock, of Cuero, Tex., writes me an encouraging letter upon the Federation, inclosing a copy of a little leaflet which he has named the Gleaner, and with which he is doing a grand work. He is an aged Freethinker, over eighty-three years, and is in possession of a toy printing-press. He picks out little gleanings from Freethought papers, and interspersing scriptural texts and mottoes, he distributes them among his neighbors. One copy is devoted to the interest of the Federation, and he is doing his utmost to push our cause along in his district. This kind of help is valuable to us indeed, and will accomplish a good work. Would that every Freethinker who had such opportunities would go and do likewise.

Charles F. Blackburn, of Seattle, Wash., writes, in response to my request, that he will be pleased to arrange for a course of lectures in that city, and assures me that we can rely upon his help in behalf of the Federation.

And thus the good work goes on. The bugle-call to freedom has been sounded, and our soldiers are ready to fall in line. Liberty has been threatened by the "whited sepulchers" of the church, and on every hand comes the assurance of assistance to fight in its defense. Faith refuses to set the judgment and imagination of man free, hence we must force it. No compromise can be effected between faith and reason. We must bring out the human intellect from among the dry bones of the past, into the broad, open, free, and glorious sunlight of nature and truth.

We hav still a slight deficit in our treasury and once more I appeal to our friends to send us what financial help they can. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH,

Sec. Freethought Federation of America.

Liberals, Vote Together.

I hav just read S. P. Putnam's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 17th on "Liberal Political Organization." It is a subject which I hav turned over in my mind many times within the last ten years. I hav often regretted that men who are Liberal in regard to religion are as clannish and il-Liberal in regard to politics as they can possibly be. If such Liberals would investigate politics as they investigate religion, Liberals could accomplish much without forming a party. Unfortunately those who are leaders in antireligious movements are mere sheep politically, and follow a leader without knowing why.

I hav no doubt that the newly organized Freethought Federation will do some good, but I think more good could be accomplished through the efforts of Liberal papers. But few Liberals can attend the meetings of a Freethought Federation, while all can read Freethought papers; and I think if pains were taken to dispel the superstitious fears which hover around political parties, much could be accomplished, and Liberals could make themselvs felt in politics as a class. It would be useless to put candidates of our own in the field; but if we would stick together we could often carry the balance of power, and candidates would need our votes and yield to our demands in order to obtain them.

I would advise, therefore, that every Liberal vote for such candidates only as are known to be Liberal in their views irrespectiv of party. I am no party man, and think as little of joining a party as I should of joining a church, but I hav always tried to learn the antecedents of the candidates of all parties and then I hav voted for those I considered the best.

Next election will be a good time to show our preference. The government is now in the hands of a pack of pious hypocrits, who, if they are allowed to retain the government another four years, will make strenuous efforts to oblige us to go to church and Sunday-school. It is high time that their career was cut off. The pious Wanamaker, whose corruption fund elected Harrison, has used his best endeavors to put an end to Liberal literature. Like most pious people, he can swallow a camel and choke at a gnat. He admits the Bible in the mails, but would, if he could, exclude everything that contradicts that obscene book. Look at our hypocritical Senate. While weak-minded, but oft well-meaning, people spend their time in church on Sundays, most of our Senators lie in bed to sleep off a drunk or debauch; but when a handful of Christians petition to close the World's Fair on Sundays those hypocrits accommodate them because the church is organized and the rascals want their votes. I wrote to our Congressman and likewise to our Senator in regard to the proposed outrage of closing the World's Fair on Sundays. Our Congressman, Thomas J. Geary, answered my letter like a gentleman; and I would advise all Liberals living in my district (the first Congressional district of California) to vote for Thomas J. Geary. Mr. Felton, our Senator, wrote in a different strain. He thought the World's Fair ought to be closed on Sundays to please the Christians who had petitioned to that effect. He must hav been informed at that time that many of those petitions were mere frauds, which contained many names but very few signatures; and since less than one-third of the population of the United States are Christians, and perhaps not more than half of these want the World's Fair closed on Sundays, it must hav occurred to these worthy Senators, who are perhaps better known on account of drunkenness than sense, that it would be an outrage on the people at large to close the World's Fair on Sundays for the sake of pleasing a handful of Christians, and that to meddle with religion in any way is out of their jurisdiction. But, as I hav said before, that honorable (?) body knew that the Christians are organized, and although they belong to different political parties, when the church has anything at stake they vote in a body.

If Liberals ever want to accomplish anything politically they should do like Christian folks; they must forego party affiliations when their real interests are at stake; they must vote for candidates who favor their interests, and sit down on those who favor the church. Liberals are numerous enough to accomplish something if they will only unite on things that concern them. It is impossible that people who do their own thinking can all think alike. As no two persons liv in the same circumstances; hav the same constitutions physically and mentally; hav the same amount of education and the same facts to reason from, so no two persons can think alike. While all may be sincere, their opinions must necessarily vary greatly; but on one thing we can all agree—we all know that the church is our common enemy, and that to obtain our rights we must strangle that hydra-headed monster.

Applying this to our present situation, we all know that our present administration favors the church, we likewise know that no favors were shown the church under Cleveland's administration. Let us be consistent then; let us prefer principle to party affiliations; let us unite on one point and vote for Cleveland. ROBERT GUNTHER.

Biographies of Foreign Freethinkers.

ERNESTE RENAN.

Joseph Erneste Renan, the philosopher, the poet, the historian, the Freethinker, of world-wide reputation, is dead. He died at Paris, Oct. 2, 1892, of congestion of the lungs, complicated with valvular disease of the heart.

Renan was born at Treguir, Cotes-du-Nord, Brittany, France, on Feb. 27, 1823. Treguir is a small, sleepy place, the inhabitants of which know but little of the outside world and care less; their whole interest centers in the old minster and the welfare of the good-natured, ignorant, and pious fathers attached to same. The shadow of the church darkens the whole village. A priest is a god in disguise. Hence no wonder that the parents of Renan destined him to become a priest. The "good fathers," as Renan calls them in the autiobiography of his youth, taught him all he knew, and apart from Latin and lives of saints this knowledge was but scant. Finding they could teach him no more, they sent him to Paris, where, after the close of his classical studies, he was placed in the seminary of St. Sulpice to complete his theological course. Here he showed a remarkable aptitude in the study of philosophy, and of Latin, Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic languages. But alas for the church, the keen intellect and moral courage were too strong to be fastened down by the chains of dogmatism and superstition, and on the eve of his consecration he abandoned the church forever.

In 1847 he won the Volney medal for a work upon the Semitic languages. In 1851 he was attached to the department of manuscript in the National Library, and five years later was elected a member of the Academie des Inscriptions in the place of M. Augustin Thierry. In 1860 he went on a mission to Syria, and three years later published his "Life of Jesus." This work excited the vehement antagonism of the French clergy, which brought about his dismissal from the professorship of Hebrew, to which he had been appointed in 1862. The minister of public instruction endeavored to atone for this dismissal by giving Renan an office in the Imperial Library; Renan, however, refused to accept the appointment.

M. Renan became a member of the French Academy on June 13, 1878. In 1880 he delivered in London a series of lectures on "The Influence of the Institutions, Thought, and Culture of Rome on Christianity and the Development of the Catholic Church." During this visit he also delivered at the Royal Institution a lecture on Marcus Aurelius.

Among his voluminous writings we will mention but a few besides those above named and such only as may be of interest to others than the scholar: "Studies in Religious History," "Spinoza, "Philosophical Dialogs and Fragments." The "History of Christianity" is too voluminous—seven volumes—and is besides inaccurate, a fault which is found in all of his Antichristian writings. Renan was too much of a poet. He allowed his imagination to get the best of him. Take his "Life of Jesus"—it is but an exquisit poem, with Christ, a perfect man, as hero. On the life of Jesus Renan is as much of an authority as Milton on heaven, or Dante on hell. He evidently saw the truth, but recollections from youth, the teachings of childhood, the fear of causing too intense pain to his readers, maybe even a faint belief in Christ—who can tell?—made him shrink back from telling the whole truth. There is, outside of the Bible, no credible evidence that Jesus ever lived; he is no more of a historical character than is Buddha or Chrishna. Renan was a man of seeming contradictions. You think you hav his opinion and he flies away. You read one page of his works, he is a Deist; on another, a skeptic; on again another, a true Freethinker. As a man Renan is a Deist, as a historian a skeptic, as a philosopher a Freethinker. Renan's "Life of Jesus" is a historical romance, Strauss's "Life of Jesus" a history.

A portrait of Renan in our possession shows him to be a man of rotund form, not unlike a well-kept Catholic priest. His lips are sensual, and on them plays a satirical smile, cutting yet amiable.

On October 7th he was buried from the College de France. The services were secular, and in the great hall of the university the minister of state, the municipal body of Paris, scientists and students, paid the last homage to a man whom the world long ago had recognized as a prince of thought and learning. A military guard of honor accompanied the remains of the illustrious Freethinker through the crowd-lined streets to the cemetery, and soon the earth covered the greatest Frenchman that our century has produced. GUSTAVE NELSON.

At a Radical Reception.

Home again, and as is my wont, I seat myself to talk awhile with the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER! They are my friends—friends whom I love most, and with whom I like most to be in correspondence. Three months ago I left home, earlier than otherwise I would hav done, to be present on the eighty-fifth birthday of my long-time friend, Mrs. Lucy M. Tilton, a genuin reformer of the most pronounced type. Her daughters Flora and Josephine (doubly reformers) wrote me that they had some fifty persons on their list of invitations to greet their mother with good wishes for the future of her already advanced age, and earnest hopes for another decade of useful life. Being one of that number, I found myself at their hospitable and beautiful home in dear old Boston, where I am always welcomed by these excellent and heroic women, as though I were indeed their mother. On the day of the reception I met reformers of every shade of thinking, all agreeing in this sentiment: "The government in spite of the Constitution is run on purely Christian wheels, and none other than a Christian need apply, be his accomplishments ever so good." Several of these persons had tasted the sweets of prison fare for conscience's sake. Alas! I often ask myself if I hav not been remiss in the world's work that as yet I hav never been imprisoned, while people that are better than I am are still shut up as criminals, whose whole lives hav been work for the good of suffering humanity. I met daughters of our lamented friend, dear Elizur Wright; some of the grandchildren of Richard Hildreth, of antislavery renown, and men known as labor reformers, some Anarchists, Nationalists, and Socialists—all earnest thinkers and doers, as they understand duty. Mr. Putnam was not early enough for the birthday, but when he came he gave us all new hopes by his marvelous courage and enthusiasm.

Voltairine de Cleyre spoke well in the hall dedicated to freedom of thought and repeated her "Bastard Born" as none but an artist could. I went to Wellesley to the home of the late William Denton; never hav I seen a more beautiful home. Mrs. Denton is a woman worthy to bear the name; and four sons all thoroughly Antichristian; their work (all naturalists) is very fine indeed. I am glad to know this family and to hold them as among my dearest friends.

I wish I could giv your readers who hav never seen New England in its autumnal beauty an idea of it. The Berkshire hills hav put on the most gorgeous colors—every shade of green, and then the orange and the reds seem to vie with each other in brilliancy and glory.

If only the Indian summer of human life were so beautiful we would long to reach it. With love to all who bear me in remembrance, I am, dear TRUTH SEEKER, yours to help as far as able,

Syracuse, N. Y., Oct., 292. LUCY N. COLMAN.

The Trinity Explained.

In the Presbyterian creed we read: "There are three persons in the godhead, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; and these three are one God, the same in substance, equal in power and in glory."

A few days ago I called to see an old friend who used to be deacon in the church with which I was identified for sixteen years. "How is it," said he, "that you hav drifted away from the faith of our fathers and from the creed of the church, and renounced everything that is sacred? Why, I hear that you don't believe in the trinity of the godhead any more. I am surprised that a man of your ability would admit that he did not believe such a grand truth!" "You should not blame me for not believing what I cannot understand," I said. "I was never able to understand how three persons could make one God." "Why, that is very easy. A child can understand that," said he. "You see, it is like this. There is the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Can't you understand that?" said he. "They are one, having one and the same head. It is as easy as the multiplication table. Three times one are three. Three Gods with one head make the Holy Trinity." "Then if I understand your interpretation correctly," I said, "the mystery is like this——" "There is no mystery about it any more than there is about the fact that three times one is three," he interjected. "Can't you understand that three times one is three?" "Yes, I understand that to be a scientific and demonstrable proposition. But I cannot understand how three times three make one." "Can't you understand that one time one will make one?" "Yes," I replied. "Then can't you see that three times one will make one? One time three is three, and three times one is three. Three bodies and one head; that is the glorious trinity," said he. "Then if I understand you correctly it is like this: three times one is three, and three times three is one." "That is it exactly," he interjected. "Well, that does not coincide with the cardinal principles of science," I said. "Then science is wrong," he retorted. "The holy Bible is true and right. If science don't agree with the Bible it should be corrected. Science must be made to agree with the Bible. We can't make the Bible agree with science," said he. "The efforts of great men to make the Bible and science agree hav made a world of trouble. It can't be done until they begin right, and correct the errors in science." I said, "Let us waive further investigation, and talk about turkeys, or anything that we can understand." SERENO E. TODD.

Not Obliged to Believe Everything.

From the Pall Mall Gazette.

The dean of Norwich in a recent speech told this story to illustrate the new criticism as it appears among the middle classes. A worthy timber merchant announced that he was relieved to find that he need not believe literally the various passages in the Bible which he had always proved to be impossible. Being pressed to name one of these passages, he mentioned the ark. It was, he understood, 450 feet long, 70 feet broad, and 45 feet high, and was filled with live animals. He was convinced, therefore, that the Israelites could not hav carried it about with them for forty years!

Letters of Friends.

Wants Ingersoll for the People's Party.

CROOKSTON, MINN., Oct. 12, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: You hav advertised for names and addresses in order to send out sample copies. I hav been trying for weeks to get time enough to work out a list for you, but work is so rushing that so far I hav failed. In two or three weeks from now the busy time will be mostly over, and then I will send you hundreds of names, as I hav got plenty of them.

With your permission, Mr. Editor, I will at this time not only thank Mr. T. Strickland Fisk for his open letter to R. G. Ingersoll in the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I will join with the writer in asking the foremost Infidel in our land to make a plea for what he terms "the sacred principles set forth in that second Declaration of Independence, called the Omaha platform." And when I in this way subscribe to the open letter of Mr. T. Strickland Fisk and beg of our beloved Liberal friend R. G. Ingersoll to make a plea for those principles and for our respected leaders, James B. Weaver and James G. Field, I am safe in saying that I voice the sentiment of all Liberals up here in this great Northwest. The eloquent letter of Mr. Fisk will be echoed back from the bottom of the very heart of every Liberal in this mortgage-ridden country, and with irresistible force it will sound: Make a plea, Mr. Ingersoll!

Yours for freedom and right,
OLE E. HAGAN.

Thinks Christians Sharper Financiers.

CORNWALL, IDA., Sept. 19, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I enjoy reading THE TRUTH SEEKER better than any other paper I take, more especially the "Letters from Friends," so I will undertake to write a few lines for that part. The reason I hav not written before is because I am too busy trying to pav for my home. I hope some day to aid financially to the Freethought cause. I believe one reason Freethinkers do not organize and battle for the right more is because they lack the means. I am inclined to think Christians are the best financiers—at least, when they are combined. See how much they make from their festivals, concerts, etc. And on the Fourth of July they beg the best location and sell ice cream, lemonade, etc., for the benefit of some church.

I hav two TRUTH SEEKER pictures pasted on cloth and tacked on trees, one entitled "The Real Rock of Ages," the other "A Man Who Would Make It Hot for the Author of the Above Text." Lots of people stop to look at them. Heretofore they hav been taken down by Christians, or perhaps by Infidels who fancied them.

At this coming election I mean to ascertain who among our nominees are Secular and vote for them regardless of party. I hav already found Mr. W. J. McConnell, nominee for governor, to be a true Secularist.

Will you please answer these questions: Has Robert Dale Owen a son who is a preacher in the Christian church? Has Mr. R. G. Ingersoll a son, and how old is he? A. L. MCFARLANE.

[We do not know of any son of Robert Dale Owen who is a preacher. If any reader does, we shall be pleased to print the fact. Colonel Ingersoll has never had a son.—ED. T. S.]

Nominate Ingersoll.

VINELAND, N. J., Oct. 11, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Liberals, awake, arise, work! Be in earnest! If possible, save your country from utter wreck and ruin! The rascals in Congress who toady to the rotten church for office hav voted to giv two and a half million dollars to the Chicago Fair, provided it close on Sunday. The government has no legal right to giv one farthing of the people's money for such a purpose, whether it is closed or open on Sunday, and a stop should be put to it at once before the money leaves the treasury. By making that gift Congress united our glorious secular government with the rotten church, and put the church over the government, and every honest paper in the nation should protest against it and stop the gift. Let all Liberal papers unite and nominate Col. R. G. Ingersoll for president, and T. W. Braidwood, of Vineland, N. J., for vice-president. All Liberals could vote for them, because they are two honest men. The millions of Spiritualists would vote for them, or the most of them. And there are thousands of churchmen who, though they may not agree with them in religious matters, would vote for them because they know they are honest. Liberals hav never shown their strength, and if they will nominate these men they will be astonished at the results. And if they should fail to elect them, they will show their strength, call attention to their papers, and prepare the way for something better at the future election. Now act in earnest and save your nation.

J. HACKER.

P.S.—Let all Liberal papers publish this at once. J. H.

Methodists Helping Us Against Catholics.

ST. LOUIS, MO., Oct. 13, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find a clipping from yesterday's St. Louis Globe-Democrat. It seems that the Methodists are awakening to the fact that it is their duty as American citizens to take a decided stand in favor of free schools against the aggression of the Romish church.

Respectfully, T. H. GERDES.

CATHOLICISM DENOUNCED.

Sterling, Ill., Oct. 11, 1892.—Roman Catholicism, in connection with the system of public schools, received a vigorous scoring at the hands of the Methodist ministers in session here at the Rock river conference, which includes Chicago. The subject came up in the form of a report from the committee on education, which was adopted as follows:

"The American public schools are in danger. The danger is occasioned by the very thing that Washington said would not be tolerated—foreign interference. Against this interference we emphatically protest. Firmly believing that the pope and the bishops are criminals against some of the best things in human life, we stoutly affirm that the Roman policy in America should be put in quarantine. Compulsory education is a civil necessity in this country. We must protect ourselvs from the tide of ignorance and prejudice rolling in upon us from Roman Catholic Europe or perish in the threatened devastation. Wherever the Latin church flourishes her people are criminally kept in ignorance, and the state is wickedly denied its independence. She says:

"'If the pope demands it, the authority of the state must be braved, human affections must be disregarded, life must be sacrificed.'

"Therefore, reaffirming our thorough confidence in the public school system,

"Resolved, That we as a church stand opposed to any encroachment from any quarter that would lessen the influence or diminish the vigor of this most essential factor in our national well-being."

A Heartfelt Utterance.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Oct. 11, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I take the liberty to send you these lines, which I hope you will kindly insert among the columns of your valuable paper, omitting anything you may not approve of. I am not a bigot, but am liberal in my views, and try to do what I can for the cause of right; but, with few exceptions, am met with defeat. Those who agree with me in my views are afraid to express themselvs openly, being held in fear by the church and loss of business or position. I hav lost employment by not joining the church. I hav lost friends by not joining the church. Friendship, I believe, is confidence extended from one to another. At this period, it is a mockery. The outside appearance belies the innermost thought, which is generally avarice, deceit, and selfishness. Good sense is the best friend a man can hav in an emergency.

I always try to do the best I can and urge others to do the same, but with little success. I hav relativs who are jealous of me, but who are so-called Christians, and who should not sin, according to the rules of the church and the laws of their God. When I try to do anything for the cause of right, I am lied about and trampled upon, but to my face they are full of sanctimonious friendship.

At this period of the century, corruption before purity is the leading feature, with but few exceptions. I think if there could be clubs established in cities and country towns with men of education and intellect at their head, it would do much toward advancing Liberalism and exterminating popery and hypocritical Christianity.

I hav a relation who is a Freethinker, and who is a credit to the community in which he livs. He is a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and has been for many years, and will be until death, I hope. Occasionally I receive copies of it from him. At present it is impossible for me to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER annually; but I will do so at the first opportunity.

If you will inform me whether you approve of my way of thinking or not, I will be grateful to you for the same.

FRANCIS LINCOLN PHILLIPS.

Science.

VERA CRUZ, IND., Oct. 7, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Nature delights in astonishing her wondering devotees.

In science is a genuin example of reciprocity. No truer friend has ever stood by the philosopher, the chemist, the botanist, the physiologist, the geologist; and even the mathematician delights to drink at her deep, at her unerring fountain.

He who is master of a science will find and know that in its elementary details there is rich food for the mind of youth, for its normal growth, for its safeguard against vice, and especially for its healthy, holy growth and understanding of truth as it exists.

There is a vast difference between the minds developed by the unfolding of nature's laws and those developed, or rather dwarfed, by fable and fiction. The earth is no longer flat. Grass no longer grows without a gleam of sunshine, nor do the vines blossom before the sun was "made." The rains do not issue from "the windows of heaven."

Yes, the beautiful and wonderful truths revealed by nature's unerring laws are a sublime study, and mankind is endowed with reason to understand them.

We are led to cry out in earnest, O that men might cease to develop in the minds of youth a thirst for fiction! Truth is wonderful, even more so than fiction!

If the precious hours of youth are occupied with learning thoughts of the real things around us, their causes and effects, we are able not only to discover the great errors of former times but will be able to avoid many disasters, diseases, and deaths. He will hav a fairer, better understanding of the divine. The eruption of Vesuvius and the fate of Pompeii are no longer fire rained from heaven by the vengeance of God, as at Sodom and Gomorrah, but are causes in nature which the intelligent can understand. The pestilential ravages of King David's time are no longer a destruction of the innocent masses by the hand of offended deity to punish the pride of the king; but are causes in nature which may be not only understood but successfully battled against. Thus we may learn to cease to accuse deity of producing fire, famin, pestilence, floods, disease, and destruction; and if we choose to impersonate the infinit power we will ascribe attributes of honor instead of dishonor.

Friends of truth! honest truth seekers! everywhere the wide world over, I earnestly admonish you to help us redeem the human family from the errors under the name of religion which degrade us.

Those who teach that "man, the crown of God's noblest work," was created perfect, and still declare that a large portion of mankind is destined to be an everlasting failure, are neither consistent, nor respectful to their all-wise creator. They get their opinion from ancient tyrants. O that they may study the truths as revealed by nature and cease to form their opinion of man's great destiny from ancient fables.

These fabulous errors hav even defiled our text-books, from Webster's Unabridged to the first primer in some schools. A man who can hold a high professorship in our schools must be able and willing to make a long prayer, closing with atoning merits of the "blood of Jesus Christ."

No wonder it became proverbial that "Where Nature has one secret revealed, she has a thousand concealed."

Whatever permanent, abiding, useful knowledge we may be able to disseminate will bear the test of the unalterable laws of nature. Not so in theology. They had to bring meat, it was said, "that it might be burnt to go up into the nostrils of the Lord to appease his wrath." Now they only hav to bring the almighty dollar that the preacher may get a fat living without work. Thus we might continue to illustrate the changes in theology. Not so in Science! J. J. M. MILLER.

An Evening Among the Heathen Raging Furiously.

NEW YORK, Oct. 3, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: All the deluded fools are not dead yet.

A friend last Sunday evening invited me to visit the Salvation Army (another fool) and see a performance of its members. On arriving at the church door we found one of the sisters holding out a basket for admittance fee. On taking our seats, soon the platform was occupied by about twenty half-grown boys and girls, with a few older women. The leader was à la Talmage—full of "gab," as that mountebank is. The performance commenced with a circle of girls with hands joined in one another. One of the sisters led in prayer, then there were singing and exhortation, men and women clapping their hands and shouting Amen, Glory to God, Hallelujah, etc. It put me in mind of when, sixty years ago, the writer attended the Methodist meetings held in the old Forsyth street church in New York city. At the latter part of the meeting the leader appealed to the audience for funds. She had to pay $225 a month for the room, and it was difficult to raise the amount. She said: "I don't expect to be paid here. My reward is there"—pointing up with her finger, with an extended arm, making an attitude on one toe. One of the sisters went round through the audience to gather up the pennies. One of the young men exhorted, with "the serpent in the wilderness" and "what God and Moses did to bring the children of Israel to the promised land of milk and honey"—saying that Jesus was the serpent and he would bring them all to the promised land. It was evident the young fellow was ignorant of the truths in the "Age of Reason," for he wandered over the whole ground without an idea of what he was saying.

It is astonishing what ignorance, superstition, and bigotry are manifested with the majority of people, having the mind filled with the thoughts of other men. How can it be otherwise when they hav been taught to believe a fable? Let them read the "Age of Reason" without prejudice and they will find their illusion to vanish like smoke, and scatter like chaff before the wind. All it wants is Freethought.

One of the young men in his prayer called upon Jesus so lustily to drive the devil out, they all began to shout, "Amen!" "Do so, Lord!" amid much confusion. What tomfoolery! If they had ever read the Bible with understanding they would hav been staggered by what is said in Isa. xlv, 7: "I formed the light and created darkness. I make peace and create evil. I, the Lord, do all these things." Here are implied two propositions: 1. God, a supreme intelligence; 2. God, the original cause of all things. Reason declares that prayer could not alter the decrees of God, and it occurs to my mind the foolishness of the Chinese, when they burn paper saturated with some liquor to drive the devil away, or for the Roman Catholic to pray to the Virgin Mary for her to intercede to her son Jesus Christ to liberate the faithful from the tortures of purgatory, is all nonsense. The devil still holds his own, and will hold it to the end of time. Should he be a personal devil, how are they to drive him out? What humbug! S. R. THORNE.

A Freethinking Town.

GLENN'S FERRY, IDA., Oct. 5, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: This is one of the very few communities that the churches hav never succeeded in getting within their grasp. The strict church-members here can nearly be counted on one's fingers, and I believe that I can truthfully say that over half of the voting population are Freethinkers in many different stages. Both the Protestant and Catholic churches hav made desperate efforts to establish a following here, but hav only partially succeeded. The Catholics, by the usual methods of dances, suppers, and giv-or-be-damned subscriptions, hav raised enough money to build a very small church, surmounted by a very large wooden cross, which, judging by its size, Christ, with the assistance of Simon, would never hav been able to carry to his own crucifixion. The "holy father" comes up from Ogden every pay-day regularly, hears confession of the faithful, does the absolution act, receives his fee for same, and departs on the next train to repeat the same routine the next time the boys get their money. The opposition church hav not been able yet to build a house to the Lord, but hold forth in the taxpayers' schoolhouse whenever they can succeed in getting some one to do their exhorting free—which you know is not often. The man of God who has been administering to their spiritual wants occasionally has just been suspended by his church in Shoshone three hundred and sixty-five days for undue familiarity with one of the sisters of his flock. The parson who was sent to relieve him made a proposition to his flock here that if they would go in with Shoshone and pay him five hundred a year, he would throw in three weeks' revival service free as a premium, but so far they hav not been able to take him up, and I am afraid they will lose the chromo.

The new Federation is just the thing we hav been wishing for, and I am confident that Idaho will furnish her share of its members. We will take the advice given at the German Catholic congress recently and vote for those only who will work to our own interests. The sentiment here against Sunday closing of the Fair is nearly unanimous. Last spring, when we circulated a petition to that effect, it was signed by nine-tenths of the men in the town.

I inclose following an editorial from the Salt Lake Tribune, brought forth by the expressions used at the congress referred to above. Coming as it does from the daily paper having the largest circulation between Denver and San Francisco, I think it has the right ring and will open up the eyes of all true Americans to the danger that lies in wait for them if they let the church get in power.

CHAS. C. JANNEY.

GO SLOW.

Some resolutions of a German Catholic convention were telegraphed from New Jersey, the burden of which is the indorsement of parochial schools, the determination of the convention to resist any attempt on the part of the state to infringe by any law the right of education, the denunciation of secret societies, and a call upon Catholics to giv their votes only to such candidates as take the Catholic stand on the school question.

We beg to say to those gentlemen and to all adherents of that faith in the United States that it is a very dangerous thing for them and their church when they go to instructing voters or counseling voters how to vote and what officers shall be and shall not be voted for. If they try that very much there will two things happen: the first will be the gathering of a mighty anticatholic party; the second will be a schism in the Catholic church itself in America, for the great majority of Catholics in this country will stand no dictation as to how they shall vote. The sentiment of this country is that Catholics shall hav just as many parochial schools as they please to establish, but the sentiment is so strong and sensitiv regarding our free schools that any creed, no matter how strong, that dares to try in the least to trench upon the system will find itself in a more uncomfortable position than it ever dreamed of being in. That is one question which the American people North and South are united upon. It is the one question which the American people will bear no tampering with, for it has become one of the foundation-stones of our republic, one of the defenses which the people will uphold, if necessary, by appealing to the last resort possible to nations.

When Bismarck banished from Germany some bigots who belonged to the Catholic church, he expressed deep sympathy for the United States, where those men proposed to go. Some of those same men must hav been in control of this convention in New Jersey, because no nativ-born Catholic, no Catholic born in this country, would any more get up and propose instructing voters of this land how to vote than he would think of declaring open treason against our institutions.

The resolution against secret societies is a harmless one, except in this, that the men who passed those resolutions ought to remember that there is nothing in our secret societies which is any more secret than are the councils of the high priests of the Catholic church; and, further, that the members of secret societies in this country outnumber, two to one, the adherents or communicants of any one church.

There is not very much in the resolutions themselvs, except a menace. We counsel the Catholic archbishops of the country—the archbishops and cardinals—to caution their zealous priests not to precipitate that sort of menace upon this country often, because if they do there will be some new questions to settle by the American people, and they will be settled in a very prompt and efficacious manner.

Interesting Experience of a Former Adventist.

ADDISON, VT., Oct. 15, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: We are much pleased to get THE TRUTH SEEKER. We think by its many correspondents we will be greatly edified. We will pass it on among our neighbors, hoping others may become interested in seeking for truth, aiding you. We think if friend Heston had thought to portray a fourth party, that league together to sit astride of the fence laughing at all others, hoping to go with the biggest crowd, boasting that they are not the party that can be easily deceived, refusing to help any, the picture alone would be worth the whole year's subscription.

People here are so afraid of chaff that it is very hard to get them to winnow for wheat. Yet slow beginnings often giv the best results.

With your permission, I will cast my pennyworth of mind into the great treasury of reasoning for truth to encourage every truth seeker. Twenty years since, I was one of the most zealous Second Adventists that could be found, taking the whole Bible in a natural sense just as we read common history. Now you can imagin how many absurd things I hav believed, said, and done. Do you ask how I came to giv up all I once believed Christian worship, to please God, for a home in heaven? It was in this wise: This town became a regular battle-field of the Advent denomination against all older voices of teaching; calling from every quarter earnest seekers of prophecy and the most talented speakers in the Advent realm; showing up every class of temperament, nature, disposition, or spirit in fighting to prove Advent belief the only truth begotten of God. Then I began to see their hate toward every other voice of teaching; and the hate of every other denomination acted back toward the Advent voice. I saw, too, that not one thing proved true that any of the clergy were teaching the human family, and that they often put new patches of ideas over old rents, trying to hide mistakes or disappointments. I then said, I will examin the scriptures for my own edification, to learn, if possible, the cause of all such hate, confusion, and disappointment; and soon found, to my utter astonishment, that the common reading of the Bible is no more or no less than the history of all men's beliefs, sayings and doings, failures and disappointments, written out by men who hav all proved that they hav not yet arrived at the true knowledge of God or creation. Priests and clergy hav made what they claim to be the word of God, which is only the words of scheming device, held up to the world by the most bigoted classes until the great darkening of minds itself emits light. I learned by my research that evolution of times, conditions, sayings and doings, now necessitates an entire change of ideas, sayings and doings, among every class of teaching from the very least unto the greatest. The professing classes hav for ages judged the world's people in wickedness, never even dreaming that the time would come when the world's people must judge the professing classes. When I essayed to tell these things to the clergy of different denominations, all with one accord said to me, "Away with any new ideas, for we know of a surety that our own voice of teachings hath all truth." Yet such strong assertions did not prove it a fact. The clergy and their followers pronounced me insane or possessed with the devil, advising me to leave off reading the Bible if it would not allow all my ideas to harmonize with popular Christian teachings of past and present ages; this proving to me that all the clergy are as set against giving any attention to passages of scripture which are not in their common use, to try to prove their own ideas true, as they are against examining respectfully Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason."

Just here, perhaps, it would be well to relate a little experience that happened seventeen years since. A friend of mine by chance borrowed the "Age of Reason," to be returned in four or five days, as the owner feared to trust it long in others' care. I was asked to read some parts of the book to see for myself whether its ideas were so very absurd as the clergy and the press had made them appear. I answered that I would like to see some of Thomas Paine's ideas direct from him. An Adventist lady sat by hearing our conversation, and in a few minutes she began to groan until she went into a fit, I not knowing I was the cause until she came to. Fastening her eyes on me showing the most malignant hate, so that those who were called in to aid questioned to learn what could hav caused such looks of extreme hate, she said I was not a fit person to be in society or hav the care of my family, because I had studied the Bible until I had turned that upside down, then to cap the climax expressed my willingness to read the godless book called "Age of Reason." My neighbors, church people, and the clergy immediately coincided with the woman, making me a hissing and a by-word, while before this I was respected in common with other people. My family circle became angry and ashamed of me, calling me every sort of low names, because I accepted ideas so unpopular. The church people advised my family to use strategy to attract my attention from any more study that did not agree with theirs—they thus unconsciously aiding me in my research for a reasonable explanation of the human family's present condition, thus proving my best friends in spite of their intentions to hinder my progress. Through the order of nature's laws every class and kind will be shown up in their own true light. In passing through this ordeal none can hide what they truly are.

Now I wish to kindly ask all who call themselvs truth seekers, Is it the best of wisdom to keep on talking and acting back toward the clergy and church people just as they all do toward truth seekers? There certainly is no spirit of kindness shown by doing thus. It is not doing as we would be done by—which is a very good maxim, wherever it came from. Will not plain truth, actually shown by the laws of nature in a spirit of kindness, do more to remove bigotry and untrue belief than all the fiery thrusts of contempt? Unprofitable words do not reason from effect back to cause.

In the cartoon the journeying truth seeker rider is well represented as having a happy, cheerful, kind smile upon his face, his eyes beaming with intelligence, his ears listening to every sound, as he looks out upon the broad expanse, reading truth out of the great book of nature, which will not deceive, lie, or be governed by the natural desires of covetous men. What kind of animals would best represent the spirit and words of opposition in this age? I think the old book calls them rams, butting to let each other know they are firmly in opposition to each other, neither getting ahead of the other, wearing their heads out for naught but to show their own folly.

I send you an example of some thrusts between a popular clergyman and the editor of the Utica Saturday Globe:

JONES AND THE INFIDELS.

Rev. Sam Jones, the expounder of muscular Christianity, preached in New York Sunday and made out Infidels as destitute of common sense. The members of this class hav prided themselvs on their intellectual attainments, and through knowledge, they assert, hav lost faith in the truths of Christianity.

Mr. Jones states "revealed religion finds its exponents in honest men and women. As for Infidelity, there is nothing to it but its dirty mouth. Wash that out and the nonsense vanishes. But Ingersoll is the only sensible Infidel yet resurrected. He receives $500 a night for airing the nonsense, but the fools who pay $1 to hear him are the greatest ninnies of the generation. These small-souled creatures are the laughing-stock of sensible people and are the first to run from any danger, real or fancied. Only silly Infidels would sit at the feet of this pot-bellied defamer."

This talk hardly becomes a minister. In his eagerness to impale Ingersollism the Rev. Mr. Jones resorts to billingsgate that weakens his case and that reflects on Christianity more than it does on Infidelity. There are comparativly few who claim to be Infidels. Indeed they are as one to a thousand of those who accept the teachings of revealed religion. Even those who gather at Ingersoll's bidding are attracted chiefly because of his eloquence and humor. As a rule his auditors care little what he preaches so long as they can sit within the spell of his eloquence. He amuses but does not instruct. Consesequently he does not make converts. To say that his hearers are fools is about as absurd a declaration as could be put forth. In fact they are quite as intelligent and well-behaved and respectable as those found in the congregations where sledge-hammer Jones is tolerated.

Would these men stop long enough to read the whole book which they profess to hav such respect for, they would readily see that in other ages like this the world's people, or those who were called no people, received the voice of truth gladly long before those who professed to be God's chosen people.

May the above words help to dry the tears of the good Texas girl, who has truly a kind spirit. I would say to her: It is plainly to be seen that your dear dead sister's spirit remains with you, which is an animating, trustful spirit, and with you her spirit will enter heaven when you hav sought truth carefully enough to learn where heaven is. The old book explains that the kingdom of heaven cometh not with observation; is as a little leaven, or a grain of mustard seed sown. This does not represent a heaven away off up in the sky, as the clergy teach. Yet it is above the knowledge, principality, and powers of men, who know not that heaven is a sphere of conditions where there are gentleness, love, patience, and forbearing with one another, leading and being led into higher cultivation of knowledge and activity. For illustration, Thomas Paine, though long dead, is now activly aiding the people and being aided into higher spheres of knowledge than he could attain until many took hold to carry on the work which he left in the most feeble, despised infancy. His reasoning spirit remained here among the people, waiting for nature's laws to develop its manhood strength through other men. The old book explains that a spirit is no such kind of a thing as the clergy hav imagined and taught. To illustrate this, I will tell you about a Baptist deacon here who died last week, having on his face a peaceful, happy, resigned look. The minister said such a look was proof that his dead brother was a man of God and that his spirit had now entered upon that which was before unknown to him. This deacon's spirit, or energizing light of mind, when he was in health was to possess broad lands, hav a nice home, educate his children, and pay largely to supply a minister to tell everybody how to be good, godly, and do justice to all. But did the minister do his work in a way to pay the deacon for his support? While the deacon's large spirit of energy caused him to constantly overwork until he lost nerve force—which is properly termed consumption of nerve; the will power givs up, causing the peculiar look or expression of countenance according to natural law, and early death is the result. Nearly all consumptiv people hav the same look just before and at death, whether they ever belonged to a church or not. So it is no more proof that such dying ones know God than it was proof that the sun went around the earth because it had that appearance and all men but Galileo said it must be so. Yet they had to giv it up, just as the churches will be obliged to giv up their course of light.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight.
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Luck and Labor.

Luck, weakly wishing, idly lingers
For favoring fortune yet to smile!
Labor, at work with busy fingers,
Depends upon himself the while.

Luck lies abed in dreams to number
The coins of future riches vast!
Labor, arising from his slumber,
Earns pence that grow to pounds at last.

Luck ever sighs and says in sadness,
"Why does my ship come never in?"
Labor, all lightsome, sings in gladness,
"I'm sure success in time to win!"

Luck comes to poverty and sorrow,
To vain regret and lasting shame;
Labor has ne'er to beg or borrow,
And gains at length each cherished aim.

Christopher Columbus.

On Friday, October 21st, there occurred a great demonstration in honor of Christopher Columbus, the alleged discoverer of America, in which many civic societies and the schoolchildren of America took part.

The truth compels the statement that Columbus did not discover America. The continent was known to the Scandinavians a thousand years ago, and Columbus made use of their previously obtained knowledge in his voyages, to his own interest and advantage.

He was also aided by his wife and the charts of her father. He himself was a great falsifier, and practiced piracy upon the high seas. He was the first to establish slavery in America. But he was not worse, perhaps, than the times in which he lived. He had great perseverance, strong resolution, and no doubt many good qualities. That he was a Catholic is neither here nor there. Catholicism was the prevailing religion, and the faith in which he was educated. On the whole, in reviewing his life and character, it is not thought that he deserves the great homage paid him. He was a fair sort of sailor, fond of adventure, and made some good voyages, achieving success under great disadvantages. S. H. W.

Correspondence.

MEMPHIS, TEX., Oct. 4, 1892.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: Welcome, welcome home! We hav appreciated you in Europe. But oh, how we miss you at home! May the echoes of gladness reach you from all the Cornerites. We note your return in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 1st. GLEN MULKS,
LAURA MULKS, U.J.

MANHATTAN, MONT., July 21, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is the first time I ever wrote to the Corner. I am nine years old, but do not go to school because it is too far to walk, and I hav no horse to ride. I read the Children's Corner and I think it is the most interesting part in the paper.

Well, for fear of taking too much room I will close, hoping this will escape the waste-basket. Your Liberal friend,
ARCH GRAHAM.

BRONSTON, KY., June 29, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER and I hope you will print it, for I want to surprise my papa and I wish to show it to my little orthodox friends.

I am very fond of reading the children's letters.

My papa and mamma are Freethinkers, and, so far as I hav learned, I am a Freethinker, too. We don't attend Sunday-school, but we go to school and love to study our schoolbooks.

Your little Freethinker,
MATTIE STIGALL.

BALDWIN, MO., July 8, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first attempt at writing to the Corner. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I love to read the Corner and look at the pictures.

I am eleven years old and go to school. I study history, spelling, geography, grammar, arithmetic, and singing.

We are the only American family in the neighborhood. The others are all Germans. Our nearest neighbor's name is Rapple. Every time I go over there the children hav some weed or root fixed up for me to eat. I tell them they will get poisoned some time, but they don't seem to mind.

I hav a Maltese kitten. She is very tame. Her fur is as glossy and soft as silk.

Well, fearing my letter will go to the waste-basket, I will close.

Your Liberal friend,
CORA LANE.

PENACOOK, N. H., Sept. 1, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I wish to send you greeting and welcome home to our loved and lovely shores. That you are rested and in good health is the best wish I hav for you, and that you will again take up the pen in your own good way to help rid this far from free country of creeds, and legislation in the interest of them.

Mr. Chaapel is here with us, and we wished to hav a word of love and good cheer waiting for you when you come.

He is a friend we found through letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER. We like him much, and his whole aim seems to be for our cause. Perhaps he may be a little in advance, but we need all the advance guards we hav ever had or shall hav. We wish you were here with us this sunny morn.

That you will come some time is the wish of Your friend, MRS. ETTA MARDEN.

TURNER, ORE., July 21, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON AND LITTLE FRIENDS: I thought I would write and tell you about our pets. We hav two pretty puppies. One I call Knight of Snowdon, James Fitz James, after the knight of Snowdon in "Lady of the Lake," by Sir Walter Scott. One we call Timothy Skittlebones Ingersoll, because he is always on top with his argument. I think mamma made a mistake in calling him Ingersoll, as she sold the pup to a Methodist man. There was no celebration here Fourth of July, but the young people sent up twelve little balloons, some rockets, and burnt some Roman candles, shot fire-crackers, and fired the anvil about sixteen times.

Mamma says, tell the young people that she has a white rat with red eyes. She calls him Jesus Redeye.

I hav a pet hen that will sit in the hammock and swing. I call her Dolly. We also hav a big dog which says his prayers.

How many of the young people who write to the Corner are members of the Young Men's Freethought Temperance Society? I am for one. The church people of Turner are building another church here now right on the other side of the street from our place, and they tell papa they are doing it for his benefit.

Well, as my letter is too long I will just ask what has become of Lores L. Goodwin and his cat. Respectfully yours,
KATIE D. MATTESON.

ROGERS, ARK., July 28, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. I am fifteen years old, and I like to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, especially the Children's Corner. I hav been going to the Rogers Academy. It is run by the Congregational church. It is vacation now. They had chapel exercise every morning before school. School will commence again in September. The academy has a musical department. I took lessons on the piano about three years ago, and I take lessons on the violin now. T. L. Rickaby, professor of the musical department, organized a junior military band last October, a year ago. It is getting along finely. I play the solo bo cornet. Professor Rickaby is away during vacation. I take his place in his string quartet while he is gone, and I am a member of his brass quartet. When the professor is at home he has an orchestra of sixteen, composed of his music students. There was a debate here commencing the 24th of May, between John E. Remsburg and J. H. Hall, lasting five days and five evenings. It was the biggest thing that has ever happened to this town. It has done more to civilize this town than all the sermons that hav ever been preached here. With best wishes to the Corner, I remain,

Your Liberal friend,
FRANK H. MCGAUGHAY.

ALTUS, OKLA., July 24, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: From the town of Vernon I came in February to Greer county, for the ownership of which the United States and Texas are having a contest, still undecided. Greer is a beautiful county when everything is green, but this summer a drouth has devastated a part of northwest Texas and the Indian Territory. Many of the people hav no wells, and in that case one well supports a whole community; and when there is a long dry spell the well givs out and thus we suffer very much.

Many homes are mortgaged, and so you see, although we hav a beautiful and fertil county, very few are able to sustain their families and homes as they should be.

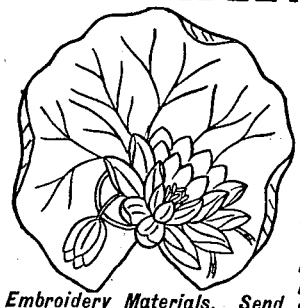
I know of no avowed Liberal in the county besides myself. Nearly everyone is a Christian, and it is something like Russia—the more religion, the more poverty and misery.

The school I hav been attending this spring opened in the morning with prayer. It was very trying to me. I would often look around and wonder if the children were insane to bow their heads before empty air and never think how they were duped. Poor things! They cannot help it, though, for their parents are as superstitious as they are, and were taught it from infancy to manhood and womanhood.

I hope we will be able to secure the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday. It would certainly be a great victory over the church.

I wish to see more letters in the Corner than of late. Our letters are few, but good—much better than children's letters in orthodox papers. Letters written by girls and boys up in their teens in the paper I take are not as good as those of Liberals of ten and twelve. Thus we see, as a rule, Liberals are better educated and hav sounder views than religious children.

Yours for mental liberty,
MYRTIE MARTIN.



NEWPORT, KY., June 28, 1892.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: It rather gratified my old heart to see my homely letter in the Children's Corner. I recollect the corner of my father's house I was sitting in, away back yonder, perhaps in about 1823. There had been a session of Presbyterian preachers at my father's. The little old church-house close by was small. They used our house, so after the session several preachers staid all night. Several of our neighbors were in to sit until bedtime. I recollect neighbor Bus, who was a Baptist, a great talker, especially on religion. I will remark furthermore he was one of two of our neighbors who took a newspaper. He styled his paper the Philadelphia Gazette. But to my subject. I was always afraid of preachers, they had such long faces; they seemed to make my mother miserable when they were around, so her otherwise kind face looked to me to be out of order. So I sat in a corner while these divines talked. One, a slender, sandy-haired man, had been to the Holy Land. He stood up in front of the old-style fireplace and recounted his journey—what he saw. And if I recollect well, he said he saw the remains of the ark on Mt. Ararat. Nobody seemed to doubt his history. I really thought it was all true. Yet I hav often heard lawyers and politicians, even yet to our times, to prove what they say affirm it "as true as holy writ," and say "God knows I tell the truth." Some eighteen years ago I asked our present governor to put his witness on the stand. This in Kentucky then was thought shocking blasphemy.

GEO. SMITH.

P.S.—In my next I want to tell how it was I knew so little geography and history at the age of seven or eight years old. So, as one stamp will carry two communications to the Corner, I will relate my story now. My father was unlettered. My mother could read the Bible. I was the eldest child. They were very anxious I should get an education. So they sent me to school very young, to a Scotch Presbyterian schoolmaster. All teachers in those days were "masters." At least, this one was. He had a dunce-block, a cat-o'-nine-tails, school rules pasted on a board. I saw he intended that this cat-o'-nine-tails and dunce-block should some day learn us to read. So I rebelled, could not be persuaded to go to school. Presents, sugar on my biscuit, a nice little basket, a mother's love and my father's too, were of no avail. I could not go. This settled my schooling. I never went to school a day afterward, willingly. My father kept a very popular country tavern on one of the most traveled roads in this state. I was activ in waiting on our travelers—a good hostler, got the praise of many travelers. This was the best means I had of learning some useful things. G. S.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.

News of the Week.

THE wife of President Harrison died on the 25th.

THE Vatican has asked the Italian government to protect the pilgrims to the papal jubilee from injury by Antichristian mobs.

ON Columbian day collections were taken in all Methodist churches for the great Methodist University to be erected at Washington in rivalry of the Catholic.

SIR EDWIN ARNOLD will probably miss the poet-laureateship of England because of the suspicion of heresy that has attached to him since his praise of oriental religions.

THE manager of the Thalia Theater, New York, who has been giving performances Sunday nights, was notified to stop. He informed the police that he would make a test case by keeping open last Sunday. He was arrested during the play, which was stopped.

THE church of St. James, at San Francisco, has secured a piece of cloth from a garment of the Apostle James, and a lock of his hair. The pastor, Father Lynch, says that he obtained the relics from the authorities at Rome, and that they are fully authenticated and there is no doubt as to their genuinness.

IN a convention of Catholic societies at Newark, N. J., to arrange a Columbus parade on the 21st, a motion had been made to allow the carrying of any flag if an American flag were before it, when Ex-Alderman John Drudder rose and said, "We should hav the papal flag first. We are Catholics first and Americans afterward."

AT Buffalo, N. Y., on the 16th, Leonora Wagenor died of typhoid fever. She had been attended by faith curists, who prayed over her for three weeks. They and the girl's parents forcibly ejected City Physician Barber from the house and the girl had no medical attendance. The girl's parents and the faith curists will be indicted.

THE Parisian suburb of St. Denis has fallen into the hands of Socialistic and Atheistic revolutionists. Recently the town councillors at the city hall, after the singing of the "Marseillaise," administered civil baptism to several infants in the name of "humanity," thus "snatching them from the influence of the church." The sponsors engaged, in case of the death of the parents, to rear the children in the principles of "liberty, equality, and fraternity."

THE pope has issued an encyclical commending especial use of the rosary of Mary during October. After recounting the afflictions of mankind, he says: "Therefore, to appease the anger of His Divine Majesty, to bring a convenable remedy to the evils of which the world suffers, nothing is more efficacious than the pious and persevering office of prayer, united with zeal and action of a Christian life. This double result appears to be gained particularly by the Rosary of Mary. Its origin, well known, illuminated by superb monuments, and which We hav often recalled Ourself, attests its admirable efficacy."

TALMAGE continues to talk about the excellences of Russia, such as "the superb kindness written all over the faces of emperor and empress and crown prince." He wishes all to join "in the execration of that too prevalent opinion that a tyrant is on the throne of Russia." He asserts that "the most slandered and systematically lied about nation on earth is Russia, and that no ruler ever lived more for the elevation of his people in education and morals and religion than Alexander III. So I put all the three prayers together: God save the president of the United States! God save the queen of England! God save the emperor and empress of Russia!"

IN reply to the invitation of United States Secretary of State Foster, Leo XIII. dispatched Monsignor Satolli to Washington with a letter from Cardinal Rampolla, the papal secretary of state, signifying an intention to be represented at the Fair by an exhibition of Columbus relics. The latter remarks that "His Holiness has many reasons to entertain special regard for the United States government on account of the liberty which is enjoyed in the said States by the Catholic church." Monsignor Satolli was accompanied from New York to Washington by Richard Kerens, member of the national Republican committee from Missouri, who along with member Manley from Maine has charge of gathering in the Irish-American vote. Satolli was received with great consideration by Secretary of State Foster, who expressed the president's anxiety to see the legate and his disappointment at being absented by the illness of his wife.

As man advances in knowledge he loses confidence in the watchfulness of providence and in the efficacy of prayer.—Ingersoll.

THE multitude of brute beasts called men, compared with the little number of those who think, is at least in the proportion of a hundred to one in many nations. —Voltaire.

THERE can at this day be no scientific doubt that life obeys no special or exceptional laws, and that it does not stand outside the influence of inorganic forces, but must rather be regarded as the result of a definit interaction of chemical and physical forces or a peculiarly complicated mechanical group of motions, for the explanation of which none but the usual and known forces of nature can and need be called in.—Büchner.

IT is remarkable how easily and insensibly we fall into a particular route, and make a beaten track for ourselves. I had not lived there [at Walden] a week before my feet wore a path from my door to the pond-side; and though it is five or six years since I trod it, it is still quite distinct. It is true, I fear that others may hav fallen into it, and so helped to keep it open. The surface of the earth is soft and impressible by the feet of men; and so with the paths which the mind travels. How worn and dusty, then, must be the highways of the world, how deep the ruts of tradition and conformity!—Thoreau.

THE proofs of the theory of Evolution extend over the whole realm of nature. The most prominent of these is the apparent connection of all forms of animal life, such as would exist if each order of life had grown out of the order below it. The students of nature are continually finding intermediate forms, or "missing links," between the established classes of the animal kingdom. As a tree from a single stem spreads out into numerous branches and twigs, so life appears to manifest itself in a series of forms, each closely allied to the other, or with such strong resemblances that relationship appears certain.—Robert C. Adams.

AGNOSTICISM, in fact, is not a creed, but a method, the essence of which lies in the rigorous application of a single principle. That principle is of great antiquity; it is as old as Socrates; as old as the writer who said, "Try all things, hold fast by that which is good;" it is the foundation of the Reformation, which simply illustrated the axiom that every man should be able to giv a reason for the faith that is in him; it is the great principle of Descartes; it is the fundamental axiom of modern science. Positivly the principle may be expressed: In matters of the intellect follow your reason as far as it will take you without regard to any other consideration. And negativly: In matters of the intellect do not pretend that conclusions are certain which are not demonstrated or demonstrable. That I take to be the Agnostic faith, which if a man keep whole and undefiled, he shall not be ashamed to look the universe in the face, whatever the future may hav in store for him.—Huxley.

WE can . . . trace the origin of the belief in the demons of evil which were the direct ancestors of our king devil, or Satan. As these primitiv people were wont to abide in the open air without shelter from the storm, subject to every variation of the weather, the toy and sport of the battling elements, what wonder their minds were constantly troubled concerning the world of monsters ("prinees of the powers of the air"), which seemed ever ready to tantalize and injure them? To-day our hunters meet with animals no larger than the bison or the elephant, no more ferocious than the lion or the tiger. In those days man was the companion of the mastodon and other animals of incredible proportions—their skeletons displayed in our museums to-day, some of them extending scores of feet in length, are sufficient to convince us of their inspiring terrors when, clothed with flesh and nerves, they moved and growled, attacked and destroyed! The sea was full of saurian monsters and the air swarmed with black-winged bats of frightful size. Man was yet subject, in the half-completed state of the planet, to cataclysms and deluges, to storms and upheavals of which we know nothing, and ofttimes became the victim of these terrors of the elements. Again, making his abode in the dark and gloomy caverns, with the mammoth and the bear as his companions, subject every moment of his life to destructiv elements plying their grim and mysterious powers to his ruin; what wonder he early learned to believe that the air, the earth, and the water were full of mighty monsters whose only occupation was to search for human lives and drag away with them their prey into dark and foreboding haunts?—Henry Frank.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress Assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, do hereby respectfully pray and memorialize your Honorable Body to repeal that portion of the Act entitled "An Act to aid in carrying out the Act of Congress, approved April 25, 1890, entitled 'An Act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by the holding of an International Exposition in the City of Chicago'"—approved August 5, 1892, which reads as follows: "That it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition, are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and it is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by the Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modifications of the rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

Also, to repeal that portion of the Act entitled, "An Act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes"—approved August 5, 1892, which reads as follows:

"And it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition, are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and it is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modifications of the rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

We ask the repeal of these portions of these laws for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago, who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you ought to decide is that of the public welfare.

5. It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

Life of Thomas Paine,

WITH A

History of His Literary, Political, and Religious Career in America, France, and England.

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY,

Author of "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," "George Washington and Mount Vernon," "Washington's Rules of Civility," etc.

To Which Is added a Sketch of Paine by William Cobbett.

No real biography of Paine has ever appeared. The so-called Lives of Paine have been mainly the controversial work of pamphleteers, turning chiefly on his religious heresies. Paine was in his fifty-eighth year before he published anything concerning religion, and before that time he had acted an important part in revolutionary movements in the United States, England, and France. But in the religious conflict initiated by him, his political services and military career hav been but inadequately considered. A certain historical ostracism has buried in the archives of various countries a large mass of documents containing records of paramount interest and importance. Mr. Conway has personally searched such records, in Europe and America, and has obtained from these fresh light, not only on Paine, but on various e inent figures in American and European history with whom he was associated. A large amount of unpublished correspondence has been included in the volumes.

Mr. Conway says in his Preface: "In the laborious work of searching out the real Paine I hav found a general appreciation of its importance, and it will be seen in the following pages that generous assistance has been rendered by English clergymen, by official persons in Europe and America, by pers ns of all beliefs and no beliefs In no instance have I been impeded by any prejudice, religious or political. The curators of archives, private collectors, owners of important documents bearing on the subject, have welcomed my effort to bring the truth to light."

From Behind the Bars. A series of letters written in prison. Over 700 pages. Price, $1.50.

A Truth Seeker in Europe. A series of letters written during a visit of ten weeks in Europe. Giving some account of the International Freethinkers' Congress held at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was a delegate, followed by a description of what he saw in England, France, Holland, and Italy. The letters from Rome alone are worth the price of the book. With a steel-plate portrait of the author. 850 pages. $1.50.

The Semitic Gods and the Bible. Treating upon the Gods of the Semitic nations, including Allah, Jehovah, Satan, the Holy Ghost, Jesus Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the Bible. To the latter 230 pages are devoted, showing that book to be a very inferior production for a first-class God. 333 large pages. Paper covers. 60 cents; cloth, $1.

Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism examined historically and critically. It is thought to be the most damaging exhibit of Christianity that has appeared. 500 large pages. Price, $1.50.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate on Christianity and Infidelity between D. M. Bennett and Rev. G. H. Humphrey. This book has had a very large sale, and is a splendid work for Freethinkers to loan to Christian neighbors. 550 pages. Price, $1.

Bennett-Teed Discussion. Between D. M. Bennett and Cyrus Romulus R. Teed. Jesus the Lord God Creator of Heaven and Earth. Paper, 30 cents.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. Bennett and G. M. Mair, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. 2. Miracles and supernatural achievements have been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus. 3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history. Bennett affirms; Mair denies. This is an exhaustive discussion. Price, $1.50.

Trial of D. M. Bennett in the United States Circuit Court upon the charge of depositing prohibited matter in the mail. This gives a full history of this celebrated case, and shows what monstrous injustice was perpetrated upon Mr. Bennett. Price, cloth, 75 cts.; paper, 50 cts.

Political Platforms.

The following are the parts of the platforms of the four political parties of the greatest interest to Liberals. The differences on other points are so generally known, being reiterated weekly by the various party journals, that it is not necessary to print them:

REPUBLICAN PLANK ON "FREE SPEECH AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY."

"We declare anew our devotion to liberty of thought and conscience, of speech and press, and approve all agencies and instrumentalities which contribute to the education of the land; but, while insisting upon the fullest measure of religious liberty, we are opposed to any union of church and state."

DEMOCRATIC PLANK ON EDUCATION.

"Popular education being the only safe basis of popular suffrage, we recommend to the several states most liberal appropriations for the public schools. Free common schools are the nursery of good government, and they hav always received the fostering care of the Democratic party, which favors every means of increasing intelligence. Freedom of education, being an essential of civil and religious liberty, as well as a necessity of the development of intelligence, must not be interfered with under any pretext whatever. We are opposed to state interference with parental rights and rights of conscience in the education of children as an infringement of the fundamental Democratic doctrin, that the largest individual liberty consistent with the rights of others insures the highest type of American citizenship and the best government."

PROHIBITION PREAMBLE AND THREE PLANKS.

"The Prohibition party, in national convention assembled, acknowledging almighty God as the source of all true government and his law as the standard to which human enactments must conform to secure the blessings of peace and prosperity, presents the following declaration of principles:

"2. No citizens should be denied the right to vote on account of sex, and equal labor should receive equal wages without regard to sex.

"9. All men should be protected by law in their right to one day of rest in seven.

"12. We stand unequivocally to the American public school and opposed to any appropriation of public moneys to sectarian schools. We declare that only by united support of such common schools, taught in the English language, can we hope to become and remain a homogeneous and harmonious people."

PREAMBLE OF THE PEOPLE'S PARTY PLATFORM.

"Assembled upon the one hundred and sixteenth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence, the People's party of America, in their first national convention, invoking upon their action the blessing of Almighty God, puts forth, in the name and on behalf of the people of this country, the following preamble and declaration of principles."

It will be noticed that while the Prohibition platform is particularly pious, the People's party platform is a little so, and that neither of the old parties considers it necessary to mention God. The phraseology of the Republican plank is, however, a little curious, for analyzed, it means that in the minds of the framers a union of church and state might someway aid religious liberty. Of course such an assumption is preposterous.

The Democratic plank is meant to catch foreign sectarian voters, such as the German Lutherans and Catholics, who maintain that the state has no right to supervise their parochial schools.

The Prohibition plank directly antagonizes this foreign element, though the preamble is just as directly opposed to a Secular government, and its ninth plank is an indorsement of Sunday laws. The best thing about the Prohibitionists is that they are fair enough to want to allow the women to vote.

There is no reference to education or religious liberty in the People's party platform, except that in the preamble. Like the Prohibitionist party, however, the People's party is dominated by pietists, except in a few localities. Here in New York the leaders are heretics, and in Kansas many Freethinkers are identified with it.

The Catholic War Upon Our Schools.

Throughout the Union Catholics are pushing their warfare upon our public schools. In some cases they hav conquered and absorbed them, while in others the contest is still on.

One of the battle-grounds is Wisconsin. Here the Catholics at present stand victorious, in so far that they hav, as we hav before informed our readers, secured the repeal of the Bennett law, which by requiring all children to attend schools wherein English was taught, interfered with the practice of Catholics and Lutherans of teaching religion in the German language in their private schools. Their supremacy, however, it seems is not long to remain undisputed, as a late dispatch reads thus:

"MILWAUKEE, WIS., Oct. 23, 1892.—Strenuous efforts are being made to revive the Bennett law issue in the coming campaign. As matters stand it is somewhat doubtful which party is responsible for the revival. Many of the Republican editors and the politicians who believed in Hoard's doctrin are averse to allowing the matter to go by default. They are backed up in this by a considerable number of Republican voters who are opposed to wholly abandoning the stand taken two years ago. The result of this feeling has been that the Democrats hav been supplied with material which warrants them in asserting that the Republicans hav merely cast aside the Bennett law idea for the time being and that should they again obtain control of the state a compulsory education law would immediately be passed. As a result it is said the Lutherans are going over to the Democratic standard. The Republican leaders, headed by John C. Spooner, candidate for governor, hav solemnly pledged that the Bennett law matter will never again be brought up by the Republican party in this state, and point to the fact that John C. Koch, one of the leaders of the Lutherans in the state, is the Republican candidate for lieutenant-governor. But the Democrats hav got the Bennett law ghost resurrected to some extent, and it is worrying the politicians not a little."

In Milwaukee the Catholics are also engaged in a movement to eject from the normal school a textbook which chances to contain a mild word or two of truth in regard to their church. This is a "History of Pedagogy," by one Compayre, whom they call "a French Atheist." They term the book, as they do all works that contain a tenth part of the truth on Catholicism, "luridly bigoted." They say that it is "especially severe on the Jesuits." It was translated by Professor Payne, of the University of Michigan, and is highly esteemed by teachers. The fight against this book will probably be carried on in connection with the attack that is being made on Swinton's "Outlines of the World's History." This was commenced a few days ago, and was started by the Columbia, a German Catholic paper. The book has been in use in the schools seventeen years, and was recently superseded by Myers's History. This was objected to on the ground that in its account of the sale of indulgences by Leo X. in the sixteenth century it did a great wrong to Catholics. By comparison, it was then discovered that Swinton's History made fully as unqualified statements. The matter was taken up by Vicar-General Zeininger, and will result in a hot fight.

In Detroit, Mich., the Catholics come to light just now in the inglorious position of the under dog. The board of education of that city has just adopted a resolution, after a fierce fight, practically excluding Catholics from teaching in the Detroit public schools. It provides that no one shall be eligible as a teacher who has not obtained all his or her education in the public schools and who is not a graduate of some public high school. The Catholic clergy of the city hav presented a sharp remonstrance against this action. The committee on teachers of the board of education replied that if any religious discrimination has been shown it has been on the part of the Catholic clergy of this diocese in refusing the sacrament to pupils who attended the public schools and to parents who permitted such attendance.

Thus goes on the ill and wearisome warfare. The opposition which the Catholics find brought against them is nowhere of the sort that they should be met with. It is Protestant; it should be Infidel. Their follies are but countered with other follies of equal egregiousness, and neither side learns. One side reviles Henry VIII.; the other vituperates Philip II. The one rakes up the scandals about Martin Luther; the other holds up horrified hands over the doings of Bloody Mary. One batch of addleheads wants the Bible in the schools; another, the catechism. Neither party is willing to do justice to the other; or to Freethought aside from them both. It is not in the nature of Christianity to breed parties inclining toward justice. Freethought and science only are capable of bringing forth equity and weal. The methods of Freethought and science only can be used against these school-destroying Catholics with abiding success.

Brainless Catholics.

The picture of the Virgin Mary and the Christ-child which miraculously appeared on a window of the Catholic church at Canton, Minn., has become far more of an attraction to the faithful than ever. The reason of this is a second miracle produced in connection with it, which clinches the proof of its supernatural origin. This miracle consists in a transferral of the picture to a new pane of glass. Recently it was decided to remove the old glass. This glass, when viewed from any other point than the ground, was perfectly plain. When removed it was merely an ordinary pane of glass. A new pane was procured from the stock of a glazier and placed in the sash. The moment it was in place a loud shout went up from the crowd of people below. There was the same picture that had appeared in the other glass. The form of the Virgin, with the infant Jesus in her arms, was plainly discernible. "Nothing short of a bull from the Vatican," says a dispatch, "would now convince the people of Canton that they are not daily viewing a miracle."

Professor Herrman, the legerdemainist, has had a word to say on this miraculous picture. He says he has examined many reputed miracles, and this differs in no particular from hundreds of others. The professor asserts that some chemist is trifling with the good faith of the people of Canton. He claims that it is nothing extraordinary to produce a face in a pane of glass and that the trick was old thirty years ago. "Giv me two hours to prepare my chemicals," says the professor, "name the picture of anyone to be produced, and allow me five minutes at a pane of glass, and I will wager that after my presence the picture will come and go for weeks in phosphorescent gleams by night and in rich colors by day. Any tyro in chemistry can produce the same result."

It is unpleasant to think that this country is fast filling with the sort of human creatures who giv credence to a gross hocus-pocus trick like the above. It is disquieting to reflect that we are surrounded by legions of persons with head-pieces capable of no better work than acceptance of such tomfool impositions. A republic depends upon the sensibleness and right action of its masses; sorry must be the sense and far amiss the action of the wights who credit this humbug. The conduct of government and of all the functions of society requires the soundest and broadest intellect procurable, and pacific and right-directed feelings; how lacking are the intellects of these miracle-believers, and how adverse to society their fanatical, priest-perverted feelings, it is alarming to consider. The public weal, and even the every-day concerns of private life, indispensably demand men sage, broad, informed, cautious, uncredulous, in mind, and amicable and tolerant in disposition; to these high necessities the Catholics bring brains tiny, deludable, cramp, unopen, set, unpliable, and hearts brimmed by jealous priests with animosity toward every person believing elsewise than themselvs. These pinhead-brained and misdispositioned creatures swarm on every hand; each wields as powerful a ballot as one of us and is ready to level as deadly a rifle in war. Uncheering reflection!

The "Leather Medal" for Our Congressmen.

In response to our appeal for help in circulating an immense number of little pamphlets with opinions concerning Sunday opening of the World's Fair we hav received the following encouragement:

"CROOKSTON, MINN., Oct. 19, 1892.

"MY DEAR MACDONALD: Heston's cartoon on the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday is the hit of the season. I hav vainly tried to find words to fittingly characterize this the most infamous outrage that an American Congress has ever perpetrated against the liberties of the people. What I hav failed to do with my tongue and pen Heston has done with his pencil. A million of them should be printed. J. E. REMSBURG."

"TURNER, ORE., Oct. 6, 1892.

"MR. EDITOR: The 'Leather Medal' is grand. It not only 'takes the cake,' but the whole bake-shop. Get them out embossed, in colors. They can be sold by thousands. They will be an unanswerable argument. Ten millions of the picture, same as in THE TRUTH SEEKER, should be printed and scattered broadcast. I want some.

"In THE TRUTH SEEKER of a week or so ago I see a proposition that the opening or closing of the World's Fair be put to a vote of the people.

"I differ; no man, or combination of men, has any right whatever to close the Fair on Sunday. Everyone has a right to go in or out on Sunday, if they choose, same as any other day. It is a natural right. It exists not by votes, but by nature. No one has any right to vote on it. If the Fair is shut up on any day, it will simply be by force. The people may acquiesce, but it will be force all the same. This is the true ground. Let us accept no other. To do so is to surrender a principle of liberty. No religious person or body of persons has the least right to any consideration whatever. It is none of their business. Let them stand aside. F. S. MATTESON."

"GIBBON, NEB., Oct. 18, 1892.

"MR. EDITOR: By all means—if the means are forthcoming—hav the leaflets suggested by E. B. B. printed. I inclose a dollar to help the good work. Let the spirit of enthusiasm be stirred until Christianity shall be dumfounded; let there be a snowstorm of ridicule that shall make it a cold time for bigotry. Let the voice of liberty be raised until the demon of intolerance shall be confused and routed. I hav but one suggestion to make, which, however, may not suit a wiser preference. It would somewhat mar the paraphrase, but I thought the truth would be more direct. It is to transpose the Latin inscription so as to read 'Vox dei vox asinus.' Nor would it be inconsistent with the other inscription, for if the ass be God and rum and religion his emissaries, how greater the shame for the Christian to claim his 'faith is well founded.' Yours truly, C. PUTNAM."

"TURNER, ORE., Oct. 21, 1892.

"MR. EDITOR: Permit me to second the motion of 'E. B. B.' The idea is 'immense.' I think that I suggested in a letter not long ago that facsimile medals be made in leather 'and scattered broadcast over the land.' Either plan will do, and I will buy all I can afford to. Let me suggest additional 'mottoes,' to wit: 'Punch and Prayers,' 'Holiness and Whisky Straight.'

"The cartoon of 'How Christians Desert Faith' is another 'immense' take-off. In fact, THE TRUTH SEEKER illustrations are 'immense' generally, and teach more with one look than columns of reading can do.

"Respectfully yours, T. S. MATTESON."

We will therefore prepare the pamphlet in such shape that it can be supplied for local use at a very small price, and ask for contributions to enable us to do national work with it. The city of Chicago alone ought to use a hundred thousand copies.

Colonel Ingersoll on Renan and Voltaire.

Colonel Ingersoll's recent appearance on the platform and in the press will furnish our readers two rare treats. The paper on Renan, extracts from which we reprint on another page, is a generous tribute to one of philosophy's cheeriest writers. And next week we shall print the colonel's new lecture on Voltaire. The report of the lecture is furnished us by the author himself, and so far as it goes, is accurate. It is, however, not entirely complete, for it is the intention of Mr. Ingersoll to say a great deal more about the "greatest man of the eighteenth century," and Mr. C. P. Farrell will publish it in a book. But what we shall publish is all that can be had till that good time arrives.

We extend to Samos Parsons sincerest sympathy in the loss of his wife, who died October 16th. She had filled out her days, being ninety-one years old, but this long companionship makes the loss the harder to bear. Mr. Parsons himself is one of the kindliest of workers in our cause, and his generous benefactions are well remembered by all the Freethought editors.

A needle of truth found in the haystack of pulpitic utterance should not fail of record. Rev. Andrew Douglas, of Arbroath, Scotland, recently said: "Teetotalism is a Mohammedan and not a Christian virtue, and they who desire it to be a universal rule of society are presumptuously claiming to be superior to Christ, who wisely encouraged the social propensities of his brethren."

We are glad to see in the New York World, from day to day, as voters on the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday, the names of many ladies who are on our own subscription list. It indicates an interest in the matter sufficient to induce the performance of some labor. Everything, no matter how slight, helps to influence public opinion, and this as well as other expressions will be urged upon Congress when the time comes to argue for the repeal of the Sunday-closing clause of the appropriation.

When the Rev. Dr. Thomas, of Chicago, went on his summer vacation to the woods of Wisconsin he killed some deer out of season. The Chicago staff correspondent of the Forest and Stream has criticised the reverend law-breaker from week to week in that journal until he has professed his willingness to pay the fine, though like most other professions of doctors of divinity it has so far been mere vanity and wind, as the psalmist hath it. But another reverend sportsman, living in this city, has not escaped so easily. The Rev. Thomas Dixon, a mighty pulpit reprover of other people's sins, recently went down to Staten Island and shot thirty-one robins. The game constable saw him, arrested him, and a country justice fined him $5 each for the birds, and confiscated them for his own use. It seems to us that these reverend gentlemen ought to respect the laws more or talk less.

In the West.

News and Notes.

I hav had a varied experience this trip—from the cross-roads of Kentucky to the magnificence of the Columbian Exposition. Golden is a little bit of a place, and you would think that no more than a corporal's guard could be got together in this remote country town. But we had big audiences, and on Sunday the large tobacco warehouse of the Bogard Bros., the only "meeting-house" in the place, was crowded to its utmost capacity. From far and near the Christians and the Infidels flocked to the scene of debate. Professor Hall was not on hand Friday morning and so I opened the discussion with a lecture on "The Bible and Modern Thought." On Saturday my opponent appeared, having like myself found great difficulty in journeying to this point where the sound of the locomotiv will probably never be heard in the march of civilization.

We arranged for a four hours' debate each day, Saturday and Sunday. Professor Hall's main proposition was the divine inspiration of the Bible, which he defended with the usual arguments. He had a string of thirty or forty propositions which he himself admitted were merely suppositions, based on the assumed existence of God. As he did not prove or undertake to prove the existence of a God his "suppositions" were not arguments. Every theologian knows that there are only two possible ways to prove a divine revelation—namely, by miracles or by prophecy. Professor Hall never touched the question of miracles, and only at the very last moment did he make any reference to prophecy. So I really had nothing to which I might reply. All his arguments simply went to show that the Bible was a unique and remarkable literature. This is admitted, but that does not demonstrate a "divine revelation." I absolutely proved on the other hand that whatever excellences the Bible did possess it could not come from God—that is, from an infinitly perfect being, for it makes out that God is an imperfect being, an ignorant being, a cruel being capable of the most atrocious acts. It is needless to refer to my "proof-texts," for every Liberal student knows them. I cannot go into the particulars of our four hours' debate, the pro and con of our various arguments, but the gist is in the points noted. If the Bible is divinely inspired it must teach noble and lofty ideas of God throughout, and by miracle or prophecy giv to man what the human reason cannot possibly attain. As no miracle or prophecy is proved, and as the Bible does teach degrading ideas of God, it can only be an imperfect human production, with more or less flashes of genius and streaks of goodness to relieve the infernal darkness of its barbarous panorama. So stood the debate at the end of the first day. On Sunday I made the affirmation that the morality of Freethought was superior to that of the Christian religion. I showed that Freethought teaches self-respect, self-reliance, universal brotherhood, and hope and progress for the human race here and now, and abolishes fear of the hereafter, the horrors of eternal hell, while it depends for moral motiv on the spirit of humanity itself. On the other hand, the Christian religion teaches total depravity, vicarious atonement, "lay your deadly doing down," salvation by belief and not by conduct. It teaches a sectarian brotherhood, not universal brotherhood, and proclaims the savage and false doctrin of hell-fire. The standard of Freethought is universal human welfare, the standard of the Christian religion is the authority of a book crowded with ignorance and superstition. Freethought teaches human rights; the Christian religion teaches tyranny and the constant violation of human rights, as instanced by the exemption of church property from taxation, and the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday, and the persecution of Seventh Day Adventists under our flag.

Professor Hall replied to these arguments by affirming that the Christian religion was the source of every art, of every discovery, of every invention, of every reform, in the history of the world. However, the feebleness of his argument was proved by the fact that he was compelled in reply to my exposition of the philosophy of Freethought to resort to the old-time trick of slandering illustrious Infidels—Paine, Ingersoll, Bradlaugh, and Bennett. I was obliged to brand each statement that he made as a lie. I do not know whether Professor Hall knew that he was giving utterance to a lie. I guess he didn't. His Christian education is at fault. I don't believe he would hav said what he did say if he had absolutely known the truth. But it is pretty difficult for a theologian to see straight. Its method givs an infernal twist to his mental vision. It is like a disease. He is the victim of a condition. I can't giv more of the debate. It was the event of the season in the Cumberland country. Nothing of the kind had ever occurred before in this quiet and peaceable domain. No Infidel lecturer had before unfurled the flag. The Christians hav had their say for a century or more, and this was the first time that the other side ever put in an appearance. It was like a miracle in the eyes of some to see one criticise the Bible like other books, and condemn its God. I really think that it was expected that I should be struck by lightning.

My opponent, Professor Hall, is a skillful debater, and knows how to make his points. He knows what to dodge and what to meet. He is of course a special pleader. He plays to a certain extent on the ignorance and prejudice of his audience. He has a vein of comedy which takes the place of argument. He is a jokist and wins the applause of groundlings. On the whole, however, he does as well for the Christian religion as anyone that I ever met. He is well posted; has evidently made a study of the question, and marshals his array of arguments quite effectivly. He is a good lawyer for his side.

The report of the deb te will probably be put in a pamphlet form, edite l by C. D. McKinney, a prominent lawyer of Cadiz, Ky., and I think that he will giv an impartial history.

There are some stanch Liberals at Golden Pond. Although they are in a minority, they hold their own. There is no church at Golden Pond, and it is one of the most orderly communities anywhere around.

The Bogard Brothers—Z. T. Bogard and W. A. Bogard—are the original Infidels of this section; but they are thoroughly respected by their Christian neighbors, and are not boycotted on account of their opinions. The firm of Bogard & Rhodes does the largest business at this point. Mr. E. W. Rhodes is on the Liberal side, although he has had to suffer on account of his unflinching attitude. But he is true blue whatever may happen. I wish there were more Freethought ladies in this community, for with their assistance a splendid progress could be made. I hope Mr. Rhodes will persuade some gentle lady to unite in this noble cause. I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Z. T. Bogard. In their large house the generous table was spread for all alike—the believer and the unbeliever.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Schram, F. M. Oakley, Joseph Mayes, W. S. Crass, the McWaters Brothers, are among our supporters here. Col. Bart Wood introduced me at the lecture. Everything went off pleasantly, but Golden Pond will not soon forget the excitement of the occasion. The waves of thought are rolling on.

Golden Pond presents a beautiful appearance at this season of the year. The fields and woods and gentle declivities stretch away in quiet and picturesque effulgence. The autumn colors decorate the varied scenes. I shall long remember Golden Pond and my friends here, and the battle for Freethought.

On Monday I go to Cadiz, Ky., where I lecture in the evening at the courtroom. I hav a good audience, but no ladies are present. It is pioneer work at Cadiz, but some of the best people of the place are Freethinkers, and it is hoped that in the future I may continue and bring out the latent elements of progress in this handsome rural town, the county-seat of Trig county, and one of the prettiest places in the state. The people that I met here are most cordial and intelligent, and advanced thought will always find a welcome.

I am up at 3 o'clock Tuesday morning, and in the darkness, with the lustrous morning star shining above, I take coach twelve miles away to the railroad station. From here I go to Princeton, Ky. I am sorry that I do not hav time to stop off and see Liberal friends—Mr. Eldred, Mr. Culett, and others. I arrive at Paducah, and find that my trunk is left far behind and I must telegraph and hunt it up. I am thus compelled to go to St. Louis by way of Fulton, Ky., at extra expense and time. I hav to take a mixed train to Fulton, and the distance, fifty miles, is traversed in six hours. I am just in time for the St. Louis train and hav to scramble for it.

I am thus on hand after an all-night ride for my appointment at Springfield, Ill. Here I meet with gratifying success. I lecture in the court-house. The audience is a fine one, and the discourse on the Bible and the World's Fair Sunday opening is well received. Over fifty names were signed to the Federation. This makes nearly two hundred names taken at Cincinnati, Golden Pond, etc., for the Federation. Springfield is a magnificent city. Mrs. J. F. Maisenbacher gave me a drive through its delightful avenues, with my friend, Miss Helen Celler. Elegant houses and beautiful trees make charming views.

Mr. and Mrs. Maisenbacher and family are stanch Liberals, and I enjoyed the hospitality of their attractiv home. Miss Helen Celler also gave cordial welcome and aid. Mr. W. F. Kelley introduced me at the lecture. He is activ in the cause, and is ready to lend a hand. I was glad to meet again comrade Walters, of Eau Claire, Wis.; also Mr. and Mrs. Walker, Mr. Smith and son, old friends on THE TRUTH SEEKER roll. Well, I cannot giv the names of all I met here. I intend to renew the campaign at the earliest possible moment. There is a splendid promis in this capital of the great state of Illinois.

Again I hav to take the midnight train, and through the darkling hours sweep on to Chicago. Here the world is all agog. A vast and brilliant scene opens upon me, such as seldom greets the eye of the Pilgrim in gorgeous East or golden West. An infinity of colors is here deftly woven together in wondrous array—flags and pennons and streamers of all nations floating in harmonious splendor, miles and miles of blazing effulgence. Oceans of music entrance, filling the air from a thousand instruments, while numberless troops—children and men in gay uniforms—march to the inspiring strains. The superb bloom of all the centuries flashes its radiant glory in the streets of marvelous Chicago.

I must, however, leave this animating scene and pursue my journey to Rochelle, where Wettstein is waiting for me, and here, around his genial fireside, we renew old memories. Otto does not grow old a bit, and he wages the warfare valiantly against the gods and the gods are fleeing. The torch of reason prevails.

Rochelle is an orthodox place, and I don't hav a large audience, but I hav an appreciativ one, and I enjoy meeting these friends, who come, some of them, ten or fifteen miles to attend the lecture. There are Jas. Smith and Elmer Smith, and John Yetter and wife, of Stewart, and Mr. and Mrs. Hazleton, of Kings, and Frank Praetz and son, and others, who make a generous rally. Rochelle looks to the dawn. The man with the badge-pin carries the day.

Wettstein and myself take the early train Friday for Chicago. We meet Mrs. Wettstein and friends, and as by good fortune tickets are furnished for the dedication exercises and away we go with the vast crowd to the greatest building on earth, with an area of forty-four acres. This was the first time I had visited the Fair grounds. A marvel of beauty and grandeur bursts upon me. The immense buildings, with wonderful columns and roofs and domes, present a scene of unrivaled magnificence. It is a sublime and amazing spectacle, the mighty crown of man's long career. The main hall of the manufacturers' building covers ten acres, one roof swinging over it all. Beneath this vast expanse two hundred thousand people are gathered. Like a bank of glittering roses on one side of the hall shines the chorus, five thousand people in one mass, from whence melodies roll like sweet and lofty thunders. The imposing ceremonies of the dedication are caught by the eye and not by the ear, and the mind is almost overwhelmed by the prodigious and accumulating splendors of sound and color, the swaying multitudes of joyous and excited people. In the evening, outflaming the stars, the fireworks gem the sky with "sweeping glories and long trains of light." So passes the great gala day of Chicago.

On Saturday morning the first one I greet is Franklin Steiner, our brave young worker of Des Moines. I was glad to meet our youthful and enthusiastic comrade. He has plenty of fire and energy for the great work of Freethought.

Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday are the days of the Congress of the American Secular Union. A good Congress has been held. Fellowship prevails. Misapprehensions hav been removed. There is a better understanding than ever before. There has been a change of front and there will be better work. In fact, things hav been straightened out and we can all go ahead with lively hope. There is to be no quarrel among ourselvs, and there will be freedom and harmony.

I hav enjoyed the Congress. I hav had three days of splendid companionship—hav met many friends. I can't name them all. Their names will be seen in the report elsewhere. I was glad to meet Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Jamieson, who hav so long been in our ranks. Tuesday evening we gathered around the hospitable table of Judge and Mrs. Waite, at Hotel Holland. Judge Waite has built an elegant block within a short distance of the Fair grounds at Hyde park, and it promises to be one of the most popular resorts of the city. I like Judge Waite. He has a level head and understands the principles of Secularism. His proposed amendment of the Sunday clause was just the thing and places the Union on right ground. Hitherto it has occupied a false and weak position. Judge Westbrook, I understand, forwarded to the Congress an elaborate argument in favor of closing the World's Fair on Sunday.

We are now upon a straight Secular platform. Mr. Wakeman's amendments unfold new possibilities. In fact, we might say there has been a revolution, but it came quietly and most effectivly.

I am glad to meet again this side the Rockies A. T. Jones, of the American Sentinel. He gave a magnificent address last night and fairly captured the audience. He has complete mastery of his subject. I want to call attention to his great book, "The Two Republics." Every Liberal should read this book. As a history of church usurpation in old Rome and new America, it cannot be surpassed.

I was quite surprised to find that Dr. Greer, one of the elected vice-presidents of the Union, was an old campaigner with me in Utah, when I first struck that biblical country. We traveled for miles together over the mountains, eight thousand feet high, to Tintie, where I got ahead of all the churches and gave a Freethought lecture before the voice of a priest was heard in that lofty region. It was too high for hell-fire to reach it. I shall never forget that trip, and I was simply taken aback when I found that Dr. Greer, of Chicago, was my genial and sturdy companion of that mountainous journey, almost to the skies. The doctor has had a hard fight with the ecclesiastics, but like myself he has not lost in weight. We are still ready for another campaign.

It was a pleasure to meet Mrs. Monroe and "Baby" Monroe, wife and daughter of our famous Dr. J. R. Monroe, and the spirit of the noble dead is in the inheritors of his renown. They carry onward the light of reason, and glory of liberty.

My next notes will be written from the bosom of the Rockies. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Liberals along the line of the Northern Pacific desiring lectures should address him at 345 W. Randolph street, Chicago.

"MR. EDITOR: The Ohio Liberal Society would like to hav Miss Voltairine de Cleyre deliver a lecture in Cincinnati, but, as she is stationed at Philadelphia, the cost of a lecture would be more than the society could well afford. If any societies along the route would engage Miss de Cleyre for lectures we could then obtain her services at less cost, as the railroad fare would be less. If any societies between here and Philadelphia care to hav a lecture from Miss de Cleyre the undersigned would be obliged if they would notify him as soon as possible. ANDREW HOGG, Secretary, 215 West Seventh street, Cincinnati, O."

Ernest Renan.*

Blessed are those Whose blood and judgment are so well co-mingled
That they are not a pipe for fortune's finger
To sound what stop she please.

Ernest Renan is dead. Another source of light; another force of civilization; another charming personality; another brave soul, graceful in thought, generous in deed; a sculptor in speech, a colorist in words—clothing all in the poetry born of a delightful union of heart and brain—has passed to the realm of rest.

Reared under the influences of Catholicism, educated for the priesthood, yet by reason of his natural genius, he began to think. Forces that utterly subjugate and enslave the mind of mediocrity sometimes rouse to thought and action the superior soul.

Renan began to think—a dangerous thing for a Catholic to do. Thought leads to doubt, doubt to investigation, investigation to truth—the enemy of all superstition.

He lifted the Catholic extinguisher from the light and flame of reason. He found that his mental vision was improved. He read the scriptures for himself, examined them as he did other books not claiming to be inspired. He found the same mistakes, the same prejudices, the same miraculous impossibilities in the book attributed to God that he found in those known to have been written by men.

Into the path of reason, or rather into the highway, Renan was led by Henriette, his sister, to whom he pays a tribute that has the perfume of a perfect flower.

"I was," writes Renan, "brought up by women and priests, and therein lies the whole explanation of my good qualities and of my defects." In most that he wrote is the tenderness of woman, only now and then a little touch of the priest showing itself, mostly in a reluctance to spoil the ivy by tearing down some prison built by superstition.

In spite of the heartless "scheme" of things he still found it in his heart to say, "When God shall be complete, he will be just," at the same time saying that "nothing proves to us that there exists in the world a central consciousness—a soul of the universe—and nothing proves the contrary." So, whatever was the verdict of his brain, his heart asked for immortality. He wanted his dream, and he was willing that others should have theirs. Such is the wish and will of all great souls.

He knew the church thoroughly and anticipated what would finally be written about him by churchmen: "Having some experience of ecclesiastical writers I can sketch out in advance the way my biography will be written in Spanish in some Catholic review of Santa Fé in the year 2,000. Heavens! how black I shall be! I shall be so all the more, because the church when she feels that she is lost will end with malice. She will bite like a mad dog."

. . . . . .

The time has arrived when Jesus must become a myth or a man. The idea that he was the infinite God must be abandoned by all who are not religiously insane. Those who have given up the claim that he was God, insist that he was divinely appointed and illuminated; that he was a perfect man—the highest possible type of the human race, and consequently, a perfect example for all the world.

As time goes on, as men get wider or grander or more complex ideas of life, as the intellectual horizon broadens, the idea that Christ was perfect may be modified.

The New Testament seems to describe several individuals under the same name, or at least one individual who passed through several stages or phases of religious development. Christ is described as a devout Jew, as one who endeavored to comply in all respects with the old law. Many sayings are attributed to him consistent with this idea. He certainly was a Hebrew in belief and feeling when he said "Swear not by Heaven because it is God's throne, nor by earth for it is his footstool; nor by Jerusalem, for it is his holy city." These reasons were in exact accordance with the mythology of the Jews. God was regarded simply as an enormous man, as one who walked in the garden in the cool of the evening, as one who had met man face to face, who had conversed with Moses for forty days upon Mount Sinai, as a great king, with a throne in the heavens, using the earth to rest his feet upon, and regarding Jerusalem as his holy city.

Then we find plenty of evidence that he wished to reform the religion of the Jews; to fulfill the law, not to abrogate it. Then there is still another change: he has ceased his efforts to reform that religion and has become a destroyer. He holds the temple in contempt and repudiates the idea that Jerusalem is the holy city. He concludes that it is unnecessary to go to some mountain or some building to worship or to find God, and insists that the heart is the true temple, that ceremonies are useless, that all pomp and pride and show are needless, and that it is enough to worship God under heaven's dome, in spirit and in truth.

We know now—if we know anything—that Jesus was mistaken about the coming of the end, and we know now that he was greatly controled in his ideas of life by that mistake. Believing that the end was near, he said, "Take no thought for the morrow, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink or wherewithal ye shall be clothed." It was in view of the destruction of the world that he called the attention of his disciples to the lily that toiled not and yet excelled Solomon in the glory of its raiment. Having made this mistake, having acted upon it, certainly we cannot now say that he was perfect in knowledge.

He is regarded by many millions as the impersonation of patience, of forbearance, of meekness and mercy, and yet, according to the account, he said many extremely bitter words, and threatened eternal pain.

We also know, if the account be true, that he claimed to have supernatural power, to work miracles, to cure the blind and to raise the dead, and we know that he did nothing of the kind. So if the writers of the New Testament tell the truth as to what Christ claimed, it is absurd to say that he was a perfect man. If honest, he was deceived, and those who are deceived are not perfect.

There is nothing in the New Testament, so far as we know, that touches on the duties of nation to nation, or of nation to its citizens; nothing of human liberty; not one word about education; not the faintest hint that there is such a thing as science; nothing calculated to stimulate industry, commerce, or invention; not one word in favor of art, of music or anything calculated to feed or clothe the body, nothing to develop the brain of man.

Renan, in spite of his education, regarded Christ as a man, and did the best he could to account for the miracles that had been attributed to him, for the legends that had gathered about his name, and the impossibilities connected with his career, and also tried to account for the origin or birth of these miracles, of these legends, of these myths, including the resurrection and ascension. I am not satisfied with all the conclusions he reached or with all the paths he traveled. The refraction of light caused by passing through a woman's tears is hardly a sufficient foundation for a belief in so miraculous a miracle as the bodily ascension of Jesus Christ.

There is another thing attributed to Christ that seems to me conclusive evidence against the claim of perfection. Christ is reported to have said that all sins could be forgiven except the sin against the Holy Ghost. This sin, however, is not defined. Although Christ died for the whole world, that through him all might be saved, there is this one terrible exception: There is no salvation for those who have sinned, or who may hereafter sin, against the Holy Ghost. Thousands of persons are now in asylums, having lost their reason because of their fear that they had committed this unknown, this undefined, this unpardonable sin.

It is said that a Roman emperor went through a form of publishing his laws or proclamations, posting them so high on pillars that they could not be read, and then took the lives of those who ignorantly violated these unknown laws. He was regarded as a tyrant, as a murderer. And yet, what shall we say of one who declared that the sin against the Holy Ghost was the only one that could not be forgiven, and then left an ignorant world to guess what that sin is? Undoubtedly this horror is an interpolation.

There is something like it in the Old Testament. It is asserted by Christians that the Ten Commandments are the foundation of all law and of all civilization, and you will find lawyers insisting that the Mosaic code was the first information that man received on the subject of law; that before that time the world was without any knowledge of justice or mercy. If this be true the Jews had no divine laws, no real instruction on any legal subject until the Ten Commandments were given. Consequently, before that time there had been proclaimed or published no law against the worship of other gods or of idols. Moses had been on Mount Sinai talking with Jehovah. At the end of the dialogue he received the tables of stone and started down the mountain for the purpose of imparting this information to his followers. When he reached the camp he heard music. He saw people dancing, and he found that in his absence Aaron and the rest of the people had cast a molten calf which they were then worshiping. This so enraged Moses that he broke the tables of stone and made preparations for the punishment of the Jews. Remember that they knew nothing about this law, and, according to the modern Christian claims, could not have known that it was wrong to melt gold and silver and mold it in the form of a calf. And yet Moses killed about thirty thousand of these people for having violated a law of which they had never heard; a law known only to one man and one God. Nothing could be more unjust, more ferocious, than this; and yet it can hardly be said to exceed in cruelty the announcement that a certain sin was unpardonable and then failure to define the sin. Possibly, to inquire what the sin is, is the sin.

Renan regards Jesus as a man, and his work gets its value from the fact that it is written from a human standpoint. At the same time, consciously or unconsciously, or maybe for the purpose of sprinkling a little holy water on the heat of religious indignation, he now and then seems to speak of him as more than human, or as having accomplished something that man could not.

He asserts that "the gospels are in part legendary; that they contain many things not true; that they are full of miracles and of the supernatural." At the same time he insists that these legends, these miracles, these supernatural things do not affect the truth of the probable things contained in these writings. He sees and sees clearly, that there is no evidence that Matthew, or Mark, or Luke, or John wrote the books attributed to them; that, as a matter of fact, the mere title of "according to Matthew," "according to Mark," shows that they were written by others who claimed them to be in accordance with the stories that had been told by Matthew or by Mark. So Renan takes the ground that the gospel of Luke is founded on anterior documents and "is the work of a man who selected, pruned, and combined, and that the same man wrote the Acts of the Apostles and in the same way."

The gospels were certainly written long after the events described, and Renan finds the reason for this in the fact that the Christians believed that the world was about to end; that, consequently, there was no need of composing books; it was only necessary for them to preserve in their hearts during the little margin of time that remained a lively image of him whom they soon expected to meet in the clouds. For this reason the gospels themselves had but little authority for one hundred and fifty years, the Christians relying on oral traditions. Renan shows that there was not the slightest scruple about inserting additions in the gospels, variously combining them, and in completing some by taking parts from others; that the books passed from hand to hand, and that each one transcribed in the margin of his copy the words and parables he had found elsewhere which touched him; that it was not until human tradition became weakened that the text bearing the names of the Apostles became authoritative.

In the gospel of John you will find the metaphysics of the church. There you find the second birth. There you find the doctrine of the atonement clearly set forth. There you find that God died for the whole world, and that whosoever believeth not in him is to be damned. There is nothing of the kind in Matthew. Matthew makes Christ say that, if you will forgive others, God will forgive you. The gospel "according to Mark" is the same. So is the gospel "according to Luke." There is nothing about salvation through belief, nothing about the atonement. In Mark, in the last chapter, the Apostles are told to go into all the world and preach the gospel, with the statement that whoever believed and was baptized should be saved, and whoever failed to believe should be damned. But we now know that that is an interpolation. Consequently, Matthew, Mark, and Luke never had the faintest conception of the "Christian religion." They knew nothing of the atonement, nothing of salvation by faith—nothing. So that, if a man had read only Matthew, Mark, and Luke, and had strictly followed what he found, he would have found himself, after death, in perdition.

Renan finds that certain portions of the gospel "according to John" were added later; that the entire twenty-first chapter is an interpolation; also that many places bear the traces of erasures and corrections. So he says that it would be "impossible for anyone to compose a life of Jesus, with any meaning in it, from the discourses which John attributes to him, and he holds that this gospel of John is full of preaching, Christ demonstrating himself; full of argumentation, full of stage effect, devoid of simplicity, with long arguments after each miracle, stiff and awkward discourses, the tone of which is often false and unequal." He also insists that there are evidently "artificial portions, variations like that of a musician improvising on a given theme."

In spite of all this, Renan, willing to soothe the prejudice of his time, takes the ground that the four canonical gospels are authentic, that they date from the first century, that the authors were, generally speaking, those to whom they are attributed; but he insists that their historic value is very diverse. This is a backhanded stroke. Admitting, first, that they are authentic; second, that they were written about the end of the first century; third, that they are not of equal value, disposes, so far as he is concerned, of the dogma of inspiration.

One is at a loss to understand why four gospels should have been written. As a matter of fact there can be only one true account of any occurrence, or of any number of occurrences. Now, it must be taken for granted, that an inspired account is true. Why then should there be four inspired accounts? It may be answered that all were not to write the entire story. To this the reply is that all attempted to cover substantially the same ground.

Many years ago the early fathers thought it necessary to say why there were four inspired books, and some of them said, because there were four cardinal directions and the gospels fitted the north, south, east, and west. Others said that there were four principal winds—a gospel for each wind. They might have added that some animals have four legs.

Renan reached the conclusion that the gospels are neither biographies after the manner of Suetonius nor fictitious legends in the style of Philostratus, but that they are legend ry biographies like the legends of the saints, the lives of Pl tinus and Isidore, in which historical truth and the desire to present models of virtue are combined in various degrees; that they are "inexact;" that they "contain numerous errors and discordances." So he takes the ground that twenty or thirty years after Christ his reputation had greatly increased, that "legends had begun to gather about him like clouds," that "death added to his perfection, freeing him from all defects in the eyes of those who had loved him, that his followers wrested the prophecies so that they might fit him. They said, 'he is the messiah.' The messiah was to do certain things; therefore Jesus did certain things. Then an account would be given of the doing." All of which of course shows that there can be maintained no theory of inspiration.

Renan reaches the conclusion, proving every step that he takes, that the four principal documents—that is to say, the four gospels—are in "flagrant contradiction one with another." He attacks, and with perfect success, the miracles of the scriptures, and upon this subject says: "Observation, which has never once been falsified, teaches us that miracles never happen, but in times and countries in which they are believed and before persons disposed to believe them. No miracle ever occurred in the presence of men capable of testing its miraculous character." He further takes the ground that no contemporary miracle will bear inquiry, and that consequently it is probable that the miracles of antiquity which have been performed in popular gatherings would be shown to be simple illusion, were it possible to criticise them in detail. In the name of universal experience he banishes miracles from history. These were brave things to do, things that will bear good fruit. As long as men believe in miracles, past or present, they remain the prey of superstition. The Catholic is taught that miracles were performed anciently not only, but that they are still being performed. This is consistent inconsistency. Protestants teach a double doctrine: That miracles used to be performed, that the laws of nature used to be violated, but that no miracle is performed now. No Protestant will admit that any miracle was performed by the Catholic church. Otherwise, Protestants could not be justified in leaving a church with whom the God of miracles dwelt. So every Protestant has to adopt two kinds of reasoning: that the laws of Nature used to be violated and that miracles used to be performed, but that since the apostolic age Nature has had her way and the Lord has allowed facts to exist and to hold the field. A supernatural account, according to Renan, "always implies credulity or imposture"—probably both.

It does not seem possible to me that Christ claimed for himself what the Testament claims for him. These claims were made by admirers, by followers, by missionaries.

When the early Christians went to Rome they found plenty of demigods. It was hard to set aside the religion of a demigod by telling the story of a man from Nazareth. These missionaries, not to be outdone in ancestry, insisted—and this was after the gospel "according to St. John" had been written—that Christ was the son of God. Matthew believed that he was the son of David, and the messiah, and gave the genealogy of Joseph, his father, to support that claim.

In the time of Christ no one imagined that he was of divine origin. This was an aftergrowth. In order to place themselves on an equality with pagans they started the claim of divinity, and also took the second step requisite in that country: First, a god for his father, and second, a virgin for his mother. This was the pagan combination of greatness, and the Christians added to this that Christ was God.

It is hard to agree with the conclusion reached by Renan, that Christ formed and intended to form a church. Such evidence, it seems to me, is hard to find in the Testament. Christ seemed to satisfy himself, according to the Testament, with a few statements, some of them exceedingly wise and tender, some utterly impracticable and some intolerant.

If we accept the conclusions reached by Renan we will throw away, the legends without foundation; the miraculous legends; and everything inconsistent with what we know of nature. Very little will be left—a few sayings to be found among those attributed to Confucius, to Buddha, to Krishna, to Epictetus, to Zeno, and to many others. Some of these sayings are full of wisdom, full of kindness, and others rush to such extremes that they touch the borders of insanity. When struck on one cheek to turn the other, is really joining a conspiracy to secure the triumph of brutality. To agree not to resist evil is to become an accomplice of all injustice. We must not take from industry, from patriotism, from virtue, the right of self-defense.

It had been contended for many years that no one could pass judgment on the veracity of the scriptures who did not understand Hebrew. This position was perfectly absurd. No man needs to be a student of Hebrew to know that the shadow on the dial did not go back several degrees to convince a petty king that a boil was not to be fatal. Renan, however, filled the requirement. He was an excellent Hebrew scholar. This was a fortunate circumstance, because it answered a very old objection.

The founder of Christianity was, for his own sake, taken from the divine pedestal and allowed to stand like other men on the earth, to be judged by what he said and did, by his theories, by his philosophy, by his spirit.

No matter whether Renan came to a correct conclusion or not, his work did a vast deal of good. He convinced many that implicit reliance could not be placed upon the gospels, that the gospels themselves are of unequal worth; that they were deformed by ignorance and falsehood, or, at least, by mistake; that if they wished to save the reputation of Christ they must not rely wholly on the gospels, or on what is found in the New Testament, but they must go farther and examine all legends touching him. Not only so, but they must throw away the miraculous, the impossible, and the absurd.

He did another great service, not only to Jews, but to Christendom, by writing the history of "The People of Israel." Christians for many centuries have persecuted the Jews. They have charged them with the greatest conceivable crime—with having crucified an infinite God. This absurdity has hardened the hearts of men and poisoned the minds of children. The persecution of the Jews is the meanest, the most senseless and cruel page in history. Every civilized Christian should feel on his cheeks the red spots of shame as he reads the wretched and infamous story. The flame of this prejudice is fanned and fed in the Sunday-schools of our day, and the orthodox minister points proudly to the atrocities perpetrated against the Jews by the barbarians of Russia as evidences of the truth of the inspired scriptures. In every wound God puts a tongue to proclaim the truth of his book.

If the charge that the Jews killed God were true, it is hardly reasonable to hold those who are now living responsible for what their ancestors did nearly nineteen centuries ago.

But there is another point in connection with this matter: If Christ was God, then the Jews could not have killed him without his consent; and according to the orthodox creed, if he had not been sacrificed, the whole world would have suffered eternal pain. Nothing can exceed the meanness of the prejudice of Christians against the Jewish people. They should not be held responsible for their savage ancestors, or for their belief that Jehovah was an intelligent and merciful God, superior to all other gods. Even Christians do not wish to be held responsible for the Inquisition, for the Torquemadas and the John Calvins, for the witch-burners and the Quaker-whippers, for the slave-traders and child-stealers, the most of whom were believers in our "glorious gospel," and many of whom had been born the second time.

Renan did much to civilize the Christians by telling the truth in a charming and convincing way about the "People of Israel." Both sides are greatly indebted to him: one he has ably defended, and the other greatly enlightened.

Having done what good he could in giving what he believed was light to his fellowmen, he had no fear of becoming a victim of God's wrath, and so he laughingly said: "For my part I imagine that if the eternal in his severity were to send me to hell I should succeed in escaping from it. I would send up to my creator a supplication that would make him smile. The course of reasoning by which I would prove to him that it was through his fault that I was damned would be so subtle that he would find some difficulty in replying. The fate which would suit me best is purgatory—a charming place, where many delightful romances begun on earth must be continued."

Such cheerfulness, such good philosophy, with cap and bells, such banter and blasphemy, such sound and solid sense drive to madness the priest who thinks the curse of Rome can fright the world. How the snake of superstition writhes when he finds that his fangs have lost their poison.

He was one of the gentlest of men—one of the fairest in discussion, dissenting from the views of others with modesty, presenting his own with clearness and candor. His mental manners were excellent. He was not positive as to the "unknowable." He said "perhaps." He knew that knowledge is good if it increases the happiness of man; and he felt that superstition is the assassin of liberty and civilization. He lived a life of cheerfulness, of industry, devoted to the welfare of mankind. He was a seeker of happiness by the highway of the natural, a destroyer of the dogmas of mental deformity, a worshiper of Liberty and the Ideal. As he lived, he died—hopeful and serene—and now, standing in imagination by his grave, we ask: Will the night be eternal? The brain says, Perhaps; while the heart hopes for the Dawn.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

The American Secular Union Congress.

From among the hundreds of thousands of visitors who crowded Chicago, as it never was before, to attend the dedicatory exercises of the World's Fair, some twenty-five Freethinkers remained to attend the Sixteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, several expressing their regrets that when railroad fares had been so favorable a greater gathering had not been drawn together.

The "Old Forum" was the appointed place of meeting, but how unlike the Forum of the days of the Chicago Secular Union's triumphs. Then it had been repainted. The aisles were carpeted, the permanent seats were cushioned, a paid quartet were accompanied by the peals of an organ, and over the central arch was suspended a cross, surmounted by an American flag. Now the building is barren and bare. The seats hav been removed and it is now usually rented for indoor baseball games and dances of a not very exclusiv class.

It was a lovely October morn, clear but cool, Sunday, the 23d, when President C. B. Waite called the Congress to order and delivered the following address:

To-day we are an astonished people. Knowing that our government was founded upon the principles of civil and religious liberty, we rested quietly under the clamor for religious legislation, not believing for a moment that Congress would yield to such demands. Now we awake from our lethargy to find a union of church and state already inaugurated, and all branches of the government fully committed to the requirements of a religious hierarchy.

The character of this religio-political despotism which is to take the place of our free institutions has not yet been fully developed—the particulars are not all arranged. It has not yet been determined which of the two grand divisions of the church shall in the first instance represent the Christian religion, much less hav the subsequent struggles for precedence in the favored party itself been anticipated and provided for. That is in case it should be the Protestant party. If it should be the Catholic party, there would not, perhaps, be much discussion.

But these questions will soon arise, and their decision will be forced upon the government.

Lack of space precludes our giving more of the address. It was well received.

B. F. Underwood moved that the president be authorized to appoint a committee on credentials, a committee on resolutions, and one on nominations.

H. C. Bennett moved to strike out all but that portion relating to the committee on credentials, which was passed.

The chairman appointed as such committee Dr. Greer, Geo. Borst, Alfred Schaffner, G. Sharpless, all of Chicago; and G. W. Devenbaugh, of Brimfield, Ind. This committee was instructed to report at the afternoon session.

The president thought that was a good time for the secretary to read the annual report.

The report had very little progress to point out, merely that a meeting had been held in Chicago, and that the secretary had written numerous articles and letters; that the president had protested against the prohibition, by Congress, of the delivery of ice in the District of Columbia on Sunday. There was a very foolish allusion to leaving her enemies to be ground out exceedingly fine by the gods, or something to that effect, and then she tendered her resignation—with a string to it.

After these flights of rhetoric and lack of results the Congress seemed anxious to adjourn to 2:30 P.M., as many had to wear their overcoats, the atmosphere being so chilly.

At 3 P.M. the credentials committee confessed that they were unable to report, nor would they be until next day.

H. C. Bennett moved that the committee should report at the commencement of the evening session, which motion was accepted, and the session devoted to speeches.

John F. Geeting's topic was the "Field of Freethought." He reviewed the history of the Secular Society from its incipiency to the present time, and showed how it had "steadily advanced in spite of opposition and discouragements." Mr. Geeting made a plea against the use of the Bible or any form of religious worship in the public schools. He said: "By the use of the Bible and forms of religious worship in the public schools children are taught not how to think but what to think."

"Thaddeus of Warsaw," or Thaddeus of New York, ex-president of the National Liberal League, made a strong appeal for a reconstruction or resurrection of the Union, while advocating the adoption of his amendment made at the Philadelphia session. Mr. Wakeman took as his text Colonel Ingersoll's remarks on "Organized Credulity," pointing out that all this World's Fair furore, all this Columbus demonstration, had been captured by organized ignorance for the perpetuation of its kind. It had secured the religious sentiment of the people and through that practically the government of this country. By the power of organization, the church, representing only one-third of the people, forces upon the country a stupendous stupidity. Think of that in a country established by a Washington, a Jefferson, or a Paine. Under the leadership of the founders of this government the gods had been dismissed from politics. The late decision of the Supreme Court on the question of opening the World's Fair on Sunday—like the Dred Scott case decision—is one of fearful foreboding. By that decision superstition has been naturalized. That decision will be the mother of numerous offspring, and that before long. It is practically the end of individual rights.

Since credulity is so powerfully intrenched we must organize intelligence. The Secular Union is not broad enough as a basis for human social life. We must organize similarly to the Secular societies of England, the Positivists of France, or the Frie Gemeinde of Germany. We must organize not only to enforce our political demands, but become a practical substitute for the church. By our neglect of the social life of man, the church has captured the crowd. We must arrange to attend the funerals of members—not permit them to be buried like dogs, which the church would do if not within their fold; make marriage a secular, not a religious institution, and make our local societies the means of philosophy, of social life, and all human relations where modern science and modern intellect can cater to the requirements of man.

To do this many organizations, many integrations, are necessary. On the one hand is the Secular Union, on the other the Federation of America, headed by Mr. Putnam, who might be compared to the gallant knights of old. Then again to guard against sectarianism in our laws is the National Defense Association, of which Dr. Foote is president. All these were essential to the development of the movement, all had some good elements about them.

Mr. Wakeman preferred that the name should be changed, and gave an elaborate definition from a scientific standpoint of the word "religion," which word, he regretted, however, would be very obnoxious to Freethinkers. He believed the states should be organized after the manner they hav recently done in Ohio, explaining in detail what might be accomplished by such state organizations under proper leadership. Mr. Wakeman thought good material for lecturers and organizers could be found in every state and almost in every large city. However, there ought to be some check; such lecturers should receive the indorsement of an examining board, so that it should be shown they were qualified intellectually and morally to go out in the field and labor. The question would be asked, as we had no money, how we were going to engage in all this. The way to accomplish that was to forage on the enemy. That was what Mr. Putnam had been doing for years and he, Mr. Putnam, looked as though he had done pretty well. [Laughter, in which the rotund Putnam heartily joined.] By foraging on the enemy the Mormons had become a power. Among them, when a saint was commissioned to go out and convert the gentiles, he had to pull up stakes and light out. He had to take his chances, and they were scarcely ever known to fail. Neither did the early Apostles hav any fat salary behind them, but their ideas had grown apace. We must do the same if we are to succeed.

It was evident from Mr. Wakeman's remarks that a good deal of changes were necessary to make the American Secular Union, as now constituted, meet his approbation, and his address was listened to with marked attention and frequently applauded.

Horace C. Bennett, president of the Chicago Secular Union, one of the few persons of prominence left in that society, almost regretted that he had prepared a speech, as he felt inclined to further elaborate the ideas of the previous speaker. His address, on "The Responsibility of the American Secular Union," was:

The American Secular Union is to-day the organization of all others which advocates and demands the total divorcement from the affairs of the state of the affairs of religion. It has no other creed, no other platform, no other aim.

Had the condition of things which it demands, which it asserts, existed, it is very doubtful if history's pages would be blotted and blurred as they are by the severe cruelty and blind fanatic revenge which has characterized the conduct of all religious wars.

Any form of religion, whether Buddhistic, Jewish, Christian, or other, would hardly carry on war with another Christian or pagan nation without the aid of the secular government.

Any union of religion with the secular government as a part and parcel of it, if history is correct, becomes a terrible power of intolerance and persecution. The influences of priestcraft and the superstitions created by nearly every form of religion, when united with the secular government, hav impelled the ruling power to obey and carry out the behests and decrees of the church upon nonconformists and unbelievers to a degree of cruelty, even to the death for trivial offenses, which we of this day and generation cannot realize.

The Inquisition, with its terrible cruelties, together with all forms of punishment for nonconformists and unbelievers, the remnants and shadow of which hav even reached this age, would hardly hav occurred were it not for the union of church and state.

The cruelties of persecution by one religious sect of another, by believers of one form of religion of another, would hardly hav existed without the aid of the secular government.

Divorce church from state absolutely and in every regard. Let intelligence, reason, and the human attributes, unprejudiced and unbiased by superstition and fanaticism, control governments, and religious questions whether there be a trinity or a unity, whether there be a personal God or a spiritual God, whether it be necessary to be sprinkled or immersed in order to be born again, or indeed, whether it be necessary to be born again, would be a difference between the opinion of individuals, and wars, persecutions, and cruelties such as hav dimmed the pages of the history of the human race would hav never occurred.

I hold that religion in its true sense is that within us which stimulates and generates aspirations for the nobler, the better, and the purer. Religion in its proper sense is man's private property, and his mode of worship or nonworship is between him and the Unknowable, the Unfathomable Mystery.

When religion takes upon itself a form and adopts a creed, whether it be Buddhistic, Jewish, Christian, or other, and forms an alliance with the government of the land to perpetuate and promote itself, then it becomes obnoxious, then it loses its true quality of might, in using the tangible to enforce a false life into the intangible or spiritual.

Totally divorce your church from your state; then and not till then will you hav religious liberty in place of offensiv religious authority. The weakness of the church is its appeal to the secular government to enforce its theories and its beliefs; its strength would be greater if it followed only the glorious teachings of men like Socrates, of Jesus, and of Theodore Parker.

The mission of the Secular Union is a grand one. Let it establish its demands and it would then help alike the cause of religion in its true sense and the cause of humanity in its broadest sense.

The Secular Union is charged with the responsibility, more than is any other institution in the land, of proclaiming the truth which will do away with wars, persecutions, bloodshedding, and griefs and sorrows of this kind in every particular. Wars cannot be carried on without the aid of government; persecutions hav always had its sanction.

I charge the Liberals, Seculars, and Freethinkers who assemble in this Congress, to bury forever personal strife and past animosities, and organize with true Christians, true Jews, and true men and women everywhere, to contest for a secular government in its true sense. Two-thirds of the people in this country, if the subject is properly brought to their attention, in my judgment, are in favor of the Nine Demands of Secularism, and if this organization fails to bring its principles, its ideas, its aims, and its objects before the American people it is lacking either in ability or the sense of its grave responsibilities. In the light of the recent act of Congress, which is in effect a secular assistance to God almighty to keep his day holy, greater responsibilities are imposed on this organization. Will it accept them and discharge the duty and function it has assumed? The answer will be your action.

SUNDAY EVENING SESSION.

After a song by Miss Love, B. F. Underwood lectured on "State Secularization." He was followed by a Mr. Tindall, of the Inter-Ocean, on the Sunday newspaper. Mrs. Freeman occupied the rest of the evening, her lecture being "Religion in the Republic."

MONDAY'S SESSION.

The committee on credentials made the following report:

Members and delegates entitled to vote: T. B. Wakeman, Society of Humanity, New York; S. P. Putnam, New York Liberal Club; J. W. Harrington, J. F. Lawrence, Cincinnati Secular Society; Richard Spencer, Dayton, O., Secular Union; Geo. Borst, Alfred Schaffner, Jehu Barr, Mrs. Ames, H. C. Bennett, Chicago Secular Union; Franklin Steiner, Des Moines, Ia.

Charter members: B. F. Underwood, Chicago.

Life members: E. A. Stevens; Jas. A. Greenhill; G. A. F. de Lespinasse, Mrs. de Lespinasse, Orange City, Ia.; John Hoog, Brayton, Ia.; Juliet H. Severance, C. B. Waite, J. H. Greer, Mrs. M. A. Freeman, and A. M. Freeman, Chicago, Ill.; D. A. Blodgett, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Annual members: M. Reiman; S. G. Sharpless; S. W. Devenbaugh, Brimfield, Ind.; Otto Wettstein, Rochelle, Ill.; John F. Geeting, and W. J. Adams, Chicago, Ill.; Alfred E. Doyle, Dayton Secular Union; Le Roy Dutton; W. F. Jamieson and Mrs. W. F. Jamieson; G. Benson, Bucyrus, O.; J. W. Hosmer, Jamesville, Minn.; Andrew Willard and B. Thorpe, Beaver Dam, Wis.; Mrs. Caroline Piper, Chicago, Ill.

The above report was then adopted.

A request was made that a committee on resolutions be appointed. The chair announced as such committee: B. F. Underwood, T. B. Wakeman, J. F. Geeting, Mrs. Ames, Geo. Borst.

On motion of T. B. Wakeman it was decided that the election of officers should take place at the afternoon session.

As the treasurer did not appear with his report an auditing committee were selected to see to his accounts.

On motion of S. P. Putnam the committee on resolutions were instructed to report at the afternoon session, or not later than the evening.

Letters were read from Chas. Watts, Will S. Andres, Ernest Mendum, L. K. Washburn, R. B. Westbrook.

The chair introduced a gentleman who had painted a sketch of Franklin's garret, where, according to his theory, Washington and Jefferson assembled to write the Declaration of Independence. And the artist desired to paint a large picture for the Union if they felt like indorsing the idea. The chair appointed Horace C. Bennett, as a person of artistic culture, to look into the matter and report.

The chair brought up the question of constitutional amendments, and introduced his proposition as first in order, which was: "The repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath."

Judge Waite stated at length his reasons for this change.

John F. Geeting opposed the amendment on the ground that it would result in compelling the laborers to work on Sunday.

Horace C. Bennett proposed to add the words "as a religious institution."

T. B. Wakeman proposed a lengthy amendment to the amendment.

After a lively debate participated in by Messrs. Geeting, T. B. Wakeman, H. C. Bennett, Harrington, and Dr. Severance the amendment as proposed by C. B. Waite was adopted.

Next in order were the amendments proposed by T. B. Wakeman, published in THE TRUTH SEEKER shortly after the congress at Philadelphia.

ARTICLE I.—THE CONGRESS NON-PARTISAN.

The American Secular Union (Congress) is strictly non-partisan and non-partisan both in religion and politics, but will use any and all honorable means to secure its objects as above stated. It is not, and will not be, either publicly or privately committed to the advancement of any system of religious belief or disbelief, but honestly welcomes all societies or persons of whatever faith or party to its deliberations and memberships on the basis of "no union of church and state." The word "Secular" is here used in the broadest sense as applied to the state and state Secularization, and not to any system of religion, or philosophy, or politics.

ARTICLE VII.

As it reads now, except after "lecturers" add "or agents," and after "general objects of the Union" add "or any special objects."

ARTICLE IX.

After "full list of auxiliary" add "and of coöperativ and federation societies and individuals."

ARTICLE XII.—LOCAL AUXILIARY AND OTHER SOCIETIES AND STATE ORGANIZATIONS.

1. As it now reads on page seven, and on page eight insert this:

2. Auxiliary or federativ societies must agree with this Union and its congress in regard to state Secularization, but may also extend the principle of Secularization, if they desire, to moral, philosophical, educational, and social purposes, including the general conduct of life, or to any other lawful purposes, and will hav their constitutions and proceedings adapted to their general wants and local objects. All such societies shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and the efficient coöperation of the freest kind with this Union and its congress and its local coöperativ societies. Neither shall this Union or its congress be responsible for the acts or utterances of any local or coöperativ societies, or of any state organization, or of any individual whatever.

For the purpose of increasing and organizing in the several states of the United States local and coöperativ societies the board of directors is hereby authorized and directed to aid the formation of such societies by special efforts in the several states and to unite them under proper officers into state organizations for the purpose of the Union and as supporters of the congress, and which societies may hav other and further objects as above stated. To secure and further such state organizations in each state the board is empowered to appoint lecturers and organizers in each state. But after the state organizations are effected they and their local societies shall be independent in all respects as above provided in this article.

ARTICLE XIII.

After the word "constitution" add "and any state federativ or coöperativ society accepted by the congress."

E. A. Stevens remarked that when the Congress had nothing else to do, it very industriously went to work to change the constitution. Attempts for years had been made to enlist the lecturers to work for the organization, but up to the present time these efforts had been utterly futil. The lecturers would go where it paid them to go, regardless of the American Secular Union. He did not think these amendments would prove of any more importance.

The time for the noon recess having arrived, action on the amendments was postponed.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Another lengthy discussion and explanation followed, some fearing that outside societies might attempt to capture the Congress. However, Mr. Wakeman's amendments were finally adopted unanimously.

Dr. de Lespinasse's amendment, that life membership certificates shall be $10 instead of $25, came up for discussion.

Mr. Geeting was opposed, but was willing that a $10 life certificate should be good for fifteen years. This created some considerable merriment at Mr. Geeting's expense, but Dr. de Lespinasse's amendment was adopted, with the further amendment of T. B. Wakeman that each certificate should be subject to the approval of the Congress.

The chairman of the committee on resolutions not having made his appearance since his appointment, T. B. Wakeman called upon S. P. Putnam to read the resolutions he had prepared for the committee:

Resolved, That the religious conspiracy for the union of church and state in this republic having achieved its first triumph, an issue of universal importance is now presented to the Liberals of this country. In the case of the Trinity church of New York vs. the United States the Supreme Court of the United States by another Dred Scott decision has laid the foundation for ecclesiastical legislation by deciding in effect that the Christian religion is a national institution. The logical outcome of the decision is that disbelievers in the Christian religion may hav no rights which believers are bound to respect. Against this decision the American Secular Union unflinchingly protests and will do everything in its power to reverse this decision by action of the people.

Resolved, That the late vote of Congress to close the World's Fair on Sunday is revolutionary, unconstitutional, and most dangerous to civil liberty, and is a crime against the working people, who can only visit the World's Fair on Sunday. For the first time during the hundred years of the existence of this republic hav the supporters of Sabbath legislation received the aid of the national government. They hav demanded that the sword may be drawn to enforce conformity to observances which when supported only by persuasion are fast falling into oblivion. The age of religious persecution has not yet passed. We stand to-day facing a great revolution. The work is too momentous to permit Liberals to present any other than a united front to bigotry and superstition. In a fraternal spirit we should discuss the best mode of conducting the campaign, and carry on the work with such vigor and tenacity of purpose as must result in reëstablishing the ancient landmarks and restoring to our beloved land the principles of civil and religious liberty.

Resolved, That we heartily recognize the fact that some religious societies and many clergymen throughout the country are taking a stand for civil and religious freedom. The Seventh Day Adventists especially form a strong bulwark of liberty against the encroachments of religious tyranny. The American Secular Union will hav no quarrel with any organization whose purpose is the total separation of church and state. It will cowork with all Liberal societies and associations for a secular government, devoting its whole energies to the overthrow of the common enemy.

Resolved, That the persecution of the Seventh Day Adventists in Tennessee and other states, where they are tried, fined, and imprisoned, and sent to the chain-gang for simply obeying the Bible and working quietly on Sunday, is a disgrace to the civilization of this country, and demands the most earnest efforts on the part of the Liberals of this country to repeal those unjust laws under which religious liberty is so cruelly violated.

Resolved, That while this Union is opposed to any Sabbath or Sunday legislation which interferes with personal or religious liberty it leaves as outside its special province any restriction of the time of labor by general law, but these restrictions should be to limit the number of hours per day or days per week of labor, without regard to the rest of the community, or any theological or religious considerations whatsoever.

Resolved, That the persecution of Moses Harman and Ezra H. Heywood for violation of the so-called Comstock laws is an outrage against human rights, against a just freedom of the mails and freedom of the press. These men are martyrs to the cause of human liberty. They hav committed no crime; hav simply discussed social questions of supreme importance in their own way with due respect to the rights of all, and their imprisonment is a violation of the fundamental principles of a secular government. These persecutions, equally with that of D. M. Bennett, are the result of ecclesiastical tyranny and bigotry.

Dr. Greer moved the resolutions be adopted as read.

Mr. Geeting moved to strike out all that portion of the resolutions relating to the Comstock law, as it had nothing to do with Secularism.

That was the signal for Juliet H. Severance to swing a club at the conservativs with telling effect, which brought down the house, and she was ably seconded by W. F. Jamieson, who compared the work of Comstock with that of the Inquisition. The resolutions were then adopted with but two dissenting votes.

The election of officers being next in order the chair called for nominations.

Judge C. B. Waite was proposed for president, and no other nominations were made. Mrs. M. A. Freeman was the only nominee for secretary. For treasurer, Otto Wettstein was the solitary nominee, so that a motion was made to elect them by viva voce vote, which was done.

For vice-presidents the following were nominated: Dr. Juliet H. Severance, Dr. G. A. F. de Lespinasse, H. C. Bennett, T. B. Wakeman, W. F. Jamieson, Dr. Greer, —— Lawrence. Of this number Juliet H. Severance received thirty-one votes; Dr. de Lespinasse twenty-three; Dr. Greer twenty-two, and T. B. Wakeman the same, and were declared elected. At the suggestion of Mr. Wakeman, the delegates and members were requested to nominate persons from whom the board might select vice-presidents for the several states and organizers. A flood of names followed and the Congress adjourned after inviting Mr. Severance to lecture in the evening, as he had not been put on the program.

MONDAY EVENING.

This, as usual with evening sessions, was devoted to speaking. The speakers advertised were James K. Abbott, John E. Remsburg, and Rev. Alonzo T. Jones. As Mr. Remsburg did not put in an appearance Dr. Juliet H. Severance was, by vote of the Congress, invited to take his place. The doctor's speech was one of the best, if not the best, of the occasion, and dealt with one-sided efforts of some so-called Liberals, who were Liberal only on one point and il-Liberal on others, as shown by their boycotting of people who are in advance of them. In her estimation Liberals should become all-around reformers. She dealt with the laws of propagation, showing that there should be as much thought and consideration given to the laws of heredity and natural selection as was given to the raising of cattle. If the taint of heredity was accepted as to cattle, how much more important when applied to the human race. The children of the criminals should be surrounded by proper environments or there was no possibility of lessening the causes of crime. Crime being largely the consequence of heredity, criminals should be treated more as diseased persons and placed in scientific asylums; and, while it was eminently proper that such persons should labor for their own maintenance during confinement, they or their families should be benefited with the results of their industry. Every cent above the cost of their living should be placed to their credit, so that, when released, they would hav something with which to start life anew. If they had families, during such confinement it should be placed at their disposal instead of being handed over to monopolists, who, by this means, grind the working classes so low that it seems that soon their only chance for existence will be in the penitentiaries. The above is scarcely an outline of the subject, which was handled with the doctor's well-known vigorous style and evoked considerable applause.

James K. Abbott followed on "The Saviors of the World," which, though well written, was a little too lengthy for an evening discourse.

Rev. Alonzo T. Jones spoke on "The Captivity of the Republic," his speech being about the most practical of the Congress, proving by public documents and speeches that the assassins of liberty were working insidiously to overthrow religious freedom. Mr. Jones is perhaps the best authority on this subject, as he is devoting his life and talents to this cause.

On motion, the Congress then adjourned till 2 P.M. Tuesday.

TUESDAY AFTERNOON.

Rev. A. T. Jones gave an exhaustiv and logical discourse on ecclesiastical encroachments, his theme being "Recent National Measures Uniting Church and State." He commenced his address with a plea for freedom of thought and speech, and quoted the Bible as authority for the statement that every man has a right to believe as he pleases. Mr. Jones then went into an exhaustiv review of the United States Supreme Court decision in the Trinity church case. Among other things he said: "The Supreme Court by its decision in this case makes every man in the United States religious, and not only religious but Christian."

The speaker was especially severe on Catholics, claiming that they had manipulated matters so that their appropriation had been increased each year and now amounted to more than twice as much as all the other denominations collectivly. The argument was closed by an arraignment of the laws of Tennessee, whereby Seventh Day Adventists are persecuted for the sake of their religion.

These supplementary resolutions were presented and adopted:

Resolved, That whereas the World's Fair will be an exposition of the world's arts, industries, and progress, the greatest possible opportunity should be given the public to attend the same, and, as Sunday by circumstance is generally observed as a day of rest and recreation, that on Sunday, of all days, the Fair should be open, with machinery in full operation, that the people, and especially the working people, and their families may hav the full benefit of the same.

That the late action of Congress in regard to the closing of the World's Fair on Sundays is wholly in opposition to the traditions of the country and not consistent with a democratic government, but that such provision, being beyond the delegated powers of Congress, is inoperativ and void.

That the practice of ecclesiastical bodies speculating in real estate and at the same time refusing the payment of taxes is a vicious one, and we recommend that all laws for taxation of church property should be enforced, and in all cases where there is no provision made for the same we recommend the passage of statutes providing for the equitable taxation of church property.

That the practice of appropriating public funds to the aid of sectarian institutions should be prohibited, and that we especially denounce the action of the Cook county commissioners for misappropriating this year $45,000 to sectarian schools, the same being in violation of the state constitution and in conflict with the decision of the Illinois supreme court.

That we favor the free public-school system, and believe that the state should guarantee to each child a secular education free from all religious creeds, leaving the question of belief and unbelief to the conscience of each individual. We also recommend manual training to be made a part of our public-school system.

TUESDAY EVENING.

W. F. Jamieson occupied the rostrum on "The Church the Thinker's Enemy." The discourse was erudite, philosophical, and conclusiv. He dealt largely with the persecutions by the church of the leaders of intellectual progress.

P. J. O'Shea gave a short, sharp, crisp extemporaneous address on "Secular Progress," which was highly appreciated.

On motion of John F. Geeting a resolution of condolence was instructed to be sent to President Harrison expressing the sympathy of the Union with him in his bereavement. Dr. Severance opposed the resolution, but it was adopted by a majority vote.

Resolutions of thanks were accorded the press for generous treatment and to Miss P. A. Love for her vocal and instrumental selections.

President Waite was gratified that the spirit of harmony which he had invoked in his opening address had been maintained throughout their deliberations, and then he declared the Congress adjourned.

Letters of Friends.

In For Legislation.

SIDNAW, MICH., Oct. 15, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: You do not hear from me very often, but if you are going to legislate as proposed by Mr. Putnam the Hero, count me one for life.

Send me a catalog of your publications.

Yours for liberty of man, woman, and child, ISADORE GOULETH.

A New Worker.

NORWALK, CONN., Oct. 5, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Having come to the conclusion that there is a great deal of work in the field of Liberalism to be done, I hav resolved to go into that field as a lecturer. My terms will be very reasonable, and I will giv one, or a dozen lectures on various subjects, just as people desire.

JAMES E. LARMES, JR.

If All Would Vote Honestly Ingersoll Would Be President.

SAN DIEGO, CAL., Sept. 22, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2.50 in payment of your very interesting paper. Of all the grand suggestions I hav read in THE TRUTH SEEKER, the one proposing Colonel Ingersoll for president of this great country eclipses everything else. If Ingersoll would run for the honor, and every honest, intelligent man of this country would vote as his own conscience dictates, Robert Ingersoll would be our president. HERMAN WELISCH.

Makes His Christian Friends Ashamed.

COLFAX, WASH., Oct. 7, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Please inclosed find $1, for which please send me one more copy of the "Old Testament Stories," and oblige. Everyone that sees my book wants to borrow it or buy one. I think it is the finest book ever published, and I would not do without it for $25, though some of my Bible backfriends think it is a shame to hav a book on my counter of that kind. I am trying to get some more books, but will at some other time. With best wishes to all, GEO. W. HULL.

Literature for Norwegians and Danes.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Oct. 4, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to contribute to the Literature Fund. Instead of sending money I hav sent you through the mail one hundred copies of my two anti-Catholic poems, "Romerkirkens Söiler Vakle" and "Giordano Bruno." They are in my nativ language, the Norwegian, which is identical with the Danish. As there are a great number of educated Norwegians and Danes in New York, I suppose that these poems will find a ready market. They are sold in San Francisco for five cents apiece. I leave it to yourself to make the price in New York.

Your sister in Freethought and science and universal progress,

MRS. ANDREA LINDAL.

[Our Norwegian and Danish readers will please take notice and act accordingly. —ED. T. S.]

Attend to Money, Not Tariff.

JOHNSONBURG, PA., Oct. 23, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The communication from Henry Burton in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 15th asking the Freethought Federation to teach the people how to vote is very timely. As I understand the question, the solution is not in high tariff, free trade, or reciprocity. The difference in wages is not controled that way, but by the amount of money in the country, as is conclusivly proved by English manufacturers paying more than the same class of employers pay in high-protected Germany. If a man has not studied the financial condition of different countries he would be liable to be misled to think that a high tariff would increase wages. But so good an authority as R. G. Horr said in the New York Tribune of October 5th that the advocates of "the protectiv policy do not nor never did claim that the high tariff increased wages." For me, I should like the privilege of voting for a Liberal every time, but some of them are not enough politicians to get the nominations in their conventions. I would like to see S. P. Putnam's opinion and others'.

Yours truly, O. J. LOVELL.

An Ex-Catholic Incites Us.

CHICAGO, ILL., Oct. 16, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The people in this world are not as they ought to be, and why is it? Because they fail to investigate and learn the truth, for when a man or woman becomes an investigator and a truth seeker they know what ought to be done to better humanity. They also know their duty toward their fellow-beings. I came from strong Roman Catholic stock, and thought it was my duty to pray and love the almighty God. As much as I prayed to the unknowing God, I now feel it my duty to oppose such teaching, as taught to me from childhood.

I am twenty-five years of age. When sixteen I went out in the wide world to make my living the best I knew how, and through experience I learned the truth for the good of others as well as myself, and became a Freethinker. For years I hav taken your so noble TRUTH SEEKER, a journal that no Liberal should be without. It has grand ideas and advocates good common sense.

Being in San Francisco of late years, I hav had the pleasure of meeting our grand Freethought lecturer, Mr. Putnam, here, to start the Freethought Federation, of which I became a member. It is the duty of every good and honest Liberal to organize. Only through a good and strong organization will we gain our liberty to uphold and advocate Freethought. Christianity is nothing more than a strong organization, and see where it is to-day. Do not be too slow, Liberals. Organize at once before it is too late. Our cause is a grand and noble one, one that will be sooner or later for the best of all humanity. WILLIAM LEMPERLE.

Lectures That Make the Preachers Hide.

INDUSTRY, KAN., Oct. 21, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals of Industry and the surrounding country hav just had one of those seasons which help to make life worth living, and in which we hav had our intellectual strength renewed, and also in which the seed of Freethought has been liberally scattered, plowed deeply into the soil of prejudice and bigotry, where, if perchance there is a particle of the generativ functions of reason left, it will spring into life and relieve the accursed monotony of theological barrenness. To Mrs. Judge Krekel, of Kansas City, Mo., we award our thanks, and to her belongs the glory of whatever results may follow. She gave, to full houses, three lectures that were enjoyed by our people with strict attention, apparently appreciated by the masses, and with an ominous silence tolerated by the so-called Christians. Mrs. Judge Krekel is doing a good and promising work for humanity. She givs an opportunity to the clergy, or any believer in the Christian religion, to reply to her facts, but nary one could we get to reply to her assertions. We had sent special invitations to Rev. Mr. Vennum and Rev. Mr. Smith to attend her course of lectures, and said they would also hav an opportunity to challenge her for debate or make any replies they wished to, but neither one of the reverends attended in order to deny her assertions. The Rev. Mr. Vennum is a very portly and a bold, God-fearing preacher in our village, and when he is in the coward's refuge on Sundays he has the cheek (he calls it the boldness of God) to lie and misrepresent the Freethinkers. But when Mrs. Judge Krekel was here lecturing he was very silent on Infidelity and went around on the streets looking sickly and downtrodden, reminding you more of a dog with his tail cut off, and no doubt murmuring to himself and saying, "Is it possible that I, with the assistance of God almighty, J. Christ, Holy Ghost & Co., cannot hav the courage and boldness to defend my blessed master's cause when the enemy approaches?" To be honest he would hav to say, "No, I do not." Therefore I can truly recommend Mrs. Judge Krekel to anyone wishing Freethought lectures, as her blows are not charged with iconoclastic thunder, but her fateful arguments are so tempered with fairness and the spirit of peace, and so full of invincible truth, that the Christians' fortress is undermined before the enemy's presence is detected. J. B. WISE.

Religion and Immorality Hand in Hand.

BURNETT, TEX., Oct. 13, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Another striking evidence of the moral influence of religion has come to light here these days.

A young man, W. C. Wright, express agent here, and secretary of the Presbyterian church Sunday-school, was yesterday arraigned before the district court of Burnett county, charged with the seduction of a young lady—one of the prettiest, brightest, and best pupils of the Sunday-school class. The seduction was committed under repeated promises of marriage and other persuasiv allurements. Having accomplished his pious object, and placed the young lady in a condition in which it became impossible for her to hide the effects of his religious influences, he positivly refused to marry her, and went so far as to voluntarily present himself before the grand jury, who were then formulating an indictment against him, and stated to them that they might indict him, but that under no circumstances would he marry her, except, possibly, to save himself from the penitentiary; and even then he would not liv with her an hour. Beloved brothers and sisters, these are the benign results of religion, church, and Sunday-school teachings! Let us pray!—that thousands and thousands more of such fascinating and pious frauds may meet with their just rewards, as this young man did.

The case was opened in court yesterday, and, true to his assertions, when he saw that the evidence produced became all too convincing, this venomous young Sunday-school secretary offered to marry his victim. But the court objected on the ground that the offer was not made in good faith, and the young lady rejected his offer with scorn; and after the case had been argued by defense and prosecution and submitted to the jury, the jury, after about two hours' deliberation, brought in a verdict of guilty, with a sentence of four years in the penitentiary.

The above is a case in which the perpetrator meets with his just reward; but how many thousands of such cases happen daily of which the public never becomes aware, where the victim of such religious influences is cast on society with her soul and life poisoned forever, to contaminate and render wretched the lives of those with whom she comes in contact.

Yours for better things,

C. H. GOETZ.

Who Will Answer?

OAKDALE, CAL., Oct. 14, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I hav not received any answers to my questions yet. Perhaps the preachers are waiting till I get all my questions on file. I hav been going to church for seventy years to get the information desired, but the hundreds of preachers I hav heard hav all failed to giv me any insight into the future. I am in earnest. I wish to ask a question about original sin:

Is original sin a physical or a moral malady? If it is physical—that is, if we inherit it, like scrofula or any other disease, why cannot physicians prescribe a remedy, something like sarsaparilla root? If it is a soul malady we cannot inherit it, for we do not get our souls through ordinary generation. Is not the orthodox creed that souls are emanations from God, and that they are given some time after life commences? If so, how can Adam's sin contaminate them? If it is a physical malady, and brought death, why do animals die? Did they eat apples also? Why do vegetables die? Can they eat apples?

How many creeds are there all deduced from the scriptures? Answer: About one thousand (see Buck's Theological Dictionary). Are these creeds all true? They must be if the scriptures are the word of God. Are these creeds suitable for an enlightened people? Who made them? Were not the authors as ignorant as our North American Indians? Would we allow our North American Indians to make creeds for us? What did the writers of the Bible know about modern science? Did they not liv by plunder, or by begging? Did not Joshua plunder and kill the same kind of heathen that we are now trying to convert by missionary labor? Had not the heathen subdued by Joshua souls as well as modern heathen? If so, why make such ado about saving souls now? Had not the Apostles all things common? Were they not Communists? Did they not require that people should sell their lands and put the proceeds into a common fund? Did they not go barefoot, and liv on fish? Were such people fit to make creeds for us? Were not the prophets just as idle and as ignorant? Were they fit to formulate creeds for this enlightened generation?

Could three million of people, with their cattle, cross the Red sea in one night? Did they liv on manna? What became of the milk of their herds? Where did the rams' skins and goats' skins come from that were used about the tabernacle? Where did the fine flour come from used in sacrifice? What were the heathen Philistines doing with a building the roof of which would hold three thousand people? Where did the lumber come from? How could such a building stand on two pillars, not more than ten feet apart? Were not Job, David, and Solomon Agnostics? Did not they all doubt a future existence? Who authorized church councils to decide what was and what was not the word of God? Did they not rule out nearly one-third of the scriptures? Let preachers answer.

S. B. MCCORMICK.

Features of Freethought Warfare.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Oct. 16, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I am heartily in accord with the Federation of Liberals, and they will oblige me by putting my name down as a member.

If anyone will take the trouble to look over the files of THE TRUTH SEEKER they will find that I hav been grasping at every straw for years on which to base an argument in that direction. I hav long since made up my mind I would not vote for a bigot if I knew it. Mr. Putnam and those that inaugurated the movement hav drawn the line just where it should be drawn, viz., to vote for no bigot for office. While all Christians are not bigots, it so happens that all bigots are Christians. How often do you see a little squeaky-voiced fellow in your vicinity shoved forward for office who only has a thimbleful of brains in the back part of his head and the only thing that he has to recommend him is his bigotry and his being an activ church-member. I find by experience that as a general thing it is very easy to defeat such a class for a nomination, and if you do not find it out until they are nominated, it is quite easy to beat them at the polls. At least, such has been my experience. If you will recall my efforts in THE TRUTH SEEKER in this direction you will find they are quite numerous, and it so happened that only one that I made a fight on succeeded in running the gauntlet, and he fell behind the rest of the ticket half, or five hundred votes. The great secret in doing effectiv work is to be straightforward, and if you are suffering any injustice come out orally and personally and let it be known; and by all means let your own class know it, because among them you can do the most effectiv work and you can always reach them through the Liberal press. When I came to Kansas and insisted on preaching the gospel of truth the bigots boasted I would not be allowed to succeed financially, and by playing a very fine game of treachery and confidence through false friends succeeded in injuring me to some extent. But I kept up a constant fire on them, telling friend and foe alike, until all fair-minded people watched the movement and found out I was right, and the foes, knowing that they were closely watched, dare not aid the conspiracy, and while they are calling on the "rocks and hills to cover them," as it were, comparativly speaking I am growing rich. But I hav more pride in retaining my manhood than in all else. But even from a financial standpoint I gained more than I lost in being frugal and not losing a moment's time that could be used to good advantage. So I hav great confidence in the justice of humanity.

One of the greatest injustices that Liberals will hav to liv down is the partiality shown by the local press and politicians in catering to the church. If you are not publicly known to be a Liberal you are treated all right, but if you are you are entirely ignored by both. Now, what we want is to giv both to understand that as long as they insist on showing such partiality they need not expect our support. I ask, Is it fair, because such an orator as Ingersoll honestly differs with the church, that for that reason his party should not recognize him? When will the Liberals stand on their manhood and insist, when they hav a bright intellect in their midst, that they be heard on all subjects pertaining to human happiness? Liberals, how long are you going to treat the church as a poor old, childish, decrepit person that is in its dotage and is to be petted, pitied, and humored? Has it not outlived its usefulness? JOHN W. ABBOTT.

The World Is Growing Better.

NEW YORK, Oct. 21, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER, the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book," Taylor's "Diegesis," etc., obtained at your publication office, are truly refreshing and inspiring to all who dare exercise the faculty of reason. Some years ago I invested a sum of money in a church spire in Fifty-seventh street. Since then I hav felt like kicking both myself and the priest. The former I can kick privately. Will you kindly allow me, through THE TRUTH SEEKER, to publicly kick the latter with a few facts in rhyme, as follows:

CENTURIES AGO.

The Apostles announced, "The time is at hand"—
All the world to be burnt, as divinely planned;
The sheep to be blessed, and the goats to be damned:
But the cock still crows, and the mountains yet stand,
As they did centuries ago.

The stars come and go in beauty as bright,
The sun is as warm, the moon is all right,
Gladdening the earth with their life and light,
As they did centuries ago.

The rain falls the same, enriching the ground;
The grass grows as green; the trees are as sound;
And life is as sweet to the beast, I'll be bound,
As 'twas centuries ago.

The world may be old, but to us it is new;
Time was when its joys were grasped by the few:
It is much better now for gentile or Jew
Than 'twas centuries ago.

The fear of the priest is now passing away;
And though we still feel his oppressiv sway,
The condition of man is much better to-day
Than 'twas centuries ago.

Paul taught that woman to man is a slave;
The church followed Paul—the fanatical knave—
Which doomed many a wife to an early grave:
But woman is rising and getting more brave
Than she was centuries ago.

Religion and force, not loftier brains,
Hav degraded woman in marital pains;
But the time is at hand to cast off the chains
Forged for her centuries ago.

It used to be thought the priest stood before
Some almighty God and made up the score:
Now the priest knows less, the people much more,
Than they did centuries ago.

Though this world for the saints is not good enough,
They hav one far worse, with a God angry and gruff,
For all who dispute their blasphemous stuff
Concocted centuries ago.

The church against freedom forever has stood;
Anathemas and racks line its goblin road;
And the time is at hand to drop the false load
Carried centuries ago.

Reason and science are now in the van;
The priest to stifle them does all that he can;
But it doesn't work now, the Freethinker to damn,
As it did centuries ago.

Of freedom and science now hear the church prate,
Of a fostering love instead of its hate.
O Galileo! O Bruno! your terrible fate
Tells how 'twas centuries ago.

Gone are the Apostles, but the world is still here,
With no frightful sign of its end drawing near;
And we hav more freedom and more of good cheer,
Much more common sense and far less of fear,
Than they had centuries ago.

L. G. REED.

Finance Once More.

NEW YORK, Oct. 9, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Abbott writes: "Frederick Koezly attempts a reply to my article on finance, and as to how far he succeeded I am very willing to leave our readers to decide, but as I opened this discussion I hav a right to close." If, as he says, he was very willing to leave it to our readers to decide, why not stop there and make a reply from me unnecessary? "But as I opened this discussion, I hav a right to close!" To this I object, for the reason that I do not understand on what he founds his so-called "right" to close abruptly; maybe precedent or custom, but these I do not recognize binding me, not having agreed to them as a condition; besides, it seems to me unfair and unreasonable that a man should hav the first and also last word or say in a controversy.

Mr. Abbott has figures given by Porter, the unreliable census-taker, about the last man I should trust without proofs. A politician or demagog can use figures to show almost any side he wants by adding or leaving out certain conditions of facts. It seems to me he uses them when he has no arguments and good reasons for his cause, to muddle his hearers' minds, as they cannot follow and know of his figures whether these are correct and true or not.

Mr. Abbott and I are not far apart in what he strives at, but differ in the method and best means to attain it; I am also for plenty of money, and paper money too, but not irredeemable. As I said before, paper money is preferred to coin just as long as it can be redeemed in coin when wanted, and no longer.

It seems to me sheer short-sightedness to consider and talk about money without any regard of our commerce with other nations. The whole civilized world recognizes gold and silver as precious metals and uses these for coinage as its medium in trade, wise or otherwise. I do not see that we can change it even if it be wrong therein, but this has not yet been proved to be so.

Mr. Abbott writes: "It is the law that if a bill gets destroyed, just by having the number of the bill and where issued you can get a new bill." I would like to examin Mr. Abbott if he knows the numbers of his bills and where issued. I hav never looked after these, and I do not believe that one in a thousand knows the number. Bosh! Mr. Abbott again: "No paper ever becomes worthless until that which is back of it refuses to receive it." To receive it how? and for what? That is the question, Mr. Abbott. Answer it—how to receive it? He will say, for taxes and custom duties; but would that be enough money for him? Answer it, how to receive it? By irredeemable paper? You could get nothing else but other paper money in return, to make it a swap. I want coin for it when I need the latter.

In the time of our civil war the government was forced to issue more paper money than it wished. The money kings became distrustful of its redemption, and thereby it depreciated so that a gold dollar bought two and a half paper dollars. No one ever doubted a continuance of existence of the Northern government; there was simply overmuch issued of it.

Mr. Abbott cites Porter, Stamford, and Morgan as his authorities. I prefer an encyclopedia. Venice, so oft mentioned, it is said in 1156, 1480, and 1510 forced contributions upon its citizens, giving them in return perpetual annuities at certain rates per cent. Those from 1156 were, however, extinguished in the sixteenth century. The other loans were consolidated and eventually became the Bank of Venice. Here we hav a good reason why such money was at par, and sometimes, even, when the annuities became due, above par.

The Russian paper money was redeemable in copper coin, and was not wanted. It drove silver out of its course, and contradicts Mr. Abbott's "working successfully."

France in 1790 issued paper money up to 45,578 millions, which in the short space of six years, in 1796, it was found necessary to redeem thirty for one franc. It did not work well, Mr. Abbott, although France is a rich nation and its existence was in no danger at all at any time; but everything can be overdone.

With Mr. Abbott's last paragraph I am in accord. I also am not owned by any party, political or religious. I do my own thinking and reasoning. I am a great admirer of Mr. R. G. Ingersoll, as all good Freethinkers are, but am sorry that he advocates the Republican party. This party started with the holy principle to restrict slavery, and if possible to abolish this evil. It has done that work. Since then, step by step, it has become a centralized power and tyranny. It has helped the bankers, the railroad kings, the manufacturers. It made them millionaires through viciously taxing all others for their benefit. What right has a government to lend money, currency, to bankers to enable them to make double interest on their money? And for years and years they hav had about fifty millions, more or less, on deposit without interest to pay. Is it a wonder they all grow millionaires? The rich grow richer and the poor poorer! Where does the common people come in? To be taxed only! Cursed be such a government! Vote these rascals out!

Yours for equal liberty and progress,

FREDERICK KOEZLY.

A Ghost Story.

NEW YORK, Oct. 9, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Thinking a ghost story would be interesting to the young people of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I thought to relate it. When I was a boy about seven years of age Grandmother Thorne lived at Flushing, L. I. During the war of the Revolution she experienced great hardships while her husband was with the rebel army. The family had but little sympathy from the Tory party that was quartered on the inhabitants of the village, and suffered much from the insults of the soldiers. One day an Indian girl came to the house in great distress, seeking protection from the assaults of the soldiers. She died in the house. It became the village talk that the girl had been foully dealt with. And as I was fond to hear grandmother repeat the story of the Revolution, I would take my little bench and sit alongside of grandma, lean my head on her lap, look up in her face, and say, "Grandma, tell me all about the poor Indian girl and the ghost that you had seen." "Well, sit still and listen." I remember being full of superstition, and what grandma related was law and gospel.

"One dark night," she said, "it rained, the lightning flashed, and the thunder was loud, and broke as if the heaven's high masonry was crumbling. Retiring that night to bed, I saw the spirit of the Indian girl pass right before me all in white. I was so frightened I could not sleep, and lay listening and heard strange noises. Next morning I told your aunt Beckey what I had seen and heard. Your aunt Beckey said it was all imagination. She did not believe in ghosts. I did. A few nights after, there was more noises in the garret. The rougher the night grew, the noise was the greater, and I could hear something walking around. Next morning I said: 'Not another night will I sleep in the house. I know it is haunted by the Indian girl.' Your aunt Beckey said: 'I will sleep in the room and see if I can see the ghost. [There was no man in the house at the time.] I am not afraid. It is all nonsense to be afraid of anything.' 'Oh, yes, you don't believe in anything! Doesn't the Bible say, They came out of the graves, and walked about the city, and appeared unto many? And why not the Indian girl?' 'Bah, I don't believe any such thing, even if the Bible says so.' 'Well, I know it was a ghost I saw.' For several nights Aunt Beckey listened and heard nothing. One morning at the breakfast table your aunt confessed she had heard something that was unusual, but could not make out what it was, but saw no ghosts, it was so dark. She said, 'I am determined to find out.' After a few nights of watching the rain and wind began to blow. She heard a rumbling noise, and to find out the location she listened for a long time. The noise became louder by spells. The candle was out; all was darkness. She was all of a tremor. As she had seen nothing, she ventured to find where the noise was. Thinking she had located the place, she waited for the morning to appear. Then she went on an examination, and found—what do you think? A piece of a shingle loose in the roof. That convinced me how I was deceived. Never after that was any ghost seen or noise heard in the house while we lived in it."

Such was grandma's experience with ghosts.

In after years as I grew up to manhood, I went to Sunday-school, and was trained up in the Calvinistic creed. Yet I thought it strange that God should decree and select some of his Christians to be saved and some to be damned. It worried me a great deal. Was I one of them? And I was very strict in my behavior and religious conduct, and read the Bible from Genesis to Revelation. As I read, light began to dawn on my mind. I began to reason with myself and compare things together. Soon I found out that my knowledge was nothing but superstition of the Bible; that those prophets and seers were but men who through dreams and visions in the night had seen nothing more than what I had experienced in dreams. Many such visions originate in physical causes—disordered nerves, and indigestion, or other bodily ailments. Yet the inner eyes in sleep or trance do sometimes see realities.

I could not see any inspiration in the Bible, as some say there is, but plenty of rapin, and murder, and slaughter of the innocents. Should men read the Bible carefully, they would come out Freethinkers, and no more be gulled by prelates who make a living by deceiving. These cormorants that dwell in fiction present the most fair side of the picture, but never the reverse, keeping the people who scarcely read the Bible in extreme ignorance of its true contents.

What is the Nicene creed which these vampires profess to govern mankind by but a paraphrase of that creed which was made at the first general council of Nice, and drawn up at the second general council of Constantinople in the year 381? The creed was carried by a majority vote, and admitted into the church as a barrier against Arius and his followers. Now, where is your inspiration or God in the Constitution? Arius was a presbyter of the church of Alexandria about 315, who maintained that the son of God was totally distinct from the father, and that the Holy Ghost was not God. The Arians were condemned for having an opinion of their own and expelled from the communion of the church, but became the neighboring religion, especially in the East. In 1531 Arianism was again revived in the West by Servetus. For his opinion he was burnt at the stake by the influence of John Calvin, Oct. 27, 1553. His daring to hav a mind of his own and expressing an opinion caused his death. He sent three questions to Calvin—on the divinity of Christ, on regeneration, and on the necessity of baptism. This so enraged Calvin that he was bent on revenge, and cited forty heretical errors, that Servetus's enemies proved against him. He was condemned to be burnt. It is reported that the wind prevented the flames from reaching his body for two long hours. And this is Christianity. Reflect, consider, and then speak your mind.

The same would be enacted to-day if the Roman Catholic church had the power. For you know she says she is infallible, and claims the power now she always possessed, temporal and spiritual. There is to be a great time in this country with that Jesuitical order, such as there never was seen and never will be again. A little more power, then comes the end.

News of the Week.

Professor Totten says that the late eclipse was a sign from God.

Railroad men hav chosen the opening of the World's Fair as a time for a strike.

Professor Smith, of the Lane Theological Seminary at Cincinnati, has been arraigned for heresy.

Corbett and his company were arrested on the 23d ult. at Cincinnati for giving theatrical performances on Sunday.

The Socialist mayor of St. Denis, France, has ordered that clergy shall not accompany funeral processions clad in their surplices.

The German press has awakened to the fact that an attempt to tamper with the universal suffrage system of the empire has been manifest of late in high places.

Chas. Emmons, who has long been insane on religion, on the 23d ult. took possession of a pulpit at Springfield, Mass., and with a revolver held it fifteen hours.

William Morris is objected to as poet-laureate of England because Socialist, Swinburne because licentious in poetry, Sir Edwin Arnold because suspected of being an Infidel.

Medals hav been conferred by the pope upon several members of the Irish brigade who fought for the temporal rights of the papacy against Victor Emanuel's Sardinian army at Spoleto, Castelfedardo, and Ancona.

Owing to the loss of a bequest of $150,000 which was conditional on Sunday closing, and to a general deficiency of finances, the New York Art Museum will probably resume the custom of closing Sundays.

J. E. White on the 23d ult. attempted to giv the first of a series of anti-Catholic lectures at Muscatine, Ia. The audience became so tumultuous that he was forced to desist. The chief of police escorted him to his hotel.

M. Ribot, minister of foreign affairs of France, has requested the French mission to present claims for damages to Great Britain in behalf of the Catholic priests in Uganda, who sustained injury at the hands of Captain Lugard and the Protestants.

An imposing celebration in honor of Martin Luther was held on the 31st ult. at Wittenberg, Germany. The emperor presided. All Protestant nations of Europe sent official representativs. Luther relics were exhibited. Catholics are disquieted by the emperor's connection with it.

Paul Savvalle, a Montreal journalist, has brought a suit for a queer cause against Jules Tardivel, a journalist of Quebec. Tardivel accused Savvalle of being a Methodist and editing a Huguenot paper. The plaintiff avers that he is a Catholic and seeks a legal vindication and $200 damages.

A certain community of Aztecs in Mexico had been in hostility to the government because of official interference with their religion, and taxes. Twelve hundred soldiers attacked their village and killed every male. The Aztecs when informed of the expected assault had answered, "God is with us and we shall not be taken."

Herr Liebknecht, the famous Socialist, now in France, said a few days ago that the German Socialists are strongly opposed to the German military law; that Germany is dying of militarism; that the German army is really directed against the Socialists, and that the Socialist party in Germany will gain 1,000,000 votes in the next election.

The Russian government has recently demanded that the Belgian authorities, in issuing passports to persons intending to visit Russia, shall state therein the religion of the bearer. If Belgium complies with the demand, Belgian Jews will be treated to many indignities if they visit Russia. If she refuses, no Belgian passport will be accepted in Russia, and consequently no Belgians can enter that country, though the Russian demand is aimed solely at Hebrews.

Freethinking France is carrying her contempt of religious ceremonies to extremes. Civic funerals are everywhere the order of the day. The deputy mayor of Verdun has gained notoriety by the laconic simplicity with which he recently committed to earth the remains of a fellow-citizen. Stepping to the side of the coffin by the open grave, he uncovered his head and facing the assembled mourners, said: "Citizen Mori, in the name of the law, we bury you." Then the gravediggers did their work.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.

Gems of Thought.

MAGISTRATES, cultivators, and priests, should alike contribute to the expenses of the state, because all alike belong to the state.—Voltaire.

BY closing the eyes and slumbering, and consenting to be deceived by shows, men establish and confirm their daily life of routine and habit everywhere, which still is built on purely illusory foundations. —Thoreau.

IT is still necessary to batter away at the old and foolish superstition of the Devil. The Devil and hell are the two all-sufficient corner-stones of the Christian theological superstructure. Crush and crumble these rocks of offense, and the entire system of medievalism and barbarian anthropomorphism, with its tyrant God and its demon Devil, will soon be leveled with the age's common sense.—Henry Frank.

WHILE sincere and earnest individuals raise the standard of their own times, the age, improved by their efforts, educates other individuals, who, being thus raised to a higher point of view, can command a more extended vision than their predecessors. By obedience to a law within themselves, above the existing laws of society, such individuals help to raise the moral standard of succeeding ages to a plane still more elevated. By this mutual action and reaction between the public and private conscience, the world is slowly rolled onward toward its long-promised Golden Age. It is a glorious privilege to help it forward, even the hundredth part of an inch. It is a fearful responsibility to retard it, even a hair's breadth.—Lydia Maria Child.

THE rise, progress, and triumph of Christianity constitute indeed one of the most remarkable phenomena in the world's history. We cannot wonder that an uncritical people, regarding it superficially, hav seen in it evidences of supernatural intervention and the working of a greater than human power. A careful study of the development of other religions, however, will illustrate the truth that the rapid growth of Christianity, though indeed remarkable, is not an entirely unique phenomenon in history. The spread of Buddhism was even more rapid, not only in its nativ India, but also among peoples alien of race, unlike civilization, and different religion. It still numbers more adherents than all the sects of Christendom combined. In later times, the growth of Mohammedanism during the lifetime of its founder far surpassed the progress made by Christianity in the earlier years of its existence. —Louis Janes.

THE nebular hypothesis, suggested by Swedenborg, Buffon, and Kant, and systematized by Herschel and La Place, assumes the former existence of a vaporous matter, extending beyond the orbit of the farthest planet, which by rotation gradually gained solidity, throwing off rings which broke up into planets and moons, the central mass forming the present sun. The existing solar system is satisfactorily accounted for by this theory, which is now generally accepted by learned men as the best explanation of the universe. All the other systems of stars are supposed to hav originated in the same manner. The earth being thus accounted for as the result of a natural process, the evolutionist sees that all forms of life upon it may hav developed from the simplest cell-form of matter, for he can trace an almost continuous evolution from the plant cell upward, through all the grades of vegetable and animal life, to the highest development—man, thus establishing the unity and connection of all nature.—R. C. Adams.

I HAV dealt somewhat copiously, and with the degree of respect they seem to merit, with such writings of yours, O Lord, as hav come down to us through the medium of the "holy men of God" you were good enough to inspire. It would not, however, be just and deferential to you to pass over in silence what you yourself hav written, without troubling any holy or unholy man whatever. First, there is the Decalog. You wrote that, on two tables of stone, with your finger, or your toe, without troubling to employ an amanuensis of any kind. All I hav got to say about the Commandments, O Lord, is that I hav broken nearly the whole ten of them, and I do not know of anybody who has not. You, yourself, as I could prove from your Book, hav broken them all save one: that one is, "Thou shalt hav no other gods before me." The next time I find you, or your son—I never know which is which—writing was when you "stooped down and wrote on the ground" (John viii, 8); but what you wrote has not been preserved, and, like much else that has been written, it was, peradventure, not worth preserving; and the first eight verses of the eighth charter of John, in which this writing of yours is referred to, seem to be spurious.—Saladin in God and His Book.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress Assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, do hereby respectfully pray and memorialize your Honorable Body to repeal that portion of the Act entitled "An Act to aid in carrying out the Act of Congress, approved April 25, 1890, entitled 'An Act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by the holding of an International Exposition in the City of Chicago'"—approved August 5, 1892, which reads as follows: "That it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition, are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and it is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by the Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modifications of the rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

Also, to repeal that portion of the Act entitled, "An Act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes"—approved August 5, 1892, which reads as follows:

"And it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition, are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and it is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modifications of the rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

We ask the repeal of these portions of these laws for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago, who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you ought to decide is that of the public welfare.

5 It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

Life of Thomas Paine,

WITH A

History of His Literary, Political, and Religious Career in America, France, and England.

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY,

Author of "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," "George Washington and Mount Vernon," "Washington's Rules of Civility," etc.

To Which Is added a Sketch of Paine by William Cobbett.

No real biography of Paine has ever appeared. The so-called Lives of Paine have been mainly the controversial work of pamphleteers, turning chiefly on his religious heresies. Paine was in his fifty-eighth year before he published anything concerning religion, and before that time he had acted an important part in revolutionary movements in the United States, England, and France. But in the religious conflict initiated by him, his political services and military career hav been but inadequately considered. A certain historical ostracism has buried in the archives of various countries a large mass of documents containing records of paramount interest and importance. Mr. Conway has personally searched such records, in Europe and America, and has obtained from these fresh light, not only on Paine, but on various eminent figures in American and European history with whom he was associated. A large amount of unpublished correspondence has been included in the volumes.

Mr. Conway says in his Preface: "In the laborious work of searching out the real Paine I hav found a general appreciation of its importance, and it will be seen in the following pages that generous assistance has been rendered by English clergymen, by official persons in Europe and America, by persons of all beliefs and no beliefs In no instance have I been impeded by any prejudice, religious or political. The curators of archives, private collectors, owners of important documents bearing on the subject, have welcomed my effort to bring the truth to light."

Bennett-Teed Discussion. Between D. M. Bennett and Cyrus Romulus R. Teed. Jesus the Lord God Creator of Heaven and Earth. Paper, 30 cents.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. Bennett and G. M. Mair, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion 2. Miracles and supernatural achievements have been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus. 3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history. Bennett affirms; Mair denies. This is an exhaustive discussion. Price, $1.50.

Christianity Persecuting the Jews.

Among the contemporary events which show the vileness of the Christian religion, none is more striking than the persecution of the Jews. This detestable work has been in progress for centuries, and continues in full operation to-day. For the whole line of outrage and horror the Christian religion is responsible. The baseless legend that some Hebrews once executed a son of God is answerable for the whole of the abominable train of cruelty and suffering. The belief in this legend has, in the words of Colonel Ingersoll in his article "Renan," "hardened the hearts of men and poisoned the minds of children. . . . The flame of this prejudice is fanned and fed in the Sunday-schools of our day," and the animosity will continue to be bred until the New Testament is definitivly consigned to its suiting shelf of nurse-tales and lies.

The country in which this great abuse is most flagrant at present is Russia. This is the most unmixedly Christian land, and hence it is the one which most exhibits those calamities and wrongs which Christianity invariably begets. Of the Russian persecution a Hebrew paper says: "The persecution of millions of inoffensiv people in the most barbarous manner has now been proceeding for years, a persecution which has no parallel in history, beside which the incidents of fanatical outbursts in the Middle Ages disappear as insignificant, and which surpasses in refined cruelty the holocausts of the Crusades." Perhaps it is not true that the present atrocities surpass in direness those of the Middle Ages. One cannot take a glance into the history of those times without lighting on anti-Jewish ferocities each of which in turn seems

> "the bloodiest shame,
> The wildest savag'ry, the vilest stroke,
> That ever wall-ey'd wrath, or staring rage,
> Presented to the tears of soft remorse."

Still, the present outrages are not vastly milder.

The Jews under Russian dominion aggregate the huge number of five millions. These people hav for some time been forbidden to leave what is called the Pale of Settlement in western and southwestern Russia. This district comprises the governments of Wilna, Volhynia, Grodno, Kovno, Minsk, Podoisk, Yekaterinoslav, Poltava, Tshernigoff, and under restrictions, portions of Kieff, Vitebsk, and Mohileff. Extensiv as the Pale of Settlement seems, it is too narrow for the Jews, who are seldom tillers of the soil, who are debarred from many vocations open to Christians, and are compelled to enroll themselvs in merchant guilds or trade corporations that exist only in cities and large towns. Owing to the excessiv competition with one another to which they are thus subjected, it would be extremely difficult under any circumstances to earn a livelihood.

One thing that renders the condition of the Jews intolerable is the fact that they are burdened with exceptional taxes. Besides paying the imposts levied on their Christian compatriots, E. B. Lanin goes on to recite, the Jews are victims of a special system of taxation from which Christians are exempt. Under the so-called "box tax," for example, a fixed sum is collected for every animal, fowl, and bird killed for food according to the Jewish rites (kosher); moreover, for every pound of that same meat, and for every one of those identical fowls, an additional sum is exacted when this food is sold. In addition to this there is a candle tax, the proceeds of which are applied nominally to the denominational schools, with which the Hebrews would gladly dispense if they were permitted to avail themselvs of the ordinary educational establishments for whose maintenance they help to provide. Besides the extra tributes thus far mentioned the Jews hav to pay a certain percentage—from which Christians are exempt—on the rent they receive for their houses and shops, and on the income accruing from the sale of wine in public houses. They are also subjected to a special annual tax on distilleries, breweries, and divers sorts of factories, and for the permission to set up as cattle-breeders. Finally a fixed percentage is levied on all money left by deceased Jews, and a fine has to be paid for authorization to wear Hebrew apparel. In a word, the purpose and effect of this anti-Semitic legislation is; first, to pen the Jews up in the cities and large towns of the Pale of Settlement, and then to starve them to death. How nearly success is attained is attested by a Russian statistician, who, writing of the government of Grodno, says that frequently one house, consisting of three or four rooms, lodges as many as twelve families, and that sometimes whole families liv on three-quarters of a pound of bread, one salt herring, and a few onions per day. In the government of Kovno there are families that never break their fast till night, and then only if the bread-winner has managed to find work.

The New York Sun givs intelligence of a despicable oppression. At one time, university graduates of the highest standard, men who had taken a doctor's or master's degree, were entitled to pass beyond the Pale of Settlement. Under Alexander II. Jewish families submitted to astonishing privations in order that their brightest children might benefit by the privilege just named. Eight or ten years ago the number of Jewish pupils in the higher educational establishments of the empire was forty-eight in every ten thousand souls, while the number of Christian pupils was only twenty-two in every ten thousand of population. Then ensued a series of restrictions intended to cut off Hebrews from the loophole of escape from oppression which higher education had previously offered. In June, 1885, the present czar decreed that the number of Jews admitted to the Technological Institute at Kharkoff should be limited to ten per cent of the whole number of students. Nine months later he forbade the admission of any Jew to the Veterinary Institute in the same city. In 1886 it was enacted that the number of Jews should not exceed ten per cent of the whole number of students in the universities within the Pale, five per cent in other provincial universities, and three per cent in those of Moscow and St. Petersburg. Finally, in July, 1887, the same rule was applied to all gymnasia or grammar schools.

The measure described above, of penning the Jews in the Pale, is now being superseded by a still crueler one. This is the infliction of such abuses in the Pale itself as shall drive them from Russian territory altogether. Within the Pale such harryings and outrages hav been heaped upon them that large numbers hav been driven out to adjoining countries or to America, and all must be eventually.

Lately the Russian imperial council ordered that the teachers of the Jewish synagog schools be supplanted by instructors who would continue to teach the Hebrew religion but who would be under the guidance of the Greek Catholic state church. This measure, which has the appearance of being due to a desire to improve the Jewish schools, really aims at their complete suppression. "Specious proposals of this character," says an observer, "are merely a thinly veiled persecution of the worst description."

Not long ago the minister of the interior discovered some more old laws which had long been in desuetude. He dug them up and ordered their immediate and strict enforcement. These laws forbid Jews to acquire real estate, by purchase or by lease, in the nine western provinces of the empire. Under the disregard of these laws that has prevailed for years, thousands of Jews hav acquired lands and houses. Their deeds and leases are now officially declared null and void, and they are being forcibly expelled from their homes, without compensation. In nearly every case the victim is forced, under pain of the knout, to sign a paper declaring that he givs up his place voluntarily.

Various other instances of persecution we will record here in the words of the original dispatches:

"The Berlin correspondent of the Times has received a telegram from St. Petersburg stating that the synagog there has been closed by the government for the reason that such an edifice is an anomaly in a city where Jews are not entitled to settle."

"All the army surgeons of the Jewish race who decline to be converted to the orthodox faith are to be dismissed."

"The Novoye Vremya is highly pleased because a new oppressiv measure has been devised against the Jews. In order to raise the especial taxes which are imposed upon them and the means to provide for their poor brethren who are expelled from the interior, the Jews of the towns where they are allowed to liv hold meetings for the purpose of taxing themselvs each according to his means. They elect their officers and employees to dispense the funds which they raise in this manner. The ministry of the interior has now issued an order that such Jewish meetings should be held under the supervision and control of the government officials, and that the moneys collected or subscribed at these gatherings should be deposited in the general communal treasuries of the respectiv towns and distributed according to consideration of the communal assemblies."

"Sometimes the outrages against the rights of property are accompanied by shocking outrages of moral feelings. A certain Mr. Demy, a landlord in Besarabia, has been at law for ten years with the Jewish Chinsh people of Kopreshty about the piece of land upon which their houses and synagog are built. The synagog, pending the decision, was, as a matter of course, in the possession of the defendants. But in the summer of 1890, on the eve of the approaching Jewish holidays, Mr. Demy persuaded the police inspector, Luchinsky, to take possession in his name of the Jewish houses of prayer, and Luchinsky, knowing well that with Jews anything can be done with impunity, proceeded to carry out his friend's request. He arrived at Kopreshty, entered the synagog, took possession of all the sacred rolls, and sent them in a cart to the police station. Mr. Demy was then installed in possession of the Jewish house of prayer, and he immediately drove into it a herd of pigs, which remained there all day and the following night."

"One instance of the intolerance of the czarina is given. Her majesty, in company with the czar, some time ago inspected the troops forming the garrison at Moscow. It is customary on such occasions to giv the soldiers a holiday after the inspection is concluded. The officers of the various regiments were instructed that no Jewish soldiers must be present at the inspection. At the particular request of the czarina the Jews were confined to their barracks. In informing them of the reason why they were not permitted to join their fellow-soldiers their officers told them that Jews were offensiv to her majesty, who wished to be spared the sight of them."

"Under a revival of an ancient Sunday law the police hav begun either arresting or blackmailing such Israelites as dare to appear in the marketplaces of the Pale on Sunday. This Sunday prohibition, which often brings about terrible riots with the usual accompaniment of Jewish lives lost and Jewish shops and houses plundered and burnt, is one of the most characteristic features of the anti-Jewish laws. The Hebrews, of course, religiously abstain from labor on Saturday. It was considered by Ignatieff an extremely smart trick to forbid them to do business on Sunday as well. In its essence, this meant that the Jews could only hav five earning days against other people's seven. Although there are laws on the books prohibiting Christian labor or business on Sunday, they are a complete dead letter. Every traveler in Russia knows that Sunday in the markets and business streets differs in no respect from any other day, save that there are no Jews about. Having remained idle on Saturday for their own Sabbath, they are compelled to observe Sunday for the Christian Sabbath—the while the Christian himself works or barters from morning till night, and the marketplaces are filled as well with Tartars, gypsies, and Persians, whom no one molests."

The chief instigator in these oppressions is M. Pobiedonostseff, the chief procurator of the holy synod, or state minister of public worship. This man is an extreme religious fanatic. Everything is ascribed to the ascendency which he exerts over the mind of the czar. When the present reign began he became a trusted adviser; then, little by little, the power behind the throne. He grew to guide the czar in the selection of new ministers and officials and in the distribution of honors and of rebukes until the whole official world of St. Petersburg dreaded him and fawned upon him as Paris did in its time before the "Gray Cardinal." To-day the enormous power which he wields is exerted through these eager official sycophants who owe their places to him and scramble over one another in their haste to carry out his most faintly hinted desire to rob or slay dissenting religionists, and as well through direct personal contact with the czar. This godly villain makes other sects than the Jews suffer. The Jews are only one among many unhappy denominations and classes whom Pobiedonostseff is mercilessly driving to despair, ruin, and exile. Says a European correspondent of the New York Times:

"This theory of serving God with falsehood, with theft, with shameless treachery, with wholesale persecution, has in other times possessed the brains of great and good men of our own western races. But these men hav all been dead three or four hundred years. Russia and M. Pobiedonostseff hav only just reached the point where Europe stood when Columbus discovered America."

A rapid increase in the mortality of the Jews has resulted from their being penned in overclose quarters. Consumption, a disease from which they had been remarkably exempt, is mowing down multitudes.

The Russian populace outrage the Jews at will upon any pretext or no pretext. Children and rowdies pull the sufferers' beards in the streets and if resistance is made a mob attacks the Hebrew quarter and burns and kills. An inroad by the cholera, or any other calamity, is followed by a raid on the misbelievers whose sin has drawn down God's wrath.

Space fails us for detailing how, in the words of one European writer, "dull incompetency, ignoble greed, semi-civilized vanity, and stark-mad fanaticism, confusedly struggling together for evil, hav produced this savage spectacle at which humanity revolts."

Says Colonel Ingersoll: "The persecution of the Jews is the meanest, the most senseless and cruel page in history. Every civilized Christian should feel on his cheeks the red spots of shame as he reads the wretched and infamous story."

A Change in The Truth Seeker's Business.

Mr. Charles P. Somerby having retired from The Truth Seeker Company and ceased to hav any connection with the paper or business, our subscribers and business friends are requested to make their remittances payable to the undersigned.

It is unnecessary to say that with the change in business management there will be no change in the aggressiv Freethought policy of the paper. On the contrary the work will be pushed more vigorously than ever, and I hope with still greater success. Whatever improvements can be made in the paper will be attempted, and I trust that THE TRUTH SEEKER's many friends and correspondents will gird up their loins anew for a fight to the end against superstition and the "organized credulity" which is seeking to mentally enslave the people of the country and to dedicate to a revivified ecclesiastical tyranny one-seventh of our time. Our American secular government never more than now needed activ defenders, since courts and Congress hav practically allied the state to a church which in the rapid breaking up of its creeds endeavors to seize the government in order to preserve its forms. THE TRUTH SEEKER will never retreat, but go on better and stronger than ever in the manful war for freedom of thought and against religious tyranny.

In taking the business established so many years ago by D. M. Bennett, and with which I hav ever been connected, I hav necessarily assumed a very considerable burden of debt. That I may meet these obligations successfully, I ask every friend and reader to be especially prompt in renewing subscriptions, and I venture to urge them to also aid by sending a new subscriber or by purchasing some of the many splendid books published by THE TRUTH SEEKER. I beg to cordially thank all friends for their support and encouragement in the past—support and encouragement without which THE TRUTH SEEKER never could hav succeeded—and to solicit an even more cordial continuance, if that be possible. Our door opens inward easily, and a warm greeting is assured every Liberal in the country. Come in and see us.

E. M. MACDONALD,
EDITOR AND MANAGER OF THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A Card to the Patrons of The Truth Seeker.

I hav disposed of my interest in the Truth Seeker Company and ceased to be its business manager.

I hope the many pleasant friendships formed during the past nine years will be continued notwithstanding this severance of business relations.

I take this opportunity to thank the generous subscribers and patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER for their cordial support.

Sincerely,
C. P. SOMERBY.

Mr. Westbrook's Queer Attitude.

In a paper prepared for the Secular Union congress, not read there but since printed in the Investigator, Mr. R. B. Westbrook, ex-president, advises the Liberals not to work for the opening of the World's Fair, but to strive for the repeal of "improper" Sunday laws, the taxation of church property; to oppose Bible-reading in the schools, and "last, but not least," to "join the National League for the Protection of American Institutions." Mr. Westbrook, D.D., evidently is still a D.D., and would rather tilt at windmills and chase rainbows than come down to practical business whereof there are some hopes of success. He is a Liberal "in the future." He wants to repeal Sunday laws in general, but enforce them in particulars. It is a queer position for an ex-president of the Secular Union to take.

Chiefly to enlighten our friend C. B. Reynolds, we hav on several occasions pointed out that the National League for the Protection of American Institutions is no organization for Liberals to support, for the reason that it is a Protestant scheme to put into our national Constitution a clause professedly in favor of separation of church and state, but really in favor of *un*sectarian Protestantism. The proposed amendment reads:

"No state shall pass any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or use its property or credit, or any money raised by taxation, or authorize either to be used, for the purpose of founding, maintaining, or aiding, by appropriation, payment for services, expenses or otherwise, any church, religious denomination, or religious society, or any institution, society, or undertaking, which is wholly, or in part, under sectarian or ecclesiastical control."

This is wholly inadequate. We hav seen in the administration of Girard College how easy it is to evade any such general provision against "sectarian" or "ecclesiastical" control of public institutions. There are a great many religious bigots, working hard for their cause, who are not sectarians or ecclesiastics. It is easy to evade legal provisions in such cases. What we really need is a prohibition against applying public funds to the support of any institution not owned and managed by the state and a further prohibition against permitting any religious exercises to be conducted therein. The Nine Demands express the Liberal position on these questions a thousand times better than the proposed constitutional amendment of the National League for the Protection of American Institutions, whose secretary once personally informed us that the League could not possibly go to the limit set by the American Secular Union. In other words, he was against the union of the state and the Catholic church but thought that morality and other essentials of good citizenship would be best conserved by the government extending some aid to *un*sectarian Protestant institutions.

Mr. Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., is not a very good exponent of Liberal political principles.

The Coming Conflict.

George Parsons Lathrop, an American writer of some note, who was recently converted to Catholicism, is convinced that the Yankee mind is "ripe for conversion to that religion." "It is groping for a truth it recognizes dimly," and which, according to his new belief, can be found nowhere outside of "the true church," to which he himself now belongs. Hence he predicts that in the next century "we shall see a tidal wave of conversion sweeping millions of our countrymen into the Catholic church."

What will happen as the result of the present theological revolution the wisest of men cannot foresee. It is obvious, however, thinks the New York Sun, that the interest in the subject of religion was never before so great and general as now. Men may be changing their religious views and giving up their former religious beliefs, but they are not casting aside religion. The religious sentiment, says the Sun, continues as strong as ever, and it demands an outlet to worship. In further comment upon Mr. Lathrop's prediction the same paper remarks:

"The tendency seems to be toward a division into two great parties, the one retaining the sentiment of Christianity only, and rejecting the dogmas of theology entirely, and the other venerating and defending the dogmatic authority of the church. Protestantism seems to tend toward a more complete denial of any and all authority over the individual judgment and conscience, and Roman Catholicism is more determined in its assertion of such authority as God's representativ on earth. Between these two lines the religious battles of the next century are likely to be fought, with results which wiser heads than Mr. Lathrop's might hesitate to predict or even to guess."

This speculation, that those Protestants and Catholics who remain fully Christian will presently unite against their common enemy, is not unfrequently made. It is to be hoped that a long time may pass before such a coalition is seen. Freethought obtains now only because of the disunion in the camp of the enemy. Let the great divisions of Christianity combine and bitter will become the Freethinker's fare.

All danger of such a catastrophe might be averted—very nearly all the Christians in the land might be Rationalized—by Infidels' thrusting upon each and every one of them a plentiful supply of Freethought literature. But this is not being done. Most Freethinkers do nothing toward it. Some of them are opulent, but their fortunes are not devoted to this work. To our shame be it said, we hav not won our present liberties by our own sweat and blood, but are indebted for them to the chance circumstance of our enemies' dissensions. We will hope that these dissensions may continue; we do not know that they will.

The World's Fair Leaflet.

The subjoined letter is something to the point:

"MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Oct. 28, 1892.

"EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed you will find $1, for which send to my address one copy of Dr. Foote's 'Handbook of Health Hints and Ready Recipes.' The balance you can apply on printing leaflets with cartoon on as suggested by 'E. B. B.,' in THE TRUTH SEEKER October 15th. If you do not print them use it where it will do good. Am well pleased with the way paper is edited. Yours for justice and liberty,

"CHAS. LOWND."

The leaflet is now being prepared, and will be printed shortly. We shall be glad to send them out for 25 cents per dozen and $1.50 per hundred.

New Pamphlets.

We hav printed for Mr. Franklin Steiner in a neat little 5-cent pamphlet his open letter to the Rev. J. L. Sooy, D.D., of Des Moines. It shows that the oft-repeated Christian statement that Infidels do not contribute to nor found charities is a falsehood. The pamphlet is called "Infidels and Charity," and ought to be widely circulated.

We hav also printed, for Mr. W. H. Burr, his recent article on "Junius, Casca, Common Sense, and Thomas Paine." It sets forth Mr. Burr's views regarding these persons in answer to a foot-note in Moncure D. Conway's Life of Paine. Price 5 cents.

New Editions.

Two pamphlets which keep the printers busy on new editions are John E. Remsburg's "False Claims" of Christianity, and the "Holy Bible Abridged." The editions this time are in handsome paper covers. Price, 10 cents for "False Claims," and 25 cents for "Bible Abridged."

In the West.

News and Notes.

I am speeding along through the glorious Colorado mountains. The first snowstorm of the season has appeared, and the multitudinous hills are shining like silver, while the green and golden plains sweep away into the luminous distance. The lofty peaks with blazing masses on their crest meet the shining sky. It is a lovely day after the storm, and scenes of vast magnificence open upon the view. The sun marches through the radiant clouds, and flings a soft and brilliant light over the fields and rolling mists, and woods decked with feathery white, and the glittering streams, and then it bursts forth along some blue expanse with intolerable splendor. Through the ever-changing pictures thunders the burnished iron horse, flinging back the glory of the sun, rejoicing in its fiery life, and spreading forth its gorgeous pennon of smoke. Away we go, as if on a fairy journey. Now we pass the Castle Rock towering in ancient grandeur, a mighty ruin from the immemorial years, while at its feet is the handsome modern city, the new and the old in charming contrast. A wonderful panorama unfolds, exquisit in beauty, bold in desolation, marvelous in form, weird in suggestion, fascinating in sublimity. Thought pursues its far flight, and dreams seem like realities. It is a glorious moment of existence. A divine elation is in the mind, for nature, with its superb appareling, seems to be our slave and not our master.

It is exhilarating thus to journey on and on, and for the time being exult in the supremacy of mental life. We know that nature is our master and that we must mingle with the dust; but not less inspiring is the magnificent world of earth and sky that crowds its illimitable glories on our enchanted vision.

In my last week's pilgrimage I hav left behind Chicago with its wondrous revelations of man's progress. From Chicago to Denver, through night and day, is a swift and delightful passage. Denver in the loveliest of days sits queen-like on its mountain throne, and never did it present a more attractiv face. The atmosphere is diamond-like in its effulgence, and it seems to penetrate one like the effluence of wine itself. Denver is a gay capital. People enjoy themselvs here. The streets present an elegant appearance. Splendid business blocks rival those of New York and Chicago.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is flooding the city. Nearly four hundred delegates are present. It makes quite an imposing assembly. There are eloquent and bright-looking women in this Christian crusade, and some of Liberal ideas. If these reformers would forego the "God in the Constitution," and not try to make men good by force of law, it might be that their earnestness and enthusiasm would benefit the world. As it is, the old crusade may be repeated over again, and blood and revolution follow. All is not gold that glitters. These ladies make a fine appearance, but the shadow of despotism lurks in their lively parade.

In the hospitable home of Mr. and Mrs. Truss the world of philosophy unfolds, and everything is discussed from politics to religion. I always get a mental revival with friend Truss. He keeps up with the times around the whole circle of science. Friend Varian also joins in with his stores of enormous reading upon every subject. It is better than consulting a library to "interview" Truss and Varian. We talk till midnight sometimes, but take no note of the flying hours. We hav a bird's-eye view of the universe in these glowing discussions and "take a tilt" with nearly every problem that has tormented and inspired the human heart and brain for ages and probably will for ages to come. The goal of final solution will never be reached.

Politics are buzzing and humming and roaring along with tremendous velocity in the "Silver state." Our friend Z. Shed is making some masterful speeches for the People's party. I find that many Liberals are in this movement as leaders and candidates. Charles Roth, however, is running for the assembly on the Republican ticket. I hope he will be elected, for he will do service for the Liberal cause wherever he is. This is a good year, I guess, for Liberals. Amidst the manifold agitations and changes of the campaign, I believe some true men will get to the front.

It was too bad after the glorious weather of Friday and Saturday that it should rain on Sunday morning. It was a melancholy rain, and in the afternoon it turned into a more melancholy snowstorm, and the walking was simply horrible, and of course I did not hav a very large audience in the evening. It was quite a disappointment, but I had to make the best of it. It is about three years since I was in Denver and I was pleased to meet old friends again, and new ones too—Fred Warren, H. E. Hurlburt, Mr. and Mrs. Nesbitt, Frank Leavy, T. B. Chandler, and others. Quite a number added their names to the Federation. I was enabled to meet the fortunes of war with good cheer. Sunday afternoon I enjoyed the hospitality of Mrs. Charles Roth; and around the festiv board the darkening skies were forgotten. Mr. and Mrs. John G. Jenkins and family are always in the ranks to help. Although I struck Denver at an unfortunate time, religion, politics, rain and snow, and mud being in full sway, yet the genial and generous welcome made amends for the lack of popular success, and I hope on, hope ever.

I was pleased to meet with M. F. Everett, of Glenwood Springs, a stanch Liberal, on the roll of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He invites me to Glenwood Springs. I expect to make an appointment there some day, together with Aspen and other places in this part of Colorado, where there is a large Freethought element. I was privileged also to make the acquaintance of Mr. and Mrs. Clayton, Liberal Spiritualists, ready to stand by facts and not be blinded by fraud. In their home shines the genial atmosphere of Freethought along with gleams of immortality, whose glory is still the puzzle of modern science.

I dropped off one night, Thursday, on my way to Denver, at Bartley, Neb., where I gave a lecture at the schoolhouse. The Methodists are trying to run this place to suit themselvs. They wouldn't let the hall which they happen to control for love or money, and we were obliged to meet in the schoolhouse and now they threaten to arrest the janitor for opening the doors. They seem to think they own the whole place. They don't even allow other Christian sects the use of the hall. A more narrow-minded set of ecclesiastical stupidities is not to be found on the continent. I had a good audience, however, and intelligence and liberality will eventually prevail in this community. There are open and avowed Freethinkers here who don't propose to surrender, and the women are not by any means joined to the church—Mr. and Mrs. R. E. George and the children; Henry Lang; J. Fletcher, who introduced me at the lecture, who has the courage of his convictions though the orthodox threaten a boycott; Mr. Hopp, a Liberal Spiritualist whose hospitable home welcomes the Secularist; Henry Burton; W. P. Webb; Charles W. Hodgkin, and W. H. Gartside. Stockville, twenty-five miles away, sends a good delegation—Frank M. Hall and wife, John Delate, etc. I should like to hav gone to Stockville if time permitted, for I understand I should find a warm welcome from the Liberals of that place. In the future I may be able to do so.

I hav to take the midnight train in order to meet my further appointments. I enjoyed my short stay in Bartley even if the Methodists are so mean. These are growing small by degrees and beautifully less. They tried to build a sectarian college here, but at present it is a somewhat melancholy ruin. The funds are lacking.

The country in the vicinity of Bartley is excellent. The harvests of this year hav been equal to any on record. There is constant improvement, fine weather and fine soil. The worst crop yet produced are the Methodist elders.

I am writing these notes on board train Monday, October 31st, and just as I complete them we are plunging through the Royal gorge, and the mighty rocks overhang on every side in wild, fantastic shapes and massiv ranks. The river leaps along as if trying to escape the rocky prisonhouse. It seems as if the train would rush against the precipitous battlements. Then the frowning barriers open, and into vast abysses we dash. Winding from the gorge we pass into the immense mountain scenery, and higher and higher we climb into the land of wonders. Near and far the mountains lift their noble forms. Dark gray, dark blue, white and glittering, they shine in endless battalions. We cannot count them; like huge monsters they seem to hedge us in from all the outer world. As we rush along men and brilliant forms appear. We look into enormous vistas, with walls of silver and gold, as if some great city were built in the bosom of the sky. Near by are pretty farmhouses, herds of cattle, human life in contrast with the pathless world beyond.

The evening radiance soon shines over the varied landscape. Then with the darkening scene flare the great lights of Leadville, that wonderful hive of industry, where giant forces wrest from the earth its hard-won treasures. Beyond Leadville in the moonlight and starlight flooding the innumerable bowlders and awful crags and chasms, the swift engin winds through the canyon of the Grand river where the wildest and most sublime sceneries sweep upon the vision almost with the rapidity of a cataract. Then the lights of Glenwood Springs flash upon the view. Plunging onward through the darkness of midnight in the early morn we reach the Castle Gate, where nature it seems has huddled her "raw recruits" of the olden time in grotesque array, and relics of gigantic conflict lie round the blasted towers. Thence we come into Pleasant valley, when the sun through the white clouds and shimmering flakes makes beautiful the mingling hills and valleys. Here I finish these notes. I hav never written in such a gorgeous room before, in such a big house, with such big halls on every side. I hav had the Rocky mountains for its pillars, the blue sky for its dome, the changing clouds for drapery, and stream and plain for its fretted floor, and pictures such as mortal hand never painted on its ever-varying walls—shifting and melting from gloom to beauty as the magic car moves on. What is more magic than this car which man himself has made, that follows the circling cloud with such sure swiftness, climbing high, and like an eagle flight scaling the rocky barrier, racing with the bounding cataract between mighty walls, and almost like a winged creature springing forth from the mountains into the broad and beaming valley, onward, onward, through day and night? What a magic car this is, more wonderful than poet dreamed of a thousand years ago. It annihilates time and space, and I hope it will annihilate God too with its glorious motion and splendor.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

How Much Good There Is in Prayer.

Two drunken men got into a boat to cross a river. They rowed all night and could not reach shore. Then they thought they had drifted out to sea, and one of them fell to praying. At last one of them began to get sober and he said, "Wait a minute." Then he went to the bow of the boat and climbed out, and said to his companion, "You needn't pray any more, Bill; we forgot when we got in last night to loose this boat."

Voltaire.

The infidels of one age have often been the aureoled saints of the next.

The destroyers of the old are the creators of the new.

As time sweeps on the old passes away and the new in its turn becomes old.

There is in the intellectual world, as in the physical, decay and growth, and ever by the grave of buried age stand youth and joy.

The history of intellectual progress is written in the lives of infidels.

Political rights have been preserved by traitors; the liberty of mind by heretics.

To attack the king was treason; to dispute the priest was blasphemy.

For many centuries the sword and cross were allies. Together they attacked the rights of man. They defended each other.

The throne and altar were twins—two vultures from the same egg.

James I. said: "No bishop, no king." He might have added: No cross no crown. The King owned the bodies of men; the priest, the souls. One lived on taxes collected by force, the other on alms collected by fear—both robbers, both beggars.

These robbers and these beggars controled two worlds. The king made laws, the priest made creeds. Both obtained their authority from God, both were the agents of the infinite.

With bowed backs the people carried the burdens of one, and with wonder's open mouth received the dogmas of the other.

If the people aspired to be free, they were crushed by the king, and every priest was a Herod, who slaughtered the children of the brain.

The king ruled by force, the priest by fear, and both by both.

The king said to the people: "God made you peasants, and He made me king: He made you to labor, and me to enjoy; He made rags and hovels for you, robes and palaces for me. He made you to obey, and me to command. Such is the justice of God."

And the priest said: "God made you ignorant and vile; He made me holy and wise; you are the sheep, I am the shepherd; your fleeces belong to me. If you do not obey me here, God will punish you now and torment you forever in another world. Such is the mercy of God.

"You must not reason. Reason is a rebel. You must not contradict—contradiction is born of egotism; you must believe. He that has ears to hear let him hear. Heaven is a question of ears."

Fortunately for us, there have been traitors and there have been heretics, blasphemers, thinkers, investigators, lovers of liberty, men of genius who have given their lives to better the condition of their fellow-men.

It may be well enough here to ask the question: "What is greatness?"

A great man adds to the sum of knowledge, extends the horizon of thought, releases souls from the Bastile of fear, crosses unknown and mysterious seas, gives new islands and new continents to the domain of thought, new constellations to the firmament of mind. A great man does not seek applause or place; he seeks for truth; he seeks the road to happiness, and what he ascertains he gives to others.

A great man throws pearls before swine, and the swine are sometimes changed to men. If the great had always kept their pearls, vast multitudes would be barbarians now.

A great man is a torch in the darkness, a beacon in superstition's night, an inspiration and a prophecy.

Greatness is not the gift of majorities; it cannot be thrust upon any man; men cannot give it to another; they can give place and power, but not greatness.

The place does not make the man, nor the scepter the king. Greatness is from within.

The great men are the heroes who have freed the bodies of men; they are the philosophers and thinkers who have given liberty to the soul; they are the poets who have transfigured the common and filled the lives of many millions with love and song.

They are the artists who have covered the bare walls of weary life with the triumphs of genius.

They are the heroes who have slain the monsters of ignorance and fear, who have outgazed the Gorgon and driven the cruel gods from their thrones.

They are the inventors, the discoverers, the great mechanics, the kings of the useful who have civilized this world.

At the head of this heroic army, foremost of all, stands Voltaire, whose memory we are honoring tonight.

Voltaire! a name that excites the admiration of men, the malignity of priests. Pronounce that name in the presence of a clergyman, and you will find that you have made a declaration of war. Pronounce that name, and from the face of the priest the mask of meekness will fall, and from the mouth of forgiveness will pour a Niagara of vituperation and calumny. And yet Voltaire was the greatest man of his Century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men.

On Sunday, the 21st of November, 1694, a babe was born; a babe exceedingly frail, whose breath hesitated about remaining. This babe became the greatest man of the 18th Century.

When Voltaire came to this "great stage of fools," his country had been christianized—not civilized—for about fourteen hundred years. For a thousand years the religion of peace and good will had been supreme. The laws had been given by christian kings, and sanctioned by "wise and holy men."

Under the benign reign of universal love, every court had its chamber of torture, and every priest relied on the thumb-screw and rack.

Such had been the success of the blessed gospel that every science was an outcast.

To speak your honest thoughts, to teach your fellow-men, to investigate for yourself, to seek the truth, these were all crimes, and the "holy-mother church" pursued the criminals with sword and flame.

The believers in a God of love—an infinite father—punished hundreds of offenses with torture and death. Suspected persons were tortured to make them confess. Convicted persons were tortured to make them give the names of their accomplices. Under the leadership of the Church, cruelty had become the only reforming power.

In this blessed year 1694 all authors were at the mercy of king and priest. The most of them were cast into prisons, impoverished by fines and costs, exiled or executed.

The little time that hangmen could snatch from professional duties was occupied in burning books.

The courts of justice were traps, in which the innocent were caught. The judges were almost as malicious and cruel as though they had been bishops or saints. There was no trial by jury, and the rules of evidence allowed the conviction of the supposed criminal by the proof of suspicion or hearsay.

The witnesses, being liable to be tortured, generally told what the judges wished to hear.

The supernatural and the miraculous controled the world. Everything was explained, but nothing was understood. The Church was at the head. The sick bought from monks little amulets of consecrated paper. They did not send for a doctor, but for a priest, and the priest sold the diseased and the dying these magical amulets. These little pieces of paper with the help of some saint would cure diseases of every kind. If you would put one in a cradle, it would keep the child from being bewitched. If you would put one in the barn, the rats would not eat your corn. If you would keep one in the house, evil spirits would not enter your doors, and if you buried them in the fields, you would have good weather, the frost would be delayed, rain would come when needed, and abundant crops would bless your labor. The Church insisted that all diseases could be cured in the name of God, and that these cures could be effected by prayers, exorcism, by touching bones of saints, pieces of the true cross; by being sprinkled with holy water or with sanctified salt, or touched with magical oil.

In that day the dead saints were the best physicians; St. Valentine cured the epilepsy; St. Gervasius was exceedingly good for rheumatism; St. Michael for cancer; St. Judas for coughs and colds; St. Ovidius restored the hearing; St. Sebastian was good for the bites of snakes and the stings of poisonous insects; St. Apollonia for toothache; St. Clara for any trouble with the eyes; and St. Hubert for hydrophobia. It was known that doctors reduced the revenue of the Church; that was enough—science was the enemy of religion.

The Church thought that the air was filled with devils; that every sinner was a kind of a tenement house inhabited by evil spirits; that angels were on one side of men and evil spirits on the other, and that God would, when the subscriptions and donations justified the effort, drive the evil spirits from the field.

Satan had power over the air; consequently he controled the frost, the mildew, the lightning and the flood; and the principal business of the Church was with bells, and holy water, and incense, and crosses, to defeat the machinations of that prince of the power of the air.

Great reliance was placed upon the bells; they were sprinkled with holy water, and their clangor cleared the air of imps and fiends. And the bells also protected the people from storms and lightning. In that day the Church used to anathematize insects. Suits were commenced against rats, and judgment rendered. Every monastery had its master magician, who sold incense and salt and tapers, and consecrated palms and relics. Every science was regarded as an enemy; every fact held the creed of the Church in scorn. Investigators were regarded as dangerous; thinkers were traitors, and the Church exerted its vast power to prevent the intellectual progress of man.

There was no real liberty, no real education, no real philosophy, no real science—nothing but credulity and superstition. The world was under the control of Satan and the Church.

The Church firmly believed in the existence of witches and devils and fiends. In this way the Church had every enemy within her power. It simply had to charge him with being a wizard, of holding communications with devils, and the ignorant mob were ready to tear him to pieces. So prevalent was this belief, this belief in the supernatural, that the poor people were finally driven to make the best possible terms they could with the spirit of evil. This frightful doctrine filled every friend with suspicion of his friend; it made the husband denounce the wife, children their parents, parents their children. It destroyed the amenities of humanity; it did away with justice in the courts; it broke the bond of friendship; it filled with poison the golden cup of life; it turned earth into a very perdition peopled with abominable, malicious and hideous fiends. Such was the result of a belief in the supernatural; such was the result of giving up the evidence of our own senses and relying upon dreams, visions, and fears. Such was the result of the attack upon the human reason; such the result of depending on the imagination, on the supernatural; such the result of living in this world for another; of depending on priests instead of upon ourselves. The Protestants vied with Catholics; Luther stood side by side with the priests he had deserted in promoting this belief in devils and fears. To the Catholic every Protestant was possessed by a devil; to the Protestant every Catholic was the home of a fiend. All order in regular succession of causes and effects was known no more; the natural ceased to exist; the learned and the ignorant were on a level. The priest was caught in the net he had spread for the peasant, and Christendom became a vast madhouse, with the insane for keepers.

When Voltaire was born the Church ruled and owned France. It was a period of almost universal corruption. The priests were mostly libertines, the judges cruel and venal. The royal palace was a house of prostitution. The nobles were heartless, proud, arrogant, and cruel to the last degree. The common people were treated as beasts. It took the Church a thousand years to bring about this happy condition of things.

The seeds of the Revolution unconsciously were being scattered by every noble and by every priest. They were germinating slowly in the hearts of the wretched; they were being watered by the tears of agony; blows began to bear interest. There was a faint longing for blood. Workmen, blackened by the sun, bowed by labor, deformed by want, looked at the white throats of scornful ladies and thought about cutting them.

In those days witnesses were cross-examined with instruments of torture; the Church was the arsenal of superstition; miracles, relics, angels, and devils were as common as lies.

In order to appreciate a great man we must know his surroundings. We must understand the scope of the drama in which he played—the part he acted, and we must also know his audience.

In England George I. was disporting with the Maypole and Elephant, and then George II., jealous and choleric, hating the English and their language, making, however, an excellent image or idol before whom the English were glad to bow—snobbery triumphant—the criminal code getting bloodier every day—223 offenses punishable with death—the prisons filled and the scaffolds crowded—efforts on every hand to repress the ambition of men to be men—the Church relying on superstition and ceremony to make men good—and the State dependent on the whip, the rope and ax to make men patriotic.

In Spain, the Inquisition in full control—all the instruments of torture used to prevent the development of the mind. Spain, that had driven out the Jews, that is to say, her talent; that had driven out the Moors; that is to say, her taste and her industry, was still endeavoring by all religious means to reduce the land to the imbecility of the true faith.

In Portugal they were burning women and children for having eaten meat on a holy day, and this to please the most merciful God.

In Italy, the nation prostrate covered with swarms of cardinals and bishops and priests and monks and nuns and every representative of holy sloth. The Inquisition there also—while hands that were clasped in prayer or stretched for alms, grasped with eagerness and joy the lever of the rack, or gathered fagots for the holy flame.

In Germany, they were burning women and children charged with having made a compact with the enemy of man.

And in our own fair land, persecuting Quakers, stealing men and women from another shore, stealing children from their mother's breasts, and paying labor with the cruel lash.

Superstition ruled the world!

There is but one use for law, but one excuse for government—the preservation of liberty—to give to each man his own, to secure to the farmer what he produces from the soil, to the mechanic what he invents and makes, to the artist what he creates, to the thinker the right to express his thoughts. Liberty is the breath of progress.

In France the people were the sport of a king's caprice. Everywhere was the shadow of the Bastile. It fell upon the sunniest field, upon the happiest home. With the king walked the headsman; back of the throne was the chamber of torture. The Church appealed to the rack, and Faith relied on the fagot. Science was an outcast, and Philosophy, so-called, was the pander of superstition.

Nobles and priests were sacred. Peasants were vermin. Idleness sat at the banquet, and Industry gathered the crumbs and the crusts.

Voltaire was of the people. In the language of that day, he had no ancestors. His real name was Francois Marie Arouet. His mother was Marguerite d'Aumard. This mother died when he was seven years of age. He had an elder brother, Armand, who was a devotee, very religious and exceedingly disagreeable. This brother used to present offerings to the Church, hoping to make amends for the unbelief of his brother. So far as we know, none of his ancestors were literary people.

The Arouets had never written a line. The Abbe de Chaulieu was his godfather, and, although an abbe, was a Deist who cared nothing about religion except in connection with his salary. Voltaire's father wanted to make a lawyer of him, but he had no taste for law. At the age of ten he entered the college of Louis Le Grand. This was a Jesuit school, and here he remained for seven years, leaving at seventeen, and never attending any other school. According to Voltaire, he learned nothing at this school but a little Greek, a good deal of Latin and a vast amount of nonsense.

In this college of Louis Le Grand they did not teach geography, history, mathematics, or any science. This was a Catholic institution, controled by Jesuits. In that day the religion was defended, was protected or supported by the State. Behind the entire creed were the bayonet, the ax, the wheel, the fagot and the torture chamber.

While Voltaire was attending the college of Louis Le Grande the soldiers of the king were hunting Protestants in the mountains of Cevennes for magistrates to hang on gibbets, to put to torture, to break on the wheel, or to burn at the stake.

At seventeen Voltaire determined to devote his life to lit rature. The father said, speaking of his two sons Armand and Francois, "I have a pair of fools for sons, one in verse and the other in prose."

In 1713 Voltaire, in a small way, became a diplomat. He went to The Hague attached to the French minister, and there he fell in love. The girl's mother objected. Voltaire sent his clothes to the young lady that she might visit him. Everything was discovered and he was dismissed. To this girl he wrote a letter, and in it you will find the keynote of Voltaire: "Do not expose yourself to the fury of your mother. You know what she is capable of. You have experienced it too well. Dissemble; it is your only chance. Tell her that you have forgotten me, that you hate me; then after telling her, love me all the more."

On account of this episode Voltaire was formally disinherited by his father. The father procured an order of arrest and gave his son the choice of going to prison or beyond the seas. He finally consented to become a lawyer, and says: "I have already been a week at work in the office of a solicitor learning the trade of a pettifogger."

About this time he competed for a prize, writing a poem on the King's generosity in building the new choir in the cathedral Notre Dame. He did not win it. After being with the solicitor a little while, he hated the law, began to write poetry and the outlines of tragedy. Great questions were then agitating the public mind, questions that throw a flood of light upon that epoch.

In 1552, Dr. Baius took into his head to sustain a number of propositions touching predestination to the prejudice of the doctrine of free will. The Cordelian monks selected seventy-six of the propositions and denounced them to the Pope as heretical, and from the Pope obtained what was called a Bull. This Bull contained a doubtful passage, the meaning of which was dependent upon the position of a comma. The friends of Dr. Baius wrote to Rome to find where the comma ought to be placed. Rome, busy with other matters, sent as an answer a copy of the Bull in which the doubtful sentence was left without any comma. So the dispute continued.

Then, there was the great controversy between the Jansenists and Molinists. Molini was a Spanish Jesuit, who sustained the doctrine of free will with a subtlety of his own. "man's will is free, but God sees exactly how he will use it." The Presbyterians of our country are still wrestling with this important absurdity.

Jansenius was a French Jesuit who carried the doctrine of predestination to the extreme, asserting that God commands things that are impossible, and that Christ did not die for all.

In 1641 the Jesuits obtained a Bull condemning five propositions of Jansenius. The Jansenists thereupon denied that the five propositions—or any of them—were found in the works of Jansenius.

This question of Jansenism and Molinism occupied France for about two hundred years.

In Voltaire's time the question had finally dwindled down to whether the five propositions condemned by the Papal Bull were in fact in the works of Jansenius. The Jansenists proved that the five propositions were not in his book, because a niece of Pascal had a diseased eye cured by the application of a thorn from the crown of Christ.

The Bull Unigenitus was launched in 1713, and then all the prisons were filled with Jansenists. This great question of predestination and free will, of free moral agency and accountability, and being saved by the grace of God, and damned for the glory of God, have occupied the mind of what we call the civilized world for many centuries. All these questions were argued pro and con through Switzerland; all of them in Holland for centuries; in Scotland and England and New England, and millions of people are still busy harmonizing foreordination and free will, necessity and morality, predestination and accountability.

Louis XIV. having died, the Regent took possession, and then the prisons were opened. The Regent called for a list of all persons then in the prisons sent there at the will of the King. He found that, as to many prisoners, nobody knew any cause why they had been in prison. They had been forgotten. Many of the prisoners did not know themselves, and could not guess why they had been arrested. One Italian had been in the Bastile thirty-three years without ever knowing why. On his arrival in Paris, thirty-three years before, he was arrested and sent to prison. He had grown old. He had survived his family and friends. When the rest were liberated he asked to remain where he was, and he lived there the rest of his life. The old prisoners were pardoned; but in a little while their places were taken by new ones.

At this time Voltaire was not interested in the great world—knew very little of religion or of government. He was busy writing poetry, busy thinking of comedies and tragedies. He was full of life. All his fancies were winged, like moths.

He was charged with having written some cutting epigrams. He was exiled to Tulle, three hundred miles away. From this place he wrote in the true vein—"I am at a chateau, a place that would be the most agreeable in the world if I had not been exiled to it, and where there is nothing wanting for my perfect happiness except the liberty of leaving. It would be delicious to remain, if I only were allowed to go."

At last the exile was allowed to return. Again he was arrested; this time sent to the Bastile, where he remained for nearly a year. While in prison he changed his name from Francois Marie Arouet to Voltaire, and by that name he has since been known.

Voltaire, as full of life as summer is full of blossom, giving his ideas upon all subjects at the expense of prince and king, was exiled to England. From sunny France he took his way to the mists and fogs of Albion. He became acquainted with the highest and the best in Britain. He met Pope, a most wonderful verbal mechanic, a maker of artificial flowers, very much like natural ones, except that they lack perfume and the seeds of suggestion. He made the acquaintance of Young, who wrote the "Night Thoughts;" Young, a fine old hypocrite with a virtuous imagination, a gentleman who electioneered with the king's mistress that he might be made a bishop. He became acquainted with Chesterfield—all manners, no man; with Thomson, author of "The Seasons," who loved to see the sun rise in bed and visit the country in town; with Swift, whose poisoned arrows were then festering in the flesh of Mr. Bull—Swift, as wicked as he was witty, and as heartless as he was humorous—with Swift, a dean and a devil; with Congreve, whom Addison thought superior to Shakespeare, and who never wrote but one great line, "The cathedral looking tranquillity."

Voltaire began to think, to doubt, to inquire. He studied the history of the Church and of the Creed. He found that the religion of his time rested on the usurpation of the scriptures—the infallibility of the Church—the dreams of insane hermits—the absurdities of the Fathers—the mistakes and falsehoods of saints—the hysteria of nuns—the cunning of priests and the stupidity of the people. He found that the Emperor Constantine, who lifted Christianity into power, murdered his wife Fausta and his eldest son Crispus, the same year that he convened the Council of Nice, to decide whether Christ was a man or the Son of God. The Council decided, in the year 325, that Christ was consubstantial with the Father. He found that the Church was indebted to a husband who assassinated his wife—a father who murdered his son for settling the vexed question of the divinity of the Savior. He found that Theodosius called a council at Constantinople in 381, by which it was decided that the Holy Ghost proceeded from the Father—that Theodosius, the younger, assembled a council at Ephesus in 431, that declared the Virgin Mary to be the mother of God—that the Emperor Marcian called another council at Chalcedon in 451, that decided that Christ had two wills—that Pognatius called another in 680, that declared that Christ had two natures to go with his two wills—and that in 1274, at the Council of Lyons the important fact was found that the Holy Ghost "proceeded," not only from the Father, but also from the Son at the same time.

So, it took about 1,300 years to find out a few things that had been revealed by an infinite God to his infallible Church.

Voltaire found that this insane creed had filled the world with cruelty and fear. He found that vestments were more sacred than virtues—that images and crosses—pieces of old bones and bits of wood were more precious than the rights and lives of men, and that the keepers of these relics were the enemies of the human race.

With all the energy of his nature—with every faculty of his mind—he attacked this "Triumphant Beast."

Voltaire was the apostle of common sense. He knew that there could have been no primitive or first language from which all other languages had been formed. He knew that every language had been influenced by the surroundings of the people. He knew that the language of snow and ice was not the language of palm and flower. He knew also that there had been no miracle in language. He knew that it was impossible that the story of the Tower of Babel should be true. That everything in the whole world had been natural. He was the enemy of alchemy, not only in language but in science. One passage from him is enough to show his philosophy in this regard. He says: "To transmute iron into gold, two things are necessary. First, the annihilation of the iron; second, the creation of gold."

Voltaire gave us the philosophy of history.

Voltaire was a man of humor, of good nature, of cheerfulness. He despised with all his heart the philosophy of Calvin, the creed of the somber, of the severe, of the unnatural. He pitied those who needed the aid of religion to be honest, to be cheerful. He had the courage to enjoy the present and the philosophy to bear what the future might bring. And yet for more than a hundred and fifty years the christian world has fought this man and maligned his memory. In every christian pulpit his name has been pronounced with scorn, and every pulpit has been an arsenal of slander. He is one man of whom no orthodox minister has ever told the truth. He has been denounced equally by Catholics and Protestants.

Priests and ministers, bishops and exhorters, presiding elders and popes have filled the world with slanders, with calumnies about Voltaire. I am amazed that ministers will not or cannot tell the truth about an enemy of the Church. As a matter of fact, for more than one thousand years, almost every pulpit has been a mint in which slanders were coined.

He fought with every weapon that genius could devise or use. He was the greatest of all carica-turists, and he used this wonderful gift without mercy. For pure crystallized wit, he had no equal. The art of flattery was carried by him to the hight of an exact science. He knew and practiced every subterfuge. He fought the army of hypocrisy and pretense, the army of faith and falsehood.

Voltaire was annoyed by the meaner and baser spirits of his time, by the cringers and crawlers, by the fawners and pretenders, by those who wished to gain the favor of priests, the patronage of nobles. Sometimes he allowed himself to be annoyed by these scorpions; sometimes he attacked them. And, but for these attacks, long ago they would have been forgotten. In the amber of his genius Voltaire preserved these insects, these tarantulas, these scorpions.

It is fashionable to say that he was not profound. This is because he was not stupid. In the presence of absurdity he laughed, and was called irreverent. He thought God would not damn even a priest forever—this was regarded as blasphemy. He endeavored to prevent Christians from murdering each other, and did what he could to civilize the disciples of Christ. Had he founded a sect, obtained control of some country, and burnt a few heretics at slow fires, he would have won the admiration, respect and love of the Christian world. Had he only pretended to believe all the fables of antiquity, had he mumbled Latin prayers, counted beads, crossed himself, devoured now and then the flesh of God, and carried fagots to the feet of Philosophy in the name of Christ, he might have been in Heaven this moment, enjoying a sight of the damned.

If he had only adopted the creed of his time—if he had asserted that a God of infinite power and mercy had created millions and billions of human beings to suffer e ernal pain, and all for the sake of his glorious justice—that he had given his power of attorney to a cunning and cruel Italian pope, authorizing him to save the soul of his mistress and send honest wives to hell—if he had given to the nostrils of this God the odor of burning flesh—the incense of the fagot—if he had filled his ears with the shrieks of the tortured—the music of the rack, he would now be known as Saint Voltaire.

For many years this restless man filled Europe with the product of his brain. Essays, epigr ms, epics, comedies, tragedies, histories, poems. novels, representing every phase and every faculty of the human mind. At the same time engrossed in business, full of speculation, making money like a millionaire, busy with the gossip of courts, and even with the scandals of priests. At the same time alive to all the discoveries of science and the theories of philosophers, and in this Babel never forgetting for one moment to assail the monster of superstition. Sleeping and waking he hated the Church. With the eyes of Argus he watched, and with the arms of Briareus he struck. For sixty years he waged continuous and unrelenting war, sometimes in the open field, sometimes striking from the hedges of opportunity—taking care during all this time to remain independent of all men. He was in the highest sense successful. He lived like a prince, became one of the powers of Europe, and in him, for the first time, literature was crowned.

It has been claimed by the Christian critics that Voltaire was irreverent; that he examined sacred things without solemnity; that he refused to remove his shoes in the presence of the Burning Bush; that he smiled at the Geology of Moses, the astronomical ideas of Joshua, and that the biography of Jonah filled him with laughter. They say that these stories, these sacred impossibilities, these inspired falsehoods, should be read and studied with a believing mind in humbleness of spirit; that they should be examined prayerfully, asking God at the same time to give us strength to triumph over the conclusions of our reason. These critics imagine that a falsehood can be old enough to be venerable, and that to stand covered in its presence is the act of an irreverent scoffer. Voltaire approached the mythology of the Jews precisely as he did the mythology of the Greeks and Romans, or the mythology of the Chinese or the Iroquois Indians. There is nothing in this world too sacred to be investigated, to be understood. The philosopher does not hide. Secresy is not the friend of truth. No man should be reverent at the expense of his reason. Nothing should be worshiped until the reason has been convinced that it is worthy of worship.

Against all miracles, against all holy superstition, against sacred mistakes, he shot the arrows of ridicule.

These arrows, winged by fancy, sharpened by wit, poisoned by truth, always reached the center.

It is claimed by many that anything, the best and holiest, can be ridiculed. As a matter of fact, he who attempts to ridicule the truth ridicules himself. He becomes the food of his own laughter.

The mind of man is many-sided. Truth must be, and is, willing to be tested in every way, tested by all the senses.

But in what way can the absurdity of the "real presence" be answered, except by banter, by raillery, by ridicule, by persiflage? How are you going to convince a man who believes that, when he swallows the sacred wafer, he has eaten the entire Trinity, and that a priest drinking a drop of wine has devoured the Infinite? How are you to reason with a man who believes that, if any of the sacred wafers are left over, they should be put in a secure place, so that mice should not eat God?

What effect will logic have upon a religious gentleman who firmly believes that a God of infinite compassion sent two bears to tear thirty or forty children in pieces for laughing at a bald-headed prophet?

How are such people to be answered? How can they be brought to a sense of their absurdity? They must feel in their flesh the arrows of ridicule.

So Voltaire has been called a mocker.

What did he mock? He mocked kings that were unjust; kings who cared nothing for the sufferings of their subjects. He mocked the titled fools of his day. He mocked the corruption of courts; the meanness, the tyranny and the brutality of judges. He mocked the absurd and cruel laws, the barbarous customs. He mocked popes and cardinals and bishops and priests, and all the hypocrites on the earth. He mocked historians who filled their books with lies and philosophers who defended superstition. He mocked the haters of liberty, the persecutors of their fellowmen He mocked the arrogance, the cruelty, the impudence and unspeakable baseness of his time.

He has been blamed because he used the weapon of ridicule.

Hypocrisy has always hated laughter, and always will Absurdity detests humor, and stupidity despises wit. Voltaire was the master of ridicule. He ridiculed the absurd. the impossible. He ridiculed the mythologies and the miracl s. the stupid lives and lies of the saints. He found pretense and mendacity crowned by credulity. He found the ignorant many controled by the cunning and cruel few. He found the historian, saturated with superstition, filling his volumes with the details of the impossible, and he found the scientists satisfied with "they say."

Voltaire had the instinct of the probable. He knew the law of average, the sea level; he had the idea of proportion, and so he ridiculed the mental monstrosities and deformities—the non sequiturs—of his day. Aristotle said women had more teeth than men. This was repeated again and again by the Catholic scientists of the Eighteenth Century. Voltaire counted the teeth. The rest were satisfied with "they say."

Voltaire, in spite of his surroundings, in spite of almost universal tyranny and oppression, was a believer in God and in what he was pleased to call the religion of Nature. He attacked the creed of his time because it was dishonorable to his God. He thought of the Deity as a father, as the fountain of justice, intelligence, and mercy, and the creed of the Catholic Church made him a monster of cruelty and stupidity. He attacked the Bible with all the weapons at his command. He assailed its geology, its astronomy, its ideas of justice, its laws and customs, its absurd and useless miracles, its foolish wonders, its ignorance on all subjects, its insane prophecies, its cruel threats and its extravagant promises.

At the same time he praised the God of nature, the God who gives us rain and light, and food and flowers, and health and happiness—he who fills the world with youth and beauty.

Attacked on every side, he fought with every weapon that wit, logic, reason, scorn, contempt, laughter, pathos and indignation could sharpen, form, devise or use. He often apologized, and the apology was an insult. He often recanted, and the recantation was a thousand times worse than the thing recanted. He took it back by giving more. In the name of eulogy he flayed his victim. In his praise there was poison. He often advanced by retreating, and asserted by retraction.

He did not intend to give priests the satisfaction of seeing him burn or suffer. Upon this very point of recanting he wrote:

"They say I must retract. Very willingly. I will declare that Pascal is always right. That if St. Luke and St. Mark contradict one another, it is only another proof of the truth of religion to those who know how to understand such things; and that another lovely proof of religion is that it is unintelligible. I will even avow that all priests are gentle and disinterested; that Jesuits are honest people; that monks are neither proud nor given to intrigue, and that their odor is agreeable; that the Holy Inquisition is the triumph of humanity and tolerance. In a word, I will say all that may be desired of me, provided they leave me in repose, and will not persecute a man who has done harm to none."

He gave the best years of his wondrous life to succor the oppressed, to shield the defenseless, to reverse infamous decrees, to rescue the innocent, to reform the laws of France, to do away with torture, to soften the hearts of priests, to enlighten judges, to instruct kings, to civilize the people, and to banish from the heart of man the love and lust of war.

You may think that I have said too much; that I have placed this man too high. Let me tell you what Goethe, the great German, said of this man:

"If you wish depth, genius, imagination, taste, reason, sensibility, philosophy, elevation, originality, nature, intellect, fancy, rectitude, facility, flexibility, precision, art, abundance, variety, fertility, warmth, magic, charm, grace, force, an eagle sweep of vision, vast understanding, instruction rich, tone excellent, urbanity, suavity, delicacy, correctness, purity, cleanness, eloquence, harmony, brilliancy, rapidity, gaiety, pathos, sublimity and universality, perfection indeed, behold Voltaire."

Even Carlyle, that old Scotch terrier, with the growl of a grizzly bear, who attacked shams, as I have sometimes thought, because he hated rivals, was forced to admit that Voltaire gave the death stab to modern superstition.

It is the duty of every man to destroy the superstitions of his time, and yet there are thousands of men and women, fathers and mothers, who repudiate with their whole hearts the creeds of superstition, and still allow their children to be taught these lies. They allow their imaginations to be poisoned with the dogma of eternal pain. They allow arrogant and ignorant parsons, meek and foolish teachers, to sow the seeds of barbarism in the minds of their children—seeds that will fill their lives with fear and pain Nothing can be more important to a human being than to be free and to live without fear.

It is far better to be a mortal free man than an immortal slave.

Fathers and mothers should do their utmost to make their children free. They should teach them to doubt, to investigate, to inquire, and every father and mother should know that by the cradle of every child, as by the cradle of the infant Hercules, crawls the serpent of superstition.

At that time it was contended by the believers in God that the plan, or the scheme of nature, was not cruel; that the lower was sacrificed for the benefit of the higher; that while life lived upon life, while animals lived upon each other, and while man was the king or sovereign of all, still the higher lived upon the lower. Consequently, a lower life was sacrificed that higher life may exist. This reasoning satisfied many. Yet there were thousands that could not see why the lower should be sacrificed, or why all joy should be born of pain. But, since the construction of the microscope, since man has been allowed to look toward the infinitely small, as well as toward the infinitely great, he finds that our fathers were mistaken when they laid down the proposition that only the lower life was sacrificed for the sake of the higher.

Now, we find that the lives of all visible animals are liable to be, and in countless cases are, destroyed by a far lower life; that man himself is destroyed by the microbes, the bacilli, the infinitesimal. We find that for the sake of preserving the yellow-fever germs millions and millions have died, and that whole nations have been decimated for the sake of the little beast that gives us the cholera. We have also found that there are animals, call them what you please, that live on the substance of the human heart, others that prefer the lungs, others again so delicate in their palate that they insist on devouring the optic nerve, and when they have destroyed the sight of one eye have sense enough to bore through the cartilage of the nose to attack the other. Thus we find the other side of this proposition. At first sight the lower seemed to be sacrificed for the sake of the higher, but on closer inspection the highest are sacrificed for the sake of the lowest.

He was a believer in the optimism of Pope—"All partial evil, universal good." This is a very fine philosophy for the fortunate. It suits the rich. It is flattering to kings and priests. It sounds well. It is a fine stone to throw at a beggar. It enables you to bear with great fortitude the misfortunes of others. . . .

It is not the philosophy for those who suffer—for industry clothed in rags, for patriotism in prison, for honesty in want, or for virtuous outcasts. It is a philosophy of a class, of a few, and of the few who are fortunate; and, when misfortune overtakes them, this philosophy fades and withers.

In 1775 came the earthquake at Lisbon. This frightful disaster became an immense interrogation. The optimist was compelled to ask, "What was my God doing? Why did the Universal Father crush to shapelessness thousands of his poor children, even at the moment when they were upon their knees returning thanks to him?"

What could be done with this horror? If earthquake there must be, why did it not occur in some uninhabited desert, on some wide waste of sea? This frightful fact changed the theology of Voltaire. He became convinced that this is not the best possible of all worlds. He became convinced that evil is evil here, now, and forever.

HIS HUMANITY—JEAN CALAS.

Toulouse was a favored town. It was rich in relics. The people were as ignorant as wooden images, but they had in their possession the dried bodies of seven apostles—the bones of many of the infants slain by Herod—part of a dress of the Virgin Mary, and lots of skulls and skeletons of the infallible idiots known as saints.

In this city the people celebrated every year with great joy two holy events: The expulsion of the Huguenots, and the blessed massacre of St. Bartholomew. The citizens of Toulouse had been educated and civilized by the church.

A few Protestants, mild because in the minority, lived among these jackals and tigers.

One of these Protestants was Jean Calas—a small dealer in dry goods. For forty years he had been in this business, and his character was without a stain. He was honest, kind and agreeable. He had a wife and six children—four sons and two daughters. One of the sons became a Catholic. The eldest son, Marc Antoine, disliked his father's business and studied law. He could not be allowed to practice unless he became a Catholic. He tried to get his license by concealing that he was a Protestant. He was discovered—grew morose. Finally he became discouraged and committed suicide, by hanging himself one evening in his father's store.

The bigots of Toulouse started the story that his parents had killed him to prevent his becoming a Catholic. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

The Freethought Federation of America.

By the time this letter appears in print the excitement of the general public concerning the recent elections, the turmoil of party strife, the anxiety of ballot-stuffers, the importance of ward heelers, will be things of the past, for four more years at least, and I trust that at the polls every man calling himself a Freethinker has used his ballot in a direction to assist the Freethought movement and to let the devotees of faith realize that we hav a natural and just right to hav our opinions respected, and that we do not mean to hav them thrust aside and disregarded with impunity. A true Freethinker must be a just thinker, for Freethought in its most essential characteristic is just thought. Freethought does not consist of mere skepticism in regard to religious dogmas, but it consists of thinking freely upon all subjects; and to think freely, man must divest his mind of all prejudice. He should be just as ready to abandon a conclusion when he perceives it to be false as he is to accept a new truth, however it may clash with his previous convictions. Neither should he accept any statement merely upon authority, for the authority of a church, a college, or a creed does not and cannot add a feather's weight to the authority of a truth. All our authority is but human, and the human mind cannot expand beyond its surroundings. Man can only think about what he knows, and he can only know what he learns. Thus climate and circumstances are the great schoolmasters of the human race. It is these that hav taught us that "it is our emotions and our affections that make life sweet, and to liv, to act, and to do so that our lives may become everlasting monuments of respect to those that come after us."

On Sunday, October 30th, I gave two lectures in Old Alliance, O., in the Independent church. Both lectures were given to large audiences, and in the evening the church was well-nigh filled. A good discussion followed the last lecture, brought on by a sharp criticism thereof by a local physician. The good doctor is an excellent talker, but, doubtless through a life-long study of physics, it is hard for him to break away from anything even pertaining to the name. Consequently his discourse savored too much of meta*physics*, the arguments of which hav been exploded again and again. On the whole, however, the audience was thoroughly and deeply interested in the discussion, which always adds a little excitement to the meeting after a long lecture of an hour or more.

I was very pleased to meet again our old friends, Mr. and Mrs. D. W. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. R. G. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. J. Fitzpatrick, and many others of the host of Freethinkers that reside within this little Ohio town and vicinity. Our friends hav assured me of a hearty welcome on my return from the Pacific coast.

Several members of the church and others among the audience took blank petitions to Congress on the World's Fair, also copies of our constitution, with blanks for signatures of those desirous of becoming members of the Federation. I part from these friends in search of pastures new, to carry on the war of intellect with renewed vigor and greater determination. In common parlance, the Federation is having, just now, what would be called a boom. It is sweeping forward with a mighty rush, and I can truly say that it has exceeded our anticipations in regard to its growth.

Letters of praise, congratulation, and cheer still continue to pour in upon me. From the far Western slopes of the Pacific to the broad, sweeping coast of the Atlantic, from the frosts and snows of the North, the vine-clad hills and blossoms of the sunny South, these letters come. So that, together with my lectures and the distances I must travel to fill my appointments, with the mass of accumulated correspondence I find upon my return, I am continuously kept busy. Therefore I must ask our friends to pardon me upon this account for any delay in answering their letters. The following is one received from the young and thriving state of Idaho:

SHOSHONE, IDA., Sept. 27, 1892.

MR. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Chicago, Ill., Dear Sir: Pleased find inclosed $2 to be used by the Freethought Federation, and kindly enroll me as a member of the order, and I hope this new star of Freethought will become a glorious sun that will either Liberalize the church or cause its votaries to slink behind their shrines and hide in shame. Respectfully yours, J. C. MCMURRIN.

Also the letter appended below from an aged but stalwart couple of Freethinkers in Rochester, N. Y.:

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Oct. 24, 1892.

MR. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Secretary Freethought Federation, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find a money order on Wells, Fargo & Co. for $2 for the benefit of the Freethought Federation, $1 of which I send and the other $1 my wife sends. We both wish we could do more to help the cause. We take a number of Freethought and Liberal papers and as soon as we hav read them they are sent to friends where we think they will be acceptable in all parts of the country, North, South, East, and West, and with many they hav done good and been fully appreciated. But helping a little now and then financially is all the aid I can giv now, or at any time, as I am prevented from going to see anyone or attending any meeting, lecture, or anything on account of being afflicted from a stroke of paralysis I was taken with in August, 1890, by which I lost the use of my left side and limbs and hav it not nor am likely to hav it. So I cannot go anywhere. Having still the use of my right side and limbs, I go out on a machine called a chirocycle, which I operate with my right arm and guide with my right foot. Being thus afflicted is a very great denial to my feelings, and my wife is denied the pleasure of going much anywhere, as she has to help me a great deal as far as her strength will permit. On account of our opinions and no relations near us, we are to a great extent out of the world. We hav one son whose home at present is in Lead, S. Dak., to whom we send papers regularly. So on the whole we are rather lonesome.

I intend to vote on the 8th of November the People's ticket, and perhaps it will be the last time, as a few days after I will be seventy-nine, and my wife is very near the same age. As long as we liv we will help a little financially as much as we are able, but, our means being limited, cannot do a great deal.

With our best wishes in the cause of humanity, we are,
Yours sincerely, FRANCIS S. AND RUTH BRETTELL.

P.S.—We will endeavor to get some names to the petition and then forward it to you. F. S. B.

Again, from Tennessee, in the genial climate of the South, comes a note of encouragement:

MAYSTON, TENN., Oct. 23, 1892.
(Suburb of Chattanooga).

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, 345 West Randolph street, Chicago, Ill., Dear Sir: Inclosed find petition for opening the Columbian Fair on Sunday. If I had time I could get several thousand signers in Chattanooga and suburbs. These names are from persons working in the factory of D. M. Steward & Co. Only two or three that I asked hesitated about signing.

That Freethought Federation of America is just the right thing at the right time. Let us crowd it. Our only hope is to make ourselvs felt in the political field. There the weak-kneed ones can exert their power and help to brace up those who hav stood the brunt of the battle till almost overcome. All hail the new move. It comes like a cool breeze to the brow of the fever patient.

Please send me blanks for signatures to the Federation. I think I can get quite a list. I am acquainted with a large number scattered around the city. I want to giv each one a blank and hav them get as many as they can. I will then take a copy of the lists and forward them to you.

I am sure that if we could get the names of all Liberally inclined we would be a majority. There are so many come to me privately and talk, that are afraid to speak their sentiments publicly, and many men are Liberal that we take otherwise, before sounding them, so that if we could get a list of all it would work a revolution in our midst. L. L. GOODWIN.

"Aunt" Elmina has also favored us with a letter of congratulation, and sends a request for blank petitions to Congress, promising to assist us as far as possible in our attempt to repeal that infamous amendment.

The Quaker City has also contributed her quota to our cause, and Ernest Platz addresses us with a very nice letter, inclosing $1 to help us along.

Jos. M. Lydon also sends us the following:

HARRISVILLE, O., Oct. 25, 1892.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Chicago, Ill.: I herewith send my name as a member of the Freethought Federation, together with a post-office money order for $1 as a donation, hoping to help our noble cause and to down that infamous, licentious-written book called the Bible, written only by hypocrits like the priests of the present day.

If there is any spare literature at any time send a little occasionally. I will be always willing to do my share. I hav been a Liberal twenty years and only taken THE TRUTH SEEKER lately.

I hav several of the best books of the best writers—Ingersoll, Büchner, and Meslier. JOS. M. LYDON.

Another of Idaho's noble sons steps boldly to the front, and sends us the following letter, bespeaking his enthusiasm in the sacred cause of liberty:

GLENNS FERRY, IDA., Oct. 27, 1892.

J. R. CHARLESWORTH, Sec. F. F. of A., Dear Sir: I send you eleven names (including my own) of ardent Freethinkers who wish to become members of the young Federation. That is right! Fight them in the legislation halls. I think we hav struck the right thing at last, and wish the Federation success.

Inclosed find express order for $2, one for myself and one for James Stout. CHAS. C. JANNEY.

And again the letter given below will show conclusivly that the Federation has been received with universal favor, as this is a fac-simile of many others:

MILAN, MO., Oct. 17, 1892.

MR. J. R. CHARLESWORTH, Chicago, Ill., Dear Sir: I herewith hand you names of some Liberals who desire to be enrolled among the members of the Federation. It does seem to me that you hav struck the keynote, and every thinker I hav mentioned the matter to is in harmony with it. They think when the secretary of an Infidel association can compel the president of the United States to define his position on the Nine Demands, that the morn breaketh. Fraternally, H. T. KNIGHT.

Such letters as these cannot be misunderstood in their meaning and purport, and should be sufficient to show indeed "that the morn really breaketh." And although that morn may be some distance from us to-day, yet by firm resolves, by a determination of purpose, by a combination of effort among all Liberal thinkers, we can hasten its approach, the approach of the day of man's triumph, of man's freedom from the chains of superstition and tyranny.

Let us all unite to feed this ever-increasing, growing, and prosperous country the "daily bread" of knowledge instead of superstition, and soon the bigots shall be made to quail before the gladiators of this "order of merit."

Let us all unite and teach men to rely upon the law alive and beautiful which works within and around us. All men must be believers in it, or else the word "justice" would hav no meaning. Friends, keep up the good fight; strike at the iron while it is still hot, and keep up the striking that it may never grow cool. Send in your names for membership, and above all remember to send us a subscription to help us push the cause along.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH,
Sec. Freethought Federation of America.

On the Presidential Candidates.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Oct. 19, 292.

MR. EDITOR: I think Secretary Charlesworth is pursuing a wrong course in writing to the candidates of the various parties for president—at least, as far as they hav a record on legislativ or executiv matters. There is this harm in it, the Liberal voter might be governed by their reply, instead of the record, which all candidates should be tested by, and if found guilty we should know them not, because "they hav been weighed in the balance and found wanting," and that of itself is harm enough. Now let us be honest and impartial and make no statements further than the records will bear us out in regard to any of the candidates for the above office. General Weaver was a legislator for a good many years in the national House of Congress, and in all that time there is nothing to show that he favored any of the Comstock laws or any other of the measures that were brought forward from time to time by the bigots. Under President Cleveland's administration there were no laws passed by the bigots, although they worked as zealously to that end as any other time, nor were there any convictions under the Comstock law for him to exercise the pardoning power on. But how was it under President Harrison's administration? It was as if hell had broken loose again. Persecution and prosecution became rife under the Comstock law, and Reid, Harman, Heywood, et al, were imprisoned, and although President Harrison was petitioned and prayed to he was as "silent as the hills" or "dumb as an oyster." Then he signed the bill to close the World's Fair on Sunday. Now can any Liberal vote for him unless he is determined to vote for him right or wrong? Can anything he has a mind to say or write blot out his damnable record on the subject that all Liberals should be interested in? Mr. Secretary, count on me to vote against all candidates, from president and Congressman down to state Senator and representativ, that had anything to do, or will hav anything to do, with electing a United States Senator that voted for closing the World's Fair on Sunday, or voted for the passage of the Comstock law or any other measure that was calculated to abridge the freedom of speech, press, and mails.

News from a Co-operativ Colony.

TOPOLOBAMPO, SINALOA, MEX., Sept. 29, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Since my letter of June 11th was published in your columns, I hav received twenty-three letters from inquiring friends, and I wish to say that since that date much permanent work has been done. Water was turned into our big ditch July 3d, and has been pouring through ever since, and if we could hav controled the whole volume we could hav let through ten times as much. The rainfall was very light, as usual, and grass very short. Many horses and cattle died before the rain came to start feed, but where we turned the water on our lands the grass is three and four feet high, and our stock is as fat and sleek as anyone would wish to see. The boat landed us fifty-one tons of wire, and we made forty-two miles of four-wire fence, and cut fourteen miles of lateral ditch, and our people hav begun farming, and I think the prospects are good. We are to reorganize in February, and I would say to friends, Don't be in haste about rushing down here till after the organization takes place, for we are living in temporary houses, with our food mostly shipped from the north. The flooding has made gnats and musketoes more disagreeable than all the plagues of Egypt. I hear no more about our lumber that was coming from Oregon. No work is being done on the railroad yet, or anywhere else at present. We all feel like aking a rest. The health of all our people is good and has been for the last eight months. I believe there are about nine thousand colonists that hav joined, but only about one thousand hav ever been down here, and there are only about three hundred and fifty all told here now. Many hav gone back for their families since the ditch has been completed, and just before, and it is said that at least five hundred, if not a thousand, will come here this fall. Several hav written me for our paper that is printed here. It is $1 a year, cash or credits. Now, if parties wanting it will send $1 to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will send them the paper for one year and pay for it in credits. I find it very difficult to get greenbacks here to send to THE TRUTH SEEKER. There is no chance to sell our ditch scrip yet, nor will there be till the people begin to flock in from the north.

A Convert Givs His Experience.

BEEBE, ARK., Oct. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: As the experience of a new-born Liberalist may hav its effect to relieve some other Christ-ridden being, I would like to giv mine. My father was a Thomas Paine follower, and he being a smart, intelligent man, I sometimes asked myself the question why this could be. In his library he left the Life of Paine, which I tried to read, but my mother, who was a devout Christian, destroyed the book for fear that her son might be led to follow the father, as she thought, to hell. Often I thought, Oh, how cruel the decree that my mother would go to heaven and look down into that burning lake and behold the husband she loved so well. But being admonished that this lake should be my portion forever if I did not seek salvation through Jesus Christ, I went to Christ in prayer with all my sins heaped in my brain. I laid my case humbly before his majesty and asked for that gift, that holy something, which the preacher and the Testament told me would send me to that eternal bliss where the joys of heaven would be so great that I would not even hav time to look with pity upon that writhing father who had failed to receive the holy pardon. But alas, poor me! after years of faith, prayer, and belief that Christ was God I found myself just where I started—lost, damned, and ruined. I saw men who testified with great pomp that Jesus had shown himself to them by pardoning their sins, and they knew they were the children of Christ. The brethren took them by the hand and blessed them and called them brother. I knew these men. I heard them lie. I saw them cheat, curse, get drunk, rob the poor widow, and persecute the Infidel because he did not follow this example, and still they are acknowledged Christians. I called a halt. I began to think. I began to realize that I had let some one else do my thinking. I began to investigate. I thought, What a strange God to hav himself murdered and that transaction held up as a beacon-light for man to follow or be damned. I read the Testament and found that its writers did not agree either in the death or resurrection of this God, Son, and Holy Ghost. Being a lawyer, I looked for preponderance of testimony. But I found the evidence I got would not be admissible in man's court. And yet it claimed to come from God. Well, I struck a light which I hope others may find. A lady friend, one of your subscribers, handed me a large bundle of TRUTH SEEKERS and a copy of Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason." This did the work. I am converted, and I stand ready to do my part to help to lift my fellowman out of the mud of superstition. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER to wave its banner of human liberty and reason.

G. B. WYATT.

An Examination of the Bible.

Oct. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot believe to be God's word a book full of legends and myths, which professes to come from ages nineteen hundred to six thousand years back, most of them ages of ignorance, barbarism, and superstition. A story which was not in printed or written form accessible to all, but almost entirely in the hands and control of a wicked and powerful priesthood, who through and by it controled the world's wealth and power, and who therefore had every opportunity and inducement to construct and modify the story to suit their interest and ambition. A book which has no positiv or even plausible evidence to sustain it, and which very few who profess to believe and trust in it can giv their reasons for believing in, farther than that they hav always been so taught and hav never given the evidence for its truth or untruth the candid and unprejudiced study and thought its great importance requires and should receive, and without proof take for granted what the priest and church say. I think if God intended our eternal salvation to depend on our acceptance of certain facts, he would make their demonstration and meaning so positiv and clear we would hav no doubt or mistakes, and not leave us alone to these musty records full of contradictions and which no one clearly understands and but small part of the world believes. Are they to be eternally punished for their honest unbelief, as are those who never heard of it?

I cannot believe such a mixture of goodness and wickedness, cruelty, vulgarity, and absurd nonsense, was inspired by or emanated from a God of infinit wisdom and goodness. And is it not blasphemous to claim that such a being was the author of so enormous a delusion and fraud? Where in all current literature can be found such absurd and indecent readings as are found in it? For a few examples note the following:

Gen. ii, 21; ix, 21–26; xvi, 4–6; xxxviii; vi, 6; xx, 2; xix, 8, 20–38; xvii; xxx, 1–10; iii, xvi. Isa. xxxvi, 12; iii, 17. Ex. xxii, 16–20. Num. xxv; xv, 32–35; v, 30, 31; xxxi, 13–35. Lev. xv, 16–33; xxvi, 28, 29; xxv, 45, 46. Job xl, 17. Judges xix. 2 Sam. xi, 13; xvi. Ruth i, 3; iv. 2 Kings xviii, 27; 1 Kings xi, 3. Hosea xiii, 16. Ezek. xxiii. 1 Tim. ii, 11, 12. Eph. v, 22–24. 2 Peter ii, 5–8. Luke i, 35–41; xii, 27–29; xiii, 28, 29. Mark i, 13–34; xvi, 16. Etc., etc.

How intelligent people can read such nonsense and vile trash as is found in the larger part of the Old Testament and much of the New and call it God's word, and honestly and thoughtfully believe it to be so, is a problem in metaphysics difficult to solve. I would rather say: "O God (if there be one), I am a weak, ignorant creature groping in spiritual darkness. Teach and lead me by nature's light in the way of truth, in the path of true goodness. Gladly and truly would I endeavor to follow it."

TRUTH SEEKER.

Sabbath at the Fair.

LEXINGTON, KY., Oct. 21, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: With regard to the World's Fair I hav only to remark that, although its design is chiefly an exhibition connected with science and the fine arts, the greatest attention will be paid to the wishes of persons attending. Even the Chinese will hav their preferences. As Dickens remarks of a showman, I would say of them, "that being afore the curtain" for some time, they must appreciate the delicious religious quality pertaining to "Melican" human nature. But the most ardent Christians ought to be aware of the fact that even religious zeal must be kept within bounds, or it will degenerate into fanaticism; and then the most strict idea of snaity, as well as sanctity, should pervade the World's Fair, even on Sunday. How delightful, also, will be the divine odor of peace and quiet observable there on every day of the week. Being a locality where decency and elegance will prevail, it is to be presumed that persons imbued with the spirit of true piety would find the very air of the place congenial to their most exalted feelings, their most holy meditations. Christ will be there upon canvas, splendid music will discourse in touching tones melodies causing us to pant for a musical heaven where we will meet Mozart, Handel, and Hadyn. Probably the articles exhibited will be suggestiv of this world rather than the next, and Congressmen are likely to be reminded of the truism that a true statesman is expected to keep the interests of state at all times distinctly in view. Closing the gates on Sunday will therefore expose them to the imputation of being hypocrits, and sentimental tricksters, willing to mix a sentimental element with the gravest and most critical of human affairs. If religion can lord it over such a place for one day, it can for seven; so that the next national purchase may be a box of thumb-screws. The next immigrants who come to stay will be intolerant serpents, undermining and poisoning our liberties, so sacred to us, bought long ago with tears, blood, strife, and agonizing struggle. Americans, are you awake? Will you permit this?

Those who fear the desecration of the Sabbath (though the greatest injury to it would follow a childish closing of gates on that day), let them go home Saturday night. As the Quaker observed when he was serenaded with "Sweet Home," "Go to thy home, thee art not wanted here." Mr. Breckenridge has earned an enviable reputation by opposing the violation of a great principle. A noble statesman and philosopher he appears to be, knowing that a foreign, flimsy idea, mixed with that of a secular and real government, has a tendency to weaken and destroy.

ALHAZA.

Points on Prohibition.

CLIMAX, MINN., Oct. 15, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In your paper of September 10th appears an article from Albert Sandberg, in which he says that I seem to be rather huffy about the Prohibition party being accused of having gangrene of the liver. I think Mr. Sandberg is a little off the line here, as it was not the party that was accused, but it was the Prohibitionist, and as accusing the Prohibitionist would be a little personal, but accusing the party would not, I answered the article. As for my being a Freethinker, I can say I believe I am, and would like to be so in the widest sense of the word. If I understand the word "Freethinker" right, it is a person who does not take authority, but reasons and thinks for himself on all subjects. Any person can be a Freethinker on one subject and be a bigot on other subjects. A man can be a Freethinker in religion and a bigot in politics or on the customs of society, or vice versa. If anyone attacks a Prohibitionist because he is a Prohibitionist I believe I will take issue; but if you attack the Prohibition party because they hav too much religion, I will say you are right. I do not think it is good logic to criticise Baptists or Methodists because they are Prohibitionists. I think this is one of their virtues. But I think they can be very successfully criticised for their religious bigotry.

Now, I do not want to be understood that I think that legal Prohibition is the perfect way of regulating the liquor traffic, but I do believe it is a great deal better than the present license system that makes it a money-making business for the individual and the municipality to create criminals and drunkards. I will admit that there is a little despotism in the Prohibition law, but I think it is a smaller and less felt despotism than we now hav under the abusiv uses and practices of the liquor traffic and the organized capital that the whisky men are using to suppress law and order and the will of the people for the purpose of increasing the sale and the profit on their goods. Mr. Sandberg says he has never met a Prohibitionist that was not a Christian. This may all be, and may be the case in California, although I cannot see why it should be so. Here in this country it is not that way, although the majority of the party are Christians the same as any other political party. North Dakota, which I can stand in my window and look over to, has constitutional Prohibition, and there is no more religion there than in any of the whisky states, and I do not think near so much. I can sit in my window to-day, which is Sunday, and count the smoke of five different steam threshers, running in full blast. The people there will rather save their grain than go to worship. They are Freethinkers enough for this.

Since I hav had this on my shelf I see an answer to me from Mr. Heald, and I can say that we are very much of the same opinion, as he also thinks the saloon is a curse to society, and we only seem to differ in the mode of getting rid of it. He seems to think that removing all license and making the sale free to everyone would do this. I cannot look at it in this way, as it would not remove the profit for the dealer, and we know by experience that people will do almost anything for the profit or gain if it be legal. The only way to remove the profit to the individual is to make it a national monopoly and sell and manufacture it only by salaried officers appointed by the federal government or elected by the people.

Mr. Heald winds up by saying that "Mr. Steenerson may think I am too radical," and so forth. This, however, is not the case at all; but I think you are a little intolerant by thinking another class of reformers are affected with liver disease because they do not agree with you. I would ascribe intolerance to gall in the blood rather than Prohibition. This word Prohibition may not sound well to you, but it is, however, the fact that we prohibit a good many things that are bad for both the individual and society; and the abusiv use of whisky should be classed among these evils. When you say you do not like the work of these cranks who recognize no other authority than the monster of monsters, who rules only by superstition, ignorance, murder, power, scourge, and Prohibition, I will perfectly agree with you if you remove the last word, "Prohibition," and put "whisky" instead, as whisky and Romanism are generally close friends, and in fact drunkenness can be successfully defended by many parts of the scripture.

Yours for Freethought,

ANDREW STEENERSON.

Incitement to Patriotism and Freedom.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Oct. 27, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find my subscription and money for a new subscriber.

I hav long looked upon THE TRUTH SEEKER as the only truly independent paper in the United States, one that dare advocate unpopular truth and defend the human family against those wild animals, the priest and politician. Therewith I send a few thoughts on the subject of the World's Fair being closed on Sunday. Fellow-countrymen, when we look upon that picture, then upon this: When our forefathers were struggling for redress of grievances and were forced to revolt at the tyranny of the mother country, a man by the name of Thomas Paine appeared upon the scene, who was the first to advocate a total separation from the English government and her church, firmly believing that a republic could be erected and last for all time upon the foundation of man's self-government. He laid upon the altar of his ambition all he had—his voice, his pen, his life, fortune, and sacred honor. He lived to see the establishment of his dearest object in life, a free and independent government. He refused offices of honor or emolument. Therefore, dear fellow-countrymen, we must endeavor the best we can, without fear or favor, to promote free thought, free speech, free press, and free religion, to the end that mankind may attain Universal Mental Liberty. This, when enlightened by reason and intelligence, will eventually, as we believe, rid the world of superstition, priestcraft, and theology, and introduce the system of nature which has reference only to humanity, knowledge, science.

Bound to no party, to no sect confined;
This world our home, our brethren all mankind.
Love truth, do good, be just and fair with all,
Exalt the right though every ism fall.

We deal with facts, not fiction; with earth, not heaven.

Ministers of the gospel of Christ! Dear Congressmen and politicians of America! Do not you think you hav amused the world long enough playing the farce of the live jackass kicking the dead lion? Drop the curtain; assume a virtue if you hav it not; practice the morals of humanity and quit lying for Christ's sake.

Sunlight and shadow play upon the hills
And chase each other on the restless waves,
Seeming to follow but their own sweet wills,
Yet to the powers above them faithful slaves—
Reflecting every changing cloud with ease,
Stirred by a leaf, and dancing with the breeze.

O blessed shadows! who so kind as you—
So patient, humble, generous, and good?
Obedient to the sun and ever true;
Your presence beautifies the roughest road,
Lends to the sternest rock a tender grace,
And throws a charm upon the meanest place.

O blessed lights that make the shadows sweet,
That make the world so exquisitly fair!
Life is more full when lights and shadows meet
Than in the midnight gloom or noonday glare,
And human hearts hav little tenderness
Till grief and joy hav met in fond caress.

CHARLES ENOWITZ.

The Savage Notions of Christians.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Nov. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Riding down Fourth avenue recently a tall, sober-looking man got on the car and sat down near me. He had hardly got his seat when he took from his pocket the following slip:

THE GREAT ELECTION DAY. WHO'S TO BE THE MAN?

The whole place is in an uproar! Nothing but canvassing and election speeches! What excitement! What a great ado! And soon it will be voting day; and then the excitement will reach its hight. Meanwhile the cry is "Who is to be the man?" And, strange to tell, that was just the cry in a certain great city many hundred years ago. It was voting day in Jerusalem. What! you say, you did not know there was any voting day there? Oh, but there was. And what crowds and what excitement there was then! You could hav numbered the people by the thousands—aye, by the tens of thousands. It was election day; and there never had been a day like it before; nor has there been a day like it since. The governor of the city presided at the meeting, and took the vote of the people as to whether they were for Barabbas or Christ—Barabbas the murderer, or Christ, Jesus, the Lord and Savior of lost sinners.

"WHO'S TO BE THE MAN."

That was the question. And it was one soon to be settled. "Who are you for?" said the governor. "Are you for Christ?" "No," they cried out at once, "away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas." Their choice is made; Their vote is recorded. They hav elected Barabbas. They won't hav Christ. They will hav anybody but him. They will rather hav Barabbas, murderer though he be. And what is to be done with Christ? "Away with Him; crucify Him." And so Barabbas, the people's man, is set free; Christ, the rejected one, is led forth and nailed to the cross on Golgotha's Hill, and hung up between heaven and earth, as if unworthy of a place in either! But God has not forgotten that terrible deed—the murder of His own Son. Ah! no. And there is a day coming when the world shall hav to stand before God, and tell Him what they did with His son. And Jerusalem's governor shall hav to say what he did with Christ. And YOU, reader, shall hav to answer the question—"What hav you done with Christ?" "What!" you say, "me?" YES, YOU. The question before you is the very same one Pilate asked: "What shall I do then with Jesus which is called Christ?" Hav you received Him, or hav you rejected Him? Remember that this is the question God has in store for you. On the great day that is coming, God will not ask, "Whom did you vote for in this election?" or "What party did you sympathize with?" or "Who was your favorit?" but he will ask, "What hav you done with my Son?" You need not say, "I'll be neutral; I'll neither receive nor reject him." Pilate tried that but failed. There was no middle ground. It was simply

CHRIST OR THE WORLD—WHICH?

And that is the question with you, reader.

Does the world think any more of Christ now than 1800 years ago? O, no. Go into that company there, and say, "Let us hav a little talk about Christ;" and they say, "Away with Him; we don't want to hear about Him; we'll talk of anything, anybody, but Him." The vote of the world is still the same. God says, "Seek first the Kingdom of God." But the people say, "No, we must see this election over first. Mr. So-and-So is to be the Man, and he must be put in." God says Christ is to be the Man, and He is to be first; and the world virtually says He must be second this time. What terrible folly! Reader, you may be a voter, although possibly you are not. But no matter. In the midst of all this noise I ask, Are you born again? Is your soul saved? If not, what will this great ado profit you if God were to say, "Thou fool, THIS NIGHT thy soul shall be required of thee!" What then? "Ah! lost forever," you would cry; "and I might hav been saved had I taken God's plan and got CHRIST first!" Then, reader, I beseech you even as you are reading this, to be reconciled unto God.

People say they don't believe in excitement. But look at the great excitement that prevails just now. And if you got only half as much excited about your soul's salvation, the world would say you were getting into "too great a state!" How Satan is blindfolding the people! But don't be deceived, reader. Don't be afraid of getting excited about your soul. It will be terribly exciting for you to go to hell, for there you must go if you hav not got Christ—if you are not converted to God. Then don't tarry. Let others get excited about the election, or whatever they like—"Make your calling and election sure." Take the lost sinner's place, and claim the lost sinner's Savior. While others are crying up this one or that one, and wondering who's to be the man, let the language of your soul be—"The Man Christ Jesus for me."

"My heart is fixed, eternal God—
Fixed on Thee;
And my eternal choice is made—
CHRIST FOR ME."

Reaching across the lap of a lady between us he handed it me without a word. I took it and read it. I now send it to you. Perhaps you will print it as a sample of what is going on every day in many places. Many Christians and those who are not Christians, but Liberals, tell us the Radicals are too severe in their denunciations of religion, which, they say, is very much changed and improved. Hell, they tell us, has been given up. Most people say Christ was only a good man, and what is the use of quarreling about these points? It is true hell has been given up by intelligent people, but not by the great masses. And Christ, instead of being a leader and reformer, is still a means of salvation. So long as this is so, and so long as tracts like this are peddled everywhere, there will be destructiv work for somebody to do. When this sort of thing is really given up, then we may disband and go to building up something new and better. JAMES CHANDLER.

Christianity in New Zealand.

NEW ZEALAND, Oct. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The inclosed cutting is a letter that appeared in one of our morning papers during the week. I send it in hope you will publish it in order to let your readers know the opinion of

AN INTELLIGENT MAORI ON CHRISTIANITY.

To the Editor of the Press, Sir: You published a few days ago the account of what took place at a meeting of Maoris convened by the bishop of Christchurch. I was present at the meeting, and wish you to giv me an opportunity of answering one of the questions put to us by the bishop—namely, "Why is the fire of Christian faith so low amongst the Maori people in my diocese?" I will tell you what I think is the reason. We Maoris are confused and bewildered in our minds by the extraordinary way in which you Pakehas treat your religion. Nobody amongst you seems to be sure whether it means anything or nothing. At the bidding of the early missionaries we substituted what they told us was a TRUE religion for that of our forefathers, which they called FALSE. We accepted the book containing the history and precepts of the "True Religion" as being really the word of God binding upon us his creatures. We offered daily, morning and evening, worship in every pah and village throughout New Zealand. We kept the seventh day holy, abstaining from every kind of work out of respect to the divine command, and for the same reason we abolished slavery and polygamy, though by doing so we completely disorganized our social system and reduced our gentry to poverty, and inflicted much pain on those who were forced to sever one of the tenderest ties of human relationship. Just when we were beginning to train up our children to know and to obey God as manifested in Jesus Christ, Pakehas came in great numbers to this country. They visited our villages, and appeared very friendly, but we noticed that they did not pay the same respect to the Bible as we novices did. They never held any daily public worship, unless a clergyman was present to conduct it. They ridiculed our strict notions about Sabbath-keeping and about the wrongfulness of drunkenness and unchastity, and they gave us generally to understand that all Pakehas but the clergy and a few fanatics held that the people might do just what they liked, as long as they kept out of the grip of the law; that the only being we need fear was the policeman, and the only book we need read, mark, learn, and obey the precepts of was the statute book. On seeking an explanation from our missionary friends of the plain contradiction between their statements and those of their countrymen, we received the same answer which they gave us when we asked them when they began to teach us Christianity, "Why sailor men and Port Jackson men did not honor God and the Bible as they did." They told us not to pay any attention to what such persons said, because they were, like the gentiles of old, unbelievers. Our minds were quieted for a time, and in all earnestness and sincerity we strove to put into practice what we willingly believed were God's commands. But by and by we were still more disturbed and mystified by Pakeha ministers of religion who came amongst us telling us that while the Bible was true, the interpretation put upon its contents by our missionaries was quite wrong. The Roman Catholics told us they alone knew the correct interpretation, and that unless we joined them our souls would be lost. The Baptists followed, who ridiculed our presenting our children to Christ in baptism, and told us that as we had not been immersed we were not baptized Christians at all. Then came the Presbyterians, who said that the office of a bishop was unscriptural, and that in submitting to be confirmed by Bishop Selwyn we had gone through a meaningless ceremony. Lastly came the Plymouth Brethren, who told us that Christ never instituted a visible church or ministry at all, but that everybody ought to be his own minister and make his own creed.

Besides the confusion in our minds caused by the godless example of the majority of Pakehas, and the contradictory teaching given by ministers of religion, we were puzzled by the behavior of the government, which, while professing to be bound by the moral law contained in the Bible, did not hesitate, when we became powerless, to break solemn promises made to us when we were more numerous and strong than the Pakehas. Great was our surprise when the Parliament, composed, not of ignorant, low-born men, but of Pakeha gentlemen, and professing Christians, put the Bible out of the schools, and while directing the teachers to diligently instruct the children of New Zealand in all kinds of knowledge, told them on no account to teach them anything about the Christian religion, anything about God and his laws. My heathen master taught me to fear and reverence the unseen powers, and my parents taught me to order every action of my life in obedience to the will of the Atuas, who would punish me if I offended them. But my children are not taught now in the schools of this Christian country to reverence any being above a policeman, or to fear any judge of their actions above an R. M.

I think when the bishop of Christchurch asked us the other day the question I hav already referred to we might fairly hav asked him to tell us first, "Why the fire of faith burns so low among his own people?" We might hav quoted apt words from that book which English people want everyone but themselvs to take for their rule of life and reverence as the word of the living God, "Physician heal thyself." I do not think the bishop had then seen the following statement reported in the daily newspapers as having been made at a public meeting by one of the most learned and most eloquent of the clergy: "He could not attempt to prove the existence of God, because he knew no more of him than did the pope, or the bishop of Christchurch, or anyone else in the world."

Can ignorant Maoris be blamed for lukewarmness in the service of a God whose existence one of his ordained ministers tells them no man in Christendom can prove? I sometimes think, sir, that my children would hav had a better chance of developing into honorable men and women, and would hav had a better prospect of happiness when the time comes for them to enter the unseen world and meet their maker if, like the first Maori king (Potatau), I had refused to make an open profession of your Pakeha religion till, as he said, "you had settled amongst yourselvs what your religion really is." Better, I think, the real belief in the unseen spiritual world, which sustained my forefathers, than the make-believe which the Pakeha people hav asked us to substitute for it.

Yours, etc., TANGATA MAORI.

Otautahi, Sept. 13, 1892.

The word "Pakeha" is the Maori for "white man."

Freethought has made great headway in New Zealand during the past two years, the latent enthusiasm having been aroused by activ propagandist work carried on by Mr. W. W. Collins, one of the late Charles Bradlaugh's vice-presidents and an authorized lecturer of the National Secular Society of England. Since Mr. Collins left, Mr. Wallace Nelson, another able and eloquent speaker, has occupied our platform with most excellent results. I should be most happy to send you occasionally a report of the progress of our movement, if you think it would prove of interest to your readers. FRANCIS J. QUINN,

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Little Things.

A traveler through a dusty road
Strewed acorns on the lea,
And one took root and sprouted up,
And grew into a tree.
Love sought its shade at evening time
To breathe its earthly vows,
And age was pleased, in heats of noon,
To bask beneath its boughs;
The dormouse loved its dangling twigs,
The bird sweet music bore;
It stood a glory in its place,
A blessing evermore!

A little spring had lost its way
Amid the grass and fern;
A passing stranger scooped a well,
Where weary men might turn;
He walled it in, and hung with care
A ladle at the brink;
He thought not of the deed he did.
But judged that toil might drink.
He passed again, and lo! the well,
By summers never dried,
Had cooled ten thousand parching tongues,
And saved a life beside.

A dreamer dropped a random thought.
'Twas old, and yet was new;
A simple fancy of the brain,
But strong in being true;
It shone upon a genial mind,
And lo! its light became
A lamp of life, a beacon ray,
A monitory flame.
The thought was small, its issue great.
A watch-fire on the hill,
It sheds its radiance far adown,
And cheers the valley still!

A nameless man amid a crowd
That thronged the daily mart
Let fall a word of hope and love,
Unstudied from the heart;
A whisper on the tumult thrown,
A transitory breath,
It raised a brother from the dust,
It saved a soul from death. —Mackay.

Three Hundred Years Hence.

"Tell us again, teacher, of those queer people who lived so many years ago."

"What, something more about them? Well, well, you are quite right; they were queer people and no mistake. Now, the ancestors of these people had a great many gods——"

"What were these gods, teacher?"

"They were never anything, my child, but the imaginations of their uncultivated intellects. Now, these gods were of different kinds; some were men, some women, and others the lower animals, just according to the fancy of the people. But each tribe, as a rule, had a particular god of its own, although some tribes, or nations, as they called them, had many gods, big and little."

"But what were these gods to be for?"

"Of that I will tell you some other time. What will amuse you most now, I think, will be the fable of the last god, and that god was worshiped by people even in this part of our planet, many, many years ago. The story runs: that this god was a great and powerful man to whom nothing was impossible, who was never born but always was. He was supposed to liv up in the clouds, in a place called 'heaven,' and had a host of 'angels' with him. These 'angels' were like men and women, only they had wings, were dressed all in white and wore crowns of gold on their heads. The chief occupation of these 'angels' was to play on harps and sing songs praising this God, day and night. Heaven was supposed to be a most beautiful place, and paved with gold. Although this place was supposed to be the abode of every perfection, yet there seems to hav been even there discord. The fable goes, that there was one angel who was not content, but desired to be a god himself. He gathered together other angels who thought as he did, and they fought the other angels, but were defeated and banished to a place called hell. Now, this hell was said to be the very opposit of heaven, being a place of horrible torture, where one burnt in fire and brimstone for ever and ever. The angels who were banished to this place were then called devils, and the chief was named Satan. Hell was supposed to be in the center of this planet; but as this planet was not supposed to hav been in existence then it is a mistake on the part of the story-tellers. It is said that then peace dwelt in heaven, and God said, 'I will make a world,' a planet. So he started to make this planet, with earth, trees, rivers, and everything, including the sun and the moon, and as the people who invented this fable did not know any better, they said that he made our sister planets at the same time. Now, it took this God, to whom nothing was supposed to be impossible, just six days to do all this. And then, although he is said to be all-powerful, he was tired and rested one day, and was very pleased, it is said, with his work.

"Now, my children, what do you think he was supposed to hav made all this with?"

"It's all so funny, teacher, that we'll giv it up."

"Well, out of nothing!"

This caused such a peal of laughter that it was some time before the venerable teacher could continue the story.

"Then, it is said, this God decided to make one man to liv on this planet, and so, taking a little earth—just a handful—he made a full-grown man, and this man was the exact image of God, although, of course, not as powerful, but just like men of to-day. So you see by this how this God of theirs was only a creature of their imagination. They could only think of him as like unto themselvs. Their total ignorance of the different characteristics of men is also portrayed in this part of the legend. This man was called Adam and placed in a large and beautiful garden called Eden, and it is a very strange fact that some believed so fervently in this improbable story that only as far back as three hundred years they tried to discover its exact location. The next thing that this God is said to hav done was to call all the animals to Adam and he named them. You will easily see the absurdity of this. In the first place, how unreasonable to imagin such an assemblage—rats and cats in peaceful company with wolves and alligators, and so we might go on; but I must not weary you with my digressions but continue. Of course Adam was alone, in so far as he had no other animal of his species for company; so God decided to giv him a companion, and it was brought about this way: God had now ceased to make things out of nothing—his stock of nothingness was evidently used up—so he caused Adam to fall into a deep sleep and during this sleep God came down and taking a rib out of Adam's side made a full-grown woman. Why this God, whom, as I hav told you, they believed to be all-powerful and able to make this planet out of nothing, should go to all this trouble the story-tellers fail to enlighten us."

"But, teacher, don't be hard on them, they had no light to spare," exclaimed a bright five-year-old citizen.

"True, true, my child, and that reminds me that we must stop this tale now and get some light ourselvs. We must not waste too much of our time on such foolish stories, for as much as we may laugh at them there is a serious side to it, for those of our ancestors who believed all this were made miserable by it, and our glorious religion of science had a hard struggle to uproot the superstition. But there is a lot more to tell and maybe we can find some time again." THOMAS ROGERS.

Correspondence.

ROCKVILLE, IA., Aug. 7, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to the Corner for the second time. I would like for the little girls and boys to write to me.

I am ten years old. The grass is green. I guess I will stop for this time.

From your Freethinker,
ROSE ALICE CARLTON.

DANBURY, NEB., Nov. 1, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my second letter to the Corner. Week before last there was not one single letter in the Corner. My little and only brother was so sick last week that we did not think he would liv. We all felt so bad we could hardly stand it. He is better now, but has not walked for over a week. I hav two pets, a bird and kitten; their names are Ted and Nellie. I wish more boys would write to the Corner. I like to read their letters so well. I can help my father do lots of his farmwork. I dragged lots of the corn last spring and mowed pretty near all of the clover hay. I do think it must be more fun to be an Infidel than a Christian, for the latter cannot dance nor hav any fun on the "Lord's day," Sunday. I must close and help sister get dinner, but will write again.

Yours sincerely, INEZ E. P.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Aug. 14, 1892.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON AND THE CORNERITES: Seeing that communications to the Corner are rather scarce, I thought I would make my début. I hav begun to think that interest in the Corner has fallen off a little, because the older members hav ceased to write; the younger ones must bear the burden. I liv in a rather orthodox town, where the Law and Order Society would like to run things to suit itself. Last winter they thought they would stop the Sunday newspapers; but they were left, because, while the papers are still issued, the "Society" has slunk "out of sight." I hav been taking a four years' course at our high school, of which I hav completed two years. I hav not yet decided what profession I shall take up, but I think I could profit by a course in chemistry or electrical engineering.

Several months ago there appeared in the Corner columns a suggestion that a sort of a history club be organized. I would suggest that our organ be the Corner, and that any member wishing to send questions should send them to Miss Wixon, who shall decide which shall be accepted. I would like to hear some suggestions in regard to the organization of such a club, as I think it would be both interesting and instructiv. I hope we can carry out our scheme this time, but to do so successfully the coöperation of all is necessary. A short glance at the columns of other children's papers shows that they hav some such amusement, and we must not be behindhand. So, to set the ball rolling, I will send a short list of questions on general history. Hoping this plan finds favor with the readers of the Corner, I remain, Yours,

JAS. S. DOUTHITT.

1. What is meant by sacred history? Profane history?
2. What is the earliest authentic date in the history of the world?
3. Into what three general divisions has history been divided? What event marks each?
4. When, where, and by whom were cannon first used?
5. Who was Rameses II.? and why was he famous?
6. Who were the Phœnicians?

[The above is a very good idea, and we would like more similar historical questions. Readers of the Corner will please look up the answers to the questions, and send them to the editor of the Corner, when they will be printed and the names also of those who get them correctly. Since our return from Europe the Corner has been somewhat disarranged, and one package of letters and communications designed for this department seems to hav disappeared entirely after mailing. If it does not come to light those who hav sent articles and letters will understand that they hav somehow gone astray in the post-office buildings. We will take this occasion to thank all our friends who hav kindly sent flowers, letters, telegrams, and many good wishes on our safe return from overseas.—ED. C. C.]

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.

News of the Week.

A PILGRIMAGE of British Catholics to Rome has been arranged for February.

THE church congregations of Long island and Staten island, N. Y., hav been praying for rain for a month.

THE German emperor's baby daughter has been baptized with water brought, as in the case of the baptism of the other imperial princes, from the river Jordan.

THE people of Germany and France are so burdened with military expenses, and harried with fear of war, that a general melancholy prevails, especially in the former nation.

EMPEROR WILLIAM has ordered that a medal commemorating the Luther festival be struck. Catholic papers say that the expense of the medal should fall solely on the Protestants.

AT the Luther celebration William II. drank of the Reformer's cup, and spoke on "the good and beautiful that God almighty procured for us when he gave us the evangelical church."

NORAH FORD died at Red Bank, N. J., on the 4th, from an operation performed to hide the result of criminal intercourse. She said: "Ed. Woodward and I were to hav been married before now, but he was a Protestant and I a Catholic."

THE pope has granted a dispensation for the marriage of Princess Marie, a Protestant, daughter of the duke of Edinburgh, to Crown-prince Ferdinand of Roumania, a Catholic. He requires that the children shall be baptized and educated as Catholics.

A NEW YORK court of appeals has confirmed the judgment of a lower court refusing $400 damages claimed by a German excursion club against a steamboat company for failing to take the club on an excursion. The courts held that a contract to be carried out on Sunday is void.

ON the 31st ult. Dr. G. W. Kelly, a prominent physician of Louisville, Ky., threw his daughter into a well to drown her and shot his sister-in-law. He had for some time been in a nervous excitement, and had hinted at killing his relativs to deliver them from this sin-cursed world.

AT our going to press the presidency is claimed by the Democrats and but faintly disputed by the Republicans. Wisconsin and Illinois, formerly Republican, appear to hav gone Democratic. Indiana seems to hav done likewise. The Democracy has been successful with its candidates for other offices almost everywhere. The People's party won little if anything.

DEMOCRATIC campaign speeches hav contained some accusations of bigotry against the Republican party, such as this by J. Solomon, editor of the New York Hebrew Standard: "Who arrests a man for selling a three-cent collar-button on Sunday? The Republican party. Who prevents you from drinking a glass of beer on Sunday when you want to? The Republican party."

THE Chinese in this country hav steadily refused to obey the law passed a half-year ago requiring them to register and provide photographs of themselvs. The San Francisco Chinese paper says: "If the Chinese Registration act is enforced upon Chinese resident in America, China will insist that Americans resident in China shall register and wear tags, under penalty of imprisonment and expulsion, according to the American system."

AN English paper says that the hopes of the Old World were placed on America, but "what men see, instead, looking across the Atlantic, is a host of millionaires, exceeding in number and riches anything the world has ever known before, a ready-made proletariat in the great cities rivaling the lowest slums of the Old World, and a standing bitterness between employers and men for which there is no parallel elsewhere, and which under the slightest friction will flame up into a ferocious civil war."

THE election at Columbus, O., was one of unprecedented excitement, owing to the fact that sectarian issues were involved. Catholic and anti-Catholic animosities engaged press, pulpit, and people. The fact that Foley and Kelley, two Democratic candidates, were Catholics, caused a fight against their election to be made by Protestants. A secret distribution was made to Catholic voters of a twenty-four-page pamphlet exposing the purposes of a nopopery society called the American Protectiv Association, with its ritual and a list of prominent Protestant citizens as its members. Fear is felt that the social and business ruptures which hav begun will extend.

Gems of Thought.

IT is the office of prudence to avoid being injured if possible, but after an injury has been received a regard for our own tranquillity will preserve us from a desire for revenge.—Democritus (400 B.C.).

THIS degraded belief [in the devil] is still found in the almost gleeful pulpit picturings of physical agonies as especially attending the deathbeds of Infidels—as Voltaire and Paine—and its fearful result is found in the degree to which priesthoods are still able to paralyze the common-sense and heart of the masses, by the barbaric ceremonials with which they are permitted to surround death, and the arrogant line drawn between unworthy goats and credulous sheep, by "consecrated" grounds.—Moncure Conway.

MERE theological tenets may do much and prolonged mischief. The abstract idea that Matter was the origin of Evil has produced an immense amount of physical and moral disease in the world. Thousands and thousands hav starved and lacerated their bodies, and stifled the kindliest emotions of human nature, in consequence of it. For centuries, it changed the entire social system, by banishing a very large proportion of men and women into convents. The influence of it to this day infects our ideas of love and marriage.—Lydia Maria Child.

THERE are a thousand hacking at the branches of evil to one who is striking at the root, and it may be that he who bestows the largest amount of time and money on the needy is doing the most by his mode of life to produce that misery which he strives in vain to relieve. It is the pious slave-breeder devoting the proceeds of every tenth slave to buy a Sunday's liberty for the rest. Some show their kindness to the poor by employing them in their kitchens. Would they not be kinder if they employed themselvs there!—Thoreau.

THEOLOGIANS, or pretended politicians, cry—"Religion is destroyed, the government is lost, if you print certain truths or certain paradoxes. Never attempt to think, till you hav demanded permission from a monk or an officer. It is against good order for a man to think for himself. See into what horrible decay the liberty of the press brought England and Holland. It is true that they possess the commerce of the whole world, and that England is victorious on sea and land; but it is merely a false greatness, a false opulence: they hasten with long strides to their ruin. An enlightened peop'e cannot subsist." . . . In general, we hav as natural a right to make use of our pen as our language, at our perils, risk, and fortune. I know many books which fatigue, but I know of none which hav done real evil.—Voltaire.

HISTORY is full of illustrations proving that wherever this barbaric and diabolical theology has held sway, it has cast its gloom of despair over every household; ushered in the new-born child with a cloud of gloomy prophecy; overshadowed every church with its vampire wings of terror; filled the creeds with most damnable untruths, born of its own untruth, the father of all lies; poisoned the cup of nourishment which the daily toiler presses to his lips, and crowded the atmosphere of the whole world with such hosts of imaginary beings, plying their instruments of everlasting torture, as to hav driven one-half the world insane through fear, and the other half insane through imaginary powers, by which they presumed to conquer and control these impalpable substances; resulting in the establishment of the most pretentious and presumptuous hierarchy—a veritable incarnation of diabolical propensities—which has ever been permitted to burden and curse the globe.—Henry Frank.

SIR WILLIAM THOMSON has suggested that life originated on the earth from germs contained in meteoric stones that fell from inhabited planets. But this idea has not received much support. Haeckel and many others maintain that the first forms of life came by spontaneous generation. Just as we see crystals form themselvs to-day, so by a process, chemical and electrical, the atoms of carbon combined into the speck of protoplasm or "primitiv slime," which constitutes the lowest living form—the Moneron. No one claims that organized beings hav arisen spontaneously; it is only in the case of Monera—"structureless organisms without organs"—that spontaneous generation is assumed to hav occurred at the first beginning of organic life upon the earth. If the whole development of life and the formation of intricate organs proceed without supernatural aid, why should we assume that this principle, so contrary to all observed action of nature, must hav acted to produce this simple beginning of life in the Moneron?—Robt. C. Adams.

NATHANIEL VAUGHAN:

Priest and Man.

A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,
Author of the "Iliad of the East," etc., etc.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not have been ashamed to own as her first novel. . . . A more vigorous presentment of the mischievous nature of modern Christianity, in its most honest and consistent form, need not be desired.—[Westminster Review.

Petition to Congress to Open the Gates of the World's Columbian Exposition on Sundays.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress Assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, do hereby respectfully pray and memorialize your Honorable Body to repeal that portion of the Act entitled "An Act to aid in carrying out the Act of Congress, approved April 25, 1890, entitled 'An Act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by the holding of an International Exposition in the City of Chicago'"—approved August 5, 1892, which reads as follows: "That it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition, are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and it is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by the Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modifications of the rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

Also, to repeal that portion of the Act entitled, "An Act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes"—approved August 5, 1892, which reads as follows:

"And it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition, are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and it is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modifications of the rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

We ask the repeal of these portions of these laws for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago, who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you ought to decide is that of the public welfare.

5 It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

Life of Thomas Paine,

WITH A

History of His Literary, Political, and Religious Career in America, France, and England.

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY,

Author of "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," "George Washington and Mount Vernon," "Washington's Rules of Civility," etc.

To Which Is added a Sketch of Paine by William Cobbett.

No real biography of Paine has ever appeared. The so-called Lives of Paine have been mainly the controversial work of pamphleteers, turning chiefly on his religious heresies. Paine was in his fifty-eighth year before he published anything concerning religion, and before that time he had acted an important part in revolutionary movements in the United States, England, and France. But in the religious conflict initiated by him, his political services and military career hav been but inadequately considered. A certain historical ostracism has buried in the archives of various countries a large mass of documents containing records of paramount interest and importance. Mr. Conway has personally searched such records, in Europe and America, and has obtained from these fresh light, not only on Paine, but on various eminent figures in American and European history with whom he was associated. A large amount of unpublished correspondence has been included in the volumes.

Mr. Conway says in his Preface: "In the laborious work of searching out the real Paine I hav found a general appreciation of its importance, and it will be seen in the following pages that generous assistance has been rendered by English clergymen, by official persons in Europe and America, by persons of all beliefs and no beliefs In no instance have I been impeded by any prejudice, religious or political. The curators of archives, private collectors, owners of important documents bearing on the subject, have welcomed my effort to bring the truth to light."

Bennett-Teed Discussion. Between D. M. Bennett and Cyrus Romulus R. Teed. Jesus the Lord God Creator of Heaven and Earth. Paper, 30 cents.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. Bennett and G. M. Mair, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion 2. Miracles and supernatural achievements have been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus. 3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history. Bennett affirms; Mair denies. This is an exhaustive discussion. Price, $1.50.

The Religion of the Pig and the Devils.

In China there are being distributed gratuitously large numbers of pamphlets assailing Christianity. These works, says one advertisement of them, "are got up in styles to suit all tastes; in the most scholarly classical and in the familiar mandarin colloquial; in poetry and prose; with illustrations and without." The expense of their production is borne by private individuals and associations. Of one pamphlet alone no fewer than eight hundred thousand copies hav been disbursed. They are sent off by huge boatloads. We will confess that such liberality in the dissemination of Antichristian literature makes our mouth water a little. Would that the Freethinkers of the United States would scatter Infidel works by the eight hundred thousand and the boatload. These Chinese booklets incite to massacre of the Christians:

"However many the devils are they must and shall be utterly exterminated." "Haste to sweep away the heresy and exterminate the devils." "Ten thousand arrows and a thousand swords would not expiate their crimes."

This latter sentence is a perfectly accurate statement. However, as to killing believers in Christ, we cannot, while admitting them to be pernicious creatures, wish to see them treated in this sort. It would be better to civilize them.

One of the books says of the Christians:

"They wish to come to China to build devil churches and practice the devil religion. China has fallen into the foul snare, and, having failed to raise any barrier, the devil rulers dispatch a crowd of devil priests to work upon the people's feelings."

Yes, rulers—one must resist the temptation to say devil rulers—at the solicitation of ecclesiastics hav long made it a practice to send priests to other nations, and soldiers to force the people into conversion if they balk at the priests' arguments. There is cause for indignation here.

"At times they say that Christ the Pig was transformed from the essence or spirit of the Supreme Ruler; at other times that He is His Son."

We felicitate the Mongolian intellect upon this concise and not unclear exposition of a Christian tenet. Certainly no Caucasian has ever got any nearer to a satisfactory conception of just what is meant by that piece of literature about "three almighties" which are "only one almighty" and being "not created but begotten" and "not begotten but proceeding" and the Lord knows what else.

Our celestial colaborer visits no little scorn upon the Christian notion that "it is enough to worship Jesus, and then there will be such happiness, without beginning or end!"

In view of the misery in which mankind weltered for centuries through faith in the above notion, we think it a meet subject not only for scorn but for sternest hate.

"The Being they worship has been dead for two thousand years."

He is at least dying. His ideal existence in the minds of men, which is the only one that he ever possessed, is undeniably dwindling.

"His spirit has been confined in the darkest perdition; and yet His followers say He has ascended to heaven."

Christ flung threats of perdition about among his opponents pretty carelessly; if there be truth in this "newsy" extract, to the effect that he has himself fallen into that sorry pickle, it exemplifies the saying that He who draweth the sword shall perish by the sword.

"The devil men and children call the Supreme Ruler their Heavenly Father, and the corrupt devil Jesus their Heavenly Elder Brother. And I don't know how much more stuff and nonsense they hav."

You don't know, dear antipode? Would that we did not. Alas, they hav libraries and libraries full.

"At the present time in every province the devil priests dispatch a crowd of Chinese devil sons and devil grandsons belonging to their sect [viz., old and young nativ Christians] who secretly distribute devil books everywhere. Many of these books hav been picked up. Remember, as soon as you hear them spoken about by anyone, go quickly and make search everywhere and seize them. Whenever you see a devil son or a devil grandson praising the devil doctrins, attack him; whenever you see a devil book, burn it. On no account be careless."

Had our almond-eyed agitator's advice been promulgated and acted on in Europe in earlier days, the race might now be enjoying a halcyon and delectable estate instead of tossing as at present in throes barbarian.

"Once allow them to come and incite people to enter the devil sect, and if one man enters it the whole family is led astray; if one family is led astray, so will their immediate neighbors be, their fellow-clansmen, their relativs and friends, and numberless places will be ruined. It is just as it is with opium. If one person smokes, the whole household is certain to do so; if one household smokes, the neighborhood will be sure to do so, and when there are many smokers an opium divan will be opened."

Apt comparison. The writer might hav added that opium was forced upon his people by the same nation which is now essaying to thrust in its devil creeds—or devilish creeds. Few of our readers are unaware that pious England, to please its East India merchants in opium, forced trade in that drug upon the Chinese against the protests of their emperor that it would ruin his subjects.

"In the same way, if the followers of the faith are many, a devil's hall will be built, and what can you do then?"

The writer can see, by gazing upon this American land, what formidable obstacles are these devil's halls, or churches, to the prevalence of truth. In many a town one of these structures, with its clique of unconvinceable blockheads, forms an insuperable barrier to the victory of no few intelligent Freethinkers.

One American journal thinks such sentiments as the above "shockingly blasphemous" and "inconceivably malignant." We, however, fail to find ourselvs disposed to pick any such fault in them. We get along with them very well.

Mexico.

It is instructiv to scrutinize the condition of any country wherein Christianity has enjoyed thorough prevalence for a long time. Such a survey yields us unchallengeable evidence of the effect of that religion when not checked and antidoted by other influences. Mexico is such a land. Up to the rise of Infidelity there in the last few decades Christianity had for many generations permeated and governed the whole of the people's life. The results of this rule are beheld in these observations by the late historian Bancroft:

"As we penetrate the country we are more and more struck with the phenomenon of a republic without a people. There is no middle class. The aristocracy are the nation. The low are very low; they are poor, ignorant, servil, and debased, with neither the hear nor the hope ever to attempt to better their condition. hav never before witnessed such squalid misery and so much of it. It surpasses Europe, and with this difference: In Europe the miserable know they are miserable, here they do not. Sit at the door of your hotel and you will see pass by, as in a procession of the accursed, the withered, the deformed, the lame, and the blind, deep in debasement, their humanity well-nigh hidden in their dingy, dirty raiment, form bent and eyes cast down, as if the light of heaven and the eyes of man were equally painful, hunchbacks and dwarfs, little filthy mothers with little filthy babes, the former but fourteen years old, and grizzly men and women, with tanned and wrinkled skins, bent double and hobbling on canes and crutches. Into such pits of deep abasement does man thrust his fellow-man in the name of civilization. Infinitly happier and better off were the people of this plateau before ever a European saw it."

We will amend Mr. Bancroft by making his sentence read, "Infinitly happier and better off were the people of this plateau before ever a Christian saw it," and by saying that "into such pits of deep abasement does man thrust his fellow-man" in the cause, not of civilization, but of Christianity. European civilization does not work such results. Christianity does, invariably. European civilization taken by itself has in a few late years vastly benefited Mexico and every land where it has operated dissociated from religion.

The Tables Turned.

The Paris Univers laments that since the French government has undertaken the superintendence of the schools and transferred the teaching of youth from the hands of the Sisters and Christian Brothers to those of lay teachers, a great change has shown itself among the young in many districts. The respect they formerly had for religion has vanished; and, "as in the case of all light-headed youths, their former love has become a hatred, and, braggart-like, shows itself by acts of insolence. Our admirable Sisters," continues the Univers, "cannot even escape the insults of the laicist youth, who, not content with despising their religious character, do not even grant them the respect due to their weakness and dignity as women. It is only a few days since one of the Sisters of La Providence was passing along the Rue de la Parme, Dunkirk, when three young ruffians, named Emile Kersemacher, aged sixteen years; Jules Gazet and Auguste Verguin, catching her by the arms shook her violently and addressed her in most vulgar terms. A gentleman named Vandendrieche, who was passing, seeing the assault, became quite indignant and immediately went to the Sister's aid; he was knocked down by the young ruffians, who beat him so badly that he lay unconscious and covered with blood until the police arrived and succored him, at the same time succeeding in arresting the rowdies." On this news the Roman Catholic Freeman's Journal, of New York, cries out, "This is indeed strange reading from Catholic France, and the godless schools stand accountable for it.'

Certainly we ourselvs do not approve of acts of violence such as those above described. It is regrettable that ruffians will attach themselvs to every cause when it reaches a certain degree of popularity, a good cause equally with a bad. But when such misbehaviors do occur, it at least is less depressing when we can reflect that the victims of them are impostors and robbers than when, as in former ages, we find as sufferers the noble and the true.

America's Rank As a Christian Land.

Goldwin Smith, the Canadian observer and writer of note, indites about religion in America as follows: "I hav lived both in a Canadian city and in a country town of the United States. I am much mistaken if society and life are not fully as religious there, under the free system, as they are in England under that of a state church. Unquestionably there is far more respect for religion than there is in France, where, as Lord Selborne reminds us, the church is still established, but where, in a Librarie Anti-Clericale, the most hideous blasphemy is openly sold." Mr. Smith says that "the very aspect of an American town or village, with its spires and steeples 'pointing to heaven,' though perhaps not tapering with consummate grace, proclaims the community religious."

This is but too true. The first glance at each of our towns does only too certainly reveal by its upperched cross, or spire, or other insignia of the house of the Religion of Sorrow, that healthy, natural pagan joy and freedom are not to be found within its melancholy pale. One relieving instance of the contrary has lately blessed the people of New York city. Diana, free and brave goddess of the Greeks, forms the subject of a gilded figure recently exalted high over the edifices in the heart of New York, on the turret of the beautiful Madison Square Garden. Could other pagan deities be thus represented about the city there might arise some hope of a superseding of the lugubrious Christian creed and its emblems of suffering. The pious folk fear as much, and hav already expressed themselvs scandalized by the figure of Diana.

Our Canadian observer continues: "While the choice of a religion is absolutely free, while no man while a candidate for anything is asked to what church he belongs, while members of the same family belong to different churches without domestic friction, to be entirely without a religion is to incur, with most people, a shade of social suspicion. In no reputable society would anything offensiv to religious feeling be endured. All this is spontaneous and has the strength of spontaneity, while the religion of the peasantry in an English country parish is not so certainly spontaneous."

O'ertrue description!

How Nations Become Christian.

The Jewish Tidings predicts that within ten years Sunday services will be held in the American synagogs. It says that the Jewish people of this country want to keep Sunday as a religious day, and that "the delay in its universal adoption is due almost entirely to the rabbis—all of whom are not as progressiv and up-to-the-times as they might be."

Here we hav a good example of a particular religion coercing lesser bodies into gradual adoption of its ceremonial, by wrongful use of the power of the state. When the Jews hav kept their own Sabbath, Saturday, they are then compelled by our church-and-state to keep that of the religion which chances to be the most influential in the nation, Christianity. They cannot afford such protracted inactivity, and hence little by little they enter upon conformity with the religion of the despotizers. It is in ways like this that the adherence of total nations to Christianity has been produced in the past. Preachers cite such unanimity as proving the reasonableness of their creed. But that creed was not voluntarily adopted by the judgment of the people; it obtained the backing of the state, and by this means, in the lapse of generations, imperceptibly infused itself into opinion and observance. There are many Jews in this country, many Seventh Day Protestants, and some adherents of every great religion on the globe—Confucianism, Buddhism, Brahmanism, Mohammedanism. Besides, there are the Rationalists. It is a shame that all these should be bayoneted into rendering an unwilling veneration to that faith which happens for the moment to be the most powerful.

The Bible.

The New York Sun says:

"The popular reverence for the Bible is strong, and it extends to every copy of the printed Book, and includes even those who reject the supernatural authority of scripture. At least so far as the exhibition of outward and formal respect is concerned, they are all of one mind. The various Bible societies are careful to put copies of the scriptures in the reading-rooms and bedrooms of hotels and upon all ships and steamers. They are never defaced. The most flippant treat the Holy Bible with instinctiv and distinctiv respect. Roysterers do not tear out its leaves to light their cigars. The lewd do not disfigure its pages. Gamblers on Mississippi steamers will gravely and carefully put away the Bible before using a table on which it lies. The Bible is treated as a book apart from all other books, even by men who reject its divine authority altogether. They look upon any misuse of the printed volume as in bad taste, and there is among the usually thoughtless and profane a superstitious feeling which prevents them from doing injury to it. No matter where a Bible is put, it may be assumed that it will be safe from ill usage."

The above is mainly true, and that it is so is an unfortunate thing. Respect should be paid to that which is worthy, and withheld from that which is not. The Bible is not worthy of respect; it has done more harm to man than any million other books in the world put together; it can receive treatment of especial reverence from no really knowing man who at the same time reverences the good of his race. We ourselvs do not treat the Bible "as a book apart from all other books." We use its pages to light cigars far sooner than the leaves of loved Ingersoll or gold-precious Spencer. Which, we suppose, will confirm anew in the minds of the pious that good old doctrin that Infidels are lower than "the most flippant," "the lewd," "roysterers," and "gamblers on Mississippi steamers."

Some Handsome Premiums.

To induce new subscriptions and prompt renewals on the part of our friends we make the following handsome premium offers:

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a cloth-bound copy of "Bible Myths" ($2.50).

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth ($2.50).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in boards ($2).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a copy of "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in cloth covers ($1.50).

For $3.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in board covers ($1).

For $3 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and 50 cents' worth of any Tracts or Pamphlets advertised in these columns.

This is a splendid opportunity to obtain books which every Liberal desires to hav at an exceedingly low price. Old and new subscribers can avail themselvs of it, and we shall be glad if our present readers will call the attention of their friends to the values offered.

New Editions.

A new edition of William Hart's "Candle From Under the Bushel" is just fresh from the press and is No. 23 of The Truth Seeker Library. In this book Mr. Hart asks the clergy just thirteen hundred and six questions, not one of which the preachers can answer satisfactorily. Price, 40 cents.

It is not improbable that Colonel Ingersoll will soon lecture in this city. We hope New Yorkers will giv him as great a reception as did the Chicagoans. When he lectured at the Auditorium in that city there was an audience of a thousand back of him on the platform and six thousand in front.

Our readers are particularly requested not to send orders for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the books advertised by The Truth Seeker Company to anyone but the Company or the undersigned.

E. M. MACDONALD.

Fourteen members of the Seventh Day Advent church at Springville, Tenn., hav been indicted for Sunday labor. Trial on this charge means conviction and possibly a term in the chain-gang. Thus do Christians show their love for one another.

The Rev. Walter S. Rudolph, of Denver, Presbyterian, has been haled before his presbytery charged with repudiating the dogma of eternal punishment. In his defense he admitted his guilt, but held that such a tenet "is not vital to religion." When it comes right down to the bedrock of theology it will be found that nothing is "vital" to religion except a preacher's salary.

As showing the desire of the people of this city for a reputable and pleasurable Sunday resort, the Sunday attendance at the Metropolitan Museum of Art may be taken. From January 3d to October 23d of this year 234,638 visitors were registered by the turnstiles. On the single Sunday, April 3d, there were 17,000 visitors. The average Sunday attendance was more than 5,450.

On pages 744 and 745 of this paper readers will be pleased to see matter denouncing the Sunday closing of the World's Fair, which will at once be reprinted in pamphlet form, with the pictures on the covers. The pamphlet we shall send out at the rates of one dozen for 25 cents, or one hundred for $1.50. True Liberals, procure and distribute these protests against the damnable outrage!

We publish this week the remainder of Colonel Ingersoll's lecture on Voltaire. Our report is accurate, so far as it goes, and is a great deal fuller than any other. It will not be published in book form at present, as Colonel Ingersoll will add to it and hav it printed by Mr. Farrell, of which we will giv due notice We hav only a few extra copies of the issues containing it and those who order first will get them. One copy of both issues 15 cents; three copies of both issues 30 cents, and larger orders at the same rate of 5 cents per copy.

We call attention to the advertisement of books for the Holidays on the second page of this paper. There are many beautiful things connected with the pagan festival in celebration of the returning sun, which the Christians hav adapted to their own use and called Christmas, chief of which is the kindly remembrance of friends with presents, and nothing can be more appropriate for such presents than books which instruct as well as please the eye. A list of such works is what we hav made for the guidance of our readers.

The Commercial Advertiser notes the fact that "Colonel Shepard asserts that nearly four hundred thousand Rhode Islanders hav signed petitions demanding the closing of the Columbian Exhibition on the Sunday." The Advertiser's only comment is that "Mr. Porter's census givs Rhode Island a population of only 345,506." The Sentinel adds that "everybody ought to understand by this time that the number of inhabitants has nothing to do with the number of petitioners for Sunday closing." And the world will learn some time that the pious ones pay the least regard of any to cold truth when they desire to "make a point." The lies they hav told about the number of petitioners for Sunday closing are almost as numerous as the alleged petitioners.

Mr. Putnam intends to return East shortly, and make his headquarters for a time at Washington, where he can best work for the Sunday opening of the World's Fair. We are glad to see that he will hav help in the matter. The Chicago people hav organized an association known as the "World's Fair Sunday-opening Association." Upon its advisory committee are the following gentlemen:

Col. James A. Sexton, postmaster of Chicago; Hempstead Washburne, mayor of Chicago; the Rev. Minot J. Savage, of Boston; the Hon. Frank Hatton, of Washington; Samuel Gompers, of New York, a leader in the labor movement; the Right Rev. Bishop Spalding, of Peoria, Ill., and the Rev. Robert Collyer, of New York. Among its sympathizers, it is claimed, are His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons; the Right Rev. Bishop Potter, of New York; Mrs. John A. Logan; the Rev. David Swing; the Most Rev. Archbishop Brennan, of Dallas, Tex., and the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, of Ann Arbor, Mich. Its object will be to devise all ways and means to induce Congress to revoke its recent action and giv to the Fair an open Sunday. A circular has just been issued setting forth the views of the Association, and urging the people to hav their representativs in Congress work for the repeal of the Sunday-closing clause. There are almost too many clergymen named in connection with this organization for it to be very effectual. They probably want an open Fair so they can preach there to the people they cannot force into their churches.

In the West.

News and Notes.

Conductor J. M. Morris was the first one of the Scofield "boys" to greet me in Pleasant Valley at the junction. Although election fills the air in Utah with a sort of triangular contest, still there was a good attendance at the Freethought lectures, especially on the last evening—Wednesday, November 3d. This was concluded with a dance which was declared to be the best of the season. The flower and the chivalry of Scofield were present, and the merry notes dissipated the mists of superstition. I enjoyed my campaign this time equally with the first. I found the same royal welcome. These mining camps and railroad towns are generally on the front line of progress, and I never fear to go to the remotest point so long as there is pluck and energy to clear the way. Scofield is somewhat of a Mormon stronghold. The bishops lord it still, but their power is departing. Thought is in the air and the Liberals of Scofield are not afraid to speak right out with frontier emphasis. The "wild beast" is in the Mormon missionaries still, for in a recent discourse one of them declared that ninety-nine out of every hundred of the gentile youth were mentally and physically diseased. It is the same old priestly logic, the same old slander, the only defense of the church—the Infidel is bad. But the howls of superstition and bigotry will not keep the sun from shining, nor Freethought from its victory. I am in hopes that Scofield will score a Liberal success in the election now at hand. If not, the day is coming when it will, and the church power receive its death-blow. When the hand of despotism is thus removed Utah will become one of the most brilliant stars in our national constellation.

M. P. Braffit is still at his post and lets no occasion pass by when he can help Freethought. Wright is on the same line, square to the front. Also Donaldson, Patterson, Lewis, Dr. Cunningham, Webb, Strang, Macdonald, Earl, and others. Judge Harkness was off prospecting this time. Lloyd, however, was present, being on a gold hunt before by the waters of the San Rafael, which is one of the most curious portions of Utah, where as yet the foot of man has scarcely trod. Scofield is in pretty lively trim, about one hundred and fifty carloads of coal being shipped every day. The snows are beginning to come and the breath of winter is in the air. This is eight thousand feet high, and the thermometer is sometimes 50° below zero. But it is healthy, and when the summer does come it is perfectly lovely. The hills are soft and shining and the atmosphere is sweet and cool. So long as the pioneer corps remains in Scofield our flag will fly to every breeze, rain or shine, and the "saints" will never hav any "rest" until, like the Arab, they "silently steal away." The glory of civilization is on their track, and they must "get."

Thursday morning I leave Scofield refreshed with the genial companionship, and bright and bracing mountain weather. R. Forrester, United States inspector of mines in Utah, is my fellow-traveler, with T. N. Donaldson and others. As I had to remain nearly all day at Pleasant Valley junction, where there is nothing in particular to attract the attention of the stranger, Mr. Forrester invited me to spend the time with him at Castle Gate, and I gladly accepted his hospitality, and found a goodly welcome at his home, where the frowning rocks on every side, like mighty castle gates, indeed remind one of the vast sweep of ages and the tremendous conflicts on the field of time. Here are the remnants and ruins of immense periods piled high around in strange and desolate splendor. Mr. Forrester has been all over Utah, in its wildest portions, where probably no other human being has been before, and he has studied its formations with wonderful enthusiasm and accuracy. He has many fine specimens, and has forwarded to the Smithsonian Institute a most valuable collection of fossils, etc. He is one of the most expert geologists on the coast, and it is most entertaining and instructiv to listen to his varied experiences in this new and magnificent country, where some of the greatest discoveries are yet to be made, whose antique treasures are among the most interesting on the planet. I must thank both Mr. and Mrs. Forrester for the delightful day which I passed at Castle Gate.

I am up early on Friday morn, before the sun glints the lofty peaks about me, and hie away to Salt Lake. It is a lovely day, and the City of the Saints presents its most enchanting appearance. The temple shines as if Solomon himself were there with his thousand wives. The angel Maroni towers and blows his trumpet as if the day of resurrection were at hand. I hav time to see a few friends at Salt Lake—Mr. and Mrs. H. P. Mason; Dr. and Mrs. Tibbetts; Rev. David Utter, one of the most genial of the cloth; Alex. Rodgers, our sturdy Liberal worker, and others. Since I was here the Rev. Fay Mills has passed by with his revival proceedings, and to cap the climax the fool mayor issued a proclamation to close all business places on one day in order that everybody might hav a chance to go to the anxious seat. I understand the mayor is an unbeliever, and how he could hav been so led astray from his official decorum I do not understand. How the churches do bulldoze, and how quietly the people submit. The schools of San Jose, Cal., were closed for the same purpose. I think it about time for Liberals to do a little vigorous kicking.

From Salt Lake I speed on to Reno, Nev., where I arrive on Sunday noon, having been delayed several hours by an accident on the railroad. All things are ready for a Sunday evening lecture, and the Opera House is well filled. Politics are running high as usual, and the People's party is in the van. However, our Liberal friends here as elsewhere are pretty evenly divided among the Democrats, Republicans, and Third party. Of course each one must decide for himself in this eventful campaign, and the perfect party is by no means in sight. We must be content with less than half a loaf, even with a negativ benefit, in the turmoil of the presidential strife. I must confess, however, to a longing desire to see Wanamaker, the czar of the post-office, knocked out, whatever else may be accomplished. Whenever I see a bigot's head I want to hit it hard, no matter on whose side it is.

It is lovely weather now, and Reno and the plains and hills round about shine with autumn luster. The Liberal friends at Reno are enthusiastic as ever. I am now in the hospitable and elegant home of John Sunderland, where I am penciling these "News and Notes" with pictures and books all about me, a comfortable armchair for my Secular body, the pleasant fire in the stove making soft music, while outside is the glittering sky, the dull gold of the beautiful trees, and the radiant ground checkered with uncounted leaves. These are happy surroundings, and I can ask for nothing better on my varied journey.

Since I was here last summer my old friend Harmon Wright has passed away—eighty-three years of age. He passed away gently, with no fear, having been a true soldier in lifelong battle. He desired that no clergyman should speak at his funeral, and his wishes were faithfully carried out. With simple ceremony he was taken to his eternal rest. No cloud of superstition hovered over the peaceful scene. In nature's bosom our friend has found the goal of human life. Memory will cherish his virtues. Hope will throw its blessed beams over the solemn and beautiful silence.

Judge Young was the first to greet me on my arrival—a worker with the "enthusiasm of humanity," a brave and true Freethinker. Charles E. Jones is "deep in politics," but he does not forget the deeper issues of universal freedom. I was introduced to Newlands, who is making a splendid run for Congress on the People's ticket—a man, I should judge, of broad and humanitarian views. Wald; Greer; Gilson; Wright; Fulton; Stanley; Hagerman and son; Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Toler; Mr. and Mrs. Tolly; Mrs. Sloan; Col. Irish Smith, formerly of Oakland, Cal., and many others of the Liberal people of this place and vicinity giv me a cordial welcome. I had a larger audience than all the churches put together. I feel at home in this mountain town where Freethought by the devotion of its adherents has won a position of power. Mr. John Sunderland and his family are in the ranks with the experience of age and the glorious promis of youth.

Everything is hopeful here. The banners of Freethought float with the sunshine and the blue hills and shining plains. Reno has excellent facilities for education. Its public schools are among the best on the coast. The state university is established here, and is conducted in a most liberal manner. It has sixteen professors, able and energetic in their chosen work. All departments of knowledge are available. Rooms are furnished free to those who hav to depend on themselvs, also a chance to labor so that one can earn a dollar or more per day. Thus the poorest boy can win a first-class education if he will. Nevada can certainly be proud of its liberal educational policy.

Without giving judgment as to the universal aspect of the question, I will say that for Nevada the free coinage of silver would be a vast blessing. Within a stone's throw of Reno are hills loaded with ore which cannot at present be developed. If silver were monetized Nevada would double in population and the hum of industry be heard where now there are only barren lands. Large numbers of miners would be employed. These facts are of interest to the political student, who certainly must study every question for the interest of the whole. It is not simply a question of money, but of industry and development and the prosperity of great sections of the country.

I hav determined to return to Washington in December. I am sure the Liberals will see the necessity of this movement. The question of supreme importance before the country to-day is that of opening the World's Fair on Sunday. It is a question of far-reaching influence. The battle-ground is Washington. A great effort will be made to change the vote of Congress, and Liberals must do their share in a question which so vitally concerns them. I believe we can change the vote. It is necessary to be with Congress and stay with Congress until the question is settled. This is what I intend to do, and I know there are enough Liberals in the country to support the undertaking.

Besides the Congressional work I shall organize Sunday evening meetings. This under any circumstances ought to be done. Liberalism should be an organized power at the political center of the republic. Every Liberal can contribute something to this needed enterprise.

Meantime Mr. Charlesworth will lecture in Washington, Oregon, and California this winter, where I am not to be. I hope the Liberals all along the coast will giv him a hearty welcome. He will do them good with his enthusiasm and boundless energy. Don't fail to arrange for lectures at every possible point.

At Reno, as elsewhere, a large number united with the Freethought Federation. Whatever may be the honest differences of opinion among Liberals, the Federation is now an assured success. I need not answer criticisms. Liberals will judge for themselvs. There is no dictation. The Federation now numbers over three thousand. Such an array of Liberals cannot be ignored or destroyed. The membership is constantly increasing. There will be ten thousand by May next. The attitude of the American Secular Union is the attitude of the Federation; there is no quarrel. Liberals can belong to both and find no discord. The Federation presses forward into an unoccupied field, that is all.

The old work is still necessary, and the Union must still be supported for that work which the Federation does not propose to do. As Mr. Wakeman wisely puts it, the Federation, like the National Defense Association, is not a faction, but a differentiation made absolutely necessary by the new issues which confront it. It is in accordance with the magnificent philosophy of Stephen Pearl Andrews, "Unity in Diversity." So far as the universal Liberal movement is concerned there is harmony, as there is harmony between the infantry, the artillery, and the cavalry, as they advance in varied battle line upon the common enemy. All three national organizations are necessary to the complete triumph of Secular principles.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Time.

Each moment is a bee that flies
With unreturning wing,
Giving its honey to the wise
And to the fool its sting.

Voltaire.—(Concluded.)

On this frightful charge the father, mother, one son, a servant, and one guest at their house, were arrested.

The dead son was considered a martyr, the church taking possession of the body.

This happened in 1761.

There was what was called a trial. There was no evidence, not the slightest, except hearsay. All the facts were in favor of the accused.

The united strength of the defendants could not have done the deed.

Jean Calas was doomed to torture and to death upon the wheel. This was on the 9th of March, 1762, and the sentence was to be carried out the next day.

On the morning of the 10th the father was taken to the torture-room. The examiner and his assistants were sworn on the cross to administer the torture according to the judgment of the Court.

They bound him by the wrists to an iron ring in the stone wall four feet from the ground, and his feet to another ring in the floor. Then they shortened the ropes and chains until every joint in his arms and legs was dislocated. Then he was questioned. He declared that he was innocent. Then the ropes were again shortened until life fluttered in the torn body; but he remained firm.

This was called the question ordinaire.

Again the magistrates exhorted the victim to confess, and again he refused, saying that there was nothing to confess.

Then came the question extraordinaire.

Into the mouth of the victim was placed a horn holding three pints of water. In this way thirty pints of water were forced into the body of the sufferer. The pain was beyond description, and yet Jean Calas remained firm.

He was then carried to the scaffold in a tumbrel. He was bound to a wooden cross that lay on the scaffold. The executioner then took a bar of iron, broke each leg and each arm in two places, striking eleven blows in all. He was then left to die if he could. He lived for two hours, declaring his innocence to the last. He was slow to die, and so the executioner strangled him. Then his poor lacerated, bleeding and broken body was chained to a stake and burnt.

All this was a spectacle—a festival for the savages of Toulouse. What would they have done if their hearts had not been softened by the glad tidings of great joy—peace on earth and good will to men?

But this was not all. The property of the family was confiscated; the son was released on condition that he become a Catholic; the servant if she would enter a convent. The two daughters were consigned to a convent, and the heart-broken widow was allowed to wander where she would.

Voltaire heard of this case. In a moment his soul was on fire. He took one of the sons under his roof. He wrote a history of the case. He corresponded with kings and queens, with chancellors and lawyers. If money was needed he advanced it. For years he filled Europe with the echoes of the groans of Jean Calas. He succeeded. The horrible judgment was annulled—the poor victim declared innocent and thousands of dollars raised to support the mother and family.

This was the work of Voltaire.

THE SIRVEN FAMILY.

Sirven, a Protestant, lived in Languedoc with his wife and three daughters. The housekeeper of the bishop wanted to make one of the daughters a Catholic.

The law allowed the bishop to take the child of Protestants from their parents for the sake of its soul. This little girl was so taken and placed in a convent. She ran away and came back to her parents. Her poor little body was covered with the marks of the convent whip.

"Suffer little children to come unto me."

The child was out of her mind—suddenly she disappeared, and a few days after her little body was found in a well, three miles from home.

The cry was raised that her folks had murdered her to keep her from becoming a Catholic.

This happened only a little way from the Christian City of Toulouse while Jean Calas was in prison. The Sirvens knew that a trial would end in conviction. They fled. In their absence they were convicted, their property confiscated, the parents sentenced to die by the hangman, the daughters to be under the gallows during the execution of their mother, and then to be exiled.

The family fled in the midst of winter; the married daughter gave birth to a child in the snows of the Alps; the mother died, and, at last reaching Switzerland, the father found himself without means of support.

They went to Voltaire. He espoused their cause. He took care of them, gave them the means to live, and labored to annul the sentence that had been pronounced against them for nine long and weary years. He appealed to kings for money, to Catharine II. of Russia, and to hundreds of others. He was successful. He said of this case: The Sirvens were tried and condemned in two hours in January, 1762, and now in January, 1772, after ten years of effort, they have been restored to their rights.

This was the work of Voltaire. Why should the worshipers of God hate the lovers of men?

THE ESPENASSE CASE.

Espenasse was a Protestant, of good estate. In 1740 he received into his house a Protestant clergyman, to whom he gave supper and lodging.

In a country where priests repeated the parable of the "Good Samaritan," this was a crime.

For this crime Espenasse was tried, convicted and sentenced to the galleys for life.

When he had been imprisoned for twenty-three years his case came to the knowledge of Voltaire, and he was, through the efforts of Voltaire, released and restored to his family.

This was the work of Voltaire. There is not time to tell of the case of General Lally, of the English General Bing, of the niece of Corneille, of the Jesuit Adam, of the writers, dramatists, actors, widows and orphans, for whose benefit he gave his influence, his money and his time. But I will tell another case:

In 1765, at the town of Abbeyville, an old wooden cross on a bridge had been mutilated—whittled with a knife—a terrible crime. Sticks, when crossing each other, were far more sacred than flesh and blood. Two young men were suspected, the Chevalier de la Barre and D'Etallonde. D'Etallonde fled to Prussia and enlisted as a common soldier.

La Barre remained and stood his trial.

He was convicted without the slightest evidence, and he and D'Etallonde were both sentenced:

1st, to endure the torture, ordinary and extraordinary; 2nd, to have their tongues torn out by the roots with pincers of iron; 3d, to have their right hands cut off at the door of the church, and 4th, to be bound to stakes by chains of iron and burnt to death by a slow fire.

"Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us."

Remembering this, the Judges mitigated the sentence by providing that their heads should be cut off before their bodies were given to the flames.

The case was appealed to Paris; heard by a Court composed of twenty-five Judges, learned in the law, and the judgment was confirmed.

The sentence was carried out on the first day of July, 1766.

When Voltaire heard of this judicial infamy he made up his mind to abandon France. He wished to leave forever a country where such cruelties were possible.

He wrote a pamphlet, giving the history of the case.

He ascertained the whereabouts of D'Etallonde, wrote in his behalf to the king of Prussia; got him released from the Army; took him to his own house; kept him for a year and a half; saw that he was instructed in drawing, mathematics, engineering, and had at last the happiness of seeing him a captain of engineers in the army of Frederick the Great.

Such a man was Voltaire. He was the champion of the oppressed and the helpless. He was the Cæsar to whom the victims of Church and State appealed. He stood for the intellect and heart of his time.

And yet for a hundred and fifty years those who love their enemies have exhausted the vocabulary of hate, the ingenuity of malice and mendacity, in their efforts to save their stupid creeds from the genius of Voltaire.

From a great hight he surveyed the world. His horizon was large. He had some vices—these he shared in common with priests—his virtues were his own.

He was in favor of universal education, of the development of the brain. The church despised him. He wished to put the knowledge of the whole world within the reach of all. Every priest was his enemy. He wished to drive from the gate of Eden the cherubim of superstition so that the children of Adam might return and eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge. The church opposed this because it had the fruit of the tree of ignorance for sale.

He was one of the foremost friends of the Encyclopedia—of Diderot, and did all in his power to give information to all. So far as principles were concerned he was the greatest lawyer of his time. I do not mean that he knew the terms and decisions, but that he clearly perceived not only what the law should be, but the application and administration. He understood the philosophy of evidence, the difference between suspicion and proof, between belief and knowledge, and he did more to reform the laws of the kingdom and the abuses at Courts than all the lawyers and statesmen of his time.

At school, he read and studied the works of Cicero—the lord of language—probably the greatest orator that has uttered speech, and the words of the Roman remained in his brain. He became, in spite of the spirit of caste, a believer in the equality of men. He said: "Men are born equal."

"Let us respect virtue and merit."

"Let us have it in the heart that men are equal."

He was an abolitionist—the enemy of slavery in all its forms. He did not think that the color of one man gave him the right to steal from another man on account of that man's color. He was the friend of serf and peasant, and did what he could to protect animals, wives and children from the fury of those who loved their neighbors as themselves.

It was Voltaire who sowed the seeds of liberty in the heart and brain of Franklin, of Jefferson and Thomas Paine.

Puffendorf had taken the ground that slavery was, in part, founded on contract.

Voltaire said: "Show me the contract, and if it is signed by the party to be the slave, I may believe you."

He thought it absurd that God should drown the fathers, and then come and die for the children. This is as good as the remark of Diderot: "If Christ had the power to defend himself from the Jews and refused to use it, he was guilty of suicide."

The flame of the fagot does not enlighten the mind.

On being released from the Bastille the Regent said: "Be prudent, and I will take care of you." Voltaire replied: "I shall find it very good if your Majesty should be pleased henceforth to charge yourself with my board, but I beg your Royal Highness not to trouble yourself further about my lodgings."

Voltaire was not a saint. He was educated by the Jesuits. He was never troubled about the salvation of his soul. All the theological disputes excited his laughter, the creeds his pity, and the conduct of bigots his contempt. He was much better than a saint.

Most of the christians in his day kept their religion not for every-day use but for disaster, as ships carry life-boats to be used only in the stress of storm.

Voltaire believed in the religion of humanity—of good and generous deeds. For many centuries the church had painted virtue so ugly, sour and cold, that vice was regarded as beautiful. Voltaire taught the beauty of the useful, the hatefulness and hideousness of superstition.

He was not the greatest of poets, or of dramatists, but he was the greatest man of his time, the greatest friend of freedom and the deadliest foe of superstition.

After the exile of twenty-seven years, occupying during all that time a first place in the civilized world, Voltaire returned to Paris. His journey was a triumphal march. He was received as a conqueror. The Academy, the Immortals, came to meet him—a compliment that had never been paid to royalty. His tragedy of "Irene" was performed. At the theater he was crowned with laurel, covered with flowers; he was intoxicated with perfume and with incense of worship. He was the supreme French poet, standing above them all. Among the literary men of the world he stood first—a monarch by the divine right of genius. There were three mighty forces in France—the throne, the altar and Voltaire.

The king was the enemy of Voltaire. The Court could have nothing to do with him. The Church, malign and morose, was waiting for her revenge, and yet, such was the reputation of this man—such the hold he had upon the people—that he became, in spite of Throne, in spite of Church, the idol of France.

All kinds of criminals except infidels, meet death with reasonable serenity. As a rule, there is nothing in the death of a pirate to cast any discredit on his profession. The murderer upon the scaffold, with a priest on either side, smilingly exhorts the multitude to meet him in heaven. The man who has succeeded in making his home a hell, meets death without a quiver, provided he has never expressed any doubt as to the divinity of Christ, or the eternal "procession" of the Holy Ghost. The king who has waged cruel and useless war, who has filled countries with widows and fatherless children, with the maimed and diseased, and who has succeeded in offering to the Moloch of ambition the best and bravest of his subjects, dies like a saint.

All the believing kings are in heaven—all the doubting philosophers in perdition. All the persecutors sleep in peace, and the ashes of those who burnt their brothers sleep in consecrated ground. Libraries could hardly contain the names of the Christian wretches who have filled the world with violence and death in defense of book and creed, and yet they all die the death of the righteous, and no priest, no minister, describes the agony and fear, the remorse and horror with which their guilty souls were filled in the last moments of their lives. These men have never doubted—they had never thought—they accepted the creed as they did the fashion of their clothes. They were not infidels, they could not be—they had been baptized, they had not denied the divinity of Christ—they had partaken of the "last supper." They respected priests—they admitted that Christ had two natures and the same number of wills; they admitted that the Holy Ghost had "proceeded," and that, according to the multiplication table of heaven, once one is three, and three times one is one, and these things put pillows beneath their heads and covered them with the drapery of peace.

Thus, while kings and priests did nothing worse than to make their fellows wretched, so long as they only butchered and burnt the innocent and helpless, God would maintain the strictest neutrality; but, when some honest man, some great and tender soul, expressed a doubt as to the truth of the Scriptures, or prayed to the wrong God, or to the right one by the wrong name, then the real God leaped like a wounded tiger upon his victim, and from his quivering flesh tore his wretched soul.

There is no recorded instance where the uplifted hand of murder has been paralyzed—no truthful account in all the literature of the world of the innocent child being shielded by God. Thousands of crimes are being committed every day—men are this moment lying in wait for their human prey—wives are whipped and crushed, driven to insanity and death—little children begging for mercy, lifting imploring, tear-filled eyes to the brutal faces of fathers and mothers—sweet girls are deceived, lured, and outraged, but God has no time to prevent these things—no time to defend the good and protect the pure. He is too busy numbering hairs and watching sparrows. He listens for blasphemy; looks for persons who laugh at priests; examines baptismal registers; watches professors in college who begin to doubt the geology of Moses and the astronomy of Joshua. He does not particularly object to stealing, if you won't swear. A great many persons have fallen dead in the act of taking God's name in vain, but millions of men, women, and children have been stolen from their homes and used as beasts of burden but no one engaged in this infamy has ever been touched by the wrathful hand of God.

Now and then a man of genius, of sense, of intellectual honesty, has appeared. Such men have denounced the superstitions of their day. They have pitied the multitude. To see priests devour the substance of the people—priests who made begging one of the learned professions—filled them with loathing and contempt. These men were honest enough to tell their thoughts, brave enough to speak the truth. Then they were denounced, tried, tortured, killed by rack or flame. But some escaped the fury of the fiends who loved their enemies, and died naturally in their beds. It would not do for the Church to admit that they died peacefully. That would show that religion was not essential at the last moment. Superstition gets its power from the terror of death. It would not do to have the common people understand that a man could deny the Bible—refuse to kiss the cross—contend that Humanity was greater than Christ, and then die as sweetly as Torquemada did after pouring molten lead into the ears of an honest man; or as calmly as Calvin after he had burnt Servetus; or as peacefully as King David after advising with his last breath one son to assassinate another.

The Church has taken great pains to show that the last moments of all Infidels (that Christians did not succeed in burning) were infinitely wretched and despairing. It was alleged that words could not paint the horrors that were endured by a dying Infidel. Every good Christian was expected to, and generally did, believe these accounts. They have been told and retold in every pulpit of the world. Protestant ministers have repeated the lies invented by Catholic priests, and Catholics, by a kind of theological comity, have sworn to the lies told by the Protestants. Upon this point they have always stood together, and will as long as the same falsehood can be used by both.

Instead of doing these things, Voltaire willfully closed his eyes to the light of the gospel, examined the Bible for himself, advocated intellectual liberty, struck from the brain the fetters of an arrogant faith, assisted the weak, cried out against the torture of man, appealed to reason, endeavored to establish universal toleration, succored the indigent, and defended the oppressed.

He demonstrated that the origin of all religions is the same, the same mysteries—the same miracles—the same imposture—the same temples and ceremonies—the same kind of founders, apostles and dupes—the same promises and threats—the same pretense of goodness and forgiveness and the practice of the same persecution and murder. He proved that religion made enemies—philosophy friends—and that the rites of Gods were the rights of man.

These were his crimes. Such a man God would not suffer to die in peace. If allowed to meet death with a smile, others might follow his example, until none would be left to light the holy fires of the auto da fe. It would not do for so great, so successful an enemy of the Church, to die without leaving some shriek of fear, some shudder of remorse, some ghastly prayer of chattered horror, uttered by lips covered with blood and foam.

For many centuries the theologians have taught that an unbeliever—an infidel—one who spoke or wrote against their creeds, could not meet death with composure; that in his last moments God would fill his conscience with the serpents of remorse.

For a thousand years the clergy have manufactured the facts to fit this theory—this infamous conception of the duty of man and the justice of God.

The theologians have insisted that crimes against men were, and are, as nothing compared with crimes against God.

Upon the death-bed subject the clergy grow eloquent. When describing the shudderings and shrieks of the dying unbeliever, their eyes glitter with delight.

It is a festival.

They are no longer men. They become hyenas. They dig open graves. They devour the dead.

It is a banquet.

Unsatisfied still, they paint the terrors of Hell. They gaze at the souls of the infidels writhing in the coils of the worm that never dies. They see them in flames—in oceans of fire—in gulfs of pain—in abysses of despair. They shout with joy. They applaud.

It is an auto da fe, presided over by God.

But let us come back to Voltaire—to the dying philosopher. He was an old man of eighty-four. He had been surrounded by comforts, the luxuries of life. He was a man of great wealth, the richest writer that the world had known. Among the literary men of the earth he stood first. He was an intellectual monarch—one who had built his own throne and had woven the purple of his own power. He was a man of genius. The Catholic God had allowed him the appearance of success. His last years were filled with the intoxication of flattery—of almost worship. He stood at the summit of his age.

The priests became anxious. They began to fear that God would forget, in a multiplicity of business, to make a terrible example of Voltaire.

Toward the last of May, 1778, it was whispered in Paris that Voltaire was dying. Upon the fences of expectation gathered the unclean birds of superstition, impatiently waiting for their prey.

"Two days before his death, his nephew went to seek the Curé of Saint Sulpice and the Abbé Guatier, and brought them into his uncle's sick chamber, who, being informed that they were there, 'Ah, well!' said Voltaire, 'give him my compliments and my thanks.' The Abbé spoke some words to him, exhorting him to patience. The Curé of Saint Sulpice then came forward, having announced himself, and asked of Voltaire, elevating his voice, if he acknowledged the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ. The sick man pushed one of his hands against the Curé's coif, shoving him back and cried, turning abruptly to the other side, let me die in peace. The Curé seemingly considered his person soiled and his coif dishonored by the touch of a philosopher. He made the nurse give him a little brushing and went out with the Abbé Guatier."

He expired, says Wagnière, on the 30th of May, 1778, at about a quarter-past eleven at night, with the most perfect tranquillity. A few moments before his last breath he took the hand of Morand, his valet de chambre, who was watching by him, pressed it, and said: "Adieu, my dear Morand, I am gone." These were his last words. Like a peaceful river with green and shaded banks he flowed without a murmur into the waveless sea, where life is rest.

From this death, so simple and serene, so kind, so philosophic and tender, so natural and peaceful; from these words so utterly destitute of cant or dramatic touch, all the frightful pictures, all the despairing utterances, have been drawn and made. From these materials, and from these alone, or rather, in spite of these facts, have been constructed by priests and clergymen and their dupes all the shameless lies about the death of this great and wonderful man. A man, compared with whom all of his calumniators, dead and living, were, and are, but dust and vermin.

Let us be honest. Did all the priests of Rome increase the mental wealth of man as much as Bruno? Did all the priests of France do as great a work for the civilization of the world as Voltaire or Diderot? Did all the ministers of Scotland add as much to the sum of human knowledge as David Hume? Have all the clergymen, monks, friars, ministers, priests, bishops, cardinals and popes, from the day of Pentecost to the last election, done as much for human liberty as Thomas Paine?

What would the world be if infidels had never been?

The infidels have been the brave and thoughtful men; the flower of all the world; the pioneers and heralds of the blessed day of liberty and love; the generous spirits of the unworthy past; the seers and prophets of our race; the great chivalric souls, proud victors on the battlefields of thought, the creditors of all the years to be.

Why should it be taken for granted that the men who devoted their lives to the liberation of their fellow-men should have been hissed at in the hour of death by the snakes of conscience, while men who defended slavery—practiced polygamy—justified the stealing of babes from the breasts of mothers, and lashed the naked back of unpaid labor, are supposed to have passed smilingly from earth to the embraces of the angels? Why should we think that the brave thinkers, the investigators, the honest men, must have left the crumbling shore of time in dread and fear, while the instigators of the massacre of St. Bartholomew; the inventors and users of thumb-screws, of iron boots and racks; the burners and tearers of human flesh; the stealers, the whippers and the enslavers of men; the buyers and beaters of maidens, mothers and babes; the founders of the Inquisition; the makers of chains; the builders of dungeons; the calumniators of the living; the slanderers of the dead, and even the murderers of Jesus Christ, all died in the odor of sanctity, with white, forgiven hands folded upon the breasts of peace, while the destroyers of prejudice, the apostles of humanity, the soldiers of liberty, the breakers of fetters, the creators of light, died surrounded by the fierce fiends of God?

In those days the philosophers—that is to say, the thinkers, were not buried in holy ground. It was feared that their principles might contaminate the ashes of the just. And they also feared that on the morning of the Resurrection they might, in a moment of confusion, slip into heaven. Some were burnt, and their ashes scattered; and the bodies of some were thrown naked to beasts, and others buried in unholy earth.

Voltaire knew the history of Adrienne Le Couvreur, a beautiful actress denied burial.

After all, we do feel an interest in what is to become of our bodies. There is a modesty that belongs to death. Upon this subject Voltaire was infinitely sensitive. It was that he might be buried that he went through the farce of confession, of absolution, and of the last sacrament. The priests knew that he was not in earnest, and Voltaire knew that they would not allow him to be buried in any of the cemeteries of Paris.

His death was kept a secret. The Abbé Mignot made arrangements for the burial at Romilli-on-the-Seine, more than 100 miles from Paris. On Sunday evening, on the last day of May, 1778, the body of Voltaire, clad in a dressing-gown, clothed to resemble an invalid, posed to simulate life, was placed in a carriage; at its side, a servant, whose business it was to keep it in position. To this carriage were attached six horses, so that people might think a great lord was going to his estates. Another carriage followed, in which were a grand nephew and two cousins of Voltaire. All night they traveled, and on the following day arrived at the courtyard of the Abbey. The necessary papers were shown, the mass was performed in the presence of the body, and Voltaire found burial. A few moments afterward, the Prior, who, "for charity had given a little earth," received from his Bishop a menacing letter forbidding the burial of Voltaire. It was too late.

Voltaire was dead. The foundations of State and Throne had been sapped. The people were becoming acquainted with the real kings and with the actual priests. Unknown men born in misery and want, men whose fathers and mothers had been pavement for the rich, were rising toward the light, and their shadowy faces were emerging from darkness. Labor and thought became friends. That is, the gutter and the attic fraternized. The monsters of the Night and the angels of the Dawn—the first thinking of revenge, and the others dreaming of equality, liberty and fraternity.

For four hundred years the Bastille had been the outward symbol of oppression. Within its walls the noblest had perished. It was a perpetual threat. It was the last, and often the first, argument of king and priest. Its dungeons, damp and rayless, its massive towers, its secret cells, its instruments of torture, denied the existence of God.

In 1789, on the 14th of July, the people, the multitude, frenzied by suffering, stormed and captured the Bastille. The battle-cry was "Vive le Voltaire."

In 1791 permission was given to place in the Pantheon the ashes of Voltaire. He had been buried one hundred and ten miles from Paris. Buried by stealth, he was to be removed by a nation. A funeral procession of a hundred miles; every village with its flags and arches in his honor; all the people anxious to honor the philosopher of France—the Savior of Calas—the Destroyer of Superstition.

On reaching Paris the great procession moved along the Rue St. Antoine. Here it paused and for one night upon the ruins of the Bastille rested the body of Voltaire—rested in triumph, in glory—rested on fallen wall and broken arch, on crumbling stone still damp with tears, on rusting chain and bar and useless bolt—above the dungeons dark and deep, where light had faded from the lives of men and hope had died in breaking hearts.

The conqueror resting upon the conquered. Throned upon the Bastille, the fallen fortress of Night, the body of Voltaire, from whose brain had issued the Dawn.

For a moment his ashes must have felt the Promethean fire, and the old smile must have illumined once more the face of death.

The vast multitude bowed in reverence, hushed with love and awe, heard these words uttered by a priest: "God shall be avenged."

The grave of Voltaire was violated. The cry of the priest in 1791, "God shall be avenged," was bearing its fruit. Priests skulking in the shadows with faces sinister as night, ghouls in the name of the Gospel, desecrated the grave. They carried away the ashes of Voltaire.

The tomb is empty. God is avenged.

The world is filled with his fame.

Man has conquered.

What cardinal, what bishop, what priest, raised his voice for the rights of men? What ecclesiastic, what nobleman, took the side of the oppressed—of the peasant? Who denounced the frightful criminal code—the torture of suspected persons? What priest pleaded for the liberty of the citizen? What bishop pitied the victims of the rack? Is there the grave of a priest in France on which a lover of liberty would now drop a flower or a tear? Is there a tomb holding the ashes of a saint from which emerges one ray of light?

If there be another life—a day of judgment, no God can afford to torture in another world the man who abolished torture in this. If God be the keeper of an eternal penitentiary, he should not imprison there the men who broke the chains of slavery here. He cannot afford to make eternal convicts of Franklin, Jefferson, Paine and Voltaire.

A perfect master of the French language, knowing all its moods, tenses and declinations, in fact and in feeling—playing upon it as skillfully as Paganini on his violin, finding expression for every thought and fancy, writing on the most serious subjects with the gayety of a harlequin, plucking jests from the crumbling mouth of death, graceful as the waving of willows, dealing in double meanings that covered the asp with flowers and flattery—master of satire and compliment—mingling them often in the same line—always interested himself, and therefore interesting others—handling thoughts, questions, subjects as a juggler does balls, keeping them in the air with perfect ease—dressing old words in new meanings, charming, grotesque, pathetic, mingling mirth with tears, wit and wisdom, and sometimes wickedness, logic and laughter. With a woman's instinct knowing the sensitiv nerves—just where to touch—hating arrogance of place, the stupidity of the solemn—snatching masks from priest and king, knowing the springs of action and ambition's end—perfectly familiar with the great world—the intimate of kings and their favorites, sympathizing with the oppressed and imprisoned, with the unfortunate and poor, hating tyranny, despising superstition, and loving liberty with all his heart. Such was Voltaire writing "Œdipus" at 17, "Irene" at 83, and crowding between these two tragedies the accomplishment of a thousand lives.

Vive le Voltaire! ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

THE WORLD'S FAIR
CLOSED on SUNDAYS!

ENLIGHTENED AMERICA RULED BY

BEER, BISHOPS, AND BRIBERY.

THE PEOPLE ASK KNOWLEDGE: THEY ARE GIVEN

RUM AND RELIGION.

WHY THE WORLD'S FAIR SHOULD BE OPEN.

When addressing the Congressional committee about the World's Fair, Director-General Davis told them that the Fair ought certainly to be open on Sunday. Colonel Davis declared, for one thing, that the brewers and distillers would be willing to pay a large bonus to hav the Fair gates closed on Sunday, in anticipation of a heavy trade at the liquor saloons throughout the city.

During the debate over the World's Fair appropriation a few weeks ago, the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER wrote to Amos J. Cummings, M. C., who was opposing the gift, urging him to work for Sunday opening in connection with the appropriation. He replied:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVS U. S.
WASHINGTON, D. C., Aug. 8, 1892.

DEAR SIR: Certainly, the Fair ought to be open on Sundays, whether the government makes any appropriation or not. That is the one day in the week in which workingmen and their wives and children can visit the Fair without losing time. I did everything I could to hav Congress allow the Fair to be open on Sunday, but was beaten by more than two to one. At all events the decision should hav been left to those in charge of the Fair.

Sunday closing has undoubtedly robbed the Fair of $3,000,000 receipts, and for whose benefit? Men who ought to know say for the benefit of the liquor saloons and theaters, which are always open on Sunday in Chicago. Yours truly, AMOS J. CUMMINGS.

MR. E. M. MACDONALD, N. Y.

There has been a very persistent effort to ridicule the idea that saloon-keepers and their like, and worse, in Chicago, would be friendly to the closing of the Exposition on Sunday, since it would force the crowds of idle strangers into their doors—either front or rear. But such ridicule is very ill timed in view of facts that are abundantly well known as to the use that people shut out from the Exposition made of their Sunday afternoons in Philadelphia.—Bishop Potter of New York.

The brewers and saloon men are delighted at the action of Congress in requiring the Exposition to be closed on Sunday, and if necessary they would raise a big amount of cash to have that pernicious piece of legislation enacted. They know that the hordes of people, if debarred from the inspection of exhibits, would seek solace and amusement in the bar-rooms—which will not be closed on Sundays—and augment the revenues of the proprietors by many thousands of dollars. The sporting fraternity, also, advocates the proposition from the same spirit of self-interest that actuates whisky men.—Washington Post.

OPINIONS UPON THE SUBJECT.

Of course the Fair is the enemy of the church, and the church ought to have it closed every day as well as on Sunday.

People looking at the Apollo Belvedere will be in danger of forgetting Abraham and Joshua. Those who look at the Venus de Milo will cease for a moment to be a part of hell. Beautiful landscapes will woo the mind from the day of judgment and the contribution-box.

One look at a landscape by Corot will make the average Chicago church-member forget the last sermon he heard. Besides, after looking at the wonderful machinery on the ground, the poor workman who toils all the week will be in danger of putting inventors above parsons, and may think a good manufactory will help a town more than a poor pulpit.

By all means let the Fair be closed on Sunday so that faith and superstition can flourish. Give the world over to creeds and in a few years there will be no Fairs because there will be nothing to show.

That is the gospel according to the Shepard. As a matter of fact, Congress, in its cowardice, deliberately violated the Constitution in order to curry favor with these hidebound bigots. The members of Congress who voted for the Sunday-closing provision did so in open violation of the Constitution and against the best interests of the masses.

Why, it is a notorious fact that more than half the signatures to the petitions were literally forged. Every man, woman, and child whose name had ever appeared on the church rolls were made to appear as signers. Thousands and thousands of them were dead, and most of those who are still living are wishing they were dead.

If the doctrine of these people is correct, people having pictures in their houses should cover them up on Sunday. The women should put their old clothes on statues. Musical instruments should be made dumb.

According to their belief God is a constant violator of the Sabbath, for on Sunday the sun will shine, the grass will grow, the brooks will sing, the birds will warble, the flowers will burst into blossom. Surely that shows that God is not a Christian or he would have stopped all this activity of nature on the Sabbath.

He would have covered the sun with a tarpaulin and cut the clouds square on that day. I want to know what the Sunday-closing people have to offer as a substitute for the beautiful creations of art, of science, and of genius, which may be seen by the working-people at the World's Fair on Sunday.

Do the priests and parsons offer any better attractions? Will the churches contain any such exhibits of the marvelous creations of man, and of the tangible evidences of the world's onward march from barbarism to the highest degree of intelligence and brotherhood of man? I fail to hear a reply.

Colonel Shepard denies the right of the workingman and his wife and children to visit the Fair on Sunday and spend the day in learning the noblest object-lessons in the world.—Colonel Ingersoll.

It is proposed by some of the people in Chicago who are interested in the World's Fair to go to the courts and secure a perpetual right to keep the Fair open on Sundays. This is a proper procedure—one which will put an end, we hope, to the annoying controversy. Of course the Fair should be kept open on Sunday. And it will be.—New York Morning Advertiser.

Now that Congress has passed the bill appropriating a large sum of money to the Columbian Exposition on condition that the gates be closed on Sunday, we have admitted into our national government the principle of legislation in religious matters, and the principle of religious freedom is set back more than four hundred years. We need not now be surprised at anything in this line.—Sabbath Recorder (Seventh Day Baptist).

Some of the Catholic journals condemn the proposed closing. The Catholic Mirror says: "To close the art and non-mechanical departments on Sunday, which is the only day on which so many thousands will have an opportunity to visit them, would be an injustice and shame. Sabbatarian bigotry, however, is as blind as bigotry in the other forms. Surprising is it that those who are thus acting with the idea of keeping the Sabbath holy, do not see that the course they insist upon will be the very one to embitter thousands against Christianity and religion. Deprived of their rights in this way, they will see in the system which forces this wrong upon them, something odious and intolerable. Sunday closing, as we have already pointed out, will do infinite moral harm to many visitors to Chicago; for, not being permitted to go to the Fair, they will visit worse places. The saloons and evil resorts will be crowded with persons in search of amusement, and in the low dives of the city a saturnalia of wickedness will reign. The blunder on the part of Congress is to be regretted, and all the more since it was not made from the impulse of principle. The members simply had not the courage to resist the pressure of the fanatical element which urged the Sunday closing, and in yielding must have done so with a secret feeling of shame for their own want of moral fortitude."

The moralist has food for thought in the amendment to the World's Fair bill offered by Senator Quay, closing the Fair on Sundays. The whole world has asked and is asking that the Fair be open on Sundays. Organized labor everywhere in concert has adopted resolutions urging it; everywhere it is signing petitions asking it. The labor world is made up of those who are confined at their task from early morning till late at night. They have no opportunity to visit a picture gallery, to use a reading-room, except Sunday, when such use becomes to them the truest rest, the greatest help. Their earnings at the best are not so great as to permit large savings. Those of them who shall be able to amass sufficient means to see the Fair, can not make the sight a long one; they must crowd into a few days what the more fortunate may give weeks to. To deprive those people of an opportunity to see this vast museum, this great gallery and educational institution on Sunday; to shut them up to the city of Chicago to crowd its hot streets and to find diversion in hot theaters and saloons—with the hundreds of acres of the world's wonder in Jackson park walled in, and they walled out, a sin and wickedness for them to look at and enjoy on that day—is a refinement of cruelty, a sublimity of idiocy, a lunacy of judgment, morals run mad. . . . The fundamental law of this land prohibits, and rightly prohibits, the establishment of any religion, as well that which keeps Friday as a holy day as that which keeps Saturday or Sunday. So it is difficult to see upon what this proposition is based, or why it is sound. The World's Fair stands upon precisely the same ground that the reading-room of a public library stands, or a public art gallery. All over the land bigotry has been finally driven from its guard of the doors of these places, and they are now open and recognized as giving to the cause of good morals and right living a valuable adjunct to the labor of the church in this behalf. We protest against the Senate's action in the name of the toiling millions of this land, in the name of justice, enlightenment, and progress, and urge all who oppose it to continue their protest. It is a protest for liberty.—Indianapolis News.

Now that the government of the United States has invaded the domain of religious controversy it will dominate it; inasmuch as it has assumed jurisdiction to settle religious questions by act of Congress and by Supreme Court decision it will surely never yield that jurisdiction. When Constantine had made Rome "Christian" it was only natural that he should seek an authoritative definition of Christianity; and when the council of Nicea had given that definition in the shape of the creed which it adopted, nothing was more natural than that the emperor should require his subjects to subscribe to it. The government of the United States has entered upon the same evil course. The Supreme Court has declared the nation to be Christian. Congress has already taken sides in a religious controversy, and to be consistent must not the government use all the power at its command to enforce that decision and to uphold the Sunday-Sabbath cause which it has espoused? A United States Senator has well said: "The domain which government invades it dominates; the jurisdiction it takes it keeps." This is true whatever the domain or the jurisdiction; and it always has been true.—The American Sentinel (Seventh Day Adventist).

Congress has no business to dictate how the citizens of Chicago or the inhabitants of Illinois or the people of any other state shall spend their Sunday. Whether the Columbian Exposition shall be kept open or closed on that day is no concern of the Senate or House at Washington. The Exposition was not got up by the nation and will not be controled by the nation. Its organization and control are local. Its conduct should be left to local hands. Whether it shall be closed one day in seven is for its directors to say.—New York Herald.

There would be the greatest injustice in closing the Fair on Sunday, because there are many thousands who can visit it on no other day and whose right to visit it is just as good as that of anybody else. The principle of right under a free government is that no man's conscience shall give law to any other man. Strait-laced philanthropists, cranks, professional canters, and dullards, as well as pious rich people, who have no need for recreation on Sunday, because they have all days in the week for it, have managed to convince themselves that the advocates of a reasonable Sunday are going to keep open the gates of the Exposition unnecessarily and force the poor people against their will into the inclosure. This country is not occupied by poor people who can be forced into anything by way of supposed pleasure. They will go to the Exposition Sundays if they desire to do so and if the Exposition be open on Sundays. If it be open and they do not want to go nobody is going to compel them. But if they want to go the gates should be open, and it ought to be considered whether they ought not to be open free.—Minneapolis Times.

The Sabbatarians have made a great noise over the length of their petitions to close the World's Fair on Sundays, and their method of counting signatures, at least in Ohio and Michigan, has been referred to by us. Others are now sharing the opinion expressed that these Sabbatarians are a not particularly honest lot. On the same subject the Jackson, Mich., Industrial News says: "Long petitions for closing the World's Fair on Sundays have lately been showered upon Col. John T. Dickinson, secretary of the national commission. It begins to look as though people who are clamoring to have the gates closed on Sunday are stuffing the ballot-boxes. It is considered somewhat peculiar that a number of petitions from several states exceed the total population as shown by the census of 1890. The states in which the petitions seem to have been padded out of all reason are Ohio and Michigan. The tally-sheets in Secretary Dickinson's office show that 4,053,425 citizens of Ohio have signed petitions. The census of 1890 gives Ohio a population of 3,672,316. On the face of the returns it therefore appears that if every man, woman, and child in that state had signed the Sunday-closing petitions, the list would have been swelled nearly four hundred thousand votes. The returns from Michigan are even worse than those from Ohio. Mr. Porter's census-takers found 2,093,889 people in that state, yet the petitions contain 4,050,518 names. This is a sad commentary upon closing the Fair on account of morality when Christian people will resort to such measures."

The following, from the Evening Sun, applies as pertinently to the World's Fair as to the Museum of Art, concerning which it was written: "The man excluded from the museum is pushed along the path to the gin-mill. The story is older than English-speaking New York. King James I. of England found that the new Puritan meddling with the old Sunday games was sending his subjects to the alehouse. To-day, as for three centuries, Scotland, the home of the Puritan Sabbath, has been the drunkenest country in Europe on that day. Society has not the moral right to interdict both work and play. That measure is the devil's own device, and one that he has hardly bettered in the whole range of his ingenuity. It is said that the Museum has lost at least one bequest through being open on Sunday. Better that it never receive another bequest than that the thousands who now find sweetness and light within its walls be turned aside into the courses that make for bitterness and gloom. More than the single exhibition is put in issue; a principle is at stake. If the funds be insufficient, as alleged, to keep the Museum of Art open seven days in the week, far better that it should be closed on Monday or Friday or any other day than the one which society has assigned for its highest usefulness by prohibiting labor and providing leisure. . . . Those who do not care to use the museums on Sundays are willing to close them in the faces of those who need and can use them only on that day. It is the old story over again and ever new, of the bear-pit closed, not because it gave pain to the bear, but because it gave pleasure to the spectators. A landowner once cut down a tree that overshadowed the highway because wayfarers were wont to repose themselves in its shade. He would have been one to close art museums on Sundays out of the identical motive, though he would have found another plea, and would have suffered it to impose on himself. . . . As a measure of moral evil, backed by the spirit that now unites the Union League Club and the Philadelphia Gang for a common end, it recalls that other combination pilloried to fame as the coalition of the Puritan and the Blackleg. . . . If the museum is to be closed on one of the free days, it will not be on the people's own day. It must be on one of the week's secular free days."—New York Evening Sun.

The New York Board of Women Managers of the Exposition have voted 12 to 1 that it be open Sundays.

Poor Jonah took his flight,
Said he: "Lads, like this miracle,
I'm simply out of sight!"

WHAT DAN SAID.

Said Daniel from the royal cage:
"It's lying down I am;
But see, the animals don't rage,
They know that I'm no lamb!"

SHADRACH, ALLEGED.

When Shadrach and the other two
Were from the furnace raked,
Quoth Shad.: "From this proud moment who Shall say we're but half baked?"

AND MOSES, TOO.

And Moses, during Egypt's pest,
Once sprung, we're told with glee,
This most unkind and wicked jest:
"There are no flies on me!"

Little Blasphemies.

Jinks: "What's the reason your minister failed to answer his new call?"
Filkins: "I believe it lacked the true metallic ring."

Mrs. Horton: "All sorts of people are allowed to enter heaven. How annoying."
Mrs. Goodun: "True; but I am afraid you will find it very exclusiv."

Mrs. Kingley: "I see your church is going to send away your minister for three months. Isn't that a long time?"
Mrs. Bingo: "Yes. But we need the rest."

From Under the Church Shadows.

Oct. 15, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I am in possession of one of your pamphlets, and find it full to overflowing with grand truths and philosophical conclusions, and as I am living almost under the shadows of the spires of three churches, and believe and contend that religion is wholly a matter of education, I consider the pamphlet an intellectual feast. I very much regret that I am not able to send for several of your publications, so I might be better prepared to defend my convictions as often as I hav to do it. A READER.

Would Burn This Paper and Its Editor.

MELVIN VILLAGE, N. H., Oct. 16, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I am very much pleased with your paper, and I hav been trying to get subscribers for it, but hav not met with any success. We are having a howling revival here at present. Everybody here is being converted, and the churches are reaping a rich harvest. Some who hav seen THE TRUTH SEEKER say that it ought to be burnt and the editor with it, and the majority of the people here are of the same mind, so you see it is hard work to enlighten them, as they will not see the light, but will believe all that the ministers tell them.

Wishing you every success, I remain,

Yours truly, MRS. MARY A. HORNE.

A Drop in the Good Bucket.

RIDGWAY, N. Y., Nov. 7, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find the small contribution of fifty cents for printing leaflets and picture "Beer, Bishops, and Bribery," for which please send me some for distribution when printed. I make some sacrifice to spare even this small sum, and deprive myself of the good things the money would bring in the way of Freethought literature you hav to sell that I wish to read. I hope others who can spare more than I hav, or even less, will be moved to do what they can to scatter the leaflets broadcast. I hope to be able to contribute something more later on.

Yours for freedom and truth,

GEO. L. PRATT.

P.S.—I send same amount by same mail to the Freethought Federation.

They Must Perish for Lack of Knowledge.

OTTAWA, KAN., Sept. 14, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In vain hav I tried to get just one subscriber. They are joined to their idols and do not seem to know a good thing when they see it, and must perish for lack of knowledge which THE TRUTH SEEKER would giv. But my skirts are clear. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER so long that I should be very lonesome without it, and must take it on and on, forever perhaps.

The Liberal meeting is going on at Ottawa, but I hav been prevented from attending on account of the weather and sickness in my family. I hav heard there was some disturbance, the brethren probably not liking such performances.

Our Family Is Smart—Let It Be Good.

ANTRIM, N. H., Oct. 19, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I do not want to hav the friends of Freethought get jealous of one another and go to quarreling over everything that one of the brothers or sisters says, for we are a great family of really good folks and I doubt mightily that there is another family that has got as many smart boys and girls in it on this globe as we hav in ours. And many times when I am reading our paper I think how our thoughts are alike. And I hope that some time I shall be able to meet all of my brothers and sisters. For I know there will be no asses amongst them, such as I see get to telling sometimes in our papers about their souls. Oh, it makes me sick to read the twaddle!

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $8 for one year's subscription for myself and for two new subscribers. For balance send me "The Age of Reason."

Here is not a fat place for black-coats, but anyhow we hav three churches—one Methodist, one Free Methodist, and one Catholic—where the old superstition is dealt out to hungry souls. We also hav three saloons where those who are thirsty can get what they wish for their body.

I like Watson Heston's drawings in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I should like if he would draw out on one plate the old Jehovah; Jesus, Joseph's son, with brothers and disciples, and some of that time's aristocratic Jews. I should like to hav it framed, too.

Yours for freedom, MARTIN GRAN.

From a Russian Friend.

MINNESOTA LAKE, MINN., Oct. 8, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed a check of $5, to pay for my paper, and two Picture Books, as I want them to show my Christian friends what work we are doing and make them try to think for themselvs, as books contain more than I can write.

A few weeks ago I had the pleasure to hear in Mapleton Mr. Putnam, when I bought a Bible Picture Book. Well, I hope to see him again and hear his logic. All that we want is an army of men to blow the trumpet of progress and truth. I tell you, friend, the people are getting more Liberal. The churches are falling rapidly; it does not take a very heavy push to make them go.

I hope to see the time when we will be able to lift our head in politics, and here is one sure vote for R. G. Ingersoll!

Yours for liberty, E. S. GLICK.

An Activ Campaigner.

AUBURN, CAL., Oct. 19, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 8th, on page 649, appears an item from a Denver paper saying a man was killed by lightning for saying there was no God. This is all a lie. No such thing ever occurred. It was a lie got up by hypocrits and sky-pilots. I saw the same in another paper, and made it my business to investigate the matter, and found it all a dirty lie.

We are still keeping up the war on superstition. THE TRUTH SEEKER, with books and tracts, are passed around and sent by mail. We hav sent copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER to Pennsylvania, Minnesota, Michigan, and to remote parts of California, and where men are not able to subscribe for it I furnish them with an occasional copy. We hav worked hard to get a new subscriber, but it is hard to do.

Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER and Heston.

The Latest Christian Lie.

DE RUYTER, N. Y., Oct. 29, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I chanced to attend church the other Sunday and heard the latest slander on the noble Ingersoll. The elder was telling how all the scientists, and Infidels even, were coming to acknowledge the existence of a supreme being, and said that even the great skeptic Bob Ingersoll had prayed to almighty God. He went on to relate that at the recent funeral of a little nephew Ingersoll called on God to heal the wounds he had made. None but the immediate family were present, but so unexpected a thing reached the outside world, and to a reporter who sought the colonel and asked why such a prayer, the great Infidel placed a hand to his face and in a tragic whisper said, "Notoriety!" What a big, yet what a weak and silly, lie! Please drop me a line about it.

Keep the good cause moving! I would that I could contribute, but am badly in debt. Yours, W. W. AMES.

[Indeed a big and silly lie.—ED. T. S.]

A Freethinker's Serene Old Age.

BRAYTON, N. Y., Oct. 9, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: You will herein find $3 to renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year more. Perhaps this will be the last, as my years now number seventy-eight almost, and my eyes are getting dim; but the cause that I hav kept from my youth up is gaining. and growing better and plainer as time flits away—which will soon leave only a name behind to tell our career through this mundane sphere. But I feel prepared to go when called for by the great god of Nature. I hav made my will, and got up my headstones, and on them is my epitaph in these words of my own composition:

This silent dust forever must
To mother earth be wed,
The most sublime through endless time
Remain in ashes dead.

To those who stay I here would say:
Giv little heed to bliss
In worlds of night "far out of sight,"
But make the best of this.

ASA W. BRAYTON.

The Tranquillity of Philosophers.

YPSILANTI, MICH., Nov. 6, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Last week we buried Farmer Green, who has been a constant reader of your paper ever since I hav taken it. He was an Atheist in good and regular standing, having quite a Freethought library, which was thoroughly read. He was able to tell why he was an Atheist. We hav been in the habit of exchanging books. His experience and mine through life having been very similar, there grew up a strong attachment between us. After he was aware that he was dying he sent for me. I hurried to his bedside. He smiled; reached out his hand to mine, which he held for some time; said he wanted to go, as it was all right. His son-in-law told me he had been perfectly astonished at his calmness at the thought of death. He had never manifested the least anxiety or fear at its approach; was ready to meet it, even anxious to do so, although he believed that when he died he died entirely. He formerly had been a church-member as well as myself. He was a temperate, moral man; a kind husband; an indulgent father, and an honest, industrious man. So we go, one after another. So be it. It's all right. J. P. DICKINSON.

Barbarous Powwows.

SPRINGWATER, N. Y., Oct. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to thank you for your efforts in behalf of liberty, particularly in the agitation against Sunday closing of the World's Fair. I wrote a letter of protest to the World. I would like to be enrolled as a member of the Freethought Federation of America. In sentiment and heart I am a Liberal; reverses hav forbidden contribution to the propaganda fund.

I know all the persecutions attending one who dares to be a Freethinker and fearlessly giv utterance to the truth in an orthodox community. I chanced to fall into a meeting of the Epworth League. Bless me, I was carried back thirty years to backwoods schoolhouse meetings! I was astonished to learn that the religious drivel of bygone years still had place. One after another would rise and mumble the old, old cant of "I feel the Lord has blessed my soul," etc. Poor fools, or I should say, deluded mortals! I attended service twice and listened to a hell-fire, God-and-devil sermon—how the "brazen serpent was lifted up in the wilderness," etc. Why, the Methodist church in this village is fifty years behind the age. Everybody so far met is under the ban of orthodoxy. The dominie could not speak well of George Eliot "because she separated from a former husband by divorce." He did admit her brilliancy of intellect.

GRACE L. PARKHURST.

The Brooklyn Ninny.

NEW YORK, Oct. 5, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the report that the mountebank Talmage returned from his trip to Europe last week, and preached his first sermon at the church in Brooklyn. In his discourse he said: "In all questions between the scientific explorer and the inspired writer, the skeptics giv the preference to the geologist. These men—these spiders I will say—suck poison out of the sweetest flowers, and if they can find some bad trait of character in a man of God, these carrion crows caw and flap their wings over the carcass. They cannot understand how the whale swallowed Jonah or the dumb ass spake. They themselvs prove the thing possible by their own utterance." He also said: "There are enormous Presbyterians, or fierce Baptists, or violent Methodists—they cut the Bible to suit their creed. What do they care about the religion of Jesus Christ? I hav more admiration for a man who goes forth with his fists to get the championship than I hav for these theological pugilists who make our theological magazines ring with their warcry."

One will think Brother Talmage has run foul of a snag since he has been absent. He appears to hav no faith in anybody but himself, the poor, self-conceited mountebank. He should be indicted for slander. He never will be any better until he reads "The Age of Reason" carefully. It is as much an inspired book as the Bible—if not more so, for it has truth and common sense to back it.

S. R. THORNE.

Summary of the Economic Situation.

CALISTOGA, CAL., Oct. 7, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose a money order to renew my subscription and for the new Bible Picture Book. Times are so hard I am sorry I cannot do more for the cause. I believe the Freethought Federation is a move in the right direction, as we will never be respected until we show our power at the ballot-box. We may send petition after petition, only to be dumped in the waste-baskets of our misrepresentativs. We hav too long allowed ourselvs to be led by the nose and voted like a lot of sheep for the two old parties. We hav sent a lot of scheming politicians, corporation lawyers, bankers, and millionaires to Congress and our legislatures until they hav well-nigh fastened the chains of perpetual slavery upon us. Our lands hav been stolen from us by corporations and foreign potentates; our finances are controled by shylocks and bankers; our commerce is controled by heartless monopolies and merciless syndicates, and our people are being fast reduced to a state of slavery and serfdom but little above that of the paupers of Europe. The ballot-box is our only remedy, and if the people will rise in their own interest they can sweep their oppressors from our land, and unless they do so soon it will be too late. I remain,

Yours for liberty and reform,

R. F. GRIGSBY.

Liberals Go To Church Because There Is No Other Place To Go To Sundays.

BONNEY, MICH., Nov. 3, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I hav not troubled you in some time, so will giv you a little news from this place.

There is a Baptist church here with sixty five members, and of that number there are only sixteen males and two of those are objects of charity. But still they raise a salary of $300 and a donation yearly for a sky-pilot. So you may well imagin that a good share of the church expense is kept up by non-members.

There is enough of a Liberal element here to keep up a good strong organization if one could only be started. Mr. J. T. Townley, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 22d, states the difficulties very clearly of such organizations, especially in rural districts such as this. A good many Freethinkers go to church and take their families because there is no other place to go on Sundays.

I am the only one here at present who takes a Liberal paper. I hav been advised not to talk my views on religious matters for fear it would hurt my business. But I told the party that gave me the kind advice that if any of my Christian customers did not want to trade with me on account of my belief, or rather my unbelief, I could not help it, for I am not going to giv up principle for policy. So when they tread on my toes they hear from me.

Inclosed please find an order for a few of your publications and money for same.

I hav to-day sent my name to Mr. Charlesworth as a member of the Federation, and hope Liberals will unite to defeat further religious legislation.

Yours for liberty,

H. W. GILLETT.

"Most Liberals Feel Good."

STODDARD, NEB., Oct. 10, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Believing that our cause is the cause of enlightenment, and therefore the cause of humanity, I write to tell you that we hav just been treated to two lectures from Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, of Kansas City, and feel better, stronger, and prouder. Most Liberals feel good, but they feel better after an intellectual feast; they feel stronger after finding out how many in a priest-ridden town really lean to the side of Liberalism after all; and they feel prouder since listening to Mrs. Krekel, remembering that their mothers were women.

Mrs. Krekel spoke on "The Evolution of Morals," and showed conclusivly that the path of progress had been by way of Secularism and not by way of the church. She is a fine reasoner, expressing herself in a clear-cut, unmistakable manner, yet glowing often into fervent eloquence when depicting the wrongs that hav blocked and are still blocking the way of human progress. The people here are just now much absorbed in politics. The money question is to them one of deep interest, and they hav about seen through that humbug the tariff. But, all things considered, Mrs. Krekel's coming among them was a success, and we hope to hav her here again before very long. She has just finished an extended trip on the Pacific coast, going up into British Columbia even to talk to the miners; and she goes from here to South Dakota, where she has been asked to speak on many different subjects, all bearing on Liberalism.

Most sincerely yours, EMILY BURTON.

Catholics.

NEWARK, N. J., Oct. 24, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Kindly compare the truth and a published lie. History brands this banner a lie:

After them came five thousand boys out of the various parochial schools, all well drilled and all uniformed diversely from the coats of the Manhattan College mounted aides to the Zouave dress of St. Peter's drum corps. Emblems were plenty among the Catholic schoolboys, and not the least striking was that of the cross in which the Catholic protectory lads marched around a banner inscribed:

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH,
THE DEFENDER OF THE FAMILY
AND CIVILIZER OF NATIONS.

The inclosed truth, the Jesuits' oath, should be published, as it might open the eyes of blindly led Catholics and ignorant Protestants. Let this Catholic church get power, then good-bye TRUTH SEEKER.

Publish the truth if the heavens fall.

Very respectfully, A FREETHINKER.

THE JESUITS' OATH.

I, ——, now, in the presence of Almighty God, the Blessed Virgin Mary, the Blessed Michael the Archangel, the Blessed John the Baptist, the Holy Apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, and the saints and sacred hosts of heaven, and to you, my Ghostly Father, do declare from my heart, without mental reservation, that the Pope is Christ's Vicar-General, and is the true and only head of the Universal Church throughout the earth, and that, by virtue of the keys and binding and loosing, given to his Holiness by Jesus Christ, he has the power to depose heretical Kings, Princes, States, Commonwealths, and Governments, all being illegal without his sacred confirmation, and that they may be safely destroyed.

Therefore, to the utmost of my power, I will defend this doctrin and his Holiness's rights and customs against all usurpers of heretical or Protestant authority whatsoever, especially against the now-pretended authority and church in England and all its adherents, and opposing the sacred mother church of Rome.

I do renounce and disown my allegiance as due to any heretical King, Prince, or any State named Protestant, or to any of their inferior magistrates or affairs. I do further declare the doctrin of the Church of England, of the Calvinists, Huguenots, and other Protestants to be damnable, and those to be damned who will not forsake the same.

I do further declare that I will help, assist, and advise all or any of his Holiness's agents in any place wherever I be, and do the utmost to extirpate the heretical Protestant doctrin, and to destroy all their pretended power, legal or otherwise.

I do further promis and declare, notwithstanding that I am dispensed with, to assume my religion heretical for the propagation of the mother church's interest; to keep secret and private all her agents' counsel, as they intrust me, and not to divulge, directly or indirectly, but execute all which shall be proposed, given in charge, or discovered unto me by you, my Ghostly Father, or by any of this convent.

In testimony whereof I take this most holy and blessed sacrament of the Eucharist, and witness the same further with my hand and seal in the face of this holy convent.

Hav Inquisition Instruments at the Fair.

LAMPASAS, TEX., Oct. 10, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Send the Picture Book for the other $1. Allow me to say a few words to the friends in the "Letters of Friends" columns. In regard to THE TRUTH SEEKER itself I will say that it suits me to a T as it goes. I find no fault with it, for I see no whipping the devil around the stump in it, and there is no whipping the devil around the stump in myself. I always strike square for the head of the nail and hit hard. I would like, though, for the friends to be a little more amicable and allow one another to state their honest thoughts in a friendly, dispassionate way, leaving out all harsh and cutting words. I would never like to see the church point her bloody finger at us and sneer, "See how beautiful it is when brethren dwell together in unity." We know the church is very quick at pointing out the splinter in others' eyes, but the beam in her own never worries her.

It appears to me that the Liberals of the United States hav too many irons in the fire—more than we can attend to. I am glad that the discussion in regard to starting a secret society has died out, and this removes one evil. It appears to me that the World's Fair ought to engage our whole and undivided attention until finally settled. Let us try and remove the stain upon our country that our Congress has placed upon it, in making this Fair a narrow-minded Christian affair instead of the grand Fair that it was intended to be—a Fair that would allow all religions to stand on an equal footing before the world. Congress, by giving preference to a Christian religion, has dragged our country in the mud of the religious slough of strife and hatred, and the people of other races and religions can no more look to this country as an impartial government in regard to religious matters.

Then, what are we, as Liberals, going to exhibit? In the first place, I think, as some others hav said, that a collection of the tools that Christian love invented, when the world's inventors had yet to be born, would make a good showing. Could we not hire that collection of somebody's in England for the occasion? It would be an eye-opener before which even the brazen church would stand ashamed. Hav this collection in a room by itself; the room itself ornamented with such pictures as Giordano Bruno at the stake; Galileo on his knees; Torquemada condemning Jews and heretics to the stake, by Kaulbach (said picture by itself caused a mighty rumpus at its exhibition in Germany years ago). Then in comparison let us exhibit a few scientific inventions—a phonograph, for instance. Seeing the inventions of the Dark Ages, and comparing them with the modern improvements and the progress of the world at present compared to the stagnation of medieval times, ought surely to raise a light in everybody that is capable of seeing. For seeing will convert where all argument would fail. To such an exhibition, or something similar, I would gladly giv $10, about as much as I can raise in my present condition and position. Will not somebody break the ice in this direction?

Allow me to ask, Would it not be better to assist the Secular Union rather than start a new organization with the same end in view?

My best respects to all the friends.

What Clergyman Will Answer?

WICHITA, KAN., Oct. 22, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I chanced to get a copy of your paper, and it recalls olden times. When D. M. Bennett started to publish it I was one of his subscribers. But it has been many years since I saw a copy. I hav been in the Rockies for twelve years, and a part of that time at the altitude of eternal snow. My nerves gave way, and I was forced to seek a lower level, hence I came to Wichita, where drunkenness, theology, and Prohibition reign supreme. We hav been having a series of theological meetings here, and being a stranger, I hav attended them. The clergy preach hell in its hottest form, and try thereby to frighten men and women from their evil ways, but it does not work even here among the ignorant. No, hell has lost its terror. During my attendance to these meetings I hav had some opportunities to converse with the clergy and apply such questions as these: Did you ever observe that all so-called Infidels are temperate men? Did it ever strike you that the Infidel, if good, is of necessity the best man in the world, because he is good for the sake of right alone, without fear of punishment or hope of reward? Don't you think it very fortunate that Mother Eve ate the apple and thus brought death into the world and prevented an overpopulation? Do you realize that mankind would hav covered the earth to the depth of forty-five miles had she not made this transgression? Are you aware of the fact that you hav no good man or woman in your churches except those who were good before they joined? Did anybody ever tell you that Thomas Paine and Jesus Christ were identical, except Christ was put to death, while Paine only suffered persecution and was allowed to die a natural death, each being a reformer and creating great revolutions in matters of religion? Are you religious because your parents were? Why don't you believe the world is square because your forefathers did? Does age prove the truth of an assertion? Do you believe in witchcraft? Your parents did. In your prayer do you hope to influence an unchangeable God? Do you truly believe that a God of infinit love will punish his creatures for expressing their true convictions? Can you explain why a just man should suffer eternal damnation? Do you know that a man must believe according to evidence, apparent or real? Do you believe that God has caused me to propound these questions that he may hav the pleasure of damning me for it?

But they hav not given answers that were satisfactory. Hence I send them to you, being confident that you are a philosophic man, and perhaps can help me out on them.

In conclusion, I will say that just as soon as I become permanently located I will send in my subscription for your paper.

I remain, Truly thine, C. JONES.

Freethought Agitation at Gillespieville, O.

GILLESPIEVILLE, O., Nov. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: At the G. A. R. Hall on the 24th and 25th of October, 1892, the citizens of Gillespieville and vicinity had the honor of being present at the Freethought lectures delivered by John R. Charlesworth, secretary of the Freethought Federation of America.

Mr. Charlesworth's discourses were: First, "The Depressiv Influence of the Bible on Morality;" second, "Life, Death, and Immortality." Many were unable to procure seats, there being present between two and three hundred people.

Mr. Charlesworth is a fluent, eloquent speaker; and for two hours, amid laughter and applause, held the undivided attention of his audience. When closing he invited criticisms on the topics discussed. Mr. David Clymer, a prominent Christian, of Vigo, O., immediately accepted the challenge. To use Mr. Clymer's own slang expression, he "came to size up" the man, born in England, educated in London, a citizen of New York city, and an experienced orator. We had previously given Mr. Clymer credit for having more mother-wit than to compromise himself in such a deplorable manner; but verily there is no accounting for the lengths self-conceit will take one.

Dr. Evans, a Liberal, of Richmondale, O., was highly amused by acting as second to Mr. Clymer, administering the smelling-salts when our Hercules ignominiously downed his antagonist, which occurred the first round. After considerable rubbing and encouragement, Dr. Evans succeeded in getting his man on his feet again, but he returned not so valiantly as at the first onset. Another engagement ensued, in which Mr. Clymer's helmet was thrown down, his visor displaced, his shield utterly crushed. But his spirit was indomitable. He returned, wounded and bleeding, to the third attack; but the audience entered a protest, that Mr. Charlesworth should not annihilate his antagonist then and there.

The second night, when closing, Mr. Charlesworth again invited criticism. Where was Mr. Clymer? The echoes answered, Where? It was at last whispered around the room that a burnt child dreads the fire. Mr. Clymer had learned something by experience the evening before, and had wisely remained at home.

We hav for the last fortnight been enjoying a few free exhibitions given by our Christian friends. A Quaker sister, one of the Lord's chosen, arose in God's sanctuary last Sabbath and maligned us in a most unseemly manner. Now, if we were a Christian we would retaliate, but being a Liberal, the fluid that flows in our veins is not vitriol, but warm human blood. We hav only the deepest pity for our deluded sister who is still bowing down to idols in true heathen fashion, still groping in the black darkness of ignorance and superstition, surrounded by a halo of false modesty and questionable respectability.

Others of the sweet sisters, whose private lives will not bear too close scrutiny, hav expressed themselvs properly shocked by our stepping out of the ranks of conservatism and taking a stand for truth and progression. They hav no reason to be either shocked or surprised. We never belonged in their ranks. We were never one of the Lord's chosen. We are not longing for the respectability they value above sense and reason.

Now, ere we close, a word to you, my TRUTH SEEKER friends, who hav so loyally supported our cause and assisted so cheerfully in our life-work. Permit us to say with our pen what we failed to say with our lips on the occasion of our meeting. Thank you for the honor of your presence, men, women, children, all. We were delighted to see the young so well represented in our ranks. It shows a spirit of progression. Let the rising generation adopt our principles. Then adieu to the world-renowned dogmas of superstition.

Especially are we proud of our Freethought ladies who hav shown their Christian sisters they were not cowards and cringing slaves enfolded in a cloak of superstition and holy hypocrisy, fearing the light of truth and reason to illumin their pathway, lest it expose the tyrannies, frauds, and fallacies of which their holy, inspired religion consists.

We also wish to thank the trustees of the G. A. R. Hall. They showed themselvs gentlemen, as well as men of sense and reason.

On the evening of our last entertainment many of our friends came to us with kindly offers of support and assistance. We thank them truly and will be happy to accept their aid. Permit us to add, we solicit information through the mails on the subject of Freethought. We wish to learn of our friends. Let me implore you, Freethinkers, to fight ignorance, superstition, and bigotry till the last enemy disappears from our paths, and harmony, truth, and reason take their place.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Vanished.

Bring flowers of bright and varied hue—
Bring lilies fair and pansies too;
For these sweet blossoms symbolize
Our vanished friend, so true and wise.

With ivy green and eglantine
Her precious memory we entwine;
With words of love that burn and breathe
We weave for her a laurel wreath.

Softly, O summer sun and skies,
Caress the spot where low she lies;
And gently may the evening breeze
Float far abroad her melodies.

In sweet accord her minstrelsy
Was one with bird and flower and bee;
Her cheering songs to age and youth
Still palpitate with love and truth.

And though her voice is strangely hushed,
Her heart like rose in silence crushed,
Yet the bright influence of her ways
Sheds perfume sweet upon these days.

To her we cannot say farewell,
For with us still she seems to dwell;
In work and thought and tender word
Her spirit still is felt and heard.

Talks on Political Economy.

Ringing peals of girlish laughter, joyous shouts from fresh young voices, and breezy flutterings of muslin and lace, all proclaimed the joyous news that a holiday had been granted the pupils of Madam Hauton's seminary.

It was examination time, that trial which is so sure to precede the joyous weeks of a vacation, so dear to the heart of every pupil of every school. It was no less dear to these young ladies than it is to the little struggler of a public school. For it meant life-long freedom (from school disciplin anyway) to the graduates. And the majority were going to graduate.

Apart from the rest, and together as usual, strolled our two young friends, Isabella and Ethel. They were to graduate, and thoughts of the coming separation made both girls thoughtful and sad. Isabella was the first to break the silence as she said musingly and regretfully: "No more talks on political economy. Will you forget all that we hav said, and forget me too, Ethel?"

"Forget each old, familiar face,
Each long-remembered spot?
When these things are forgot by me,
Then thou shalt be forgot!"

quoted Ethel, reassuringly. "I can not forget you if we correspond as you suggested." "True," answered her friend, still in a sentimental mood. "But after a while the correspondence will lag, and finally cease altogether. Other friends will come with new and more diverting conversation, until gradually all memories of our pleasant talks will fade away, and lose themselvs in the hazy mist of things that were." Absorbed in her own contemplativ thoughts, Isabella did not see the humorous twinkle in her friend's eye as she bent attentivly over a rose bush. "I think my memory will prove as faithful as yours," she remarked slyly, "since your attention is so likely to be claimed first." "At least we might hav one more talk, and arrive at some conclusion, if possible," said Isabella, beginning to look around her and giving no sign of having heard Ethel's remark, except a little hightened color. "Let us go down to our old nook, if it is not already occupied." Arriving at their accustomed place and finding it vacant, the two girls seated themselvs comfortably, preparatory to opening the conversation. But Isabella did not seem inclined to start it, and Ethel, growing impatient at the long silence, tapped her foot and said:

"We hav discussed the various principles of this study, political economy, and now the question presents itself as to its practical utility. Is it really beneficial? Hav its authors established any truth that can be demonstrated? Is it not in fact something like the 'science of theology' that divides itself into 'schools of thought?'"

"There is no doubt much truth in this assertion," said Isabella somewhat indifferently. "But I look for the harmonizing of these schools. I believe that the time is coming when political text-books will be introduced into our public schools." "Of course that would be instructiv," agreed Ethel. "But which theory will be accepted first? Will the admirers of Carey and Bowen supply the text-books? Or the works of Wayland and Perry supply the schools? Or the disciples of Greeley and Thompson introduce their theory? The very name political economy is suggestiv of so much diversity of opinion as to debar it from all exact sciences. It is based upon a theory of a natural order, and the same trouble visits it that plagues theology. The student is forever justifying the laws and customs of man to the result of natural law. Injustice is just as natural as justice. Disease is just as natural as health. The study of economy to be of any benefit must discard its gods, its heroes, and pet theories. Its aim should be to study theories and be bound to none. The only use for all authorities is to aid the mind in the investigation. Reason should never bow to 'great men.'" "We shall hav to 'agree to disagree,'" laughed Isabella. "The girls are collecting for a game of tennis. Let's go and join them, Ethel." Absorbed as they were in the fascinating game, political economy was soon forgotten.

IDA BALLOU.

Legend.—(Continued.)

Said Seth: "Poor, blind Nature is always repeating herself. Humility is safer than luxurious high development, from which there is a constant tendency to fall. A kind heart is a noble thing, benevolence being mostly imaginary. The most pious people are the greatest abusers of the poor. The pious and wealthy Mrs. Scald helps the indigent very little, but on condition that they believe in election and total depravity. She takes a malicious interest in poor Mrs. Beck, believing all the lies of her enemies, loving fiction better than truth. She abuses without helping her, leaving that for Infidels and Spiritualists to do, then she will make her exit like a flying grasshopper. You know how the dragon-fly will cause feeble insects to shriek with terror as he enters their humble bower. Mrs. Beck is broken down with hard work, but Mrs. Scald insults her brutally because she has not a fine dress. Such rich ladies believe in women's rights, and wish to vote and hold office."

Let me giv the news of the week. A robin's nest of young birds saved from injury by a judge. A good boy who fed a starving horse. How much better than coarse rudeness on the street. I, myself, rescued a poor butterfly in imminent danger.

Freedom helps the mind, but not always the heart. Oh, what shall reclaim the greedy soul of luxury and cause us all to share what we hav with lone, suffering friends?

ALHAZA.

P.S.—We will think of a brutal Christian woman, and then of the beautiful adaptiv habits of a climbing plant, which throws out a shoot where it is needed, thus displaying its taste for progress and improvement. Though we are despised for poverty, let us do all the good we can, and liv on, patiently and hopefully. A.

Grains of Gold.

Rank and riches are chains of gold, but still they are chains.

As tears soften the heart, so does rain soften the earth, that good may come.

Be always frank and true; spurn every kind of affectation and disguise. Hav the courage to confess your ignorance and awkwardness, and confide your faults and follies to but few.

Too much reading and too much meditation may produce the effect of a lamp inverted, which is extinguished by the excess of the oil whose office it is to feed it.

Sympathy is a skittish and perverse nymph; demand too much of her and she givs nothing. When a soldier has lost his arm, if he were to go whining about the world lamenting over it, everyone would despise him; but if he holds his tongue, and carries his sleeve carelessly, all the girls are in love with him.—Jean Ingelow.

Wit undirected by benevolence generally falls into personal satire, the keenest instrument of unkindness. It is so easy to laugh at the expense of our friends and neighbors—they furnish such ready materials for our wit—that all the moral forces should be arrayed against the propensity, and its earliest indications checked.

Correspondence.

SHERMAN, MICH., Aug. 5, 1892.

MISS WIXON AND CHILDREN OF THE CORNER, Dear Friends: I wonder if you hav not forgotten ever hearing, or rather reading, my name? I am afraid you hav, so think it time for me to write and remind you of my existence.

It is raining really hard this morning, and I guess my father, who has gone huckleberrying, wishes he had taken warning from the dismal-looking clouds and remained at home.

The huckleberries we hav here grow on bushes that do not average over six inches in hight. They seem to be quite plentiful this year.

I intended to write a letter to you last winter to tell you about our pretty things. You ought to see our cedar swamps in winter. It is a sight well worth seeing—the great green branches bent down under their weight of snow, and everything seeming to be green and white, and where the sun shines flecked with gold and silver. Yes, it is all very pretty, but I do not like to liv in the cedar swamps, in winter at least; it is so dreary and lonesome. Two years ago last winter I stayed three weeks in our "camp" and got very lonesome though there was a crowd around me all the time. One thing that can be seen almost anywhere here in winter, and which probably most of you children from the North hav seen, is the "snow caps." We had no such things when in southern Michigan, though. Snow caps are nothing more or less than snow piled high on stumps and fence-posts. They looked funny enough to us when we first came here. But, for all the pretty things to be seen in winter, I think there are prettier things in summer, for there is the multitude of flowers! And in summer you can go into the woods. We hav woods within twenty rods of our house one way, and within thirty another, and both east and west there are woods in plain sight. Yet amongst our nearly five hundred acres of land a good share of it is cleared.

We hav a large barn, which is now crammed full of hay—i.e., the haymows are—and one stable, and then we hav as much more about three miles north of here on a place called the renting lot, of which grandpa has the management. They think we will hav three hundred bushels of wheat off about eleven acres of ground. So from all this you can see how nicely things are flourishing around here. My father has thirty-six acres of corn which is also looking very nicely. He raises a great deal of corn which, before it gets ripe enough to husk, he runs through a cutting machine and puts into his silos, from which he feeds it out to the cattle in winter. It seems to me it must be first cousin to that mixture so well liked by the Dutch and which is called "sauerkrout." Do the cattle like ensilage? Well, if you could see them eat it you would think so. But perhaps you hav seen silos and ensilage, Miss Wixon? Maybe some of the children hav not, though.

Well, I did intend to tell you about our butter, but will not this time as this letter is getting rather long. Please permit me to subscribe myself, as ever,

Your Freethinker friend,

News of the Week.

THE Freethinker Renan has received, both at his public funeral and since, honors second only to those paid Victor Hugo.

GEO. H. BELL, the inventor, in reply to his wife's suit for divorce says that he did not treat her unkindly, but she ridiculed him when he prayed.

LIEUTENANT TOTTEN says that the late eclipse shows that "it behooves all who call themselvs Christians to set their houses in order ere it is too late."

REV. MATTHEW SMALL, of Edinburgh, Ind., has denounced W. B. Owen, school superintendent, as an Infidel, and in a sermon asked his congregation to cease sending their children to the school.

REV. MR. JONESON, a leading colored preacher of New Jersey, before the election issued a circular saying: "Negroes, look to your own interests. We should not vote like slaves. Hold out for $25 before you vote."

THE proposal to hold a Catholic congress at Leipzic has met the wildest opposition from anti-Catholic organizations. A Protestant procession marching with banners denouncing the proposal was attacked and the police had to interfere.

NOT only the next president but both houses of Congress will be Democratic. The Democrats carried states which were generally expected to be Republican, as Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin. The People's party seems to hav carried Idaho, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and Nevada.

"THE gifts of God to our people during the past year," says President Harrison in a proclamation, "hav been so abundant and so special that the spirit of devout thanksgiving awaits not a call, but only the appointment of a day when it may hav a common expression." The president accordingly appoints November 24th.

IN London the lord mayor's show, or procession at the inauguration of the lord mayor, took place on the 9th with no other demonstration against Knill, the Catholic installed, than hooting. The Anti-popery Association had received from the police a denial of their request to follow with cars representing Catholic methods of converting heretics—Inquisition scenes, Huguenot massacres, etc.

THE pope has caused a report to be made to him of the Chicago fêtes, and the receptions to Monsignor Satolli, the papal delegate. He has been greatly pleased by the honors rendered by America to his representativ, and also with the speech of Mr. Chauncey M. Depew, the prayer of Monsignor Ireland, and the medal struck by order of the committee on the occasion. Referring to the event he said: "The United States form a great people, to whom the future belongs."

AMONG the causes to which the Republican defeat is imputed are protection; the "Force" bill; the new ballot laws by which vote-buyers cannot insure the casting of the vote paid for; Reid's unpopularity with workingmen because he long "ratted" his printing office; the Democratic position for, and the Republican against, the right of Illinois and Wisconsin Catholics and Lutherans to send their children to private parochial schools in which foreign languages are used.

IN Paris, at the office of the Carmaux Mining Co., where a strike is being desperately waged, police found a bomb and had a porter of the firm carry it to the police station, where it exploded and killed the porter and four policemen. The whole people hav been excited into indignation against Anarchism, and may overthrow the ministry, whom they accuse of overleniency to Anarchists of late. The Anarchists hav announced that they hav been quiet only because the warm weather rendered their explosivs dangerous to themselvs, but will do terrible things this winter.

THE executiv committee of the New York Museum of Art has reported: "The most obvious step in the direction of economy is to repeal the resolution which authorized the opening of the museum on Sunday, and not open it on that day again until a suitable fund has been provided. The results of the experiment thus far hav been a loss of over four hundred and six annual members and the $4,060 we were annually receiving from them. We hav lost the sympathy and favor of an important portion of the public. We know of large bequests that hav been revoked on account of our opening on Sunday, and we hav reason to apprehend the loss of others. This opening of the museum on Sunday may continue to prove of great advantage to the general public, but so far we hav received but little to counterbalance the pecuniary losses already sustained."

New Publications.

Unless otherwise specified, all publications noticed here can be had of THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY, at the price named.

"The Pilgrimage of a Pilgrim Eighty Years," by John Atwood, Boston, Mass. This is a cloth-bound volume of over 200 pages. Religion and a thousand other as extensiv themes are treated in a style which we wish we were not obliged to call rambling and eccentric. Its price, like many a one of its passages, remains to us a mystery.

Mrs. Carrica le Favre, a professor of Delsartean physical culture, in an 86-page book assumes to lead us on "The Royal Road to Beauty, Health, and Higher Development." Vegetarianism appears to her about the most expeditiv crutch, or walking-stick, on this pleasing path. Drugs and cosmetics fail of favor. New York: Fowler & Wells. Price, 25 cents.

Lizzie Magie, a young lady whose name is more or less known to Freethinkers, has written a booklet entitled, "My Betrothed, and Other Poems." A frontispiece portrait of the author depicts a countenance pretty, passionate, interested. In the poems, fancy's wilding sprays and sentiment's gentle-winding tendrils half hide and half reveal trunks of philosophy's stanch grain. Perhaps the price is 25 cents; perhaps it is more.

"Short Talks on Character-building," by G. T. Howerton, contains many miscellaneous suggestions of value on the conduct of life and the upbuilding of a robust mental and moral constitution. The composition and preservation of character certainly cannot receive too much attention. This work abounds with reference to phrenology and physiognomy. We regret that it contains a little nonsense, viz., Christianity. New York: Fowler & Wells Co. Pp. 228; profusely illus.; price, $1.

"The Religion of Humanity: Philosophy of Life," is a small book written by J. Leon Benwell and published by H. L. Green. The author cleverly analyzes religion, and finally advocates these principles: 1. The divinity of humanity; 2. The humanity of divinity; 3. Personal accountability to evolve the higher nature from the lower; 4. The need of unceasingly working to make all bad things good and all good things better; 5. The especial responsibility of the rich, high-placed, and able. Price, 15 cents.

A first-class publishing house allying itself with a third-class writer is the uncheerful sight which now meets us. The admirable Century Co. we find publishing the wabbly, wandering reasonings of Rev. Dr. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, on "Faith Healing, Christian Science, and Kindred Phenomena," including Dreams, Somnambulism, Presentiments, Spiritualism, Apparitions, Astrology, Animal Magnetism, Witchcraft, Mind Cure, etc. In the days when the clergy were in the joyous habit of suppressing the works of all other explicators than themselvs, perchance we should rather hav read an ecclesiastic's theories on these things than no one's, but just now we shall prefer the treatises of our many modern scientific inquirers to those of a wooden-headed old Methodist who starts out with the affirmation that Christ's cures of the sick were genuinly miraculous. Pp. 300; price, $1.25.

"The Step-by-Step Primer, in Burnz' Pronouncing Print," is the title of a new instruction book in reading for children. It is issued by Burnz & Co., 24 Clinton place, New York. Price, 25 cents. The plan of teaching is unlike that of any book for children previously published. The type is large and clear and the pictures are numerous. Its use will insure clear and correct pronunciation. The introduction says: "The Step-by-Step Primer is so arranged that a little child or a foreigner can learn to read from it easily, through analogy and by the use of reason. The pronunciation of each word is shown on the printed face without at all changing the common spelling. It takes as a basis the Anglo-American alphabet of forty-two letters, or combinations of letters, each of which denotes an elementary sound of the language. There are no new letters, but the long vowel sounds are denoted by the marked letters found in Webster's dictionary. An unmarked vowel letter always stands for the short sound. When letters in a printed word are silent—that is, really useless—they are put in hair-line type. If a letter is perversely used, its true sound is indicated by a small type placed below. By these devices the exact pronunciation of words is made apparent to the eye, while the spelling remains unchanged." In this primer directions are given how to place the organs of speech in position to produce exact sounds, so that it is adapted for training foreigners into an accurate enunciation of English. The pronouncing print would be just the type with which to prepare simple books of conversation and reading matter. Mrs. Eliza B. Burnz, the author of pronouncing print, has been an excellent teacher of phonography and phonetics for twenty-two years, before which she was a teacher of other branches in public and private schools. The devices employed in this new print are shown in the following specimen:

Burnz' Pronouncing Print

This new print is offered to the edūcātional world for the purpose of effecting two desīrable results: First, to enāble children and illiterāte adults to acquīre a knowledge of Ēnglish rēading in a shorter tīme than is now possible by mēans of ordinary primers or rēaders; second, to bring about a mōre general and thorough knowledge of the elementary sounds of our lañguāge.

It is time for a renewal of that high praise which we hav always accorded the Popular Science Monthly. Its November number is filled with treatises as seductiv as a romance, as plain as a primer, and as profound as the lowest mental subsoil that modern science furrows. The titles of these articles read thus: "Eurasia," by Sara Jeannette Duncan. "The Natural or Scientific Method in Education," by Wesley Mills, M.A., M.D. (illustrated). "On Posture and Its Indications," by T. Lauder Brunton, F.R.S. (illustrated). "The Problems of Comparativ Psychology," by Prof. Joseph Jastrow, Ph.D. "The Synthesis of Living Beings," by M. Armand Sabatier. "Economical Trees," by Frederick Le Roy Sargent (illustrated). "The Latest Arithmetical Prodigy," by M. Alfred Binet. "Reasoning Animals," by Allen Pringle. "Color in Flowering Plants," by Alice Carter. "Modern Nervousness and Its Cure," by Herr Dr. Bilsinger. "The First German Papermaker," by Eduard Grosse (illustrated). "Are Business Profits too Large?" by J. B. Mann. "The Scientific Societies of Italy," by Dr. W. C. Cahall. "Sketch of Henry Walter Bates" (with portrait). Correspondence: The Abandonment of Penikese, Hole or Holl? Editor's Table: Evolution in Politics, Prevention of Cholera Epidemics. Literary Notices. Popular Miscellany. Notes. The treatis on "The Synthesis of Living Beings" starts off in this interesting way: "If it is true that crude or dead matter and living matter are not separated by any impassable gulf, it seems reasonable to think that the resources of our laboratories, of which the power is increasing every day, will be able at some time to prove themselvs capable of producing living matter from mineral. I propose to discuss the legitimacy of this hope." We will giv one more bit of an extract, this time from "Are Business Profits Too Large?" As we print so much for the new labor doctrins and against the established and conservativ system, we will this time like a good and faithful truth seeker do something toward restoring a fair balance by selecting a passage adverse to the former and favorable to the latter: "Attempts at coöperation thus far hav generally shown a strong if not fatal tendency to failure because of the difficulty of commanding the requisit skill and faithfulness in management. Co-operators are not willing to pay the price for service which their business needs in order to succeed. They always stand on the theory that the men who conduct great enterprises get too much for doing the business and the operativs too little. In course of time, and usually not very long time, their scheme goes down. This is because in the nature of things no hired person on a salary of fixed amount will all the time keep his wits alive and study into the small hours of the night devising ways and means to make money for other people. They propose in their constitution to take from capital and skill a portion of the profit that has usually been accorded to them and giv it to labor; but after thousands of experiments during forty or more years of good business in this country there is hardly a single case of such undoubted success as to warrant the assertion that demonstration of feasibility has been attained. The combined skill of all the coöperators in half a century has produced no concern of magnitude. The almost uniform failures seem to prove that great management must hav great compensation, and in endeavoring to get the skill without the pay the co-operators' dream has come to naught." This magazine is published at $5 a year, or 50 cents a number.

B. O. Fenton, of Bundysburg, O., an attentiv reader of Freethought literature, sends us for publication the following opinion on a certain book:

THE BIBLE ANALYZED.

"Even if nothing worse than wasted mental effort could be laid to the charge of theology, that alone ought to be sufficient to banish it from the earth as one of the worst enemies of mankind" (Lydia M. Child).

"There are no convocations in which I feel greater interest than in those striving to free the human mind from theological superstitions" (Elizabeth C. Stanton).

"Much dearer be the things which come through hard distress" (Herbert Spencer).

These words of Mr. Spencer are in the highest and broadest sense applicable to the production of the work under consideration, which was written among the greatest disadvantages and lack of the comforts of life ("The harder the conflict the more glorious the victory," says Paine), with the exalted hope of its being instrumental in freeing the minds of many from the thralldom of superstition. It is a handsomely bound volume of 821 pages, with a fine steel portrait of the author—who sleeps beneath the quiet stars that wheel in the boundless ocean of space. Its object is to plainly show the absurdness of divine inspiration. This is so plainly done that all who read the work with superstition's bandages removed from their eyes cannot help realize the undeniable fact that the Bible is a jumble of contradictions and absurdities from Genesis to Revelation, realizing the fact that

"Errors like straws upon the surface flow;
He who would search for pearls must dive below."

He labored to widen the mental horizon of man. His luminous mind was formed of love for research, of comprehensiv observation, and of minute attention. The demoralizing influence of Christianity is without a parallel in the annals of history. Bronson C. Keeler in his great work, "A Short History of the Bible," well says: "The Bible did not form the beliefs, the beliefs formed the Bible." Let that never be forgotten. It is final, all in all. The author, Col. John R. Kelso, was not such a scriptarian or Bible mythologist as Bishop Colenso, whose works are turgid, tough, abstruse, quite the reverse. Hear yc Aristotle: "He who would be a leader must think as wise people do, but speak as common people do." Hume said: "A wise man proportions his belief to the evidence." In answer to the question why he gave up Christianity the great Darwin said: "It is not supported by evidence." This work will greatly assist those that hav not already learned that fact to a clearer realization of Darwin's words. If Jesus Christ ever lived and uttered the words, or any part of the words, attributed to him in the New Testament, I desire to know who has kept those words and handed them down to the writers of the four gospels. For it is a conceded fact that none of the gospels were written for at least eighty years after he lived, if he ever lived. More than a generation of years (seventy) had elapsed before a pen was raised to preserve what we now hear claimed by some, desired by others, to be the real utterances and doings, etc., of Jesus Christ. History is nearly silent on this person. Notwithstanding that fact, priestcraft has so thoroughly duped the human race that millions believe in contravention to the wise words of Hume and Darwin as given above. The author, Mr. Kelso, was a soldier in the late Rebellion and fought to sustain the Union. He was also in former years a Methodist minister. His eyes became opened to the errors of the claim that the Bible was inspired, and being an honest man he maintained the views his reason and conscience said were right, with such a persistency of zeal and versatility of skill that none can attribute anything but honesty in his aim and purpose. All Freethinkers of every shade of thought should own a copy of the hero's work, for sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office at the price of $3.

"Shall those who liv by faith alone,
Whose lives float on in daily crime,
Shall they by prayer for guilt atone,
And liv beyond the bounds of time?"

He says: "That which is true can bear any amount of fair investigation." Certainly, but the divine claim for the Bible being false, it cannot stand when subjected to an impartial analysis. Therefore priestcraft's claim must and shall inevitably go down. This book is a weapon in that direction.

BIBLE STUDIES: Essays on Phallic Worship and Other Curious Rites and Customs. By J. M. Wheeler. London: Progressiv Publishing Co. Cloth; pp. 136; illus.; price, $1.

This is a scholarly and soundly reasoned book. We recommend its purchase by all who would read the Bible understandingly. It shows how largely phallic worship, or worship of the organs and acts of generation, prevailed among the ancient Jews and other peoples. Thus when read in the light of this work many passages in the Bible otherwise unintelligible, or purposely obscured by shamed orthodox, become comprehensible. A preface by the author's friend Mr. G. W. Foote contains the following: "During the sixteen years of my friend's collaboration with me in many enterprises for the spread of Freethought and the destruction of superstition, he has written a vast variety of articles, all possessing distinctiv merit, and some extremely valuable. From these he and I hav made the following selection. The articles included deal with the Bible from a special standpoint; the standpoint of an Evolutionist, who reads the Jewish scriptures in the light of anthropology, and finds infinit illustrations in them of the savage origin of religion. Literary and scientific criticism of the Old Testament hav their numerous votaries. Mr. Wheeler's mind is given to a different study of the older half of the Bible. He is bent on showing what it really contains; what religious ideas, rites, and customs prevailed among the ancient Jews and find expression in their scriptures. . . . Many readers will be astonished at what Mr. Wheeler tells them. We hav read the Bible, they will say, and never saw these things. That is because they read it without knowledge, or without attention. Reading is not done with the eyes only, but also with the brain; and the same sentences will make various impressions, according as the brain is rich or poor in facts and principles." Further aid to an understanding of what the book is will be found in a glance over its chapter titles: Phallic Worship Among the Jews, Circumcision, Moses at the Inn, The Brazen Serpent, Religion and Magic, Taboos, Blood Rites, Scapegoats, Trial by Ordeal, Bible Witchcraft, Saul's Spiritualist Séance at Endor, Sacrifices, Passover, The Evolution of Jahveh, Joshua and the Sun, Hebrew Prophets, Old Testament Marriage, Song of Solomon, Sacred Seven.

Gems of Thought.

[THE present] Sunday is the fit conclusion of an ill-spent week, and not the fresh and brave beginning of a new one.—Thoreau.

IT [the belief in the devil] inspired every imaginary species of fraud and imposition on the part of cunning mountebanks, while it darkened the vision of the less penetrating multitude, and caused them to sink into sullen submission to every spiritual autocrat who assumed to overpower and control them.—Henry Frank.

THE savage is certain of those things that cannot be known. He is acquainted with origin and destiny, and knows everything except that which is useful. The civilized man, having outgrown the ignorance, the arrogance, and the provincialism of savagery, abandons the vain search for final causes, for the nature and origin of things.—Ingersoll.

WHAT constitutes a state?
Not high-raised battlements or labored mound;
Thick wall, or moated gate;
. . . . . .
No, men, high-minded men;
Men who their duties know,
But know their rights, and knowing dare maintain.—Sir William Jones.

EVOLUTION is manifest in speech and in human language. The origin of speech dates from the time of the development of the organs of the throat. Animals hav the power of communicating ideas to each other, and we can observe the dawnings of speech in their cries. Our domestic dogs are descended from wolves and jackals, and hav learned to bark in four or five distinct tones. In language we find the same law of Evolution that governs physical forms. There are rudimentary words and letters—remains of ancestral forms; variations constantly occur, and a struggle for existence goes on between words, and also between various languages. The survival of the fittest perhaps will be evidenced in the future universality of the English tongue.—Robt. C. Adams.

LET us see what view was taken of the claim that there is design in nature by the unsophisticated mind of an adept of the most Freethinking and most widely diffused religious system in the world, which is Buddhism. When a Christian missionary said to the late king of Siam, Maha Moughut, who himself wrote on theology, that the Most High let fall the rain in order that men might cultivate their fields, he answered: "But the rain falls irregularly; in some places there is too much of it, and in others too little. A great part of it falls into the sea and on mountain ranges. Sometimes the water carries away towns, while at other times there is not even enough to make rice grow. Many parts of the earth are utterly barren and unfitted for the support of human life." Upon being told that God had created the earth for man and man's good, he pointed out that there were hidden reefs on which ships foundered, and fiery mountains which only brought destruction on man. He spoke of diseases and epidemics, and hearing that these were intended by God to punish men for their sins, he replied that epidemics were caused by foul and poisonous air, and that the rich could escape from the punishment by leaving the infected places.—Büchner.

THE sovereign is called a tyrant who knows no laws but his caprice; who takes the property of his subjects; and who afterward enlists them to go and take that of his neighbors. We distinguish the tyranny of one and that of many. The tyranny of several, is that of a body which would invade the rights of other bodies, and which would exercise despotism by favor of laws which it corrupts. Under what tyranny should you like best to liv? Under none: but if I must choose, I should less detest the tyranny of a single one than that of many. A despot always has some good moments; an assemblage of despots, never. If a tyrant does me an injustice, I can disarm him through his mistress, his confessor, or his page; but a company of tyrants is inaccessible to all seductions. When they are not unjust they are harsh, and they never dispense favors. If I hav but one despot, I am at liberty to set myself against a wall when I see him pass, to prostrate myself, or to strike my forehead against the ground, according to the custom of the country, but if there is a company of a hundred tyrants, I am liable to repeat this ceremony a hundred times a day, which is very tiresome to those who hav not supple joints. If I hav a farm in the neighborhood of one of our lords, I am crushed; if I complain against a relation of the relations of any one of our lords, I am ruined. How must I act? I fear that in this world we are reduced to being either the anvil or the hammer; happy at least is he who escapes this alternativ.—Voltaire.

Hindoo Virgin and Child.

The worship of the "Holy Virgin," the "Queen of Heaven," the "Mother of God," etc., which has become one of the grand features of Roman Catholicism, was a tenet of faith for centuries before the virgin now adored was born. In India. they have worshiped for ages, Maha Devi—The Great Goddess—and have temples erected in honor of her. Like her Roman counterpart she is the Goddess with a thousand names. As Devaki, she is the mother of Vishnu, the Preserving god, in the form of Krishna. "The gods, invisible to mortals," says the Vishnu Purana, (p. 502) "celebrated her praise continually from the time that Vishnu was contained in her person." She is represented in Moor's Hindu Pantheon, adorned with jewels, and the infant Saviour at her breast. BIBLE MYTHS shows that nearly all nations of antiquity worshipped a Virgin Mother-Goddess.

Petition to Congress to Open the Gates of the World's Columbian Exposition on Sundays.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress Assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, do hereby respectfully pray and memorialize your Honorable Body to repeal that portion of the Act entitled "An Act to aid in carrying out the Act of Congress, approved April 25, 1890, entitled 'An Act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by the holding of an International Exposition in the City of Chicago'"—approved August 5, 1892, which reads as follows: "That it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition, are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and it is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by the Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modifications of the rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

Also, to repeal that portion of the Act entitled, "An Act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes"—approved August 5, 1892, which reads as follows:

"And it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition, are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and it is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modifications of the rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

We ask the repeal of these portions of these laws for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago, who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you ought to decide is that of the public welfare.

5. It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

Life of Thomas Paine,

WITH A

History of His Literary, Political, and Religious Career in America, France, and England.

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY,

Author of "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," "George Washington and Mount Vernon," "Washington's Rules of Civility," etc.

To Which Is added a Sketch of Paine by William Cobbett.

No real biography of Paine has ever appeared. The so-called Lives of Paine have been mainly the controversial work of pamphleteers, turning chiefly on his religious heresies. Paine was in his fifty-eighth year before he published any thing concerning religion, and before that time he had acted an important part in revolutionary movements in the United States, England, and France. But in the religious conflict initiated by him, his political services and military career hav been but inadequately considered. A certain historical ostracism has buried in the archives of various countries a large mass of documents containing records of paramount interest and importance. Mr. Conway has personally searched such records, in Europe and America, and has obtained from these fresh light, not only on Paine, but on various eminent figures in American and European history with whom he was associated. A large amount of unpublished correspondence has been included in the volumes.

Mr. Conway says in his Preface: "In the laborious work of searching out the real Paine I hav found a general appreciation of its importance, and it will be seen in the following pages that generous assistance has been rendered by English clergymen, by official persons in Europe and America, by persons of all beliefs and no beliefs In no instance have I been impeded by any prejudice, religious or political. The curators of archives, private collectors, owners of important documents bearing on the subject, have welcomed my effort to bring the truth to light."

The Design Argument.

"CONCORDIA, KAN.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In the last previous issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, September 24th, the following old chestnut is alluded to: 'All the works of nature indicate design; hence there must hav been a designer; hence—God.' The Editor amplifies upon the time-worn argument and does it full justice. Now, I beg to say that I am not one of the Jewish-God-believers—not a God-believer at all, perhaps. Oft in my youthful days I hav tried to allure my Christian opponent into this cause-and-effect argument to spring that unanswerable query: 'Well, then, this God is a most magnificent effect—please explain the moving cause of his existence.' But after forty that argument became unsatisfactory. Can we account for all the phenomena of nature, and the many apparent results of design (at least) on the hypotheses of adaptation and evolution? It may be that we can—yet I doubt it.

"The Editor alludes to the old, old story of the watch found ticking in the road (made old because we hav all listened to it from the pulpit many times). The finder says, 'There must hav been a designer'—and no one disputes a proposition so rational; the designer found, he adds: 'And this grand and complex being, this watchmaker, must hav had a maker.' 'Yes, the maker is God.' 'Well, who designed God?' The suppressed premis of the enthymeme is patent and need not be repeated. My criticism (rather my difficulty) can be expressed briefly. The inference is that, since having found God as the ultimate architect leaves the difficulty where we found it, we may as well cancel that discovery also, since the new cause is also an equally unaccountable effect. My difficulty is as follows: Where then shall we rest in the inquiry? If we stop at man, why do so? Why not stop at the watch, and say it is a mere adaptation of springs and wheels—possibly a mere gradual evolution from some tiny crystal? When, however, one calls attention to the result of this fine complexity of mechanism, why may I not be content to say, 'But, my dear sir, if this thing had a designer, then the designer had one,' etc., and where shall we stop? No, no, let us be content to say, 'This machine is the result of circumstances and has no maker.' May it not be wiser to say, 'This watch must hav had a designer; the maker must hav had a designer—and somewhere the intelligence must be eternal?'—for, can we conceive of the origin of intelligence? Can we conceive of its utter annihilation? If No to these, then we hav material from which to formulate a very fair kind of a God.

"B. R. ANDERSON."

Answering the inquiry of so acute and alert a thinker is less a task than a pleasure. Another glance or two at the subject will hardly fail of bringing him where stand all genuin reasoners who hav given the matter adequate attention.

You seem to us, dear sir, to hav fallen into error in the following way. In the first part of our "Design" article we temporarily conceded a certain Christian claim to be true, for the purpose of showing that even if it were so it would not serve Christians' purposes, as it would necessitate an infinit series of designers. In the latter part of our article we retracted that concession and pronounced the claim baseless. You hav given that Christian claim lodgment in your mind, but chanced to overlook its confutation. We will reproduce both the Christian claim and the confutation. The first, the claim, read thus: "We find a watch and we say: So curious and wonderful a thing must hav had a maker. We find the watchmaker and we say: So curious and wonderful a thing as man must hav had a maker. . . . It is the wonder of the thing that . . . suggests the necessity of a creator." The confutation, or denial, read thus: "The fact that any object is constituted in a highly complicated manner does not tend to prove that it was designed. The reason why we believe on finding a watch that it was designed is not, as has been commonly held, its complication and co-adaptation. The reason why we believe it had a designer is solely that we hav had a previous experience of such mechanisms being designed by men."

Thus, the fact that a thing is curious, or wonderful, or highly complicated, or co-adapted, does not suggest the necessity of a designer. The reason that many think so is, they hav been taught thus by ecclesiastics. These persons hav always chosen whatever is complicated, or mysterious, to be cited as instances of God's operations. They chose this class of objects because the real and natural cause was in these cases difficult of comprehension or undiscovered. Hence they had an opportunity to assign as the cause a fictitious being created by their own imagination. Their object was to draw fees for the exercise of their pretended influence over this pretended causer. Where knowledge ends God begins. Many classes of phenomena that once seemed complicated and obscure beyond human comprehension hav been explained and simplified. As each of these classes has been explained ecclesiastics hav withdrawn their claim that there was divine authorship of that one class, but hav still insisted on divine authorship of each as yet unexplained class. Astronomy, meteorology, and disease hav successivly passed out of the region of mystery and hence of divine authorship or superintendence. Eclipses and comets, lightnings and drouths, small-pox and cholera, hav ceased to evidence a designer or superintender. Now, biology, the science of life, and psychology, the science of mind, are daily being developed in the same manner, and if the workings of life and mind seem to you so complex, or exceptionally co-adapted, or singular in any way, that they must hav originated otherwise than from the operation of the simple elementary forces of the universe, then we recommend you to look up the late progress made in bringing them under natural law, and you will find a call for a designer no longer. Darwin, Spencer, Haeckel, Bain, Mill, and Büchner will meet the purpose.

You say:

"Can we account for all the phenomena of nature, and the many apparent results of design (at least), on the hypotheses of adaptation and evolution? . . . I doubt it."

Our answer is, we can. In fact, there are no suggestions of design that, to the eye of reason, are so much as apparent, or seeming. That to which suggestions of design are apparent is not unsophisticated reason, but a compound of egotistic feeling with reason, the latter long perverted by the theological atmosphere. Our human egotism has ever been a weak victim of the temptation to consider man's welfare the chief end of some sympathizing creator, and hence has influenced the intellect into believing in such a creator. Our egotism has always desired to see in nature's doings a purpose to sustain and comfort man—to see an aim at man's benefit in the fruiting of the plant and the usableness of the beast—and hence has seduced his intellect into seeing this pleasing thing. The human spirit has ever revolted at viewing itself as the child of harsh and unsolicitous earth to which it must finally return, and hence has persuaded itself that it is the offspring of a loving Great Soul who assuredly will not permit it to perish.

To the thorough Christian there are many results of design not merely apparent but unchallengeable; to the inquirer like yourself who has nearly reached the end of the path of knowledge there seem to linger some apparent, seeming, possible, or quasi results of design; to one who has paid yet more attention to the matter there are not even apparent ones.

You continue:

"The finder [of the watch] says, 'There must hav been a designer;' and no one disputes a proposition so rational."

If you mean, as we believe you do, that the finder should infer a designer because the watch is complex, curious, co-adapted, exhibits a subserviency of numerous means to one end, we "dispute the proposition" and declare it not "rational." Pretty much everything in the universe is as complex as a watch when looked on from certain viewpoints. Many vegetable growths and other objects are as curious as a watch and yet hav never suggested design. The watch's parts being co-adapted does not tend in the least to show design; everything in the universe is co-adapted to everything else. And everything exhibits a subserviency to one end of means numerous beyond the conception of the human intellect; the poise of a grain of sand on an ant-hill in your dooryard is the result of an inconceivable number of past events, and of the simultaneous operation on it of the gravitativ force of every other grain on the earth, to say nothing of other forces; to the production of the exquisit pattern of a crystal there go many more minutely nice arrangements than to the construction of a watch.

This custom of saying that we credit a watch with a designer because it is "wonderful," or "complex," etc., is due to those unsuppressible fallacy-mongers the theologians. When a person incautiously accepts this proposition he is started on a wrong path that will lead him many a sad mile astray. Sorry are the tangles and scrapes in which this start will involve seekers. It sends the Christian along till he finds himself passing his uncreated God, when he abandons his straightforward course and scurries off across-lots till he has reached that irresistibly seductiv individual; while forthright reasoners like yourself are soon brought up aghast at such an undertaking as making a greeting, and paying such respects as even a decent civility requires, to an infinit succession of gods.

The solution of the difficulty is here: The finder of a watch infers a designer not because it is "complex," etc., but because he has had experience of constructions very similar and always found them to hav been made by designers. To this may be added the ancillary consideration, that he knows of a purpose, viz., the registry of time, which would motiv certain designers, men, to the making of such an instrument. If this finder be a person of ordinary information who has known of watches he has then known other individuals of the very species to which the watch belongs, and need make a leap of inference but very slight. If he has never heard of watches but has had experience of other man-made apparatuses he knows, though not the very same class, or species, at least a class near enough, the genus of human apparatuses in general, and need make a leap of inference but little longer. In this latter case he recognizes in the watch metals and glass of a quality which he has experienced only in the works of men, and numeral characters which he has experienced only in such works; and in addition he perceives the capacity of the instrument for measuring time, a function which he knows would naturally be desired and attempted to be secured by men.

But a person who had had no experience of human apparatuses, and metals and glass, and numerals, and of the measurement of time, would not find in a watch evidences of an intelligent designer; and with this flat denial we will leave the shades of Butler and Paley to tussle.

"My difficulty is as follows: Where then shall we rest in the inquiry?"

After affirming that the watch had a designer, viz., man.

"If we stop at man, why do so?"

Because, while we know of classes of designed objects bearing an analogy to the watch, and therefore may draw the induction that the watch was designed also, we know of no classes of designed objects bearing an analogy to man.

We will try still another form of presentation. Experience has justified us in affirming that—

All instruments made of tempered metals and refined glass, bearing notation, and measuring time, were designed;

Now, this watch is made of tempered metals and refined glass, bears notation, and measures time;

Hence, this watch was designed.

Now, you, Mr. Anderson, perhaps were on the point of saying:

The capacity to use design is always conferred by another designer;

A part of this watchmaker consists of the capacity to use design;

Hence, a part of this watchmaker is conferred by another designer.

Here the major premis is an assumption, without sanction from experience. It even involves the supposition of a previously unheard-of factor; viz., a designer of the intelligence of the human race. It is a canon of logic not to attribute an effect to an agent specially conceived for the purpose till the effect has unsuccessfully been attributed in turn to each "agent or agency already known to exist, and seen to be sufficient to account for the effect if its presence be admitted." How wide of the mark, then, to attribute the production of mind to a being conjured up for the purpose, whose existence we hav never had any reason to suspect—whom intuition, history, revelation, all fail to disclose—rather than ascribe it to those agents which we do know to exist, the elements or forces of nature.

We will go yet farther and say that evolutionary history proves man's faculty of design, with all his other mental functions, to hav grown out of the substances and forces of the natural universe.

"May it not be wiser to say, . . . intelligence must be eternal?—for, can we conceive of the origin of intelligence? Can we conceive of its utter annihilation? If No to these, then we hav material from which to formulate a very fair kind of a God."

We should say that "No to these" would afford grounds for supposing the eternal existence, if of anything, then of a nondescript something, but hardly of a "very fair kind of a God." This is what it would afford grounds for at the most, while much more probably—but we will show that we, at least, are not without a faculty of design, by sapiently shunning an entrance, after already filling one page with this article, upon an argument on the Impossibility of the Inconceivable.

To the Friends of The Truth Seeker.

You are hereby appealed to on behalf of this paper. We find on taking charge of the "business end" of THE TRUTH SEEKER that there are many outstanding financial obligations which need to be canceled at once. We owe a good deal of money to paper manufacturers, printers, and so forth, and it troubles us.

We find also that there are many subscribers in arrears, and while that wouldn't trouble us if our bank account were fat, it does seriously incommode us at present. We beg to ask them to send what is due as soon as they possibly can. Two or three dollars is not much to each one, but the aggregate is a large sum, and we need it.

We also hope that every reader will take an interest in increasing the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and for that purpose we make a liberal offer in an advertisement on the second page of this issue. And we again call attention to the handsome premium offers of books sent in connection with subscriptions. The paper ought to hav a much greater circulation, as nothing helps the Liberal cause along more than good reading which can be handed around the neighborhood. We shall endeavor to make THE TRUTH SEEKER worthy of all efforts in its behalf, and we hope thereby to increase the influence of Freethought, and make mental liberty in this country something less like a dream than it is at present.

Some Handsome Premiums.

To induce new subscriptions and prompt renewals on the part of our friends we make the following handsome premium offers:

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a cloth-bound copy of "Bible Myths" ($2.50).

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth ($2.50).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in boards ($2).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a copy of "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in cloth covers ($1.50).

For $3.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in board covers ($1).

This is a splendid opportunity to obtain books which every Liberal desires to hav at an exceedingly low price. Old and new subscribers can avail themselvs of it, and we shall be glad if our present readers will call the attention of their friends to the values offered.

Our readers will be glad to know that Prof. Felix L. Oswald has agreed to furnish regular contributions for these columns. He will write concerning Science and Progress—short notes with humorous comments, showing how far behind the age the church has lagged. Professor Oswald has published a great many books on hygiene and travel, and is a regular contributor to the Popular Science Monthly, International Review, North American Review, the Forum, and Lippincott's Magazine. His "Bible of Nature" was written for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we also publish "The Secret of the East," one of the liveliest attacks Buddhistic asceticism, under the name of Christianity, ever sustained. Dr. Oswald is as epigrammatic as Emerson, as spicy as Montaigne, as caustic as Heine, and one of the most uncompromising Freethinkers in the country.

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer reports: "The Washington Secular Union, through its secretary, C. B. Reynolds, a noted Freethinker, has sent to this city confidential circulars asking votes for F. T. Read and Mr. Teat, Populist candidates for supreme judge and attorney-general respectivly, stating as a reason that they are avowed Freethinkers. This circular also advises members of the organization to vote for Thomas Carroll, Democratic candidate for Congress, because of the pledges he has made to the organization. These circulars are manifolded on letterheads of the Union and signed by Reynolds by order of the Washington Secular Union executiv committee, and in addition to these recommendations instructions are given voters to vote against any amendment to the constitution." That seems to be doing on our side about what the Catholics and Protestants are doing on their side; and, under the circumstances, considering the avowed purpose of the church folks in Washington to repeal the constitutional provisions under which the Bible is excluded from the public schools, seems to hav been about the right thing to do.

The Freethinkers of France and Spain must still bear the civic disabilities which the Christians hav always attached to independence of thought. Recently at the assize court, Rheims, M. Vernouille, member of a Freethought League, was fined five hundred francs for refusing to take the oath as a juryman in consequence of his non-belief in God. At the evening sitting he was again called upon, and again refused, and this time was fined one thousand francs. And the recent Freethought congress at Madrid was closed by order of the government. M. le Lubez, who attended the congress as a delegate, writes to the National Reformer that the first two sessions of the congress were well attended, and that the speeches were earnest and able. Then he says: "The third séance was equally a most brilliant one, but even more full. But it was our last there. The government sent written notice that no further meeting should take place. On the 15th I went to the bureau of the Conseil l'organization, where I called each day, and was informed that at 12 noon that council would appear at the door of the theater to protest. I went there and found members who apologized to the delegates, who, they said, must be shocked at such a reception—doors closed. I said: 'We are much pleased with the reception which we hav received from the Spanish people and from the delegates, who hav spoken to us in fraternal terms worthy of Freethinkers. As to the government, it has behaved as master, and fitly so (il a agi en maître, et bien agi). Vive le roi.' Being questioned, I said that those who would hav a king should obey him. The protests in the Liberal press were numerous. I said I would not protest against the laws of a country not mine."

Vermont has a Sunday law upon her statute books which can be drawn tighter than a miser's purse-strings or through which a coach and four can be driven, according to the opinions of the judge before whom an alleged offender may be brought. It reads thus:

"Any person who between 12 o'clock Saturday night and sunset on the following Sunday exercises any business or employment except such only as works of necessity and charity, or is present at any public assembly except such as is held for social and religious worship and moral instruction, or travels, except from necessity or charity, or visits from house to house, except from motivs of humanity or charity, or for moral or religious edification, or holds or resorts to any ball or dance, or uses or exercises any game, sport or play, or resorts to any tavern, inn, or house of entertainment for amusement or recreation, shall be fined not more than two dollars."

An amendment to be brought before the next legislature is to raise the fine to twenty dollars, which will make the indefinitness of the statute worse. A Liberal judge would rule most acts to be of necessity, charity, or humanity, while a Vermont Puritan would force everyone to go to church or stay rigidly in the house. It is this leaving definitions to the judges which makes these restrictiv acts peculiarly infamous.

We hav a few sample pages of "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" which we will send to anyone who desires it. This book is now in the fourth thousand, and a new edition is on the press. Sent promptly on receipt of $2 for board-covered copies; $2.50 in cloth with gold side stamp. "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" has been in print but a few months, but the book-binders are working on the third thousand. Each of these books is of the convincing order, because Christians cannot get around the facts and arguments it contains, supported as they are by pictures which tell the story even to him who will not read. If those of our friends who possess these books will show them to their Liberal friends and mention the large discount made on them when ordered with THE TRUTH SEEKER for a year we think they will hav no difficulty in getting a new subscriber.

Attention is called to the list of Saladin's works (W. Stewart Ross's) advertised on page 760, a large consignment of which we hav just received from England. Saladin is one of the most brilliant and sharpest writers in the Freethought ranks. We can conscientiously recommend "God and his Book," "Woman: Her Glory, Her Shame, and Her God," "Did Jesus Christ Rise From the Dead?" "The Confessional," and "Christianity and the Slave Trade," as being books that every Freethinker can study and use with advantage in his controversies with church-members. The others are of a more general literary character but each bears evidence that its author is a man of great genius wholly free from Christian superstition. It will please us greatly to circulate them widely in this country.

We also call attention to the advertisement of books for the holidays on page 766 of this paper. There are many beautiful things connected with the pagan festival in celebration of the returning sun, which the Christians hav adapted to their own use and called Christmas, chief of which is the kindly remembrance of friends with presents, and nothing can be more appropriate for such presents than books which instruct as well as please the eye. A list of such works is what we hav made for the guidance of our readers.

The new Sunday laws in Germany went partly into effect on July 1st, and do not appear to be giving satisfaction. Their intention was to reduce the hours of labor on Sunday to a minimum and to secure a larger church attendance of working people, but the church authorities in Berlin are already admitting that the laws hav not increased the number of Sunday worshipers, though they hav the number of Sunday tipplers.

The Leaflet advocating the Sunday opening of the World's Fair ought to be scattered by the thousands. In December or January we shall send them to Congressmen and to others who may be influenced by argument. We need money to do this, and those who can afford to aid are requested to do so. The price of the Leaflets is 25 cents per dozen; $1.50 per hundred. Anyone who will distribute five hundred or a thousand can obtain them at special rates.

Mrs. L. D. White, since the resignation of Lois Waisbrooker in September, and during the imprisonment of Moses Harman, is acting as manager and editor of Lucifer.

The Investigator calls Chauncey Depew "New York's foremost orator." Our Yankee friends ought to know by this time that Colonel Ingersoll livs in this town.

In the West.

News and Notes.

I am in such a remote part of the world that I must begin to write my "News and Notes" in season, or I shall get left as I did at Golden Pond, and the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will not know my whereabouts. The mails are rather uncertain when one is off the line of railroads, and even the railroads are slow, for the trains run only three times a week in this country. It is a roundabout journey from Reno, Nev., to Inyo county, Cal. Bishop is 225 miles from Reno and Round Valley is 16 miles from Bishop. It takes two days to go from Reno to Bishop. There is no regular passenger train. The passenger is simply attached to the freight, and we go at freight speed, but not at freight rates. It costs nearly ten cents a mile for transportation.

I leave Reno early on Tuesday morning and by way of Carson and Mound Station strike the narrow-gage for Inyo. From Mound Station a wonderfully mountainous country is seen on every side. Among the mountains and over broad plains we take our way. The engin puffs leisurely along and we stop an hour or so at each station, but fortunately the stations are far apart in this thinly inhabited land, where the sage-brush triumphantly reigns and the wild Indian still roves bedecked with brilliant colors. It is election day and the immense commotion throughout the republic only givs occasional signs along our arid journey. The polling booth is sometimes at the depot; and no beer can be had for love or money to cool the thirsty lip. I cannot vote—and cold water is the only beverage in sight. This is disfranchisement in a double sense. There is not much sovereignty in spending election day among barren hills and plains and still waters. It is a lovely day, however. The atmosphere is perfectly enchanting. It shines like liquid gold and flows and streams away over the vast sceneries as if Cleopatra's jewel were melting in the radiance. The sky is like a polished dome. Every cloud is dissipated, and the perfect blue appears in mirror-like expanse. So I enjoy the solitude and beautiful pictures as they mingle in the vast extent, and care not how indolently the iron horse thunders forward. In the afternoon we trail alongside an immense sheet of water, spread at the foot of the mountains. It is named Lake Walker. It is thirty miles in extent. Not a ripple is seen upon its surface. It is like glass. I understand the Indians own this lake, and the white man cannot fish in its placid depths, which is something of an aggravation to those who love the sport. In the evening about 8 o'clock we roll into Bellville, a railroad town, with not enough voters, however, to make a precinct—not ten voters—and those who exercise the right of franchise hav to go to Soda Springs, twelve miles away. We get occasional telegraph dispatches as to the result of the national election. I hear that Cleveland has carried New York, New Jersey, Indiana, and Illinois, and up to date I do not know whether these reports are true or not or who is elected president, but I feel that the country is safe whatever happens, and if Cleveland goes in, there is one sublime consolation, Wanamaker goes out. It looks as if a mighty political revolution has swept over the country. What it means I cannot really tell. I hope it is for a diminution of church power in politics. It looks somewhat that way. It must be admitted by those who hav studied the situation that the party in power by its representativs has been to a certain extent for ecclesiastical legislation. I hope for something better in view of these tremendous changes. We are breaking away from the old moorings, and the people are in the process of education. There never was a better time for Liberalism to assert its powers, to fling its flag upon the political field. This is a noble opportunity for agitation and enlightenment. Parties' ties are sundered. There will be new formations, new issues, new questions, a grander opening for progress.

Wednesday morning I leave Bellville. Slowly we climb and wind our way among the White mountains, which stretch to Mexico. It is a delightful journey, for splendid prospects open on every hand, constantly changing. The railroad twists and turns like the folds of a serpent. At one place the tracks are only seventy feet apart and yet it is a mile from one point to the other by rail. Mount Montgomery towers near by, thirteen thousand feet high. From the bosom of the hills we creep into the broad valley extending between the White mountains and the Sierras. In the early afternoon I arrive at Bishop. This is a town of about five hundred inhabitants, the largest in Inyo county. It is in Owen's Valley. A fine agricultural county is about it. Bishop is six miles from the railroad. It was formerly called "Gospel Swamp," from the fact that it was supposed that the churches had a kind of monopoly. The Methodists hav built an academy, and about two months ago there was a conference and Bishop Vincent was present, and as no Freethought lecturer was ever in this country, the clergy appeared to be in the swim. The Baptists hav also a church at Bishop. However, judging by the reception I hav had so far, the Liberals are in the majority. I lectured in Spencer's Hall on Wednesday evening. It was nearly full, and my address, "The Demands of Liberalism," was received with great approval. I hav found nowhere more enthusiastic supporters than here. I lecture again on Friday and Sunday next and look for crowded houses. Freethought is triumphant. "Gospel Swamp" is no more. I shall hav much to say about Bishop and the friends I meet here, in my next letter. It is one of the liveliest points on the route.

Thursday morning, with John E. Jones, Jr., I travel to Round valley. This valley is about five miles long and from two to three miles wide. It lies snugly at the foot of the mighty Sierras. Mt. Tom, thirteen thousand feet high, towers over it in majestic splendor, crowned with eternal snows. For hundreds and hundreds of miles away roll the enormous mountains to San Bernardino. In their bosom are vast lakes, natural reservoirs—eight thousand and ten thousand feet above the level of the sea—and from these through springs in the rocky clefts three beautiful rivulets flow into Round valley, while into Long valley, Owen's valley, etc, dash other perpetual streams from the chambers of these everlasting hills.

Round Valley is one of the prettiest places in California, and to-day in the golden sunshine at the home of John E. Jones it presen's a glittering scene of loveliness and grandeur. The house is built on an elevation and from it the whole valley can be seen with its farmhouses, its groves, its fields, its wandering herds of cattle, flocks of sheep, and bands of horses quietly feeding in the shining pastures. It is like a picture of Arcadia, this gem of a valley beneath the cloudless blue. Resplendent with luminous cliffs and masses of snow, the mountains on every side lift their jeweled walls from ten to thirteen thousand feet in hight. Here is nature's wildness, and human comfort and repose. The whistle of the locomotiv is never heard, nor the click of the telegraph. I could not get farther away from the hum and clash of civilization and yet more enjoy its delightful calm and leisure. While I look upon elevations where the foot of man has never trod, where nature reigns in undisturbed serenity and magnificence, near around me are books and pictures, art and culture, and the glory of Freethinking humanity.

My friend John E. Jones, Sr., now seventy years of age, came here twenty-eight years ago. It was a wild country then. The Indians roamed over it and claimed dominion. For three months Jones had not a particle of bread or meat or potatoes to eat. He was obliged to liv on pine nuts and tasboose. Tasboose is a kind of grass nut, or root. The pine nuts are found on the pine trees. These constituted the main food of the Indians at that time. In spite of all these difficulties and sufferings Jones remained in the valley until the period of prosperity came, and won a home where there is beauty and plenty. By his own energy he has from small and rude beginnings built one of the best flour mills in the county. He has the latest improved machinery, with twenty-seven horse-power from the mountain stream which plunges by his home, with thirty-seven feet fall. The Cambrian mills produce as fine a quality of flour as any in the country.

Jones was formerly a Mormon missionary, intensely in earnest, thoroughly believing in the gospel of the Latter Day Saints, and traveling thousands of miles for the sake of winning converts to the church and filling its treasury. In 1857 he came from Wales to this country, and was in Utah for several years. When he experienced the inside of Mormonism he did not like it and became a rebel. He was with the Morrisites in Weber valley and a cannon ball plowed its way between his legs, but he escaped unhurt, while many were killed in that short but terrific slaughter. From Mormonism he passed into Liberalism, and for years he has been one of the most earnest and generous supporters of our cause, and through his efforts and determination I hav made this campaign in Inyo county, which promises to be so successful. I lectured last evening in the schoolhouse at Round Valley, and it was crowded to its utmost capacity. This is the first time Freethought has been given from the platform, and I must confess that I am surprised at the enthusiasm with which it is received. The fires hav been smoldering for a long time. Now they blaze forth. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Good Memory.

From the Ironclad Age.

Mr. E. M. Macdonald is now the business manager of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Macdonald has very ably edited this Freethought paper since the death of its founder, D. M. Bennett, and there is no doubt that he will prove equally successful in the execution of his new duties, or rather his old ones, for if memory serves us right he was business manager for a number of years prior to Mr. Bennett's death.

English Notes.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: When a man begins to plow his field it is only the commencement of a big work. The plowing, sowing, and a multitude of other performances hav to be gone through before the harvest is reaped, but at harvest time the fruit of all the labor comes merrily with a hop, skip, and a jump, and all at once. It looks almost as though that is the program of Freethought work. We hav sown in sorrow, watching for the harvest, and hoping almost against hope that our labor would be rewarded with success. Who does not know the bitter disappointments the leaders of our movement hav had to experience? Beaten on all sides by the purveyors of superstition, they hav stuck to their guns whilst the faint-hearted hav said that their labor was all in vain. Those who should hav joined in the struggle hav stood aloof when trouble loomed in the distance. Others, less cowardly, marched onward against the skirmishers but remembered other engagements when they discovered themselvs in force. A noble few were stanch to their principles and fought all along the line, working with one hand at their daily toil and wielding a sword in the other. Thanks to this self-denying few, Christianity bids fair to succumb; and its preparations to yield do not come from one side or two, but from all sides.

And how do they come? Well, in England it is in this wise. The church has hitherto posed as the doer of all charity. Hospitals, asylums, and benevolent societies hav all been the offspring of that great mother. If you would only believe the priests and upholders of the superstition, not a good thing in the whole world but we hav to thank the church for giving it to us. One can easily see what a strong wall this argument was to batter against. The thoughtless, seeing the clergy so much mixed up in things, thought they were justified in their boasting; whilst the poor Secularist who disputed the point was yelled at as a maniac and hissed as an opponent to the well-being of the people. All that prejudice could do was done in support of the powers ecclesiastical.

Somehow or other, our views of the story are beginning to gain ground. The seed, sown so patiently during the spring-time of our movement, has long shown evidence of life, and here and there fields of promising corn hav dotted the country; but where we least looked for it, corn has been sown by other hands resulting in a rich harvest of precious corn. Even now, Mr. Stead, of Pall Mall Gazette fame, is stumping the country endeavoring to secularize the institutions already referred to above. The stanch supporter of the Salvation Army and of his holiness the pope of Rome is thus standing godfather to the Secularists. The keynote of his new mission is a Civic church, the details of which scheme, as expounded in Rochdale, I am about to giv you.

Mr. Stead commenced an earnest and at times vigorous speech by remarking that the mayor had not quite apprehended the message he wished to deliver that day. The spirit of the remarks was all right, but he wished it to be distinctly understood that he did not in the least limit his field to Christian men or Christian women. If they wished to get Christ's work done in Rochdale they would hav to be a great deal more particular about the willingness of the people that would help them than in troubling themselvs as to whether those people were connected with any denomination. And therefore he did not appeal to those who were labeled Christians particularly, but to everyon , whether Atheist, Agnostic, or whatever he might call himself, who was willing to assist in doing Christ's work, but might not, perhaps, call it that.

What was aimed at, was that there should be a church of Rochdale as clear and definit as there was a municipality of Rochdale, and that church should include amongst its members those who were willing to sacrifice more time, take more trouble, and spend more money if need be than they had hitherto done to save their fellow-men. It was immaterial whether it was through their municipality, their school board, their board of guardians, their coöperativ societies, or through any other institution that they sought to do the work required, so long as there was time and trouble taken in order to help somebody else. And when they did that, and when they were willing to labor hard to promote something in which they had no personal gain, they would hav a right to reckon on those persons as members of the living church in the town of Rochdale. (Applause.) He did not ask them to join together in order that by helping and working for the object in view they would be satisfying themselvs that they would be saved in the next world; he asked them to leave that an open question—for the Lord would know his own—and endeavor in the mean time to make Rochdale more of a heaven than it was at present. (Applause.) Proceeding to giv his audience some idea of the church he sought to establish, Mr. Stead remarked that if they were going to hav a church that was to be a reality, they would hav to establish it where it could be found when it was wanted. He thought that a church whose representativs could not be found by a postman was not a church that could be of great use to them. Where was there in all Rochdale a man who stood for the organized or unorganized Christianity of the town—a man who, as the mayor answered for all things municipal, could answer for all spiritual and altruistic work? He reminded them that in order to carry out their simple, ordinary, every-day secular work of laying their drains, removing manure, supplying them with gas and other things, they needed a common center, and they also needed a man in the person of their mayor who was responsible for seeing that that work was properly carried out. But had they such a center for their religious work? Or had they some one to stand for them as the mayor stood for the town? If they had in Rochdale they were more highly favored than those in other towns. Some might say that the vicar of the parish was the natural person for such a position. In that case let them hav the vicar, and let them ask the vicar to undertake the responsibility that lay upon the church of Rochdale. But the vicar would be the first to tell them that he had his own church and his own parish to look after, and that the burden of looking after the whole town would be too much for his shoulders. The collectiv evils of the town could only be met by the collectiv efforts of the whole Christian people, using that term to include Atheists, who did Christ's work now and again. As an illustration, Mr. Stead remarked that there was no drain in the most miserable part of the town but if stopped for twenty-four hours would put in motion the representativs of that part of the town, and they in turn had the power to use the whole of the executiv forces of the administration of the town, and even go to the extent of laying a rate, if that was needed, to get the drain unstopped. But when they had a drain stopped in the moral and spiritual world there was no person to whom they could appeal in the name of all organized efforts in the town. They ought to bring the same common sense to bear on those great problems of carrying out their great altruistic work as they did on questions affecting municipal government. It was only by collectiv action that they could hope to be as successful with their spiritual work as they were with their secular undertakings. The mayor, backed up by the law, represented "thou must," but a church, such as he proposed, which would not depend on law but on conscience and common sense, would represent "thou ought." (Hear, hear.) The way he proposed they should begin was that those who were in favor of such a church being established, and were willing to assist it by every means in their power, should send in their names, and afterward meet together to discuss the lines on which they should carry out their object. For instance, there were in Rochdale certain agencies at work for the public good. First and foremost these agencies included the churches and chapels of the town, then came the municipal administration—the town council, the school board, the board of guardians, the members of which were giving time and labor in endeavoring to make human life safe and existence tolerable in the town—and then their great coöperativ and friendly societies and kindred institutions, all of which might form amongst them what he should like to call "the representativ council of the civic church of Rochdale." He did not think they would call it that, for in most towns they would call it anything but that. At Glasgow, a federalized association of that character, which formed about the most hopeful and promising experiment of the kind in the United Kingdom, was called the Association for Improving the Condition of the People; while others, as at Brighton, were called civic centers. Personally, he should like, for the sake of historic and traditional continuity, to retain the word "church," but they might call the center what they liked. The chairman of the federation would practically be the civic bishop of the church.

As a matter of fact the whole idea of a "church" has been tabooed by the reverend and other worthies who attended the subsequent meeting. True, a society on these lines has been formed. The mayor has taken his place at the head; committees on various social questions hav been nominated; religious questions hav been excluded; and the clergy hav had to climb down to take their place amongst Atheists and heretics, admitting that Christianity has not been able to grasp the difficulties of modern life and seeking the improvement of society by purely secular views administered by a purely secular body.

Mr. Stead is now one of the most famous religious cranks of the day in England and Rochdale is a very important town in the North of England. We Secularists are naturally elated that the clergy should thus be brought to their knees and made to acknowledge that their fetich religion has had its day. Yours fraternally, SAM STANDRING.

Priest and Dupe.

Some years ago a member of Congress commenced his maiden speech with the declaration that mankind is composed of two unequal classes—viz., the humbuggers and the humbugged. It would be as true and more specific to say that mankind is composed mainly of priests and their dupes.

To say "the priest is the most useless thing on earth" does not cover the case; for he is the greatest evil on earth. All nations from time immemorial hav been afflicted by his presence and pretensions. He is a natural product of ignorance and credulity. In the most primitiv society, if some one of more acute sight can see farther than others, or with more sensitiv ear can sooner announce approaching danger, or can discover the cause and remedy of some fellow's stomach-ache, he is at once made a medicin man or priest to propitiate unfriendly spirits. This medicin man may really fancy that he has some influence with unseen forces, and therefore feel a responsibility. The sense of responsibility induces dreams and visions of and about spirit realms which he relates from time to time to the credulous barbarians. He gradually gains confidence and credence, and is soon found holding familiar converse with some great unseen spirit and receiving from it divine instructions.

But the revelations and commands made by different gods to prophets and priests at different times and different places differ widely, in fact, disagree materially, in respect to things both seen and unseen. The sunny god of the Chinese, the abstract god of the Hindoo, and the dignified god of the Greek, present striking contrasts to the cruel God of the Jew and Christian, and the nearly-as-bad god of the Mohammedan. These gods differ in character as do the different races of mankind. Each god is believed by its devotees to be an almighty, and yet is despised by the devotees of all others.

But though the gods differ, the priest, from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof throughout all generations, is the same character—an almost universal human parasite riding his dupes with spook spurs. And he claims this action to be his divine right and duty.

Sometimes the functions of priest and chief are combined in one person; but when they are separate the chief or king is generally subordinate to the priest; for the priest assumes and is believed to possess influence with supernatural powers to send weal or woe. In ancient Egypt the priest could and did cause a king to kill himself to avert something worse from the gods. The Bible givs numerous instances of kings being dethroned by or playing second fiddle to the priest. And since our gospel of peace was revealed, the priest has been generally superior to king when the functions are not united as they now are in England, Russia, China, etc. In 1077 Pope Gregory VII. excommunicated Henry IV., emperor of Germany, and kept him standing barefoot for three days and nights outside the papal gates begging pardon. A year or two ago a contention arose between the king of Siam and the Shinto high priest. The devotees sided with the priest, the king was banished, and the priest took his place. And there is not a monarch on earth to-day who could successfully cope with the pope of Rome for supremacy. These facts go to show that superstitious people hav less fear of visible than of imaginary, invisible powers.

That barbarians should reverence priest and fetich seems natural enough; that educated folks in this comparativly free land should remain subject to priest and charm is astonishing to one who uses reason; for facts and common sense tell them that the prayers of all the priests on earth combined never brought needed rain or averted a deluge.

The priest is an obstacle to human improvement. So long as he can make his dupes believe that their God sends wars and plagues among men, they will not do much to prevent them. So long as they believe human deformities to be the work of an overruling providence they will not know the true causes. So long as they believe their days to be numbered, they will not learn why it is that even here in the front rank of Christendom a majority die young if not in infancy.

The priest is expensiv and he is very numerous. It is safe to say that in the United States alone he numbers fully one hundred thousand. Taking $1,000 as the average salary or income, we find the snug annual sum of $100,000,000, exclusiv of presents at entertainments, marriages, baptisms, etc., and privilege of kissing brides, mothers, and babies. And the dupes provide it all.

Without building roads, digging canals, or tanning hides, the priest gets good living. In Mosaic times he had not only the best roasting pieces of the fat lambs and veals, while only the poorer parts were wasted on the altar, but he bagged the pelts also (Lev. vii, 8).

All the way down through the centuries of ignorance, superstition, and misery the priest is represented as being in a kind of stall-fed condition. Our own historian Abbott, in his "History of the French Revolution," says that "at that time nine-tenths of the peasant farmer's produce were exacted by church and state." The peasants rebelled—killed somebody—and the priest has howled about it ever since. Scott, in one of his novels, describes a friar priest in time of scarcity as having secreted in a wood preserve a larder well stocked with ale and venison. And during the present great famin in Russia, where many thousands are perishing from hunger, no intimation is given that any priest is losing flesh.

Noticing one day, in a market on upper Eighth avenue, two order-baskets filled with turkeys, chickens, and prime roasts, "Good godfrey," I inquired, "where is all that a-going?" "To the Paulist fathers," was the whispered reply. On the following Sunday the Paulists' dupes were instructed to contribute to the fund for local missions.

As one on emerging from a lonely wood in which the howl of a wolf has been heard breathes freer, so will the dupe breathe more freely when he gets rid of the parasitic priest with his spook spurs.

Kill the Bible by Ridicule.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: A few weeks ago you published an article from a correspondent who disapproved of your Bible pictures on the ground that ridicule was not a proper means to use. I ask the liberty to express a different opinion.

I believe that ridicule is as good and proper in its place as the most candid argument, and hav never yet seen any other book that was open to or deserved one-half as much ridicule as the Bible. It is a man-made book; no god had anything to do with its inspiration, and most of it was written by very ignorant men.

Take for example the story that God brought the animals he had made to Adam to see what he would call them. There were Adam and Eve but two days old; had never had a mother; had never heard a word spoken by human lips, and as far as language was concerned could only grunt like a couple of young pigs.

Think of an all-wise being bringing animals to be named to a man who could not speak a single word.

Laugh and grow fat
Whene'er you read that,
And make other people laugh, too;
And perhaps you may shame
Some priest-ridden dame
And teach her to think, "Is it true?"
When she reads that old hullabaloo,
That awful old hullabaloo.

I hav shamed scores of people out of the Bible, and out of the church, by ridiculing the ridiculous passages of that old book, and am doing the same now. I hav sold nine copies of your Bible Picture Book and should hav sold more if I had been able to travel about the city. In selling it I recommend it as the best book we hav, because it is killing off the Bible, which is the worst book published.

There are thousands of people who can be ridiculed and shamed out of their errors when they could not be reasoned or argued out of them, therefore I say to you, go on with your pictures and kill off the Bible as fast as you can. That book has done more harm in the world than all other books ever published. Eight words of the Bible, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv," caused seventy thousand honest old women and innocent young girls to be hanged or burnt as witches when there never was a witch on earth. The Bible has caused some millions of the best people of their time to be put to death by the most excruciating tortures men could devise. It is a man-made book, written by ignorant men. Each writer gave the Bible and its God a patch of his own character, and their God is a very imperfect being. They tell us he made an angel in heaven, but in a little while that angel rebelled and was cast out into the earth and became a devil, and with the help of a snake outwitted God and got all the human race away from him and got them doomed to an endless hell. They tell us that after God had finished his work here on earth he looked upon it and pronounced it very good, but in a little time he found man so imperfect that it repented God that he had made him, and grieved him to the heart. This shows that the Bible God is only a man-made myth, for if he had been a perfect being he would hav made a perfect angel and a perfect man.

But enough for the present. J. Hacker.

The Clergy Might Well Take It to Themselvs.

It is related that in the canton of Berne, in Switzerland, it had been customary, from time immemorial, to keep a bear at the public expense, and the people had been taught to believe that if they had not a bear they should all be undone. It happened some years ago that the bear then in being was taken sick and died too suddenly to hav his place immediately supplied with another. During the interregnum the people discovered that the corn grew and the vintage flourished, and the sun and moon continued to rise and set, and everything went on as before, and taking courage from the circumstances, they resolved not to keep any more bears, for, said they, "a bear's a very voracious, expensiv animal, and we were obliged to pull out his claws lest he should hurt the citizens."

The story of the bear of Berne was related in some of the French newspapers at the time of the flight of Louis XVI., and the application of it to monarchy could not be mistaken in France; but it seems that the aristocracy of Berne applied it to themselvs, and hav since prohibited the reading of French newspapers (Paine's Rights of Man, Part ii, note).

Positivism in France.

From the Popular Science Monthly.

Most of our readers are probably aware that the name "Positivism" was given by the French philosopher, Auguste Comte, to a system of thought and life which he professed to hav founded on the unmistakable teachings of science. According to his view, the world had passed through the stages of intellectual childhood (theology) and adolescence (metaphysics,) and had entered upon its maturity, the distinguishing mark of which would be the acceptance and systematic application of duly verified scientific truth. That Comte was a powerful thinker, with an altogether singular faculty for generalization, no one has ever been disposed to deny; and, although the scientific world in general has stood aloof from his system of thought as something too finished and definitiv, and therefore too restrictiv, for such an era of intellectual growth and expansion as the present, it has watched, not without sympathy, the efforts of his avowed followers to uphold the claims of science to a controling voice in human affairs, and to promote the higher intellectual and moral life of society by means of popular lectures of a superior character. On the other hand, Positivism has earned the hatred of the ecclesiastical foes of modern thought by the absoluteness of its rejection of their claims and pretensions. It is, therefore, an event of no ordinary importance that the leader of Positivism in France, the man whom Auguste Comte designated as his successor, should hav been selected by the minister of public instruction to fill the newly created chair of the general history of the sciences at the Collége de France, the most distinguished educational institution in the country. The chair was created, it is generally understood, with the express intention of offering it to M. Lafitte; and when the appointment was made it was greeted with almost unanimous approval by the press. Ecclesiastical journals, like the Univers, of course objected, and the minister of public instruction had to answer some interpellations in the legislature; but, on the whole, the government had every reason to congratulate itself on the effect produced on the public mind. Some of the comments of the Paris press are indeed very striking, showing a freedom in the expression of opinion to which in this country or in England the public is scarcely accustomed. "In these days of mystical reaction," says one paper (La Justice), "it was a very suitable thing to take strong ground for the Positiv and scientific spirit, and to proclaim in clear and lofty tones the one true religion, that which exalts the claims of humanity and of social duty." In defending his appointment in the senate, the minister of public instruction, after dwelling upon the intellectual qualifications of his nominee, paid the following tribute to his character: "Truly, if there is among us a modest man, a simple man, a man who has never courted notoriety, and who has reached his seventieth year without ever having asked anything of his country, it is M. Lafitte; and, for that reason this modest and conscientious scholar, this savant, whose whole life has been devoted to disinterested study, appeared to us to present the moral as well as the intellectual characteristics necessary for the high dignity of a professor in the Collége de France." Again, speaking of Positivism as a system, he observed: "This Positivist doctrin, that people talk about and that some execrate, is an extremely tolerant doctrin; you may say that tolerance lies at its very base. Its absolute rule is to proceed by means of observation and experiment; to limit its conclusions and affirmations to what is revealed by these special scientific methods; and as regards what lies beyond verification, to treat with respect every belief and every hypothesis. Positivism is, therefore, from the philosophical point of view what the unsectarian, or lay state is from the political point of view; and I did not, therefore, think that M. Lafitte's profession of this doctrin should alarm or disturb men's consciences in this country, or prevent me from nominating him to a chair of which he was worthy."

These are notable words to hav been spoken by a responsible minister in a country in which not long ago ecclesiasticism was so powerful. It is not necessary to hav adopted, or to approve of, the peculiarities which mark Positivism in its intellectual and especially in its practical aspects, in order to rejoice that its most eminent teacher should hav an opportunity of exhibiting its broader principles from the vantage-ground now afforded him, and of thus challenging for them, more openly than ever before, the criticism of the philosophical world. As to the action of the French government, we can only applaud the determination it shows to place competently represented systems of thought upon a footing of perfect equality.

Religious Impudence.

M. M. Trumbull in the Open Court.

I once knew a dancing-master whose care it was to explain to his pupils what was "etiquettical" in a ball-room. He gave me many valuable hints in deportment, and I try to observe them as closely as I can. Lately I hav been reading a little book which tells me what is and what is not "the correct thing" to do in a great variety of social situations, but I hav not been able to find anything in it on the subject of theological politeness; and this is the more curious because a code of etiquet is needed in the sectarian world. Men who are too well bred to intrude upon my private affairs, and who literally do not care whether I go to bodily ruin or not, will stop me on the street in amiable anxiety about my soul, and tell me how to save it. Is that politeness or presumption? In the language of the dancing-master, is it "etiquettical?" The reason why I ask is that the point has lately been raised in reference to the action of Professor Huxley, who, careless of his own spiritual welfare, indignantly tore up a tract which a disburser handed him in Barmouth, in Wales. It was not the gratuitous impudence of the evangelist that irritated the professor so much as the accompanying question, "Hav you got your soul saved?" The religious papers are unanimously of opinion that Professor Huxley was guilty of Agnostic rudeness in tearing up the tract, and that the colporteur was theologically polite in accosting him on the street, thrusting a tract into his hand, and asking about his soul. They do not allow that a man is entitled to privacy in spiritual as well as in temporal affairs; and they forget that an impertinence offered recklessly, whether it be taken as an insult or not, is an insult, and that the man who offers it must expect rebuke. Professor Huxley himself, describing the affair, and referring to the question, "Hav you got your soul saved?" says, "I hav sufficient respect for genuin religion to be revolted by blasphemous impertinences, so I answered somewhat sternly, 'That is my business.' And concluding the paper to be a tract, a form of literature I do not affect, I tore it up and threw it away. On reflection, I do not see what other course I could properly hav taken." Many a time I hav had a like experience; and once a holy person, who was very well aware of my peculiar views, accosted me and inquired about my soul. He gave the question a pungent flavor by a little pious vitriol administered in this agreeable form: "Your hair is a-getting white, and a-blossoming for the grave; and it's time for you to be a-thinking of your soul." I think there ought to be a book on religious etiquet. M. M. Trumbull.

Darwinian Astronomy.

From the Galveston Daily News.

Perhaps all the civilized planets formerly had tails when they were in their cometic or monkey state.

The Freethought Federation of America.

No political campaign in the history of the United States could exceed the one through which we hav just passed in the disgraceful exhibition of religious discord, religious rancor, and religious hatred. Never hav the passions of the devotees of superstitious faith been aroused to a greater degree than in the city of Columbus, O., during the recent political contest. Catholic has been cursing Protestant, and Protestant anathematizing Catholic. Each sect has resorted to the most vile and desperate schemes to secure political preference and to manipulate the avenues of government. The pulpit, which has never been very clean, has been reduced to the level of a common political pothouse and turned into a veritable political hell. The bitterness and intensity with which these opposing sects conducted the struggle for supremacy stands as a silent and significant witness of the farce of the union of the Christian church.

The first serious outbreak commenced on the 21st of October last, when the Roman Catholics turned out a parade nearly fifteen thousand strong, to the consternation of their enemies. It was the Columbian celebration services, and the vast array of pomp and vanity on the part of the Catholic church was, as the bishop himself declared, to show conclusivly the genuinness of the fealty of the Roman Catholic church to American institutions, and the patriotism and loyalty of her subjects to the American government. But the boasted loyalty, etc., of this ecclesiastico-political machine to the United States is brought down lower than a comedy, for in order to swell their numbers in the parade, the Roman Catholic bishop had ordered the imposition of a fine, in the sum of $5, upon each and every one that should fail to take part therein.

The outcome of the religious feud now existing in Columbus is that the secular government has been called upon to interfere, in suit for slander in the sum of $50,000, instituted by Father Eis, a Roman Catholic prelate, against Rev. Mr. Van Pelt, of the Methodist Episcopal church, and two other prominent citizens of Columbus. It is expected that a prolonged and bitter struggle will ensue, the termination of which it is difficult to prognosticate upon.

Since writing my last letter, I hav lectured once more in the city of Columbus and also in Massillon. My audiences were not very large in either place, doubtless owing to political excitement. My second audience in the latter place was a considerable improvement upon the first, for the result of the elections being known, public fervor had somewhat abated and the people again took up their interest in every-day life. My thanks are due to Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Moke, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Hunt, both of whom entertained me right nobly and tried their utmost to make my stay among them as pleasant as possible. Several names were taken upon the lists of the Federation, and several petitions to Congress are circulated through the town to open the gates of the Fair. I hav never entertained any serious thoughts that the Fair would be closed on Sundays, notwithstanding the closing clause passed by Congress; and now the following item clipped from the Ohio State Journal fills me with greater hope than ever:

> At the regular meeting of the World's Fair directors this afternoon a resolution was passed favoring the opening of the World's Fair gates on Sunday, provided the machinery be not run. The directors declare that as all the nations of the earth hav been invited to attend the Fair it would be highly discourteous and inhospitable to inform them that they cannot do on Sunday what they could were they at home.
> "The closing of the gates on Sunday," says the resolution, "means that thousands of artisans and mechanics to whom the exhibition will be of inestimable advantage will not be able to attend it." The directors say: "We are in favor of allowing every nation to hold within the ground such religious services as it may desire on Sunday." They also think it desirable that the gates should be open to allow visitors from different portions of the Union to meet socially at their state buildings.

But still we must not relax our efforts to induce Congress to repeal the clause, and hav these gates opened by the statutory laws of the land. Let every Freethinker do his utmost to assist President Putnam in his labors at Washington to this end.

Our numbers are still rapidly increasing. We are already close upon the two thousand mark, and with the names that President Putnam has secured, it is probable that we hav passed it, and are on the way to reach three thousand.

The Quaker city again sends a word of cheer backed up and encouraged by financial aid.

Illinois once more contributes her quota, and states what it desires to see done:

VIENNA, ILL., Oct. 26, 1892.

MR. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Dear Sir: We herewith send you $2 for the cause of Secularism vs. churchianity.

We want all done that can be done versus the present administration, because of its pandering to churches.

We are in favor of giving the churches the protection that the Constitution guarantees to them, but no more.

JOHN S. CRUM,
B. STURDEVANT.

Texas also sends us a good word with promis of assistance.

And Colorado, not wishing to be outdone, sends us a letter of confidence in the new movement.

The letters I hav received show conclusivly that the Federation has achieved a remarkable numerical success. And we mean to push onward again until our strength can be measured on a par with the devotees of faith, and to bring the Federation to such a pinnacle of success that it shall become a factor in the political problems of the day. Higher and higher we intend to climb—to carry our banner, the banner of human liberty, far above the groundworks of the enemy, and to place it in a haven of safety where it shall be free from the vicious attacks of ignorance and credulity.

We hav had considerable printing done in the form of constitutions, petitions, and Freethought political campaign documents. This has of a necessity involved us in a little debt, which must be paid before we can draw up other documents for the press. So once more I appeal to every Freethinker to send us a donation to assist in defraying expenses.

And now the usual period of thanksgiving is drawing near, and the president of the United States has issued his time-honored (?) proclamation to the people that they shall congregate in the churches and chapels to pray and sing in praise for the benefits and privileges conferred during the past year.

Upon reviewing the history of our land for the last twelve months we witness many incidents and calamities that would seem to rather merit our curses than our praise. Let the Homestead workers and Buffalo toilers speak out. For what must they be thankful? Let us be thankful that, even if Harrison did sign the bill to close the Fair on Sundays, our chances are rapidly increasing toward securing the repeal of that law. Must we be thankful that the Roman Catholic vote has triumphed and succeeded in returning its candidate to power? Must we be thankful that Congress has made an increased number of appropriations out of public funds to institutions of a sectarian character? But Freethinkers hav something to be thankful for, and that is the organization of the Federation; for by it we may be able ere another four years hav passed to boldly declare our position upon the political issues of the day and enforce a stoppage of religious legislation. And, friends, this is greatly needed, for, in addition to what I hav stated in the beginning of this letter concerning the approaching crisis in religious matters, certain events hav come to light since the election that fully corroborate my statements and should stir the heart of every Freethinker to renewed earnestness and vigor in this great fight for human liberty. An encyclical is being distributed broadcast throughout the country, purporting to hav emanated from the pope of Rome, wherein it is stated explicitly that "subjects of every rank and condition in the United States, and every individual who has taken an oath of loyalty to the United States in any way whatever, may be absolved from said oath, also from all duty, fidelity, and obedience, on or about September 5, 1893, at the convening of the Roman Catholic congress at Chicago, Ill." Whether this is authentic or not I cannot say, but still it is just what Rome would do if she dared.

But our Federation is growing. Hope is now our strength, and work the means by which we mean to triumph. Success is the star that leads us on to victory. Already I see its glimmering light beckoning us on with renewed vigor and fresh courage. The Federation is now placed beyond all possible chance of failure, and we shall strive yet to increase its strength, that church rule and priestly domination shall hav no place in this fair land of ours.

On Sunday last I lectured before the Ohio Liberal Society of Cincinnati, where I was greeted by an immense throng; the hall was well-nigh filled almost an hour before the time announced for the lecture.

The Freethinkers in this Ohio city are doing a grand and noble work, meeting with success after success, and they hav received such a quota of that that they dared not advertise my lecture for fear of being compelled to turn too many people away. George Light is still at the head and has been elected its president, which brings to mind the force of the first line in that hymn, "Lead, kindly Light." Andrew Hogg is again its secretary, and Messrs. Silverman and Allen hav charge of the finances.

This society has conducted a vigorous campaign since its organization. It has accomplished grand results, and it has a good balance of cash on hand for future work. Our friends here gave me an enthusiastic reception and expressed a wish that I should visit them again immediately upon my return from the coast.

Tuesday morning I leave the beautiful state of Ohio behind me, with all its pleasant associations and remembrances that hav formed during the past year. Many valued friendships and lasting friends hav been made since my advent into this state and I could scarcely leave without a tinge of regret.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH,

Items of Foreign News Interesting to Freethinkers.

The French Freethought Federation will hold its annual congress next month.

There is a movement on foot tending to the formation of a Scandinavian Freethought Federation, comprising Denmark, Norway, and Sweden.

Las Dominicales of September 30th announces the adhesion in one week of fifty-eight new societies to the International Freethought Federation.

The editor of the Danish Freethought journal, Tänk Selø, has been indicted for publishing a translation of Victor E. Lennstrand's article, "The Ascension of Christ."

Henry V. Berghell, the ex-Unitarian lecturer and Freethought exile, has left Minnesota for the Pacific coast, to engage in journalism, and, we may presume, study Theosophy.

The pious Catholics of Eickel, Westphalia, hav boycotted a certain Protestant brewer because at the recent visit of the Catholic bishop he failed to hoist the flag on his brewery.

The Freethinkers of Vienna, Austria, celebrated on October 1st the twenty-fourth anniversary of the uninterrupted existence of their society. The success of this society is mainly due to the efforts and energy of our friend Edward Schwella.

A recent decision of the Russian holy synod declares that "married Hebrews who hav entered the Greek Catholic church may, with the permission of the bishop, marry another woman if wife No. 1 has not been baptized in the only true faith."

"THE TRUTH SEEKER is the only American Freethought journal which represents the International Freethought Federation in the United States and Canada, and which contains a special column devoted to foreign news," says our contemporary Las Dominicales, Madrid.

We hereby inform our readers that our supply of publications from the Cometée d' Etudes Morales is exhausted, but as soon as new ones arrive we will notify. There are more French people reading THE TRUTH SEEKER than we supposed. We hav received twenty-three letters within eight days of the publication of our notice.

If, as we expect, the cholera should show itself next year here in the United States, we advise our readers, upon the authority of Norddeutche Katholic, to use the following remedy: Take the Lord's sacrament often, and then in penitent mind be present daily at morning and forenoon mass, and pray to Holy Joseph and Holy Rochus, the saints preventing epidemics.

According to the Observatore Romano, the official papal organ, the pope is not alone the spiritual head of all Catholics, but is likewise their infallible secular judge and monarch, whose decrees stand above those of the state. The Scarlet Lady begins to show her horns. It behooves Freethinkers to organize. Send in your names and coins to the Freethought Federation of America.

In Argenteuil, Trier, Kóln, and Rome there is preserved the whole and genuin coat of Jesus. The old genuin coat is to be put on exhibition in Argenteuil next year; while a new genuin coat (now being made to order and 1.45 meters long) will be shown in Trier, Aug. 10, 1893, as the only genuin coat, which was brought by Charlemagne to his sister, abbess of the Argenteuil cloister, from the Holy Land. Whether the Kóln and Rome only genuin coats will likewise be exhibited we cannot tell at the time of this writing.

We are the recipient of a Franco-German religious sheet, called the Rose of the Month. It is the organ of a Catholic Franco-German prayer society, which sends its supplication to Our Lady of the Holiest of Hearts (Mamma Mary, we suppose). It contains the information that in 1876 there were published in it 55,564 notices of thanks for prayers answered by Mrs. Holy Ghost. It is to be regretted that the paper does not giv the number of prayers not answered.

In Saxony, Germany, the police are to notify the nearest minister if a child has not been baptized. In the same country there are being organized societies for young people which instruct them in the "near coming of Christ." There is a union of state and church in Saxony. The way to prevent such a union here in the United States is to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER and distribute the same among your many friends, to organize and join the F reethought Federation of America.

At the recent Orientalist congress Prof. Max Müller, of Oxford, stated in a lecture on the "Age of Languages," that in the year 2000 B.C. Sanscrit and Zend had reached their full development, that it has taken more than one thousand years for French and Italian to differentiate to their present status, and that at least ten thousand years must hav passed to cause the division of the old Aryan language into six languages: Kelt, Teutonic, Slavonic, Greek, Latin, and Indo-Iranic. And yet we are asked to believe in five thousand years and a Babel tower.

Only a few years ago Victor E. Lennstrand and others were imprisoned and fined for speaking against Christianity, but times hav changed. On Nov. 25, 1888, Mr. Lennstrand notified the mayor of the city of Lund that he wished to deliver a lectur e. Permission was denied him, not alone to do this, but even to read passages of the Bible. Mr. Lennstrand brought a suit against the city, and last month the mayor was fined ninety crowns and different aldermen sums varying from twenty to eighty crowns. It took a long time for justice to assert herself, but she came at last. The decision is decidedly a victory for Freethought.

Politics in Germany is at the boiling-point. A new Culturkampf (battle between two kinds of intellectual development) is at hand. The Liberal party is divided into factions, yet strong enough to prevent the passage of the new army bill which entails an additional yearly expense of over one million marks. The government has made overtures to the Catholic party, as its vote secured means passage of the bill in question. But the church will not direct her minions to vote for the government measure unless certain concessions are made, among which are the readmittance of Jesuits to Germany, and parochial schools without state supervision. We should not be surprised to see the present emperor undertake a "pilgrimage to Canossa," and then alas for intellectual liberty in Germany.

At the recent annual congress held in Stockholm by the Swedish Freethought Federation, only a few societies sent their representativs, and in spite of the decided progress of Freethought sentiment in Sweden, we can but help noticing a considerable falling-off in that enthusiasm which pervaded the Federation during that time when our esteemed friend, Capt. Otto Thomson, was member of the general committee. Fritänkaren has now thirty-five hundred subscribers, and can pay its own way. A motion was made to guarantee Mr. Lennstrand a yearly salary. This we think is but right, for our friend, like Captain Thomson, has deposited on the altar of Freethought not alone his worldly goods but even his time and health. Swedish Freethinkers cannot be too liberal to their two apostles, Lennstrand and Thomson.

A Sunday in Boston.

I had "a call to preach" in Boston last Sunday, and, like the man in the moon, went down at noon, on Saturday, visited that emporium of celestial literature the Banner of Light bookstore at the back end of Bosworth street, and bought some TRUTH SEEKERS. This was the only place where I could find them in the city; why are they not more widely on sale at the news-stands? I am sure there would be a demand for them if they were shown to the public. I find many old Freethinkers who do not know that there is such a paper, or that there ever was a Freethought paper or society in the world. Is it any wonder that self-seeking superstition rules when truth keeps herself in a corner?

Sunday morning the streets were filled with not the most intelligent crowds, wending their way through the rain to the various be-crossed Christ saloons to eat little cracker-Gods. As I was bound for a reading-room the rain began to be too generous for the good of my Sunday-go-to-meeting headgear as I fronted one of these wide-open faith-houses, and I dodged in to dodge out of the shower. The inside fixings looked very fine, very foolish, and very costly, while the people appeared very tired, very timid, and very troubled. If they were the children of God, he doesn't take so good care of his own as they do of him. The man in the monkey-jacket at the bench of images and candles lighted to help the sun, went through many pantomimes, and the only cheerful sound was the uncertain voices of a hundred or two children singing something that I could not hear. Whilst there I saw one man beg a pinch of snuff of another man at prayer, sneeze, and pass out, and whilst passing the doorkeeper, who was on one knee counting prayers on a string of beads, he, the suppliant doorkeeper, made signs to the passer, who had taken a chew off a plug, and he cut another piece, and the prayer, with a "God bless you!" tucked it between his teeth. I hav not much opinion of tobacco, but doubtless it is as happifying and less harmful than anything else to be had in that Saint Noll's Museum.

As I passed on, I read on the bulletin of the People's church that the pastor, Emory J. Haynes, would preach on "Who Will See God." Being curious to know, or rather to know how he thought he knew, I entered and hearkened to the godly gabble, which was to this purport:

"In the gospel credited to Mark, Jesus is represented to hav said, 'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.' God is not to be seen by the eye, by the brain, by the intellect, but by the character, hence the expression, 'The pure in heart shall see God.' We shall see God by being like him. Religion is the recognization of the relation of the finite to the infinit. One may be moral and benevolent without being religious. Philanthropy is all right so far as it goes, but it is not religion; it does not work for the glory of God, which is the only true aim. The pure in heart seek to see God that they may learn how to do good. It is from those who hav seen God that hav come all our institutions for the benefit of man."

My comment is, if it takes a good man to see God, then it was not the sight of God which made him a good man. The best institution there is for the benefit of man is the government of the United States as it was designed to be by those who left God out to put man in. And those who are making the most mischief in our godless government, which they own is the best the sun ever shone upon, are the ones who are trying to put God in the Constitution and shut man out of the World's Fair on God's day, and out of everything but the penitentiary for telling the truth at any time.

In the afternoon some of the best-looking people in Boston disregarded the weather to come to Paine Memorial and patiently listen to my painful discourse on "God and the Bible" as displayed by Geo. H. Emerson, D.D., editor of the Universalist Christian Leader. The lecture is to be printed in the Boston Investigator, and I will put it in book shape if desired, and repeat it—or any other lecture when called for—at a reasonable price.

I see there is a proposition for Freethinkers to buy the Paine farm and keep it as a memorial to the Author-Hero of the Revolution and Morning Star of the Age of Reason. Let them do so by all means, and open a school on it where the young can get a decent education without having to go to a minister mill, or seminary of superstition.

Heston's medal for asinin Congressmen is immense. There should be an appropriation made to furnish a leather one for each priest-guided and saloon-ruled misrepresentativ who voted to padlock the World's Fair on Sunday. A people who will stand such imposition as theirs ought to lose their franchise and call themselvs cattle.

Petitions to Congress and to presidents regarding matters of constitutional right of the people do not appear to me to be the appropriate measure. What hav we votes for but to speak what we want, and if we cannot elect legislators of our own mind how can we expect that any others will heed our request? To be sure, in the Columbian show business there is not time to make a new Congress, but the asses who violated the Constitution to please the parsons should be made to know that it will be remembered at the polls by others than churchmen.

I do not count on the Charlesworth-Putnam party as the coming great party, but if it can help get the idea of Secular government into the heads of the people, all right. It will be a bad day when political lines are solely drawn on religious questions. If the Secular Union had been a success the Federation of Freethought would not hav been thought of, so the American Secular Union need not complain, but come to time.

Liberals along the line of the Northern Pacific desiring lectures should address him at 345 W. Randolph street, Chicago.

W. F. JAMIESON now livs in his old home, Albion, Mich., after an absence of eleven years. Here is a Methodist college, with more than five hundred students. It is a beautiful city, and a stronghold of religion. Liberals are so scarce there that he and his wife are boarding with a Methodist family with the Methodist minister at the head of the table.

THE last Manhattan Liberal Club lecture for November is as follows. The Club meets at 220 E. 15th street:

The Century When Christianity Reigned.

From Chauncey Depew's Columbian Expostition Address.

Absolutism in the state, and bigoted intolerance in the church, shackled popular unrest, and imprisoned thought and enterprise in the fifteenth century. The divine right of kings stamped out the faintest glimmer of revolt against tyranny; and the problems of science, whether of the skies or of the earth, whether of astronomy or geography, were solved or submerged by ecclesiastical decrees. The dungeon was ready for the philosopher who proclaimed the truths of the solar system, or the navigator who would prove the sphericity of the earth. An English Gladstone, or a French Gambetta, or a German Bismarck, or an Italian Garibaldi, or a Spanish Castelar, would hav been thought monsters, and their deaths at the stake, or on the scaffold, and under the anathemas of the church, would hav received the praise and approval of kings and nobles, of priests and peoples. Reason had no seat in spiritual or temporal realms. Punishment was the incentiv to patriotism, and piety was held possible by torture. Confessions of faith extorted from the writhing victim on the rack were believed efficacious in saving his soul from fires eternal beyond the grave. For all that humanity to-day cherishes as its best heritage and choicest gifts, there was neither thought nor hope.

Let Them Fight It Out Themselvs.

From the New York Sun.

They were two muscular, sun-browned sons of Erin enjoying their schooners of mixed ale in a Third avenue liquor saloon after a hard day's toil. Their mortar-spattered clothing and lime-eaten boots indicated that their calling was that of mason's helpers. They were talking of walking delegates and the possibility of more strikes in the building trades when a poke-bonneted Salvation Army lassie entered the saloon and importuned its patrons to buy the War Cry, the army's official organ. Approaching Pat and his friend, she thrust a paper between the two and asked:

"Hav a War Cry, sir?"

Pat put his half-drained schooner of mixed ale on the bar and inquired dryly, "War, is it? Who's the war betune?"

"Between God and the devil, sir," promptly replied the paper-vendor.

"Sure, then, let them fight it out betune themselvs. I'll hav nothin' to do wid it," and Paddy resumed his ale and his interrupted conversation with his friend, and the S. A. girl left the place with a full stock of the War Cry.

The Greek and the Roman Catholic Church.

SANDUSKY, O., Oct. 20, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I would like you to explain in your next paper, in what respect the Roman and Greek Catholic churches differ. GEO. BAKER.

[Of the Greek Catholic church the full title is the Holy Oriental (or Eastern) Orthodox Catholic Apostolic church. The words Holy Catholic Apostolic are derived from the Nicene creed, and are also claimed by the Roman church in an exclusiv sense. Oriental or Eastern designates the origin and geographical territory. The greatest stress is laid on the title Orthodox, and a special festival is devoted to its celebration—viz., "Orthodoxy Sunday," at the beginning of Lent, when a dramatic representation of the old ecumenical councils is given in the churches, and anathemas are pronounced against heresies. The popular designation Greek church, though not strictly correct, refers to the prevailing nationality and language in which most of its creeds, liturgies, and theological and ascetic literature are composed and its worship mainly conducted. The Greek church embraces, however, also the Russian and other Slavonic nationalities. It has its seat in western Asia and eastern Europe, chiefly in Turkey, Greece, Russia, and some parts of Austria. The numerical strength of the Greek church is estimated at one hundred millions. This church is divided into three great branches: 1. The Orthodox church in Turkey, under the patriarch of Constantinople, with the subordinate patriarchates of Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Antioch. Constantinople, the city of the first Christian emperor (New Rome), though now in the hands of the Turk, is still the natural center of the whole Greek church, and some hope that it may become for the Eastern world, at some future day, in Christian hands what Gregory Nazianzen eloquently described it to be in the fourth century, "the eye of the world, the strongest by sea and land, the bond of union between east and west, to which the most distant extremes from all sides come together, and to which they look up as to a common center and emporium of faith." 2. The Orthodox church in Russia, under the permanent holy synod of St. Petersburg and the czar, whose dominion now stretches in unbroken line across the two continents of Europe and Asia. The czar is the personal, as Constantinople is the local, center of the whole Greek church, and he keeps a lustful eye on the city of the Bosphorus as his future capital, where at no distant day there must be a tremendous reckoning with Mohammedanism. 3. The national church of the kingdom of Greece, which since 1833 is governed likewise by a permanent holy synod, but less dependent upon the state than the Russian church. The Greek Catholic church is the oldest in Christendom. She still occupies the sacred territory of primitiv Christianity, and claims most of the apostolic sees, as Jerusalem, Antioch, Ephesus. From the old Greeks she inherited the language and certain national traits of character, while she incorporated into herself also much of Jewish and Oriental piety. She produced the first Christian literature, apologies of the Christian faith, refutations of heretics, commentaries of the Bible, sermons, homilies, and ascetic treatises. The great majority of the early fathers, like the Apostles themselvs, used the Greek language. Polycarp, Ignatius, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Eusebius, Athanasius, Basil, Gregory of Nazianzen, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Cyril of Alexandria, the first Christian emperors from Constantine the Great, together with a host of martyrs and confessors, belong to the Greek communion. She elaborated the ecumenical dogmas of the trinity and Christology, and ruled the first seven ecumenical councils, which were all held in Constantinople or its immediate neighborhood (Nicæa, Chalcedon, Ephesus). In doctrin and theology the Greek church is substantially agreed with the Roman, but upon the whole more simple and less developed, though in some respects more subtle and metaphysical. The only serious doctrinal difference is that on the procession of the Holy Ghost. She adheres to the theology of the fathers, and ignores the succeeding scholastic theology of the schoolmen, who completed the Roman system. As to government, the Greek church is a patriarchal oligarchy, in distinction from the papal monarchy. The episcopal hierarchy is retained, the papacy rejected. The Vatican decrees of 1870 hav intensified the separation between the two churches. Centralization is unknown in the East. The patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem are equal in rights, though the first has a primacy of honor. The Eastern hierarchy resembles the Jewish type. The Greek priest within the veil of the sanctuary is concealed from the eyes of the people, but in social respects he is nearer the people than the Romish priest. He is allowed, even compelled, to marry once, but forbidden to marry twice. Celibacy is confined to bishops and monks. Absolution is given only in the form of a prayer, "May the Lord absolve thee!" instead of the positiv form, "I absolve thee." The confessional exists, but in a milder form, with less influence and abuse, than in Romanism. The laity are more independent, and the Russian czar, like the Byzantine emperor of old, is the head of the church in his dominion. As to the Greek cultus, it is much like the Roman Catholic, with the celebration of the sacrifice of the mass as its center, with an equal and even greater neglect of the sermon, and is addressed more to the senses and imagination than to the intellect and the heart. It is strongly Oriental, unintelligibly symbolical and mystical, and excessivly formalistic. The Greeks reject organs, musical instruments, and sculpture, and make less use of the fine arts in their churches than the Romanists; but they hav even a more complicated system of ritualism, with gorgeous display, semi-barbaric pomp, and endless changes of sacerdotal dress, crossings, gestures, genuflexions, prostrations, washings, processions, which absorb the attention of the senses. The most characteristic features of the Greek worship, as distinct from the Roman, are: the threefold immersion in baptism, with the repudiation of any other mode as essentially invalid; the simultaneous performance of the act of confirmation and the act of baptism, which in the West hav been separated; the anointing with oil in cases of dangerous illness, which Rome has changed into extreme unction of the dying; infant communion, which the Latin church has not only abandoned, but forbidden; the communion under two kinds; the use of leavened instead of unleavened bread in the eucharist; the standing and eastward posture in prayer; the stricter separation of the sexes; the use of the screen or veil before the altar, and the withdrawal of the performance of the mysteries from the eyes of the people. The worship of the saints, relics, flat images, and the cross is carried as far as, or even farther than, in the Roman church, but statues, bas-reliefs, and crucifixes are forbidden. The ruder the art the more intense is the superstition. In Russia especially, the veneration of pictures is carried to the utmost extent, and takes the place of the Protestant veneration for the Bible. The picture with the lamp burning before it is found and worshiped in the corner (the sacred place) of every room, in the street, over gateways, in offices, taverns, steamers, railway and telegraph stations, in the knapsack of every soldier—not as a work of art, but as an emblem, a lesson of instruction, an aid to devotion. In morals the Greek Catholics are behind even the Roman. In Russia there is a total divorce between religion and morality. The towns are adorned with churches and convents; every public event is celebrated by the building of a church; every house has an altar and sacred pictures; every child his guardian angel and baptismal cross; a Russian fasts every Wednesday and Friday, prays early and late, regularly attends mass, confesses his sins, pays devout respect to sacred places and things, makes pilgrimages to the tombs and shrines of saints, and has the phrase Slava Boga ("Glory to God") continually on his lips. And yet even the priests are grossly intemperate, and public officials even to the highest dignitaries are open to bribery. Concerning the extent of the canon of the scriptures the Eastern church stands midway between the Roman and the Protestant view concerning the Jewish Apocrypha. The "Orthodox Confession" repeatedly quotes the Apocrypha as authority, and the Synod of Jerusalem mentions several Apocryphal books—the Wisdom of Solomon, Judith, Tobit, the History of Bel and the Dragon, the History of Susannah, the Maccabees, and the Wisdom of Sirach—as parts of the holy scriptures. As to the circulation of the scriptures among the laity, it is not encouraged, and certain portions, especially of the Old Testament, are declared to be unfit for general use. But the Greek church has never expressly forbidden the reading of the Bible to the people, like the Roman; and the Orthodox church of Russia has always had a popular version of the Bible, first in the old Slavic, and now in modern. We turn now to the Roman Catholic church, which is that body of Christians which acknowledges the authority of the pope of Rome. It styles itself the Holy, Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman church. It is the largest and most powerful denomination of Christians, numbering two hundred million souls, or one-half of the Christian population of the globe. The Roman church is scattered all over the world. The metropolitan position of the city which for so many centuries had been the mistress of the world, Rome, and the supposed martyrdom of Peter and Paul, the Apostles, after closing their labors there, together with the widespread belief that Christ (Matt. xvi, 18) has instituted a perpetual primacy of the church in the person of Peter and his successors in office, supposed to be the bishops of Rome, are the chief causes of the rapid growth of that congregation to the highest influence. It inherited the ambition and prestige of empire, and simply substituted the cross for the sword as the symbol of power. The Roman church is an absolute monarchy, which culminates in the pope. The people are excluded from all participation even in temporal matters; they must obey the priests, as the priests must obey their bishop, and the bishops the pope, who claims to be the universal bishop, the successor of Peter, the vicar of Christ, and the visible representativ of almighty God upon earth. This system is the growth of ages, and has only reached its maturity in the Vatican council. The claim of the bishop of Rome to universal dominion over the Christian church, and even over the temporal kingdoms professing the Catholic faith, goes back to the days of Leo I. (440-461), and was renewed from time to time, by Nicholas I., Gregory VII., Innocent III., and Boniface VIII. But this claim was always resisted by the Greek church, which claimed equal rights for the Eastern patriarchs, and by the German emperors and other princes who were jealous of their sovereignty. The papal syllabus of 1864 reasserted the most extravagant claims of the medieval papacy and threatened the sovereignty of the state and the peace of modern society. The Roman church accompanies its members from the cradle to the grave, receiving them into life by baptism, dismissing them into the other world by extreme unction, and consecrating all their important acts by the sacramental mysteries and blessings. Its worship is the most elaborate system of ritualism, unless we except the Greek and Russian service. It is chiefly addressed to the eye and the ear. It draws all the fine arts into its service. Gothic cathedrals, altars, crucifixes, madonnas, pictures, statues, and relics of saints, rich decorations, solemn processions, operatic music, combine to lend their great attractions for the common people and for cultured persons of prevailing esthetic tastes, especially among the Latin races. Catholic worship is the same all over the world, even in language, the Latin being its sacred organ, and the vernacular being used only for sermons, which are subordinate. Its throne is the altar, not the pulpit—which usually stands away off in a corner. It centers in the mass.—ED. T. S.]

We Desire That Some One Answer This.

VALE, MD., Nov. 4, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: While reading your bright and pugnacious paper—some recent numbers of which hav been kindly sent me by a Liberal friend of mine—I am forcibly reminded of the modern scientist who, it is alleged, as the result of his investigations into natural phenomena "politely bows God out of his own universe." But the almighty does not receive even this scant courtesy at the hands of some of your contributors, by whom he is unceremoniously hustled and even kicked out of that same universe; and by the back door at that!

Now, I am a lover of freedom, and a firm believer in free thought, free speech, free trade, free land, and free men; and when occasion seems to require it, am not very much averse even to a free fight. But I am also a lover of fair play, and I want to see justice done to all sides. It seems to me that in your iconoclastic zeal you illustrate the proneness of human nature to go to extremes; and that while diligently and enthusiastically engaged in exterminating the tares of prejudice, bigotry, superstition, misconception, and misrepresentation with which the field of human thought has been so thickly sown by the arch-enemy—a work in which I heartily sympathize with you—you are in danger of uprooting the wheat also.

For the little tin God of orthodoxy I hav but little sympathy or respect, and you might continue to batter away at him to the end of the chapter without disconcerting me a particle or calling forth any remonstrance on my part. But when you question the existence of the deity in any form, and even deny the possibility of such existence—a denial by no means easy to verify, by the way—it seems to me you are treading on hazardous, not to say untenable, ground, and hindering, if not imperiling, the very cause of truth and humanity you claim to hav most at heart.

The arguments advanced by your paper are not new to me. I hav frequently met and combated them, with more or less success according to circumstances. For I hav read Infidel books, heard Infidel lectures, and lectured and debated on Freethought platforms, while Liberals of every shade of liberality and skepticism hav been among my intimate acquaintances. I hav found them, as a rule, Liberal in nature as well as in name, fair-minded and willing to discuss all topics temperately and rationally. Wherefore I hav no hesitation in asking your permission to call the attention of your readers and contributors, through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, to certain considerations which it seems to me are persistently overlooked by all whom I hav ever known to argue this question on the negativ side.

The champions of Freethought, I hav observed, never dread or avoid debate with any defender of orthodoxy, nor hav they cause to fear aught from such an encounter. For orthodoxy is so burdened with gross literalisms and perverted conceptions of God and his word, and so honeycombed with absurdities, that it is vulnerable in every part and invincible in none. Hence an easy victory is assured to Rationalism in every contest. But in the name of that truth and human welfare which I believe we all honestly seek and desire, I ask you to discuss these vital questions with me on the broad, firm ground of unbiased reason and logical common sense.

The existence of a supreme being may, I think, be inferred and affirmed, if not confirmed and established, by the threefold logic of nature, experience, and history, as well as by the deductions of pure reason and reflection. Let us briefly consider these in order.

We learn from daily experience, as well as from the teachings of science, that the source and support of the teeming life and activity with which this wonderful planet of ours is filled to overflowing, lie not in the compass of the globe itself, but are lodged in another body, vastly superior in size and power, and at an immense distance from it. For we know that if the sun should withdraw the light and heat of his rays for a season, all vegetable and animal life would cease to exist on this earth. Now, we know, also, that a singular unity of design runs through nature, and that in all her endless combinations the whole is usually mirrored in its parts, which are often so many reproductions of the whole on a smaller scale. It is this unity that makes analogy possible.

If the universe were self-derived, self-centered, self-sustained, self-developed, and self-governed—as is claimed—it seems logical to infer that, according to this law of analogy in its construction, each planet, being an epitome of the universe, would contain within itself everything needful to the maintenance and development of its varied activities—that the vitally necessary properties of light and heat would be self-derived. And so it might easily hav been, for any reason we can allege to the contrary. But nature has not so ordained it; but compels us, whether we will or no, to "look up" to a higher source for the origin of all our material blessings and even of life itself. Is it so irrational or illogical to infer that nature herself may in turn look up to a source above and beyond herself for the power that sustains and the law that directs her varied manifestations?

So much for the logic of nature, which may be elaborated indefinitly without exhausting the subject. But I hav time now only for the briefest hints.

When the skeptic has satisfactorily reasoned God out of the universe, the next thing he usually does—having lost his heavenly father—is to throw himself into the arms of Nature, "the universal Mother of us all," to seek in her embrace consolation for his orphaned soul. This Nature—which, by the way, is as pure an abstraction, as undemonstrable an entity, as God himself—he not only personifies in thought and speech, but unconsciously and instinctivly clothes with the essential attributes of personality, e. g. purpose and motiv, intelligence and beneficence, and these in a supreme degree—deifies her, in short; thus setting up a feminin god in the place of the masculin one he has just deposed; and thereby adding another to the long list of evidences of the indispensable necessity to the human soul of a deity of some sort to reverence and adore. For if the Atheistical scientist does not worship Nature in the true sense, then there is no such thing as worship in any sense. So much for the logic of human conduct, personal experience, and the irrepressible intuitions of the human mind.

Tradition and history add their concurrent testimony; for both declare that in some form or other, as an influence or an inspiration, God has never been absent from human affairs since mankind began to hav a history. In every land and tongue God has been acknowledged in some form and under some name or other, benignant or terrible according to the character of his worshipers and the idea they were capable of forming of his nature; but whether in a single or multiple form, as a hideous monster or as "the one altogether lovely," God is always present, always supernatural, invisible, all-powerful. What a colossal mistake Nature has made if this universal craving of the human mind, shared alike by skeptic and believer, has no warrant for its existence, is wholly meaningless! And if so, what a hopeless anomaly it is, without parallel in the realm of phenomena!

In an incipient pucker, the evolutionist sees not only the desire for an organ hitherto unpossessed, but its potential existence and the prophecy of its eventual attainment with a field for its use. In the well-developed yearning of the human soul for the deity, the skeptic sees—only baseless and useless superstition! But is he logical?

So much for the evidence of history and tradition. Let us turn now to the other side of the question and see what we can make of it. Granted, for the sake of argument, that there is no God, and never was—that the supernatural has no existence, and never could hav—what then? Why, we are at once brought face to face with a most awkward and startling dilemma that I wonder Freethinkers can so persistently overlook. Whatever service the devil or the deity may or may not hav rendered mankind, they hav certainly been most useful and indispensable scapegoats to bear the burden of humanity's superfluous sins. But what the dickens are we going to do for a substitute if neither the devil nor the deity be longer available, since they hav both been conclusivly reasoned out of existence? Will not humanity hav to stagger under a tremendous load of "original sin?" In such case, original indeed, since there is no devil to suggest or incite, and no God to share the responsibility of the sin as the creator of the sinner?

When the skeptic has succeeded in dethroning and annihilating God, the next thing he usually does is to install man in the vacant place of the deposed deity. So the next step to writing god with a small g seems to be naturally and inevitably to write Man with a big M. For you see, man is so bent on having a god of some kind, that sooner than go without one he will deify himself. But I warn him, in the name of history and experience, that he will find but sorry material there to make a god of. Can humanity contemplate without a blush the blackened record of its disgraceful past—for which it has now, remember, only itself to blame? Is not the first, last, and most persistent characteristic of human nature that forces itself upon our attention its inherent and ineradicable "cussedness"—to use no more opprobrious a term? Hav we not here indeed a worthy candidate for divine honors?

The saddest of all sad thoughts, to my mind, is the reflection that the most grievous misery, the most awful and intolerable agony, torture, grief, and despair, that much-suffering humanity has ever endured, hav been the work not of accident, not of wild and savage beasts, or of the insensate elements, but hav been the deliberate infliction of human hands—the work of those who were of kindred flesh and blood to their writhing, quivering victims. At the very thought of the atrocities that worse than savage men hav inflicted upon their fellow-beings, the heart turns sick with loathing; the recital of them chills the blood and makes the flesh to creep, while the sight of them would cause the sensitiv beholder to swoon or die outright of concentrated horror. No, not the malice of the devil, nor the vengeance of the almighty, but man's inhumanity to man, has made, and still makes, countless thousands mourn. May we not well ask, Of what substance are we made that human nature could be capable of such inhuman horrors?

For, consider, who were the tyrants who hav devastated the earth and made millions groan under intolerable burdens and yet more intolerable bondage? Were they not men, born of women, of like passions with ourselvs—very bone and flesh of our common humanity? And who were the priests who hav held the world in mental and spiritual bondage more abhorrent still, making merchandise not only of the bodies but of the souls of their victims—who were they but men—men, every mother's son of them? Whence hav originated kingcraft and priestcraft, tyranny and superstition, intolerance and bigotry, and all the foul brood of kindred evils that hav wrought havoc in the earth since the first page of recorded history? Whence but from the bosom of much-vaunted humanity? You cannot overdraw or exaggerate the awful picture of human crime and cruelty. You may dip your brush in the blackest pitch that ever seethed and bubbled in the sulphurous depths of the lowest hell and it will be none too dark to paint the dismal record.

And is it from this reeking sink of corruption that we are to look for saving, purifying, redeeming influences to emanate? Can the same spring send forth sweet and bitter waters? Do men gather grapes from thorns or figs from thistles? I know there is another side to the picture. Human nature does not always present itself to us in such revolting guise. But experience shows us that evil dwells potentially even in the best of men—that the victims of one generation may be the oppressors of the next; and at all times when we compare the number of the pure-hearted, generous, fair-minded, gentle, enlightened people in the world with the venal, mercenary, thoughtless, intolerant, imbruted masses, and realize how hopelessly the former are in the minority, the outlook is disheartening for the redemption of the race if it must be the unaided work of these alone. They are, indeed, the salt of the earth; but is not a deal of salt needed to sweeten such a mass of corruption?

"In knowledge lies our hope of salvation," says the scientist. "Sweep away the clouds of ignorance, superstition, and bigotry, and let in the light of truth," says the Liberal, "for the truth shall make you free. Let men learn and obey the laws of nature, if they would lead truly human lives. In freedom and rationality and intelligent obedience to the laws of their being lies the hope of humanity." This, if I understand right, is the Freethinker's plan of salvation—immeasurably superior, it must be confessed, to the so-called "gospel plan." Law is his Lord and his Redeemer. And thus, again, after having ceremoniously bowed the almighty out of the front door, or ignominiously kicked him out of the back door, man is constrained, after all, to reinstate him under the majestic name of Law, the Lord of all things, who can never be dispensed with; for a universe without a sovereign ruler is an inconceivable impossibility.

"All right," says the Atheist; "if you will only abandon your absurd, impossible personal God and worship Law and Reason as I do, I am with you. Our quarrel is ended, for we occupy precisely the same platform." Wait a minute, brother Atheist, let us first consider what is this Law, natural or spiritual?—from which we rightly or wrongly hope so much; and what warrant we hav for our expectation. Law possesses, as we know, one, at least, of the attributes of the almighty—it is all-powerful. No law of nature can be broken or annulled; none can even be transgressed with impunity. It is also omnipresent: wherever being or existence is, there also we find Law. And it is likewise immutable: the laws of gravitation, of magnetic attraction or repulsion, of growth and development, or of decay and death, are "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever."

But is this all? Is Law simply a force? and a blind force at that? Is there no purpose in its workings? no certainty in its effects, save the certainty of destruction to the transgressor? no benefit in its requirements? Does it pursue its relentless course heedless of weal or woe, a hard, inflexible, pitiless Necessity? Then is our last state worse than the first; then is freedom but a mocking delusion; for then are we the victims of a hopeless bondage worse than Egyptian servitude. For the worst human tyrant has his moments of relenting, and may be induced now and then to spare a victim; but when was inflexible, insensate Law ever known to yield to tears or entreaties? If this be so, then has Freethought but enhanced our misery by arousing us to a realization of our condition only to show us its utter hopelessness.

To be intelligible to our reason, Law must bear the stamp of rationality, coherency, design; to enlist our interest it must manifest a purpose, and that a clearly beneficent one; to command our allegiance it must be not only unerring, but immutable and invincible. Now when we hav got along so far, when we hav discovered unerring intelligence, undoubted beneficence, and invincible power controling and directing the universe—without all of which it would be speedily resolved into chaos—we need not look much further to find and recognize our God.

"But these are purely abstract qualities, and do not necessarily imply a personal deity," objects the Atheist.

True, my friend, but neither you nor I nor anyone else ever knew wisdom, intelligence, knowledge, affection, or benevolence disassociated from a being or personality of some sort. And having always found these qualities in their imperfect or limited manifestations inseparably connected with an imperfect, because finite, personality, we are logically justified—reasoning from the known to the unknown—in assuming that the same qualities in a perfect and infinit degree can exist only in connection with a perfect and infinit personality, which I call God. For these three attributes of wisdom, love, and power are all essential elements of personality and when combined giv us personality as the inevitable result.

To sum up: the universe bears throughout evidence of intelligent design and adaptation—if not, it were a waste of time for us to study its laws; of beneficent purpose—otherwise it were not to our advantage to obey its laws; and power to operate—else were it idle to try to understand and obey laws that after all could not be enforced. Now, design invariably implies a designer; intelligence cannot exist apart from a being who is intelligent, or benevolence apart from a being who is benevolent; and while we often find great power associated with inanimate things that are devoid of anything like personality, yet when intelligently controled and directed it implies a powerful personality behind it.

How will it injure mankind to look up through the blinding mists and fogs of their own folly and ignorance to an Infinit Wisdom that never errs, to permit their hard, cold, selfish, merciless hearts to be warmed, vivified, and humanized by the sunshine of an Infinit Love that never faileth, and to link their feeble efforts toward well-doing with an Infinit Power "mighty to save," and that is able to subdue all things to itself, even to the lowest depths of the most thoroughly depraved human heart?

This view of the question, I am well aware, revives old problems, chief among which is the presence of evil in a universe created and controled by Perfect Wisdom and Goodness, and the deliverance of the race from its present deplorable condition, never so fully realized and deplored as in this age of rational investigation. For my own part, I see but one way out of the dilemma—which I fully appreciate; and I will be glad to discuss it later on with anyone disposed to investigate the subject. For the present, I hav said enough, I hope, to prove that all the argument and all the logic are not on the negativ side of the question at issue between us; and that one may entertain firm convictions on the positiv side of that question without being necessarily a bigot, a hypocrit, or a fool.

Yours for truth, progress, and humanity,

A. AUGUSTA CHAPMAN.

Charming Manners.

Who does not recognize the charm and beauty of good manners? They attract and please, giving warmth, pleasure, ease, and comfort to all. Like a sunrise in a morning in May they diffuse light and pleasure over the world. Good manners, when not artificial and used to hide the evil in people, express the gentle nature of the individual, the qualities of honesty, virtue, self-respect, kindness, and generosity.

Anger, animosity, gossip, scandal, selfishness, violent language, are all foreign to good manners, and should never be indulged. Thoughtfulness for others, the endeavors to make others happy and at ease, are first steps to grace of manners. In fact, the whole matter of fine manners may be resolved into the doing unto others as we would wish others to do to us. The practice of this is always resultant in graceful manners, as

Politeness is to do and say
The kindest things in the kindest way.

Correspondence.

ATCHISON, KAN., Oct. 20, 1892.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Esteemed Friend: I received your very kind and welcome letter some time ago, and should hav made an acknowledgment ere this, but for the fact that I hav been too busy to attend to my correspondence at all. I thank you most heartily for the clay from the grave of that brave-hearted woman, Ernestine L. Rose. I shall always retain it as a memento of her busy life in behalf of humanity. Mrs. Rose should be honored by every Freethinker in this world.

I extend to you my heartiest congratulations on your safe return home, and the assurance that the Freethinkers of this country gladly welcome you back to the land of your birth—the land for which you hav put forth your foremost efforts in trying to help save her from the poisonous influences of priestcraft, and the blighting curse of superstition. Your articles in the Corner, describing your voyage across the ocean, and the wonderful sights in the Old World, are read with much interest. I hope you will publish a book describing your tour.

Well, since I last wrote to you and the Cornerites, we hav removed to the city of Atchison. Although it was hard to giv up the exhilarating conditions of country life, yet we like our new home and surroundings very much, even much more than we anticipated. Atchison is a picturesque city located in the great Western Bend of the Missouri river. It has a population of about twenty-three thousand. It has electric lights, gas, city water works, a paid fire department, three lines of street railway, the largest lumber yards in the United States, the largest foundry and flouring mills in the state, the largest drug house west of St. Louis, four large elevators, eight banks, six large public school buildings, besides Mount St. Scholastica Academy, St. Benedict's College, St. Louis College, Midland College, and a splendid commercial college.

Atchison is the railroad center of Kansas. It has thirteen railroads. Seventy-eight passenger trains arrive and depart from its Union depot each twenty-four hours. The wholesale merchants of Atchison in 1888 did a jobbing trade of over $80,000,000. It is the only city in Kansas that manufactures vitrified paving brick.

Atchison has about fifteen churches, but nevertheless it has many avowed Freethinkers. We are thinking of organizing a Freethought society. I believe that if some good Freethought lecturer would come this way and giv several lectures, the city would not hav use for so many churches. I believe we could easily raise the necessary funds to defray the expenses of a lecture, and I think we could, by proper advertising, insure a large audience.

I am working on the Daily Champion. It is a splendid newspaper, and is a credit to Atchison (not because I am working on it, but because it is edited by Lieut.-Gov. A. J. Felt, one of the ablest men in Kansas). Atchison has two other good newspapers, the Globe and Patriot. Hon. E. W. Howe, of the Globe, is a great novelist. His "Story of a Country Town" is considered one of the best novels of the age. Mr. Howe is a man of heavy build, a well-developed head, and a smooth face, which resembles that of Colonel Ingersoll very much. He has a twinkle in his eye which foretells of the wit and genius of his fertil brain. The witticisms that appear in his paper are quoted in papers all over the country. It is hard to pick up a paper without finding something from the Atchison Globe. Suffice to say, Mr. Howe is a Freethinker. Mr. S. F. Stambaugh, of the Patriot, is a smooth writer and an able journalist. I hav worked for him, and I consider him one of the most genial men I ever met. I know not what Mr. Stambaugh's religion is, but he must be an ardent admirer of Colonel Ingersoll, as he publishes a great many quotations from the great orator.

To-morrow is Columbus day, and Atchison is anticipating one of the biggest celebrations ever held in the city. The schools will each render a splendid program, and there will be speaking by good orators and a grand procession. There will also be various other demonstrations.

Atchison is the home of Hon. John J. Ingalls, one of the ablest men in America. He has just returned from a foreign tour, and on his return home he was given a grand reception in the elegant and spacious parlors of the Byram Hotel, where hundreds of people assembled to welcome their honored fellow-citizen to his home again. Senator Ingalls is fondly attached to Atchison. In a recent interview with a Kansas City Star reporter, he said: "To me Atchison is the dearest spot on earth. Here I was married, here my children hav been born, here my dead are buried, and here I shall be buried when it comes my time."

I am circulating a petition in this country to keep the gates of the World's Fair open on Sunday. I am getting quite a number of signers.

As this letter is getting rather lengthy, I will write no more at present. With best wishes to you and my Corner friends, I remain, Sincerely,

GEORGE J. REMSBURG.

LEWISPORT, KY., Sept. 20, 1892.

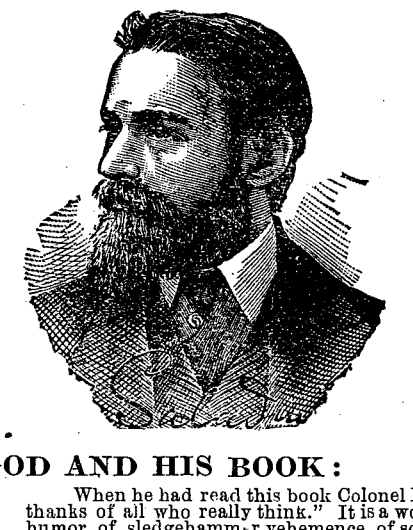
MISS S. H. WIXON: Thanks for your letters learning us how to liv by showing us the pitfalls of others away over the ocean. I often say to my young friends who hav no time to read ancient history, "Subscribe for a live Freethought paper or magazine and you will become learned at your leisure; besides, you will feel you are in the natural line with yourself."

A few days ago my little granddaughter said, "Grandpa, cool my 'tato." "Who gave you this potato?" "My sweet mamma. She is not mad." Now, this baby is twenty-three months old. This led me to think at what age I was when I noticed that my dear mother's face was looking sad on Sunday when the Presbyterian preachers came around with their long faces and doleful talk. Lydia's mother does not get mad at her, nor does she trouble herself about the cruel religion that my dear mother had, sixty or more years ago, which made her miserable. If we believe this religion we are bound to be miserable. If we pretend to believe it and do not, we are out of line with the world as it should be. And every step on the wrong road leads us away from the right place.

These preachers seemed to think sadness a virtue. But long years ago I learned that money and good living were their principal virtues. I find that the fate of rich Dives, who fared sumptuously every day, does not prevent the clergy or Christians generally from enjoying as many comforts as they can get. Jesus said, "Blessed are the poor." This is not so much a consolation to the poor as it is to the rich, who grind the poor to compete individually with each other, and collectivly to be tyrannized over by the collectivity of the rich in church and state.

I said to a clergyman: "It seems to me your class do not believe in equal human liberty and comforts as essentially necessary to the happiness of all mankind." He replied: "I believe in what you don't." "What is that?" said I. "Free will." "Why, my dear sir, you condemn free thought and preach that free will is a crime. What would the world be if every fool or villain should hav his own way? Freethought, with the privilege of expression, is education; education is civility."

I hope the coming children will not be taught that it is the proper thing to die or liv on the goodness of anybody, even a Jesus. Truth is the only real satisfaction.



I just nursed our little Lydia to sleep by singing, "O baby!" Oh, how we do love her! They say she was born wicked, when she knows nothing but love. And fear—what a shame that we hav a class who must preach a falsehood so cruel to fill their pockets and cormorant stomachs! Nature feeds all mankind on what they eat, even falsehood. It seems to me that many people are above or afraid of sympathy as not manly. Not long ago I was consulted by a rich friend as to a little business. I advised him to leniency to his debtor. He said that was not business. Is business a villain? If so, let us hav less of it and more sympathy for man, woman, and child. GEORGE SMITH.

P.S.—My neighbor and Freethinker friend, Mrs. Johnson, who lost a little daughter seven years old about the time you lost a niece, wants to know if you hav another niece. This child was her only daughter. She has one son older. She seems to identify your niece and her child together. She seems lonely. Write her a letter or answer the same in the Children's Corner and oblige

MRS. JOHNSON.

[No other niece has come into the heart and home of the editor of the Corner. We miss little Susie from day to day. We shall always miss her. Her death shattered many bright hopes and brilliant expectations. But we love all children for her dear sake, as well as for their own worthiness. We assure Mrs. Johnson of our tender sympathy in her bereavement. We know what it is to see the vacant chair, to listen in vain for the merry prattle of a childish voice. Yet those who die young escape many trials and many heartaches. They are safe.—ED. C. C.]

GOD AND HIS BOOK:
When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You hav earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.
Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.
The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."
In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered. $2.50.

DID JESUS RISE FROM THE DEAD?
The evidence for the resurrection is in this book carefully considered, and found wanting. It ought to convince every Christian of the untrutbfulness of this alleged miracle, for it is certainly one of the best essays ever written on the subject.
In paper, 25 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.
A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.
A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science.
In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.
Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.
This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius.
Cloth, gold-lettered. 75 cents.

ISAURE and OTHER POEMS.
The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.
By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin.
In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.
Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.
A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.
Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Licentiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Absolution; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Liguori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attempts at Continency even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism.
In paper, 25 cents.

He says: "If any man or men want to see me privately on an affair of honor, my address is 28 Franklin street." There are rumors of a duel.

IN the suit of an Alleghany county, N. Y., man for divorce, the principal charge is that his wife taxed him with mentioning in prayer only his children by a former marriage and not hers, and as he did not deny it ordered him to include the latter, and at his refusal seized his hair with both hands and pulled him to the floor and held him till he prayed as bid.

PRESIDENT HARRISON'S Thanksgiving proclamation says that God "has stayed the pestilence at our door; he has awakened a deeper reverence for law; he has blessed our schools and is bringing forward a patriotic and God-fearing generation to execute his great and benevolent designs for our country; he has given us great increase in material wealth; he has given his grace to the sorrowing."

THE Toledo superintendent of schools recently made charges that the American Protectiv Association, through Dr. Cott, board of education member, had tried to compel him to dismiss Catholic and Hebrew teachers, and had tried to make the examination papers so that Catholics would not pass, however well qualified. This brings the religious war at Toledo to a focus, and the matter will go into the criminal court.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.

Essays Upon Some Controverted Questions. By Thomas H. Huxley, F.R.S. New York: Appleton & Co. Cloth; pp. 490; price, $2.

This volume is composed of articles reprinted from the two English magazines, the Nineteenth Century and the Fortnightly Review. In these pieces Professor Huxley has from time to time attacked and exploded such of the false assertions of Christians as he found attracting too much the attention of the public and deceiving that o'ergullible body. As Huxley is admittedly the most competent authority of the day in general physical science, his championing of our Antichristian cause has been very grateful to us and won him high thanks. A few among the titles of his articles are: "Mr. Gladstone and Genesis," "The Evolution of Theology," "Science and Morals," "Science and Pseudo-Science," "Agnosticism," "The Value of Witness to the Miraculous," "Agnosticism and Christianity," "The Lights of the Church and the Light of Science," "Illustrations of Mr. Gladstone's Controversial Methods." The volume will be found highly instructiv. To many it will be, besides instructiv, pleasing; it will be this to those who hav leisure for diffuse treatment of subjects; who hav had a certain grounding in history and physical science; who like their information at first hand, and who are alive to the preciousness and charm of that rare quality, cautiousness and nice accuracy in assertion. To others, however, the volume will be less pleasing. For the treatment is too detailed for those who run in this dispatchful American world to read; the sentences are long, the words many, and the phrasing is often technical when it could as easily hav been popular. Nevertheless, thanks to our powerful champion! Behold him, for a specimen, overtilting Superstition's slender hero Gladstone: "The first chapter of Genesis teaches the supernatural creation of the present forms of life; modern science teaches that they hav come about by evolution. The first chapter of Genesis teaches the successiv origin—firstly, of all the plants, secondly, of all the aquatic and aërial animals, thirdly, of all the terrestrial animals, which now exist—during distinct intervals of time; modern science teaches that, throughout all the duration of an immensely long past, so far as we hay any adequate knowledge of it (that is as far back as the Silurian epoch), plants, aquatic, aërial, and terrestrial animals hav coexisted; that the earliest known are unlike those which at present exist; and that the modern species hav come into existence as the last terms of a series, the members of which hav appeared one after another. Thus, far from confirming the account in Genesis, the results of modern science, so far as they go, are in principle, as in detail, hopelessly discordant with it."

Handbook of Scientific Agnosticism. By Richard Bithell, B.Sc., Ph.D. London: Watts & Co. Cloth; pp 64; price, $1.

The title of this book sufficiently explains its nature. We will add that its merit is considerable. The author had before written two books developing his personal views on Agnosticism and kindred topics, and eventually concluded that it would fill a popular need to issue a work embodying such views as are not merely personal to himself but are held by the generality of Agnostics. He says in his preface:

"As the work was passing through the press it was subjected to the revision of a committee; and, as this committee was responsible to a large extent for the opinions herein recorded, it has exercised its right, as well as discharged its duty, by amending sundry modes of expression, or by the excision of passages which it thought would not meet with the approval of Agnostics generally."

The first chapter is devoted to Definition of Terms; the second to Vulgar Agnosticism; the third to Inchoate or Pre-Scientific Agnosticism. This early history of Agnosticism is interesting. The term "Agnostic" is of very recent origin, but, remarks Mr. Bithell, in the time of the sagacious philosopher Locke, two centuries ago, we find "a phraseology coming into use which clearly foreshadowed the progress of the Agnostic idea. The word itself was not used; still less did anyone call himself by that name. As to the scientific method of research adopted and inculcated by modern Agnostics, it was not so much as formulated till after the lapse of many years. . . . John Locke relates how, when discoursing with a few friends on some scientific subject, they 'found themselvs quickly at a stand, by the difficulties that arose on every side. After we had for a while puzzled ourselvs, without coming any nearer to a resolution of those doubts that perplexed us, it came into my thoughts that we took a wrong course, and that, before we set ourselvs upon inquiries of that nature, it was necessary to examin our own abilities, and see what objects our understandings were fitted or not fitted to deal with.' The result of this conviction upon Locke was the production of his celebrated 'Essay Concerning Human Understanding,' wherein the limitations of the human faculties were roughly outlined and very strongly insisted on. Hume profited by this warning, and undertook an essay bearing almost the same title ('An Inquiry Concerning Human Understanding') as Locke's. In the section treating of the idea of Necessary Connection we find him meeting with questions that 'must forever escape our most diligent inquiry;' facts that are in the 'last degree mysterious and unintelligible;' animal powers operating in such a manner as is 'wholly beyond our comprehension;' events effected by an energy which is 'unknown and inconceivable.' . . . The result was a clearer perception of the limitations under which the human mind must necessarily work and a more definit tracing of the line between what we hav the power of knowing and what, from the very nature of the case, cannot possibly be known. This change was brought about by the more diligent study of the phenomena of consciousness, a human faculty much talked about by all sorts and conditions of men, but mostly with a very inadequate idea of its importance or its functions." We must content ourselvs with mentioning merely the titles of Mr. Bithell's remaining chapters: Scientific Agnosticism, Part II—The Fundamental Postulates of Agnosticism—Feeling and Sensation, Consciousness, Knowledge, Relativity, Belief, Faith; Part III—The Agnostic Method and Its Applications—Physical Science, Physiology, Psychology, Metaphysics, History, Theology.

Autumn. From the Journal of Henry D. Thoreau. Edited by H. G. O. Blake. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Cloth; pp. 470; price, $1.50.

Sundry of our readers hav perchance done us the honor to retain in their memories something of our late sketch of that strange character, Henry Thoreau. He was, they may recall, a highly original individual. He was self-balanced and self-dependent. He scorned the traditionist and the formulist, and fled far from convention and pretense. He loved equally the observation of every-day nature about him and the most wingy and sky-aspiring flights of transcendental meditation. Besides his other writings, he kept a Journal from which gleanings hav been published under the titles of "Winter," "Spring," and "Summer." Now a new volume, "Autumn," has been added. It consists of observations of nature's ongoings as he marked them day by day, with which are interspersed musings the loftiest and judgments the most piercing.

Thoreau loves simpleness and veracity. We Freethinkers and Agnostics all know how many loose habits of exaggerating, or asserting before proof, or speaking cant instead of our plain thought, must be got rid of on the road from popular Christianity and worldliness to the life of the simple seeker of truth. So we sympathize with Thoreau's remark:

"How much forbearance, aye, sacrifice and loss, goes to every accomplishment! I am thinking by what long disciplin and at what cost, a man learns to speak simply at last."

The perfecting of self, the upbuilding of one's own character, is to Thoreau of incomparably greater value than the winning of the applause of worldlings. In this strain he says:

"It is to be remembered that by good deeds or words you encourage yourself, who always hav need to witness or hear them."

Thoreau ever counsels to originality, to an utter disregard of the world's canons and customs. Of his incitements in this direction this is a sample:

"Say the thing with which you labor. It is a waste of time for the writer to use his talents merely. Be faithful to your genius. Write in the strain that interests you most. Consult not the popular taste."

To the moderatists and cagelings of orthodoxy, the truth-avoiders and truth-hiders, our writer thunders thus:

"Preaching? lecturing? Who are ye that ask for these things? What do you want to hear, ye puling infants? A trumpet sound that would train you up to manhood? or a nurse's lullaby? The preachers and lecturers deal with men of straw, as they are men of straw themselvs. Why, a free-spoken men, of sound lungs, cannot draw a long breath, without causing your rotten institutions to come toppling down, by the vacuum he makes. Your church is a baby-house made of blocks, and so of the state. It would be a relief to breathe one's self occasionally, among men. Freedom of speech! It hath not entered into your hearts to conceive what these words mean. The church, the state, the school, the magazine, think they are liberal and free! It is the freedom of a prison yard. What is it you tolerate, you church to-day? Not truth, but a life-long hypocrisy. The voice that goes up from the monthly concerts is not so brave and cheery as that which rises from the frog-ponds of the land. Look at your editors of popular magazines. I hav dealt with two or three of the most liberal of them. They are afraid to print a whole sentence, a sound sentence, a free-spoken sentence. We want to get 30,000 subscribers, and will do anything to get them. They consult the D.D.'s and all the letters of the alphabet, before printing a sentence."

A reflection out of the line of the foregoing, and which may seem empty enough to some but will hit a chord in certain ponderers, shall form our closing excerpt from that fit Freethinker's ideal, Thoreau:

"Wonderful, wonderful is our life, and that of our companions. That there should be such a thing as a brute animal, not human! that it should attain to a sort of society with our race! Think of cats, for instance; they are neither Chinese nor Tartars, they neither go to school, nor read the Testament. Yet how near they come to doing so, how much they are like us who do so."

We hail with no little pleasure the Agnostic Annual for 1893. The Agnostic Annual issues each autumn in London, England, from the neat-executing printing-house of W. Stewart & Co. In it every year a troop of the ablest pioneers of progress strike vigorous blows ahead at the huge front of the Unsolved and Unascertained, while their axes fail not of plentiful back-swings against the drag and cumbrance of Christianity. The table of contents this time sets forth the following tempting array: "The Moral Sanction," Leslie Stephen; "Reverent Agnosticism," Amos Waters; "The Mother Nature: A Poem," Gerald Massey; "Dogmatism in Theology," Alfred Momerie, M.A., LL.D.; "Sermons on the Mount," Samuel Laing; "The City of the Dead," W. Stewart Ross (Saladin); "On the Duty of Honesty in our Convictions," C. E. Plumptre; "Scientific Religion," R. Bithel, B.Sc., Ph.D.; "The Blight of Superstition," Charles Watts; "Anthropology and Orthodoxy," Edward Clodd; "The Disappearance of the Nether World," F. J. Leslie Stephen, so that interested readers will purchase to continue "this fascinating romance" (no disrespect meant Mr. Stephen): "The question is not unfrequently put to Utilitarians: What is the ultimate sanction of your morality? Why, in the last resort, should a man do good rather than evil? And it is frequently put with an air of triumph, as though it were obvious that no satisfactory reply could be made. I propose to say a word or two upon this point, rather with a view to clearing the issues than to making any attempt toward a complete answer. First of all, I hold that there is, potentially at least, a science of ethics; or that it is desirable to treat ethical problems by scientific methods. A science is in this as in other cases simply an organization of our knowledge, resulting in a systematic statement of facts. This formation of a science is precisely what has been attempted more or less crudely by Utilitarians, and upon more elaborate methods by Evolutionists. Now, from this point of view, we hav to inquire what is in point of fact the general formula, supposing such a formula to be discoverable, of the existing moral law, and of the laws from which it has been developed? What again, we hav to ask, is the nature of the motivs which lead men to obey that law, so far as they do obey it; or to regard obedience to it with approval?" The price of the Agnostic Annual is 25 cents.

ARGUMENT
IN THE
Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,
At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acu en is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Heathen Illustration of the Temptation.]

The Bundehesh (a sacred book of the Persians,) states that Ahuramazda after creating the first man and woman, Mashya and Mashyana, bade them "to be humble of heart; to observe the law; to be pure in their thoughts, pure in their speech, pure in their actions." But an evil demon came to them in the form of a Serpent, sent by Ahriman, the prince of devils, and gave them fruit of a wonderful tree, which imparted immortality. Evil inclinations then entered their hearts, and all their moral excellence was destroyed. Consequently they fell, and forfeited the eternal happiness for which they were destined. They killed beasts, and clothed themselves in their skins.

BIBLE MYTHS shows this to be the origin of the Hebrew story.

Life of Thomas Paine,

WITH A

History of His Literary, Political, and Religious Career in America, France, and England.

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY,

Author of "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," "George Washington and Mount Vernon," "Washington's Rules of Civility," etc.

To Which Is added a Sketch of Paine by William Cobbett.

No real biography of Paine has ever appeared. The so-called Lives of Paine have been mainly the controversial work of pamphleteers, turning chiefly on his religious heresies. Paine was in his fifty-eighth year before he published anything concerning religion, and before that time he had acted an important part in revolutionary movements in the United States, England, and France. But in the religious conflict initiated by him, his political services and military career hav been but inadequately considered. A certain historical ostracism has buried in the archives of various countries a large mass of documents containing records of paramount interest and importance. Mr. Conway has personally searched such records, in Europe and America, and has obtained from these fresh light, not only on Paine, but on various eminent figures in American and European history with whom he was associated. A large amount of unpublished correspondence has been included in the volumes.

Mr. Conway says in his Preface: "In the laborious work of searching out the real Paine I hav found a general appreciation of its importance, and it will be seen in the following pages that generous assistance has been rendered by English clergymen, by official persons in Europe and America, by persons of all beliefs and no beliefs. In no instance have I been impeded by any prejudice, religious or political. The curators of archives, private collectors, owners of important documents bearing on the subject, have welcomed my effort to bring the truth to light."

Russia.

Russia is the most Christian nation of Europe and she is also the most miserable one. Thus she affords the Freethinker an excellent citation when he is met by Christians with the assertion that their religion promotes civilization and well-being. Every Christian making this assertion should be pointedly informed that the nation most thoroughly permeated with Christianity, and most devoid of science and Freethought, is the most unprosperous, backward, afflicted, and woe-stricken.

That Russia is the most thoroughly Christian country is not in doubt. Spain, Portugal, and Ireland are lands strong in the faith, but they do not equal Russia's completeness of orthodoxy. In them there is a certain amount of Antichristian speech and printing, and the doctrins of modern science which make against religion are more or less current; but in Russia there is no public expression of Infidelity, and science is practically nonexistent.

One of the latest advices of misfortune from Holy Russia is this printed in the London Daily News:

"The general and steadily increasing commercial depression in Russia adds extra gloom, writes our Odessa correspondent, to the darkening advent of winter in that empire. The national grain export industry languishes. One of the largest foreign houses engaged in the export of Russian grain announces its intention of suspending further operations in that country. Within the last few days eight firms in Odessa hav been gazetted bankrupts."

The cause of this business stagnation is partly the expulsion of the Jews. Some of these were financiers whose advances of cash kept industry moving. Then, the expulsion angered the great Jewish money-men not only of Russia but of all European countries, and they now refuse funds to the czar's government and to all enterprises connected therewith. This, we say, is part of the cause, and another factor is the exhaustion resulting on the famin and epidemics. We may go on to add that the extraordinary dishonesty of Russian merchants has long been inducing foreigners to contemplate ceasing to deal with them.

Under the ruinous effects of the late famin and epidemics, the peasantry, already behind with their taxes, hav fallen into hopeless arrears. Such taxes as are past can never be collected, and indeed it is being found impossible to secure more than a part of present levies, and this is accomplished only by employing in many cases cruel inflictions extending to the use of the knout and worse instruments of torture.

This diminution of tax receipts has resulted in a great distress of the national treasury. A report says:

"While M. Witte, with a sorely straitened exchequer under his control, is striving to obtain a foreign loan, the value of the credit ruble is falling . . . Russia, whose chronic affliction is a depleted treasury, has decided to raise the excise duty on brandy, tobacco, beer, petroleum, and various other articles, while extra taxes of several kinds will be levied directly. The Russian peasants are already taxed past the limit of endurance, and it is doubtful if the government can devise any system which will yield more revenue. . . . The Russian has not shown much financial aptitude. There has never been a time when the empire was not entangled in debt."

This financial embarrassment of the government, however, is productiv of one good effect. For Russia, being the most of all nations under the operation of the religion of peace, is consequently the one most desirous of war, and her poverty is a fortunate thing in that it compels her to restrain her Christian bloodthirst. A communication says:

"As the money from the tax will be wanted to increase the army, it is just as well that it cannot be obtained. It is conceded that if the huge empire of the czar had unlimited financial resources the chances of an early war would be greatly increased. The poverty of the czar's exchequer has always hindered the march of the Russian armies which, in the dreams of the Slav, are to some day sweep around the earth. It takes money to fight the Germans, or the Austrians, or the English, and the deficit in Russian finances forces the czar's armies to lie idle. The poverty of Russia is the salvation of Europe."

That these blessed poor who shall see the kingdom of God are thus by chance held off from their less ferocious if less pious neighbors, is a thing for which we are devoutly thankful. Their armies aggregate about nine million men, or nearly twice those of any other European nation. Yes, it is to be hoped that these godly Muscovites who hav each his guardian angel and baptismal cross, each his altar and saints' pictures in his house, who fast twice a week, pray every other hour, and hav the exclamation "Glory to God" continually on their lips, may by poverty or some other impediment long be withheld from "sweeping around the earth" with fire and sword.

Another evil is heralded by Count Tolstoi. This personage, in the Russian Gazette, calls attention to the continued miserable condition of the peasantry in regard to the necessaries of daily life. He says that famin again threatens the district in which he resides. The rye harvest is as bad as it was in 1891. Oats are an utter failure. There is a complete dearth of material for fires. The people are exhausted by last winter's miseries. The outlook, Count Tolstoi declares, is as black as possible.

To this we are obliged to add the calamity of the cholera, which disease continues to ravage this land of many priests and few physicians. The cases of this dread plague were last week 3,313 in eighteen reported districts alone.

To the calendar of epidemics already endured in succession by the Russians—viz., influenza or grip, typhus, and cholera—a fourth seems about to be added in the shape of the Black Death. This disease is known to hav appeared near the borders of Russia, and there seems no reason to suppose that it will not enter that nation as the cholera has so regularly been doing. The Black Death is the most fatal of all epidemic diseases. The mortality varies from sixty to ninety per cent of those attacked, and occasionally every person affected dies. Not only human beings suffer, but rats, cats, dogs, cattle, and other animals become victims of the pestilence. Death sometimes take place in a few hours. Among the symptoms which hav contributed to its various designations are enlargement and suppuration of glands and the formation of carbuncles, whence the name "bubo-plague;" and hemorrhagic spots and petechiæ under the skin, rendering the body quite dark or black, whence the origin of the phrase "Black Death." Like the cholera and small-pox and several other contagious diseases, it haunts the habitations of the poor, the shiftless, and the squalid. This and its kindred plagues find the suiting conditions for their riot among the peoples who apply holy water to their heads but no unholy fluid to the rest of their bodies, cleanse their souls with the blood of the Lamb but forget to clean their houses and streets, are particular about getting the right sort of communion wafers but careless as to the freshness of their other eating, and make a great to-do over the choice of their water of life but stick not at sewage in the rest of their beverage. Under the Christian domination of a few centuries back the Black Death frequently desolated Europe. Once it swept off twenty-five millions on the Continent. In 1664 it killed one-sixth of the populace of London. In 1721 one-third of the population of Toulon, France, perished. The nations in which sanitation has in a measure supplanted sanctity hav of late escaped it. However, it may with the aid of the Holy Land of the Czar contrive to penetrate all of our nations with the opening of the spring.

We will insert here a late incident in Russia which is a ridiculous instance of the severity of the press censorship. An Odessa shopkeeper hung in his window this printed notice: "Umbrellas and seasonable goods in great variety and at moderate prices." He was arrested, and, under the laws forbidding printed matter which has not been submitted to the government censor for approval, sentenced to pay a fine of three roubles or undergo three days' imprisonment.

Perhaps the most hopeless piece of news of all is one communicated by Harold Frederic, the distinguished correspondent of the New York Times and some London papers. This piece of news is that the Russian government has resolved upon a return to the extreme of superstitious barbarism and despotism in which she labored prior to the last half-century. It is known that within the last two generations the influence of a solitary Freethinker or two, like the novelist Tourgeneff, together with the penetration of some slight glimmerings of Western light, hav induced certain ameliorations of the condition of the people and an appreciable relaxation of despotism. But now, says Mr. Frederic, the whole of this work is to be undone. These few faint steps of progress, taken but desultorily, at the instance of a few persons and against the wishes of the main part of the prelates and aristocracy, are to be retraced. The infectiv character even of a few germs of knowledge and liberty has alarmed ecclesiastic and noble, and a desperate reaction has set in. Its first step we are witnessing in the anti-Semite persecution. This reaction, Mr. Frederic goes on to say, does not alone concern the Jews. The whole social structure is involved. Corporal punishment has already been reëstablished, and the old landlord magistrates once more exist. Other signs equally grim point to the prevailing desire to "get Russia back into her Asiatic shell." The whole tendency finds itself summarized in the words of Aksakoff, "Para domoi," which mean, literally, "It is time to go home." Mr. Frederic further translates them as meaning that "it was time to giv over the pretense of opening Western Europe; that it was time to throw to the winds the effort to appear civilized; that it was time to turn the clock back again to the starting-point of Peter the Great, to undo all that his German successors had done in imitation of Occidental models, to frankly relapse into Slavonic barbarism."

Every one of the evils noted above could be immediately removed by the application of the principles for which THE TRUTH SEEKER labors—free examination of religion and government, free investigation of science and all subjects of whatever nature, and free speech upon them all.

It is to be kept in view that the abuses which are seen at their extreme in Russia exist in greater or less degree in all lands. They exist in this nation. They would by the Christian and bigoted part of our people quickly be brought to the Russian pitch of monstrousness were it not for the counter-endeavors of the votaries of science and Liberalism. Imperativ, then, is our duty to work, unceasingly work.

To the Friends of The Truth Seeker.

We regret to hav to again appeal to you on behalf of this paper. We find on taking charge of the "business end" of THE TRUTH SEEKER that there are many outstanding financial obligations which need to be canceled at once. We owe a good deal of money to paper manufacturers, printers, and so forth, and it troubles us.

We find also that there are many subscribers in arrears, and while that wouldn't trouble us if our bank account were fat, it does seriously incommode us at present. We beg to ask them to send what is due as soon as they possibly can. Two or three dollars is not much to each one, but the aggregate is a large sum, and we need it.

We also hope that every reader will take an interest in increasing the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and for that purpose we make a liberal offer in an advertisement on the second page of this issue. And we again call attention to the handsome premium offers of books sent in connection with subscriptions. The paper ought to hav a much greater circulation, as nothing helps the Liberal cause along more than good reading which can be handed around the neighborhood. We shall endeavor to make THE TRUTH SEEKER worthy of all efforts in its behalf, and we hope thereby to increase the influence of Freethought, and make mental liberty in this country something less like a dream than it is at present.

Some Handsome Premiums.

To induce new subscriptions and prompt renewals on the part of our friends we make the following handsome premium offers:

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a cloth-bound copy of "Bible Myths" ($2.50).

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth ($2.50).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in boards ($2).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a copy of "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in cloth covers ($1.50).

For $3.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in board covers ($1).

This is a splendid opportunity to obtain books which every Liberal desires to hav at an exceedingly low price. Old and new subscribers can avail themselvs of it, and we shall be glad if our present readers will call the attention of their friends to the values offered.

How the Christians Uphold Liberty.

On the 14th ult. the police of this city haled two women and fourteen men before a police magistrate charged with having violated the Sunday law by sewing in a tailor shop on the Sunday previous. They were discharged with "an admonitory lecture for having violated the Sabbath law." These were all Hebrews who had observed Saturday.

A Methodist minister down in Maryland has had a Seventh Day Adventist arrested for husking corn on Sunday. The reason for this exhibition of Christian love is that the Methodist has lost a number of his congregation by the organization of an Adventist church in his neighborhood.

The police of Austria are closing up the Methodist churches and missions, and when asked for the reason of this restraint answer that the Methodist religion is not recognized in Austria. The courts of appeal, when resorted to by these persecuted people, declared that the meetings of the Methodists were too large to be tolerated under the right of private worship. Baron Gautsch, the Austrian minister of education, when appealed to, decided, on the other hand, that the Methodist body was too small to entitle it to state recognition.

And so it goes. Any Christian sect having the power will suppress every other sect every time.

To Try for Justice.

Some, at least, of the people of Ohio are waking up to the monstrous injustice perpetrated upon the people by the selfish laws exempting the churches from paying their honest debts to the state. We say this because the Cleveland World reports that a suit is about to be begun in Cuyahoga county courts to test the constitutionality of this exemption law. It will be in the form of a mandamus against the county auditor to require him to place upon the tax duplicate all real estate and chattel property belonging to the religious corporations in the county.

Like other states Ohio exempts church property under a clause in her statutes providing that all houses used exclusivly for public worship, with the grounds attached to them, and books and furniture therein—in other words, the parsonage—shall be exempt. But some lawyers to whom the matter has been submitted by some taxpayers giv it as their opinion—and in this they are undoubtedly right—that the exemption of church property is in contravention of the part of section 3 of the Bill of Rights, which provides "that no man shall be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship or to maintain any ministry against his consent, and that no preference shall be given by law to any religious society or mode of worship." One of these legal gentlemen said to a Cleveland World reporter who spoke to him upon the subject: "The result of exemption of church property from taxation is that every taxpayer in the county is compelled to pay for the support of the churches, because he must help to make up that portion of the expense of government which is not assessed against the churches." Another attorney said that the prohibition against any preference being given to any religious society was clearly disregarded when all religious societies were given a freedom from taxes which is not allowed to other societies. "You might as well exempt the Masonic temple and Knights of Pythias armory from taxation as a matter of equity," he added. "If that were done, however, there would be no constitutional objection as there is in the case of churches."

In Cleveland there are over two hundred churches, and the taxable valuation is roughly placed at ten millions. This would add about three hundred thousand dollars to the revenue, and the movers in the matter will claim that this is the amount the people are forced to contribute, in contravention of the constitution, to support the churches.

This suit ought to be pushed vigorously, for it will be interesting to know how the courts will decide upon the claim which has been made continuously by the Freethinkers that by church exemption they are forced to help support institutions in which they not only do not believe, but which they regard as a positiv detriment to the welfare of society. As Freethinkers are the best of citizens and stanchest supporters of the republic, this tax imposition is peculiarly an outrage upon them. Each religious sect has the consolation of knowing that if it is robbed by another sect, it also robs in turn. But the Freethinkers are the prey of all.

The Doctors Disagree.

Bishop Potter is a doctor of divinity and so is the Rev. James Buckley. In a recent issue of a magazine Bishop Potter wrote:

"Let the Columbian Exposition proclaim by the hush of all its varied traffic and machinery—no wheel turning, no engin moving, no booth nor counter open to buyer or seller, no sign nor sound of business through all its long avenues, and, better still, by its doors closed till the morning hours of every Sunday are ended—that the American people believe in a day of rest. But if there be those who would later seek its precincts to look, it may be, more closely at the handiwork of man, to study the progress of the race in the story of its artistic and industrial and mechanical achievements, and to recognize thus, it may easily be, in the study of such achievements, with Job, that 'there is a spirit in man, and that the inspiration of the almighty giveth him understanding'—that certainly can be no unworthy use of some hours of our America's rest day."

In the latest Christian Advocate the Methodist doctor commented:

"This looks plausible; but we ask by what authority, if his principle be true at all, does he propose to keep the building closed till the morning hours of every Sunday are ended? Why should the government or the managers of the Exposition presume to determin this point? Shall the people be compelled to go to church? or, if they will not, shall they be kept shut out if such opening as this be in harmony with the legal observance of the American Sabbath? In the latter part of what is quoted he givs up the whole argument so far as the workingman is concerned. He is not to be permitted to see a wheel turning or an engin moving; but the place is to be kept open, we suppose, with a charge at the door and a retinue of servants, in the afternoon, simply to allow this."

We agree with both of these distinguished doctors. We think the World's Fair should be kept open, but we think that Mr. Buckley is the more logical. There is no better reason for keeping the doors shut while the Christians are praying than for keeping them shut all day. The churches should not be considered at all in the matter. It is none of their business. Let them open their doors when they please and allow the Fair folks to do the same. The preachers are not our masters, though they think they are, and we must confess with some show of reason owing to the superstitious pusillanimity of the populace.

The article of Mr. Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., in the Investigator commending the Congressional Sunday closing of the World's Fair and urging Liberals to work for the Protestant amendment against sectarian appropriations meets with the approval of the Christian Statesman, the organ of the God-in-the-Constitution party. We congratulate the ex-president of the American Secular Union upon having at last found a proper resting-place among his friends.

Professor Briggs has been again on trial before the authorities of his church, for heresy, with what result is not known at this writing. On another page we reprint a little tract called "The New Theology in the Nursery." This tract was printed by the thousands and sent to every Presbyterian clergyman in the country with the hope of influencing Presbyterian sentiment against Professor Briggs. It is a satire by an "old school," or orthodox, churchman on the upholders of the new theology which the higher criticism has produced. Liberals can readily see fun in it, because it destroys the logic of the new theology as the new theology destroys the basis of the old Presbyterian creeds. And it shows, too, how the brethren conduct their family fights, for it was published anonymously and circulated stealthily. It is supposed to hav been written by a clergyman of the name of Covington, though where he livs we do not know.

Our readers are particularly requested not to send orders for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the books advertised by The Truth Seeker Company to anyone but the Company or the undersigned.

In the West.

News and Notes.

It is gorgeous weather in this valley. There is not a cloud in the sky. The atmosphere flows warm and brilliant, and if I were a "saint" I might believe that the mountains round about were the very gates of heaven, so gloriously do they shine. Rain and snow are in the East, but here it is like "eternal spring." Some day this valley will be a garden of delight. An English syndicate has bought up about four thousand acres of land, for the purpose of colonization. A large number of workmen are busy making ditches. There is plenty of water in the mountains, and in no place in California can irrigation be more successfully carried on. This is an excellent fruit section. Vineyards and orchards will cover its bosom. It is a fine stock country. Large herds of cattle and bands of horses are grazing in the ample pastures. Almost every mineral is to be found in this country, and miners are constantly prospecting among the hills, and new discoveries are made. When the railroad is pushed through from Keeler to Mojava it will open this great valley to further prosperity. A few years will make a wonderful change. It seems out of the world now; but it is sure to be spanned by railroads and brought into connection with the markets of the East and West. It is from four thousand to six thousand feet high in the valley. There is but little snow during the winter comparativly, and take it all in all the climate is favorable to health as well as to wealth and progress. There is delightful fishing and hunting in the mountains. A hundred streams and lakes sparkle there, fed by the everlasting snows, with wild and beautiful scenery about, and peaks that pierce the sky with blazing fronts, the loftiest upon the continent. In one point, simply by wheeling about, thirteen lakes can be noted in limpid splendor contrasting with the precipitous rocks.

On Friday, November 11th, my friend John E. Jones and myself started out on a tour through this valley, and quite an extensiv campaign we hav made of it. On Friday evening I lectured again at Bishop to a crowded house. On Saturday with horse and buggy we went our way to Big Pine, seventeen miles distant. It was a delightful journey in the beautiful afternoon. I gave my address in the schoolhouse, and every seat was occupied. Big Pine has a couple of hundred inhabitants and a good territory is about it. I found some activ Freethinkers here—Mr. Spencer and others—and enjoyed the occasion in every way. The people are hospitable and the Christians took things calmly. The Good Templars adjourned their regular meeting to our benefit, for which favor I extend to them my hearty thanks. There is not much bigotry in this valley, even in the churches. The mountain air is too exhilarating, the skies are too lovely, and the sunshine too splendid to allow the spirit of intoleration to prevail. There is a deal of heresy here even among the clergymen. One of them declared that the story of the garden of Eden was a myth, and smiled sarcastically at the narration of Jonah and the whale. It was not worth while to speak his convictions on that point. Really I find but little opposition so far as the ideas of Freethought are concerned. The church, as usual, claims them all—only Christianity is better, because it has something besides, namely, hell and heaven. That is the main difference. Take away heaven and hell and the Christian religion might be a very decent affair. It would then depend upon humanity, and might succeed as a sociable institution.

Sunday morning we leave the bright little hamlet of Big Pine with many good wishes of its residents, and pursue our Pilgrim's way again to Bishop. Sunday evening the hall is once more full, a greater number than before being present. I understand that none were present at the church meeting, and so the minister came to the Freethought lecture. I never had a better audience—more appreciativ of the points made for Liberal thought.

On Monday Jones and I take a farther range and go by railroad fifty miles to Independence, the county seat of Inyo. I lecture for three evenings—Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday—in the courthouse, and large audiences are present. The Liberal element of Independence is stalwart indeed, and our reception was all that heart could wish. The officials of this county are broad-minded men. Although the county is Republican by one hundred and twenty majority, both organizations are represented, and the good Democrat is elected to office as well as the good Republican. Party ties are not very strict, even in a presidential year. Politics are wonderfully mixed all around, I find. Even this Republican county elected a Democratic assemblyman, who will help to send a Democratic Senator to Congress. I hope a better man than Fenton, the present Senator, will be elected. I understand that Fenton voted to close the World's Fair on Sunday with the flimsy pretext that it was for the benefit of the working people. I rejoice, therefore, that such a fool Senator is to be unceremoniously kicked out, as he deserves to be, and I hope for better things.

Independence is a neat little town of perhaps five hundred people, but it is quite lively and metropolitan. All sorts of characters are here from all parts of the world—men of varied experience, of intelligence, of grit, thoroughgoing rustlers who make their own way and ask no favors. You couldn't find in San Francisco a better quality of life than in this mountain town. You meet men of the world, and not the staid and venerable population of a New England village, the majority of whom hav never been outside the precincts of their nativ state. Almost all the men and women you meet here hav been educated by travel. I couldn't hav passed the time in a big city with more vivacity than I did in this frontier village, where human nature is presented in such interesting and checkered lights. Independence was nearly destroyed by fire a few months since, but it has been rebuilt with remarkable rapidity and looks as prosperous as ever. There was a little ripple of discussion at my second lecture in this place. A young man by the name of White Smith, who claims to be a universal genius, a student of encyclopedic information, who sits up until 4 o'clock in the morning reading theology, philosophy, and history, who knows more law than any judge and more medicin than any doctor, and at the same time is a horny-handed granger "with the hayseed in his hair"—this enfant terrible, with notes of multitudinous array and "words of learned length and thundering sound," essayed to answer my lecture on "Freethought and Morality." He occupied a whole half-hour, but never touched the subject presented. He talked all around the subject with an essay evidently prepared beforehand without any reference to my particular line of thought. He showed a good deal of erudition, but no more logic than a child. I could not get him to make a single distinction. He seemed incapable of definitions. The audience was evidently amused at the drift of his remarks. It was trying to catch a point, but no points were made. Finally, as it was getting late, Mr. Smith concluded, but desired another hour in which to finish his argument. Whether he will ever hav a chance to do so is a question, for according to the way he was going it would take until the final judgment for him to reach the real matter under debate. As a curiosity, however, his discourse was a great success. I was interested in the mass of learning he displayed, but the helter-skelter manner in which it was poured forth reminds one of Southey's description of "How the water comes down at Lodore." The best way for Smith to do is to quit reading, and classify his knowledge. "Reading," says Bacon, "makes a full man." But there is such a thing as too much fullness and hence intellectual dyspepsia.

On Thursday morning, November 11th, Jones and myself return to Bishop and giv two more lectures Thursday and Friday evenings to full houses, making ten lectures in all throughout this valley. It was one of the best campaigns I hav ever made. Over two hundred names hav been added to the roll of the Federation, and twenty names to THE TRUTH SEEKER list, and quite a number of its veteran subscribers hav met me at various points and given a hearty greeting and support.

Judge George M. Gill; P. W. Forbes, district attorney; Sheriff John S. Gorman; Wm. F. Mattack; Bertrand Rhine; J. C. Rorper; Postmaster J. J. Moore, and many others are among the friends at Independence whose generous hospitality made my visit most delightful. My labor was mingled with the zest of intellectual companionship. Judge Gill is a man of brave and noble spirit, who in despite of physical suffering maintains the splendid courage of his convictions. He could only come to the lectures by being brought in a chair. He cannot walk, but he was at all three of the lectures at Independence, and he does not thank the "Lord" at all for his afflictions. We must submit to nature whether nature is right or wrong—for we cannot help ourselvs—but to believe that a God, of his own free will, having the power to do differently, thus curses humanity, is more than Judge Gill is willing to do. Such a God would deserve the detestation of every honest mind. I admire Judge Gill for his "grit" and that the fearless brain can thus master the weakness of the body.

My comrade John E. Jones enjoyed this campaign with all the poetic enthusiasm of a Welshman who traces his ancestry back to immemorial years. Adam, I believe, was a Welshman, and the Welsh language is the original language. I guess it is, for it is about the "rockiest" language I ever struck; but for all that, it flows along like a cataract, with the music of a cataract, and its thunder, too, at times. It has a marvelous power, and I do not wonder that the song and the eloquence of Wales is so masterful that it can stir the heart like a trumpet with words that seem to flow from the infinit past, ancient as the oaks under which druids performed their mystic rites and hailed the glorious sun with solemn and resounding melodies.

I think I hav met every nationality while I hav traversed Inyo county. The Celtic imagination is here; and bluff John Bull; and the Yankee; and the Israelite, with an eye to business, yet with open hand and unsuperstitious brain; the swarthy Mexican; the gorgeous-colored aborigine; the "celestial;" the learned and solid German; the child of "sunny France," and those who hav listened to the winds and waves of the cold North sea, or who first saw the light of day along the shores of the Mediterranean. Besides these there are "the nativ sons of the golden West." Variety is the spice of life and there is plenty of spice in this remote region. It is a typical Western and Californian country. I like this bright and versatil community.

I enjoyed a visit to the home of Captain Walters, who once navigated the great Pacific, but finds here a gentle harbor amidst fruits and flowers where storms are scarcely ever felt. Miss Lena and Miss Annie, his daughters, and his wife are stanch Freethinkers. His sister, seventy-three years of age, has just come over from "Fatherland" and seems to enjoy with a child's delight this new and wonderful land, so far away from the home where she has lived for nearly three-quarters of a century.

Mr. and Mrs. Horton, Postmaster Blaisdell, A. J. Shepley, Mr. and Mrs. Roberts, Thomas Williams, J. N. Kellogg, Mr. Olds, of Round Valley and vicinity, are among the friends who gave a generous welcome.

I was surprised to meet my old comrade of southern California, H. L. Shaug, who is up in these mountains "prospecting." I hope he will find "millions in it," for Freethought will never suffer while Shaug has a dollar to spare. I was glad to meet him again, for we hav campaigned together in sun and storm.

At Bishop I must count my allies by the score—Dr. J. S. McQueen; O. H. Hill, "mine jolly landlord;" John Clark; J. R. Brought; John Black; Charles Levy; T. S. A. Conley; Attorney J. L. Lewis, who introduced me to the people of Bishop at my first lecture; A. J. Murphy, who, like Goldsmith's Traveler, has seen almost all the world and spoken the speech of many a land; E. W. Flannigan; John Stoutenborough and family, who helped to gem the hours with music's happy flight; Louis Minzinger; J. F. Jones, of Benton, on THE TRUTH SEEKER list; J. E. Dunlap; Dr. Chapman. Well, I couldn't begin to mention them all, for about one hundred names are placed upon the roll of the Federation. I must thank all these friends, so many that I cannot speak of them by name, for their splendid welcome. I did not anticipate so popular an approval of Freethought. Evidently it has been in the air for some time, and now in this golden autumn weather when everything is so auspicious, nothing but splendor from vale to mountain top, the intellectual life finds genial expression in harmony with nature's most perfect season.

The Rev. Mr. Logan was invited to speak at my lectures, but he declined to do so. There was quite a call for him at the last meeting, but he only rose to say that he would reply to my lectures on Sunday evening and correct the impression I had made. This was hardly fair, for I should hav no chance to correct him, as undoubtedly he would need correction however honest he might be in his criticisms of Freethought. I think the reverend gentleman should hav met me face to face, then both sides would hav been fairly presented. I should certainly hav staid and listened to my opponent and answered him if other engagements had not prevented. I guess the Rev. Mr. Logan thought that "discretion was the better part of valor." However, if he does not toe the mark in fair and square fashion I shall follow him in judgment through the press if not upon the platform. They say he is a pretty good sort of fellow, so I hope for an honest discussion.

Items of Foreign News Interesting to Freethinkers.

According to the last census made in New Zealand the number of Freethinkers is twenty-six thousand, twenty thousand of whom are male.

French Freethought societies to the number of two hundred and four belong to the International Federation, and all were represented at the late congress.

Over two thousand persons accompanied the remains of Citizen Decamp to their final resting-place in one of the graveyards of Montpellier, France. Speeches were made at the grave by various prominent Freethinkers.

Among the distinguished Freethinkers who sent telegrams of fraternal greeting to the congress we must mention Dr. Ludwig Büchner, president of the German Freethought Federation and author of "Force and Matter."

A Danish Freethought paper of the "family paper" order has seen the light of day in San Francisco. Its name is Lanternen (the Lantern), and we wish it success. Price, $1 a year. It is ably edited by Mr. P. Freese.

We are the recipient of Onállás (Independence), a weekly Hungarian paper published at Hazleton, Pa. We mention this only out of courtesy to our Hungarian subscribers, as the only thing we can say about said paper is that it is a Republican paper with no Freethought tendencies whatever.

The French Freethought Federation held its annual congress at Salle de l'Ermitage, 29 rue de Jussieu, on Wednesday, November 20th. The main work of the congress was the discussion and subsequent adoption of means whereby the political influence of Freethought can be extended.

The well-known Capucine, Father Aurelianus, is driving devils out of Lohr-am-Main, Germany. The reverend devil-chaser does not recall to the memory of his congregation the fact that this city has an old reputation for "casting out devils." In the year 1628 alone fifty-two witches were burnt to death.

The notorious thief and bank-robber, George Bidwell, who defrauded the Bank of England of $5,000,000, is traveling over this country lecturing on the influence of Christianity on honesty in business. His lectures are given under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association. Comment is unnecessary.

To those of our German subscribers who enjoy poetry we commend the Freidenker Almanach for the year 1893. It contains no less than fourteen poems, besides innumerable quotations from the poets distributed among the various articles. The best article is decidedly the one by C. Hermann Boppe, "Woman in the Republic of the Future."

According to Las Dominicales of October 16th, the latest number of that journal we hav received, the international Freethought congress was a great success. Three public meetings were held at Theater Principe Alfonso, at the first of which there presided the venerable Antonio Machado; at the second, Mr. Leon Furnemont; at the third, the well-known French journalist, Augusto Bourieret.

We are pleased to call the attention of our Spanish-American friends to a new Liberal Spanish publication, El Pensamiento Contemporáneo (Contemporaneous Thought). This publication, which is edited by Antonio Llano, appears monthly, and is on the same plan as the Arena or the North American Review. It is an excellent publication, and contains articles from well-known writers like St. George Mivart, Romanes, R. G. Ingersoll, Herbert Spencer, John Fiske, Felix Oswald, Professor Sayce, Max Nordau, and others. Price, $3 a year.

In a recent number of Fritänkaren Victor E. Lennstrand sends out a call for financial help. He states that if the necessary sum is not forthcoming he will hav to giv up his vocation as a lecturer. We hope that the money will come, though judging from the situation of Freethought in Sweden at the present time we think the call comes too late. The various unions belonging to the state Federation are getting weaker and weaker. Internal strife, petty jealousies, apathy, discontent with the work of the central committee, all hav combined in making organized Freethought in Sweden a shadow of its former self. What is needed is a man of will and determination, who is not alone a stanch Freethinker, but also an organizer and business man. Such a man the Swedish Freethinkers possessed in the person of the badly treated Freethought martyr, Capt. Otto Thomson.

The Episcopalian Litany Hymn

AS IT SHOULD BE SUNG BY A FRIDAY MORNING CONGREGATION OF WOMEN.

Savior, when we kneel to thee
Through the lengthy litany,
When we all pretend to pray,
This is what we really say:
"Look at Susie Sparker's dress,
'Tis the old one turned, I guess."
"How I wish that Dr. B——
Would get through the litany."

Help we ask through nights and days,
While we're thinking of our "stays;"
When we all responses say,
What we whisper is, "O May, May!
There's a man across the aisle.
Had I better risk a smile?"
Fine old flirting there can be
While we say the litany.

Soon we all our sins confess—
Then's the time to smooth your dress—
Next there comes the silent prayer—
First-class chance for maidens fair
Just to peep at Tom or Dick,
Surely not a naughty trick.
Yet we're glad as glad can be
When we're through the litany.

Our London Letter.

The "Agnostic Annual," edited by Mr. C. A. Watts, and which you hav for sale, has made its tenth appearance, and contains the usual high-class articles on Agnosticism, by old and new writers, though all of them are well-known names, and all are so excellent that it is well-nigh impossible to make any particular selection in point of superiority. It is such a welcome and first-class publication that it is a pity the editor cannot see his way to produce a monthly magazine on the same lines.

The editor of the Review of Reviews is the most prominent faddist of the present time, and though he appears to mean well, goes about his work in such a remarkable manner that scarcely anyone takes him seriously. He appears to want now to pose as a modern messiah and entirely reorganize Christianity; he does not see that the present system of religion is so utterly rotten that it must be swept away, and his scheme of a modern church which will combine a theater and public house in each building, if ever initiated will scarcely hav much of a run. He evidently sees that Atheists possess the greatest collectiv intelligence, and proposes that they should combine with him in doing "Christ's work," but the invitation is one scarcely to be accepted by Atheists, who can work more effectually and effectivly than if they were handicapped with Mr. Stead as a leader.

Miss Marryat's work, "There Is No Death," has caused considerable newspaper discussion. It is certainly a curious compilation of Spiritualistic stories, and only shows what utter supernatural nonsense an intelligent person can believe—though, as she is a Roman Catholic to begin with, it is not very remarkable that she should go a step farther and take in any absurdities that the mediums like to tell her or show her.

A certain Jesuit named Clark has made it his business to attack Theosophy, and as a result has brought the foremost champion of that cult upon him in the person of Mrs. Besant, and no stronger opponent could hav been put forward to confute him. To the discomfiture of the Romish party she quoted from an authoritativ work for children on the torture of hell, and although this book is still sold by Roman Catholic booksellers, a Catholic is so ignorant of its existence or so impudent as to deny in a daily paper that such is the teaching of his church—but a denial like this is perfectly allowable, as all lies for the glory of the church are meritorious. It, however, goes to show what these people will do to gain converts and acquire power—which they seem to be doing to a great extent in this country; in fact, we are being overrun with Jesuits, Jews, and destitute Germans; the refuse of other countries are welcomed by the ruling powers with open arms.

A newspaper reader has taken the trouble to note all the cases he has seen reported of the clergy who hav committed various criminal and social offenses, and has counted as many as 629 during one year; and it must be remembered that these are only such as hav come under his notice casually and by no means represent every instance where a clergyman has made himself amenable to the law, or has managed to square matters outside a police court; and in face of these cases we are asked to believe that the disreputable gang of parsons are the salt of the earth, and if it were not for them earth would be a pandemonium. All the men above mentioned were members of the Church of England as by law established, and are supported out of the taxes. When they hav served their terms of imprisonment or been whitewashed they will in nearly every case be restored to favor and be regarded as martyrs by their foolish congregations.

Bitterness of spirit is still prevailing at the Tabernacle, and the Spurgeon and Pierson factions are imbued with the Holy Ghost or the devil, according to which party makes the accusation. This state of affairs ought to open the eyes of the worshipers of the dead idol, but is not likely to make them wiser; they will only split and one party will open an opposition gospel-shop, and each of them will deal only in the genuin unadulterated article, all for the glory of God. It is an amusing spectacle to Atheists, and does not tend to set them longing to "repent and be converted." J. D.

Spiritualism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: As no man's opinion ever destroyed a fact or impaired the truth, free discussion and the honest expression of candid thoughts can do no harm nor work any injury to "eternal verities." Fair and open discussion is more beneficial to truth than to error, and only those who realize the weakness of their claims and the lack of evidence to sustain their assertions ever oppose investigation and debate. The truth is, and should be, the most fearless thing on earth, for nothing can destroy it, and all attempts so to do must invariably strengthen its standing and reveal its indestructibility. The most timid and terror-stricken opponents of discussion are found among Christians; and religions of all kinds not only prefer the absence of debate but seek to enforce it. Spiritualism, unlike Christianity, is so confident of its claims, because based upon phenomena, that it invites investigation and discussion anywhere and at all times. Your impartial columns hav given evidence of this fact for years, and many are the individual expressions pro and con that hav been presented to your readers. The article by J. H. Cook in your issue of October 15th is one incentiv that leads me to set the pen in motion to-day, for, like him, I hav been a believer in Spiritualism, but am such no longer.

The origin of my belief was due to the incident of birth, the same as most religious convictions are established; for my parents were converts to Spiritualism in my childhood days, and parents, as everyone knows, do much to mold the mind of their progeny. Having the mind turned in that direction when young, led me for nearly thirty years to cling to that wide-spread delusion that a dead man yields up an invisible something, endowed with consciousness, that time can never destroy.

Observation, reading, and reflection hav driven me out of that belief, and to-day I stand with that large and growing class of people who believe that the human mind is dependent on the physical body for its existence, and the destruction of that body means the annihilation of mind and consciousness. It is useless to deny that mysterious phenomena are common and prevalent, but hypnotism will explain nine-tenths of the genuin mysterious manifestations credited to "spirits;" and no doubt future discoveries will reveal causes for the other tenth without getting outside of visible and tangible matter to find them.

Back of every mystery the Christian places God, and the Spiritualist locates a human spirit, but it requires the imagination to see either one, and credulity is essential to belief in both cases.

While Spiritualism makes great claims, it has accomplished mighty little, and the principal credit to which it is entitled rests on its opposition to Christian superstition and the effort to comfort sorrowing minds with a pleasant belief in another life where better conditions prevail than those now endured. But Spiritualism has never revealed a scientific fact or presented any knowledge before unknown to mortal man. It has never given us any information regarding the North pole or the interior of Africa, and only as men of flesh and blood hav pushed forward to make discoveries has anything been learned of either place. When that great Spiritualist and prominent scientist, William Denton, died on a remote island in the Pacific ocean, though Boston has hundreds of mediums for spirit communication, not a word was known or heard of his death until steamships, telegraph lines, and ocean cables conveyed the news to his home in Massachusetts. Since his death was revealed by such means, communications from his "spirit" hav been quite frequent; but why he could not reveal his death in advance of the steamship and telegraph report of that event, still remains a mystery, if Spiritualism is true. Spiritualism never reveals anything that somebody in the flesh doesn't know, and right here I want to make an important point. It is a well-known fact that many people hav been buried alive while in a comatose condition resembling death. But how was this revealed? Did spirits tell us about it and warn the world against such possibilities in the future? No, never! and the way such discoveries were made was by disinterring the dead. It has been estimated from such cases revealed by accidental discovery, that one person in every five thousand meets the awful fate of premature burial; and yet "spirits" hav never mentioned such things or raised a warning voice. Why? Because "spirits" hav no existence, in my opinion, and that reason is the only satisfactory one that can be given; for what spirit possessing human feeling and sympathy would see a living person entombed alive when by controling their medium they could reveal the fact and prevent the occurrence? Among my acquaintances is a "spirit medium" and a firm believer in Spiritualism; yet this person is so terrified over the thought of being buried in a trance condition that sleepless nights and awful worriment are the result; and a promis has been exacted from relativs that a vital organ shall be removed when death occurs before burial. What faith and confidence such people must hav in "spirit controls" and "spirit friends!" Some months ago a medium died in a neighboring town, and by her dying request her body was cremated to prevent the possibility of premature burial. What do these facts show? They show that faith and confidence in spirits who promis to protect their medium, is about as strong as the Christian's faith in God's power to answer prayer; for when the cholera comes to our shores, as illustrated by Heston, science is preferred to faith and prayer as a protector. Again I repeat that Spiritualism has done mighty little for the world, and that little is embodied in its efforts to free the mind from orthodox teachings; but "cold Materialism" has done a similar work, and is entitled to just as much credit on that point. But which is doing the most for humanity to-day, Spiritualism or Materialism? I assert that Materialism is, for all scientific discoveries to benefit the world and improve conditions result from it, and Spiritualism finds little to do outside of leading people to sing the sweet by and by and to meditate on the joys of an imaginary world that adorns the invisible regions of space. It amounts to nothing only as an amusement for leisure time, for there is neither profit or benefit to be derived from Spiritual theories and the conflicting reports that come to us from so-called spirit sources. Mediums excite curiosity without gratifying it, and the more séances one attends the sooner he will be disgusted with mediums and mediumship; and I giv it as my private opinion publicly expressed, that the fool and his money are separated without a satisfactory equivalent when he consults a medium to commune with the dead.

I speak from years of experience and not as a novice, for trying to eat soup with a fork is a satisfactory proceeding compared with getting information of any kind from a spirit medium. Spiritualism is a mild form of superstition based on unaccountable phenomena; but it does not and can not demonstrate the continuity of human consciousness after the destruction of the physical body. Prof. John Fiske declares that "such a belief has never been one that could be maintained on scientific grounds," and affirms his opinion that the belief in a continuation of consciousness after death has visibly weakened during the present century among thinking people. There is no doubt of it, and the tendency of the age where people do think is to accept the idea that death ends all.

If we lay hope and sentiment aside we find very little that creates an idea of immortal consciousness; and knowing what a persistent and almost invariable liar hope is, its testimony should be taken like a politician's promis before election, and no attention paid to it. Fatalism is the only rational belief in the world; and we are the creatures of blind fate from start to finish.

While evolution demonstrates the unfoldment of consciousness and the development of intelligence, there is nothing to show that the forces of nature were ever working systematically for such results. "The purposeless play of events" constantly going on in nature reveals no cause behind them but that of fate or inevitable necessity; and barring a few unexplained phenomena pointed out by Spiritualists, there is nothing to show that nature has any secret or invisible realms, where consciousness, which is a product of tangible matter, exists in an immortal state without a visible or tangible organization. Life from start to finish is a contest with the forces of nature, and, as the blind forces which create and destroy life hav no more regard for a man than a mouse now, it is absurdity itself to claim that they will hav when the physical body is destroyed, and existence, so far as we can see, has been exterminated.

Reason has never discovered any object or purpose for consciousness in man or beast, and what life amounts to, viewed in any form or shape, has always, and does now, puzzle the most philosophical minds. The only rational view of the so-called soul is found in the words of Zeno: "The soul of man is a spark of the vital flame, the general vital principle. Like heat it passes from one to another, and is finally reabsorbed in the universal principle from which it came. Hence we must not expect annihilation but reunion; and as the tired man looks forward to the insensibility of sleep, so the philosopher, weary of the world, should look forward to extinction." Exactly, and whether it is hoped or desired, mortal man will probably revert to the unconscious elements from which he came.

Los Angeles, Cal. C. SEVERANCE.

A Nun, a Milkman, and a Monk.

Translated from the German.

A nun sat in her quiet cell,
For in her sphere it was thought well
To do so, if she pleases.
The milkman brisk, on business bent,
Touched quick her latch and in he went,
When she exclaimed, "My Jesus!"

While she thus on her savior called,
Some fellow 'neath the table crawled,
With scarce a moment's warning.
"Go!" cried the nun, in fervent tone,
"Go! leave me with my God alone;
I want no milk this morning."

Abashed, confused, the milkman stood,
For in his vision flashed a hood
Most monkishly serene.
In confidence he tells his wife,
"Our Lord God looks, as true as life,
Just like a Capuchin!"

Science and Progress.

A CENTENNIAL CLOCK.

A Genoese watchmaker has constructed a timepiece that will run for a month and show the progress of Columbus from Port Palos to San Salvador, the landing of the Spaniards, the dances of the nativs, and the return of the triumphant discoverers. The motions of the figures are said to be wonderfully life-like, but unless those dances can be stopped on Sunday, the Chicago Sabbath Association will probably confiscate the whole apparatus.

AMERICAN ENTERPRISE.

The editor of the New York campaign organ who persists in prefacing his organ music with daily extracts from scripture is now reaping the international fruits of his enterprise. An English contemporary hopes that the publishers of the pious periodical will soon add a premium of Sunday-school tracts, and a German reviewer fears that some Yankee rival of the ingenious editor will before long offer to treat his subscribers to free baptism or a bottle of unction oil.

WONDROUS DISCOVERIES.

A clerical sensation-monger not long ago claimed to hav identified the site of the earthly paradise with some building lots in a southern suburb of St. Louis, Mo. (probably in the neighborhood of the Carondelet distilleries), and added the information that within a month the whole country would discuss his announcement. The only adequate reply was a dispatch from Edmondson county, Ky., where a geological investigator claimed to hav discovered the entrance of the orthodox hades.

FRENCH FREETHINKERS.

The French apostles of Rationalism hav evidently reached a stage of tolerance that enables them to connive at a good deal of mutual banter. When Renan published his "Life of St. Paul" Victor Hugo advised him to add a life of St. Peter and commend all his friends to the mercy of the celestial janitor. "If Hugo ever gets into heaven," said Renan, "his first impulse will be to compliment the Lord on his success in creating an author of his talents."

THE AGE OF PHOTOGRAPHY.

The French-African expedition recently captured the camping outfit of the king of Dahomey, and among a large assortment of dirk-knives and grease-pots were surprised to find a package of photographs, representing the despot in full gala dress, grasping an instrument resembling a meat-ax, used, perhaps, on the occasion of the festival when 1,225 slaves were butchered in honor of the king's birthday. If those portraits and a few autographs could be distributed among the Brooklyn representativs of Christian civilization, czar-worshiper Talmage would probably inform the public that the countenance of the African potentate is "beaming with the evidence of a superb benevolence."

TRIUMPHS OF SCIENCE.

An Austrian chemist announces his discovery of a process for constructing a barometer in the shape of a picture, painted in colors (probably litmus blue) "which upon the approach of rainy weather will cause clouds to appear over the mountains." Oriental landscapes will hereafter be painted in such a manner that when a cloud comes on Anthony Comstock's brow the water-nymphs will all appear in bathing suits. F. L. OSWALD.

Found in a Mound Near Oak Mills, Kan.

George J. Remsburg in Daily Champion.

The writer, in company with J. King and C. A. Bruner, of Oak Mills, explored another mound about a mile south of that place yesterday. The mound was located on the bend of a large bluff overlooking the Missouri river and is as picturesque a spot as can be found in Kansas. When the aborigines occupied the place the main channel of the river lashed its muddy current against the base of the bluff, but it has since changed its course and is now about a quarter of a mile to the east. There is now a broad, sandy bottom between the bluff and the river channel covered with a thick growth of willow and cottonwood timber.

Along the bottom next to the bluff the Missouri Pacific railway winds its graceful curve. How weird and wonderful it seems to look around and note the great changes that hav occurred since the noble red man of the forest stood here upon this bank "amid the beneficent fruition of nature" and declared by his firm and resolute countenance that he was the rightful possessor of the soil.

On the west side of the bluff is a small stream flowing from the northwest. Another stream flowing from the west unites with this one, and empties into the river. Old settlers say that a fine spring once flowed from beneath this bluff, but it has of late years entirely disappeared. Just across the creek bottom directly opposit to this bluff another stupendous bluff rears its head. We doubt if there is a loftier ascent in the state. The hill slopes gradually from the creek-bed on the north, and is at least a quarter of a mile stretch from the base to the summit. On the east side facing the river it is very abrupt. Leading all the way up this gradual slope on the north is an old trail over which many a beaded moccasin has glided to and from the hunting-grounds and neighboring villages. On reaching the top of the hill this trail leads off across the country in a southwesterly direction. We found on the summit of this bluff a small knoll on which nothing was growing except a tuft of buffalo grass. This place was evidently used by the Indians as a lookout spot or signal station, for it is very high, and commands an excellent view in all directions.

Having given a description of the surrounding country, we will now proceed to describe the mound. Although it contained nothing of special value, it is, nevertheless, interesting in itself, because it is dissimilar to any mound heretofore explored in this county. It is not a burial mound, such as those examined by the writer, on Owl creek, about a year ago, but is the ruins of an old lodge. The mound was not very high, there being only a slight elevation of the ground. At each corner was a large slab of yellow sandstone which was carried from the base of the hill. These slabs formed an inclosure of about twelve by fifteen feet. Several white oaks, one of them measuring about eight inches in diameter, were growing in the inclosure. We commenced excavating near the center, and after penetrating about seven inches of black loam or soil, we struck a bed, or pit, of charcoal and burnt earth to a depth of about one foot. This burnt substance was intermixed with fragments of pottery, chips of flint, and bones of animals. We unearthed a piece of sandstone with grooves passing through it. These grooves were about as large as a lead pencil, and I think that this stone was used for polishing arrow-shafts. We also found an unfinished arrow-point and a very fine flint scraper. This scraper is in the common type found at old village sites, being a flaked flint, wrought off at one extremity to a convex edge. These scrapers were used in scraping hides, wood, etc.

The pit described above covered a space of three feet and four inches by five feet and seven inches. We made no excavations outside of this pit, as our time was quite limited, but further explorations will be arranged for at some future time. A great many arrow-points hav been picked up in the fields near this place, and on the slope within close proximity of the mound there are the remains of an old aboriginal workshop where the patient, skilful hand of the aboriginal sculptor, or lapidary, wrought out these tiny little darts of death and destruction.

The New Theology in the Nursery.

Mrs. Martineau Kuenen (who has been attending various inaugural and other addresses at Presbyterian seminaries and churches): Now, Johnny, as it is raining to-day, you need not go out to Sunday-school at Dr. Westminster's church. I will giv you a lesson at home.

Johnny: Mamma, shall I say my catechism?

Mrs. M. K.: I think not. You know they are revising the Standards, and are going to let down the tender grass for the lambs of the flock.* But tell me, Johnny, what is it which teaches us how to be saved, and about heaven and God?

Johnny: The Bible.

Mrs. M. K.: Yes; but there is something else.

Johnny: I don't know of anything else.

Mrs. M. K.: There is the Church, you know; and the Reason.†

Johnny: Do you mean the Presbyterian church, mamma?

Mrs. M. K.: Well, not exactly. You see, the Presbyterian church sometimes disapproves of my good friend Professor Barkis. By church, I mean Institutional Christianity.†

Johnny: Oh, I understand.

Mrs. M. K.: You hav heard of Cardinal Newman, Johnny; he was a representativ Christian, living in or near the world's metropolis; but he could not find God through the Bible,† striving never so hard, but he became a Roman Catholic and found God in that way.

Johnny: Then, if you can't find out how to be saved, and can't find God in the Bible, you must become a Roman Catholic?

Mrs. M. K.; Yes, it is a matter of temperament and environment, which way to God men may pursue.‡

Johnny: But suppose you can't find God in the Bible or in the church, then what do you do?

Mrs. M. K.: I am glad you hav asked that question, my child. You can find God through the Reason, and become a representativ Christian.

Johnny: What is the Reason, mamma?

Mrs. M. K.: Oh, I don't know exactly. It embraces the Metaphysical Categories.§

Johnny: What are they, mamma?

Mrs. M. K.: They are the Holy of Holies of Nature,§ my dear son, and then we hav the Conscience and Religious Feeling.§

Johnny: Are they better than the Bible and the church?

Mrs. M. K.: The Bible is infallible, but the majority of the Christian world would not assign a higher place to representativ Christians who hav found God through the Bible.

Johnny: Mamma, what kind of temperament and environment hav I got? Must I find God through the Bible? I think perhaps I had better find him through the Reason, if that is the Holy of Holies of Nature.

Mrs. M. K.: Never mind about that just now. Tell me, does your teacher at Sunday-school tell you anything about God?

Johnny: Oh, yes; I know the answer to the question in the catechism: "What is God?"

Mrs. M. K.: But we need a new doctrin of God.‖ You know Professor Barkis tells us that God is love.‖ I must ask your teacher to read his Inaugural Address.

Johnny: Does God love sin, mamma?

Mrs. M. K.: I am not talking about that; but listen to the new doctrin of God. I am surprised that your teacher should not hav seen it (reading). . . . "Irregularities, breaks, misfits, broken joints, deformities, mutilations, abortions, collisions, discords, imperfections all the way along and God back of it all, pushing on His way. . . . Ah, brethren, God's thoughts are not as our thoughts. His ways are not as our ways. The designs by which He works are not patterns for patent office purposes, not pieces of dilettante china decorations, nor esthetic models of wax-work. . . . Flaws? Yes; but look at the Plan, massiv with the lines and curves of the Infinit and the Eternal. . . . Frictions? Yes; but look at the matchless correlations of energy, the action and interactions of endlessly articulated forces that determin the balancing of the dewdrops, and swing Jupiters and suns and systems along their vast and mighty courses. Discords? Yes; but listen to the Eternal Anthem that rings from star to star, and ravishes the eternities."*

Johnny: Mamma, is that out of the Bible?

Mrs. M. K.: Not exactly, dear; that is part of the new doctrin of God. It is by Dr. Heavens. It doesn't repel me as much as the answer in the Catechism which you hav learned at Sunday-school.

Johnny: Is every word in the Bible true, mamma?

Mrs. M. K.: Oh, no, Johnny. One of the barriers to the Bible is the belief that it is all true.† But only the essentials are true.‡

Johnny: Teacher says that the Bible is the word of God, and that whatever the word of God says must be true.

Mrs. M. K.: That is a ghost of modern Evangelicalism to frighten children.§ God inspired only the concept.‖

Johnny: Is the concept the same thing as a Metaphysical Category?

Mrs. M. K.: I will hav to ask Professor Barkis about that. You see, he has been very much misunderstood. But when you get older, you will learn all about such things.

Johnny: Mamma, what a wise man Moses must hav been to hav written about the creation, and all those things in Exodus and Deuteronomy!

Mrs. M. K.: Moses didn't write those books. Those were written by Elohists and a number of other men.

Johnny: Did not Moses write Exodus?

Mrs. M. K.: No, that was written by P and JE.¶ Moses may hav been the Redactor of part of the books.

Johnny: What is a Redactor?

Mrs. M. K.: A Redactor is a man who puts books written by other men together, so as to pretend that he wrote them himself.

Johnny: Next to Moses, I think Isaiah was one of the best men in the Old Testament.

Mrs. M. K. (laughing heartily): Which Isaiah do you mean?

Johnny: I mean Isaiah the Prophet.

Mrs. M. K.: Oh, you foolish boy; we don't know that Isaiah wrote half of the book which bears his name.

Johnny: Teacher says that Jesus said that Moses wrote the Law, and that the Law was the same as the five books of Moses.

Mrs. M. K.: Oh, that is a circumstantial. Jesus was speaking so as to suit himself to his hearers.

Johnny: Is it right to say what is not true, so as to suit your teachings to your hearers?

Mrs. M. K.: I hav told you, Johnny, that these are circumstantials, not essentials.

Johnny: Then some of the circumstantials in the Bible are not true.

Mrs. M. K.: It is not a pleasant task to point out the errors in the Sacred Scriptures.††

Johnny: I thought you said just now that it was infallible.

Mrs. M. K.: Only as a rule of faith and practice. It is not infallible when it contains fibs (laughing to herself).

Johnny: What is faith, mamma?

Mrs. M. K.: Oh, that is a doctrinal question. You must not ask me about dogma. Faith is belief.

Johnny: Then if the Bible is an infallible rule of belief, I ought to believe whatever it tells me.

Mrs. M. K.: Oh, no. That is a question for Christian Consciousness to decide.

Johnny: Whose Christian Consciousness?

Mrs. M. K.: Dear Professor Barkis's Christian Consciousness.

Johnny: Mamma, tell me about Daniel in the lions' den.

Mrs. M. K.: Oh, Johnny, that is a circumstantial. Professor Browning has shown that the book of Daniel is full of untruths.

Johnny: Is the story about Jonah and the whale a circumstantial, too?

Mrs. M. K.: Of course. Everything in the Bible which is not a theophany, is a circumstantial.

Johnny: Are the Psalms of King David theophanies or circumstantials?

Mrs. M. K.: Oh, you silly boy. Moses did not write the Pentateuch. David wrote only a few of the Psalms. Isaiah did not write one-half of the book which bears his name. Solomon did not write Proverbs or Ecclesiastes. The names of the mass of Old Testament authors are lost in oblivion.*

Johnny: Why, mamma, you are not leaving me any Bible.

Mrs. M. K.: If that is destroying the Bible the Bible is destroyed already.*

Johnny: Then read me something in the New Testament. That is truer than the Old. Read to me about the raising of Lazarus.

Mrs. M. K.: Let me see, that is in the Gospel according to St. John. Well, it is not yet quite settled that John did not write that, so I suppose I may read it. But remember, Johnny, if it were possible to resolve all the miracles of the Old Testament into extraordinary acts of Divine Providence, using the forces and forms of nature in accordance with the laws of nature; and if we could explain all the miracles of Jesus, . . . from His use of mind cure or hypnotism or any other occult power—still I claim that nothing essential would be lost from the miracles of the Bible.†

Johnny: Were the Apostles hypnotized?

Mrs. M. K.: I hav not taken a brief† to tell you about that.

Johnny: Was Adam a good man, mamma?

Mrs. M. K.: Yes. He was created sinless, but was not possessed of that moral excellence which comes only through disciplin and heavenly training.‡

Johnny: The catechism says that he was created after the image of God.

Mrs. M. K.: Yes; but the Elohist had a very imperfect idea of God. As I hav told you, we need a new doctrin of God.

Johnny: Was Adam as good as my papa?

Mrs. M. K.: No; your papa, whose temptations hav been a means of grace, has made his progress by the curved lines of sin, not by the straight line of obedience.§

Johnny: How did the prophets know so much about the messiah, mamma?

Mrs. M. K.: Many of these predictions hav been reversed by history; and the great body of the messianic predictions has not only never been fulfilled, but cannot now be fulfilled, for the reason that its own time is passed forever.‖

Johnny: But Jesus Christ said they would be all fulfilled, didn't He?

Mrs. M. K.: Yes, child; but God recalled his decree.¶

Johnny: Is recalling His decree, the same as breaking His promis?

Mrs. M. K.: That is part of the "new doctrin of God."

Johnny: I suppose that my little sister Jennie looks down from heaven and wonders that we are puzzled by all these things.

Mrs. M. K.: Hush, Johnny! Jennie is not in heaven. You are neglecting those vast periods of time which elapse between death and judgment. Jennie is in the Middle State. It is a heavenly university.††

Johnny: Is that an essential or a circumstantial?

Mrs. M. K.: That is an essential. We don't go at first to heaven or hell. We go to the Middle State. The bugbear of a judgment immediately after death should be banished from the world.‡‡

Johnny: Then Jesus did not die to save us from punishment.

Mrs. M. K.: Yes; but the whole race of Man is redeemed.§§ Think of the heathen who hav never heard of Christ. They would hav to be punished for rejecting Him.

Johnny: Then I will spend my next allowance on candy.

Mrs. M. K.: That will be enough for to-day. I must see about that Sunday-school teacher. I think he must be a traditionalist.

Johnny: Mamma, if I don't giv any more money for the redeemed heathen, I shall hav more to spend on the Fourth of July.

Mrs. M. K.: To be sure, and I will take you to see the fireworks; but before that Professor Barkis is going to blow the breastworks of traditionalism to atoms.¶¶ I will take you to that.

Johnny: Mamma. Shall I put the Bible carefully on the table again?

Mrs. M. K.: Oh, no; put it on the shelf with those novels. The Bible as a book is paper, print, and binding—nothing more.*

Johnny: Papa says he carried one in his pocket all through the war.

Mrs. M. K.: What nonsense. It has no magical virtue in it, and no halo inclosing it. It will not stop a bullet any better than a mass-book.† Next Sunday I will tell you all about the historical errors in the Bible. You mustn't go back to that traditionalistic Sunday-school again. And now let us go down and hear Dr. Madison Park preach on the immorality of the patriarchs. It is sure to be instructiv.

The Freethought Federation of America.

The direct results of the continuous agitations of Freethought and Freethinkers in general, are becoming too apparent to escape unnoticed. On every hand ancient conditions of thought are trembling upon the verge of dissolution. The old orthodox beliefs of our progenitors hav undergone such radical changes that the orthodoxy of our day is scarcely distinguishable from the heterodoxy of half a generation ago. Christianity is becoming more and more secularized in order to meet the secular requirements of the age, engendered by the progressiv temper of mankind. The gradual progress of secular institutions, even in connection with the church, may be distinctly traced from period to period, and as a result of the Freethought propaganda, our churches are compelled to cast aside much of their supernaturalistic doctrin, and confine themselvs to the secular and social subjects that are agitating the public mind.

These circumstances foster within our hearts a hope for the future welfare of man, a future in which work shall be man's only worship—when work shall take the place of prayer, and teaching that of preaching.

We hav also great hopes that in the immediate future, perhaps ere another year has passed away, our first Demand may become a law in one or more of the states in our republic.

Two of our state assemblies, more especially, will hav to discuss during the ensuing term the question of an equal taxation of church property with all other property—viz., those of Ohio and Oregon.

I hav received information from an authentic source that within the next few months a measure will be drafted and presented to the Ohio legislature upon this subject. The measure will be supported and backed up by the American Protectiv Association, which is a Protestant organization with an activ membership numbering thousands. And we hope that when such a measure shall be brought before the assembly every Freethinker will be on hand to do his share toward trying to make it a law of the state. Write a personal letter to the member of your district urging him to vote in favor of such a bill, and lead him to understand that if he does not then you will comply with Article V of our constitution, and will refuse to vote for him should he again be a candidate for reëlection. This is where the power of the Federation can be brought into useful operation and where it can make itself felt. To show that this is not a mere hobby or even a castle in the air to be destroyed by the first gust of wind that comes, I quote the following letter from an enthusiastic worker in the Federation from Cleveland, O.:

CLEVELAND, O., Nov. 19, 1892.

MR. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Sec. F. F. A., My Dear Sir: Press of work about election time has left me little time to attend to Sunday opening petitions. I inclose a few names which I hav picked up while at work about the court-house. You will notice that the last name is that of a judge of our court of common pleas, who is a Liberal and is willing to allow the fact to become known. I intend forcing agitation of Sunday laws and taxation of church property, the first by introduction of a bill to repeal all laws against Sunday amusements, and the second by suit to contest the constitutionality of the law exempting church property from taxation. In this way will try to keep up a little "campaign of education." I think I can rely upon one of our legislators to introduce bill to repeal Sunday laws. It will be defeated, of course, but not until I hav found an opportunity to get a few ideas in print. I am advised by good constitutional lawyers that the law exempting church property is in contravention of Bill of Rights. Local events hav made taxation questions of much interest and time is ripe for agitation.

Three of my friends hav petitions to repeal Sunday closing condition, but they are slow in bringing them in. One of them has over fifty signatures and the others hav started. ALBERT TALCOT HOLMES.

I might say that the foregoing is independent of the measure intended by the American Protectiv Association, but we hav hopes that out of the two some good may be accomplished in that direction. A similar measure is to be prepared and presented to the state legislature of Oregon, and I express a fervent wish that the other states will soon fall into line.

I would also address a few words to the members of the Federation and all Freethinkers of every shade of opinion throughout the country. Do not relax your efforts to assist in the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday. From the letters I hav received during the past week, many are inclined to think that further activity in this direction is not needed, in consequence of the action recently taken by the board of directors. Remember, that the opening of the Fair has by no means been decided. The directors are handicapped by the late enactment of Congress, and cannot act in contravention of the law, as declared by that body, unless such action could be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States. As the law stands at present, the Fair will be closed on Sunday, and all our efforts must be directed upon the attempt we shall make to induce Congress to repeal the law, a law which they had no constitutional right to pass, despite the milk-and-water arguments of R. B. Westbrook, D.D., to the contrary. Congress, as such, had no rights invested in them to interfere with the opening or closing of the Fair, nor hav they now, other than to take such action as is necessary to retrieve themselvs and redress the evils they hav done. And even if the board of directors could act contrary to law, as declared by the House of Congress, and so open the Fair, it would still be our duty to try and enforce the repeal of the obnoxious closing clause, for the sake of a national principle involved therein. Therefore I urge every member of the Federation to renew your exertions in this direction, circulate petitions wherever you can, secure all the signatures possible and send them to me addressed to the headquarters of the Federation. If you hav not sufficient blanks for that purpose, do not hesitate to address your applications to me for what you may require. Every mail brings me a large batch of such petitions, the signatures of which reach a grand total of almost ten thousand. We still desire more, because we wish, by their aid, to show Congress that in demanding the repeal of the closing clause we are acting in harmonious relation to the wishes of the people, unlike a minority, who happen to be powerful because they are organized against us. Since my last letter I hav lectured in Litchfield, Ill., chiefly through the efforts of D. M. Reynolds, who came down to Centralia to see me, and took me back with him for the express purpose of lecturing in that town. I was favored with a very good audience, despite the short notice of the lecture, and I hope to be with them again in the spring. From here I went on to Springfield, where I gave a lecture on Sunday, November 20th, in the Universalist church. The arrangements were made by Mrs. Helen Cellar, whose enthusiasm knows no bounds, and is ever ready to do her part in the grand cause of human liberty. There are quite a number of good and activ Freethinkers in this city, many of whom hav signed our constitution and helped to swell the ever-increasing ranks of the Federation. I was pleased to meet here with Mr. and Mrs. Kelly, Mr. and Mrs. Walker, Mr. and Mrs. Waesenbacher, Mrs. Gray and Miss Gray, Mr. Kusomcul, and several others. I urged upon them the necessity of immediate organization, and it is very probable that an effectiv organization may soon be established here.

Next day I arrived in Chicago, where a mass of mail matter had accumulated which it occupied two or three days' hard work to cope with. Among them were several complimentary communications and donations of our friends. First and foremost was Dr. E. B. Foote, of New York city, author of "Plain Home Talk" and other medical works, whose efforts in our cause are now well known to all Liberals. With the letter Dr. Foote sends us a check for $25 to help us in our work. Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., also sends us a nice letter, inclosing a check for $5. Besides these Dr. L. Z. Coman, of Boulder, Col., sends us an order for $9, and other donations hav been received this week as follows: J. A. Munn, Idaho Springs, Col., $2.50; J. W. Miller, Idaho Springs, Col., $2.49; Wm. Case, Lafayette, Ind., $1; Lewis Welly, Nickerson, Kan., $0.36; Wm. Raishleigh, Simmler, Cal., $1. Total for the week, $46.35.

If such financial assistance will continue to be given us we can assure our friends that the trust and confidence bestowed in us shall not be misplaced. We hav a large quantity of Freethought campaign literature in the press and by such help we shall soon hav it all in circulation, and our wish is to flood the country with it. We can do it if you will help us, and without your help we can do nothing. A fund will be required to assist President Putnam in his work at Washington, whence he will shortly return from the Pacific coast; and I therefore appeal to our friends for that financial help that we must hav to make our work successful. Then awake, Freethinkers, rouse ye and join the glorious procession of freedom's sons and daughters, until the cry of Liberty shall resound in every church corridor, stifling the curses and anathemas of her votaries; until the flag of freedom shall be unfurled from every corner of our fair land, and when the opinions of the superstitious past shall no longer be forced upon us, but relegated to that obscurity and oblivion from which they sprang. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH,

Sec. Freethought Federation of America.

Publisher's Notes.

We hav a few sample copies of "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" which we will send to anyone who desires it. This book is now in the fourth thousand, and a new edition is on the press. Sent promptly on receipt of $2 for board-covered copies; $2.50 in cloth with gold side stamp. "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" has been in print but a few months, but the book-binders are working on the third thousand. Each of these books is of the convincing order, because Christians cannot get around the facts and arguments it contains, supported as they are by pictures which tell the story even to him who will not read. If those of our friends who possess these books will show them to their Liberal friends and mention the large discount made on them when ordered with THE TRUTH SEEKER for a year we think they will hav no difficulty in getting a new subscriber.

We also call attention to the advertisement of books for the holidays on page 782 of this paper. There are many beautiful things connected with the pagan festival in celebration of the returning sun, which the Christians hav adapted to their own use and called Christmas, chief of which is the kindly remembrance of friends with presents, and nothing can be more appropriate for such presents than books which instruct as well as please the eye. A list of such works is what we hav made for the guidance of our readers.

And attention is again called to the list of Saladin's works advertised on page 780, a large consignment of which we hav just received from England. Saladin is one of the most brilliant and sharpest writers in the Freethought ranks. We can conscientiously recommend "God and his Book," "Woman: Her Glory, Her Shame, and Her God," "Did Jesus Christ Rise From the Dead?" "The Confessional," and "Christianity and the Slave Trade," as being books that every Freethinker can study and use with advantage in his controversies with church-members. The others are of a more general literary character but each bears evidence that its author is a man of great genius wholly free from Christian superstition. It will please us greatly to circulate them widely in this country.

The Leaflet advocating the Sunday opening of the World's Fair ought to be scattered by the thousands. In December or January we shall send them to Congressmen and to others who may be influenced by argument. We need money to do this, and those who can afford to aid are requested to do so. The price of the Leaflets is 25 cents per dozen; $1.50 per hundred. Anyone who will distribute five hundred or a thousand can obtain them at special rates.

To Keep Our Servants From Tyrannizing Us.

MARION, O., Nov. 15, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2 to assist in defraying expenses in getting up leaflets to pray our servants, the Congressmen of the United States, to do justice to the majority of the people who sent them there. FRANK EVERLY.

We Are Outrivaled by Another Publisher, viz., God.

IRISH RIPPLE, PA., Oct. 31, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Some one no doubt has told you to send your paper to our address. I will now ask you as a favor to send no more. We hav no use for anything of the kind. We can select our own reading matter and pay for the same. Send no more, as they are consumed by fire as soon as they are received. We hav the Word of GOD to go by; we will study that for ourselvs. Hoping to hear from you no more, MRS. STAFFORD.

[If Mrs. Stafford will not read, we can, of course, do little to enlighten her. Perhaps, however, as she grows older she will lose some of her prejudice.—ED. T. S.]

Columbus.

GALVESTON, TEX., Nov. 15, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I read in the June Century an article by Emilio Castelar on Christopher Columbus, which for Catholic impudence beats God one. I will quote. He says: "As we hav already seen, the Ultramontane school of Europe proposed to recognize the Columbian discovery as a miracle and to enroll its author in the celestial court. But the loves of Christopher Columbus and Beatrice Enriquez Arana disturbed them in this purpose, being clearly unsanctified by the sacraments of the church and illegitimate under the civil laws. Scarce knowing how to extricate themselvs from this untoward strait, they married the long-dead lovers, who in their lives had neither cared to marry nor been able to wed; and so they made them lawful husband and wife." 'Tis to be hoped they will not make a saint out of him till after his honeymoon.

We would rather miss a meal at any time than our TRUTH SEEKER. We distribute them right and left. And my husband never fails to drive home a Freethought wedge when opportunity offers. I hav no Freethought woman acquaintances, so you may know with what zest I enjoy your paper.

Wishing you success, I am,

Yours truly, SARAH E. WILEY.

They Believe in Organization.

NOVELTY, CAL., Nov. 3, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, for which send to the inclosed address "Spiritualism Sustained," by Colonel Kelso; $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER Literature Fund to print Heston's cartoon on the World's Fair, etc. (send me fifty or so when printed); $5.50, with the inclosed letter, to John R. Charlesworth.

Hoping to hear of greater success for Freethought, I am,

Yours to down orthodoxy,

MR. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Dear Sir: We desire to be enrolled as members of the Freethought Federation of America. We sincerely hope the Federation may be more successful than the old American Secular Union, which since Stevens's time has accomplished nothing and is with no hope for the future. We say, keep the sectarian hands out of the treasury, both state and national, forever.

Inclosed find the following donations: H. Dannenbrink, Novelty, Cal., $1; H. Bridger, Novelty, Cal., $0.50; Simon Barcendun, Novelty, Cal., $1; A. Dannenbrink, Novelty, Cal., $1; P. Shame On the Sunday Despots.

NEW YORK, Oct. 24, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The narrow, contracted minds of the board of trustees and commissioners of the Central park museum shown in their contemplating shutting up the house on Sunday from the poor workingman and his family, will be noted and condemned by all Liberal and sensible people on the globe.

As has been suggested by a number of considerate men, if we are so scant of funds, close the museum one day and evening of the week and keep it open on Sunday.

Where do those men get their power to shut up the people's place of amusement on a day on which the heathen celebrated their god, the sun? Should these fanatics examin history they will find no cause to deprive people of their enjoyment.

I can but notice the able caricature in last week's TRUTH SEEKER by that able, deep-thinking man Watson Heston. Every time he plays it is a trump card and wins the trick. Keep it up.

Church News.

PHŒNIX, ARIZ., Nov. 10, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Whilst passing through New Mexico on my way to this town a few weeks since, I met on the train a gentleman from Denver, who had formerly lived in Lincoln, Neb. It had been the home of his youth; and, consequently, when his mother died and left him a small sum of money, his inclination was to invest it there where he was known of everyone. She had been a "Christian" woman, and as she had also been a good mother this son grown had respected her convictions and thus allowed himself to be led into the fold. His inheritance of a few hundred dollars he invested in a confectioner's stand. A short time thereafter one of the props of the church appealed to him for a contribution, and as he had no ready funds, offered to take his note for $50—probably representing a quarter of his capital invested. The note came due, and as the young man could not meet it, the church sold him out, broke up his business, and drove him forth a wanderer to another state.

A cut in your paper, where the priest is picking the pocket of a worshiper at the shrine, reminded me of the incident I here relate, as told to me by the victim himself. MARY S. PUTNAM, M.D.

Discrepant Chapters of Genesis.

STAMFORD, CONN., Nov. 15, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Your correspondent of November 12th, Thomas Rogers, hits very forcibly in many of his remarks in reference to God's works as related in Gen. i—what an immense amount of reality he brought forth out of nothing. But I think he is a little off on his man creation. On the sixth day "God said, Let us make man in our own image. In his own image made he him, male and female made he them." Nothing is mentioned of what they were made of—whether of nothing, "a little earth," or anything else; therefore we may be justified in coming to a conclusion from surrounding circumstances that he took the remnants of nothing that were left after all other things were produced, amalgamated them together, and from the combination produced man. This would account for the great diversity there is in human characters; as there is not an animal, a reptil, a bird, a fish, a plant, or an insect but some one of the human issue will typify it.

As to the man made from the dust of the earth, the woman from his rib, the garden of Eden, etc., this was none of the works of God. That account is in the second chapter, and is attributed to the Lord God, who appears to be a very different one from the personage presented in the first chapter. When we read the Lord God found there was no man to till the ground, we are led to wonder what became of the one made in God's own image. G. W. GORUM.

Praise God From Whom——

RUSSELL, PA., Nov. 18, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: As God is the author of all things, evil as well as good, and in view of the calamities that hav occurred in the last few years, I feel it our duty to praise him for the evil he has afflicted us with, hence the following, which I think would hav been appropriate to sing as the closing exercises of thanks service:

Praise God from whom all cyclones blow!
Praise him when rivers overflow.
Praise him who whirls down house and steeple,
Who sinks the ship and drowns the people.

Praise God for the Johnstown flood—
Praise him for scenes of death and blood;
Praise him who the thousands drowned
And saved an image safe and sound.

Praise God when tidal waves do come;
Praise him for millions' damage done.
Praise him when hurricanes do sweep
Swift destruction on the deep.

Praise God for floods in far Japan;
Praise him for desolation wan,
Praise him who crumbles mountains down
And buries thousands 'neath the ground.

Praise God for Dakota's drouth;
Praise him for floods in the Sunny South.
Praise him who sends the killing frost,
And for the Louisville holocaust.

Praise God for pestilence and woe,
For railroad wreck and avalanche of snow.
Praise him for preachers who 'neath church steeple
Teach delusion and rob the people.

Praise God for war, for strife and pain,
For earthquake shock and tyrant's reign.
Praise him for gibbet, block, and prison pen,
Then all will say a loud Amen!

During His Lifetime Is When His Monument Should Be Erected.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Nov. 9, 1892.

MR. EDITOR:

"Art is long, and time is fleeting,
And our hearts like muffled drums are beating
Funeral marches to the grave."

The man in my judgment who has done more to Liberalize and Secularize the youthful mind of the Americans than any other person is Robert G. Ingersoll. To mark the epoch in which this great man lived I think a monument should be erected to him and to the age of Liberalism in which he has lived. Of all the men who hav attacked the dogmas, fanaticism, and superstitions of the modern churches, Colonel Ingersoll stands forth as the champion of champions. By the power of his genius and his eloquence he has convinced hundreds of thousands of the doctrins advocated by the pioneers in the cause of Liberalism. I am willing to contribute $100 toward a bronze statue of Robert G. Ingersoll to be erected in the city of Washington.

The Greeks deemed it the greatest honor that could be paid to any man to erect a statue to him during his lifetime.

The admirers of Ingersoll may be numbered by millions in the United States alone, while in Europe there are immense numbers. His books hav been translated into all modern languages. They are doing a silent work that will be felt for centuries to come. The names of Ingersoll and Paine will be felt and liv to the remote ages. They are the American patriots par excellence. When other men whose names are now on every tongue are lost and forgotten, the name of Ingersoll will be a household word, while his birthday will be honored as Thomas Paine's 29th of January is now remembered wherever the language in which he wrote is spoken.

Let us hav a monument to Ingersoll, and let the great genius be present at its inauguration as was Professor Morse when his monument was unveiled in Central park. WILSON MACDONALD.

Use Politics and Organization.

CLEVELAND, O., Nov. 15, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I hav sent to Mr. Charlesworth about two hundred signatures for the Sunday opening petition, including many professional men and prominent business men of this city. I hav additional petitions in circulation. I hav interviewed candidates for Congress, and am happy to say that two Cleveland men who will sit in the House next spring hav promised to vote for repeal of the obnoxious condition. Parts of this city are in two Congressional districts. Hon. L. Johnson, present representativ and Democratic candidate from the 21st district, who was reëlected, voted against the Sunday closing clause and promises to vote for its repeal. W. J. White, Republican candidate for the 20th district, also elected, is a Liberal, and, I am informed, promises to vote for repeal.

The daily newspapers are made to sell, and religious people will not buy them unless they cater to church taste. Formation of a Liberal political party will force attention to claims of Liberalism and compel opposing parties to notice them if only for the purpose of reply. The rule of bright advertisers is: "Talk about us. We don't care whether you praise or damn us, so long as our name is on your lips." Talk leads to thought, rather than follows thought, so let us make them talk.

Recent sudden change of political opinion shows how much may be done by persistent educational tactics. Free thought can be made to sweep the country as did free trade if similar methods are employed. We must organize. Past Liberal organizations are almost inert. As an auxiliary I would try secret Liberal societies, with mutual protectiv features and absolute secresy of movement, both of which hav a charm for most men.

ALBERT TALCOTT HOLMES.

Freedom Cost This Son His Father.

AMESBURY, MASS., Nov. 8, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Charles Lincoln Haskell, who died in St. Louis, Mo., last September, was a Liberal thinker, writer, and speaker of more than ordinary power and influence.

Although but thirty years of age he had passed through the valley and shadow of religious experience, out into the clear light of thought and knowledge. His father was a minister of narrow orthodox views, and used to caution his son to read the Bible more, and the scientific books, of which he was so fond, less. In consequence, he read the Bible more, but not the other books less. The influence of his surroundings, however, caused him to "get religion," which for a time he seemed to enjoy. Being still eager for knowledge, he pursued his readings, becoming familiar with "Bible science" and the science of truth. He went away to school soon after his conversion, where he had larger opportunities for scientific research. The more he read and thought the clearer it became to him that science or the Bible must be false.

It was a severe struggle, lasting several months; but truth prevailed and the Bible was overthrown. He was free from superstition's thrall, and, realizing the value of his new-found freedom, and the darkness in which he had been groping, began activly to propagate the principles of Liberalism, hoping to undo the work he had done in behalf of superstition. When his father heard of his son's changed views a stormy interview occurred, which ended their cordial relations.

In 1886 he went to Worcester, Mass., where, with ten others, he helped organize the Liberal Union, a society organized for free discussion of all subjects. He frequently addressed the Union, always in a clear, forcible, and eloquent manner. He wrote many articles of merit for the Liberal press, and had his life been spared, would hav become one of the foremost Liberal advocates.

He was a true man, as all his friends testify, with not a single moral blemish. He died far away from home and Liberal friends, and but little is known to the writer of his last days and death. Consumption was the destroying disease. He leaves a wife and many friends to regret his untimely death.

MANLY A. BRIGHAM.

Which Was the Better Christian?

GILLESPIEVILLE, O., Nov. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: A circumstance occurred in our neighborhood which we wish to hav chronicled in your valuable paper. Rev. John Carper, of this county, on Saturday night, Oct. 15, 1892, stole a wagonload of potatoes of V. Jones, this county, who is also a church-member. Jones, on the blessed holy Sabbath, let church and all go, and procuring two constables, started to hunt up his potatoes. He soon struck a mule-team trail, the same that had been in his lot. He, or rather they, followed the mule-team trail to the house of Rev.

John Carper. He was, unfortunately, the owner of a mule team, and what was more, it was the only mule team in those parts, so denial was out of the question. When wanted, the holy brother was down upon all-fours, so to speak, in church praying Gaud to hav mercy on poor sinners and to enlighten the poor benighted Infidel. Amen, say I. What we want is light. When told he was wanted, he arose, shook hands all around in old orthodox fashion, confessed his guilt, came down to Jones's, and settled by note for the potatoes. The note was made to read: "One day after date I promis to pay V. Jones $10 for potatoes I stole of him." After signing the note he shook hands all around and returned to the bosom of his family, again to lead in prayer, and again to bemean the Infidel.

Now, let us ask which of the two self-righteous brethren was living up to the teachings of that God they both adore. The meek and lowly Jesus said, "If thine enemy smite thee on one cheek turn him the other cheek also." "If he take thy cloak let him take thy coat also." Mr. V. Jones, to hav been consistent with his Bible, his creed, and his profession, should hav hunted for his brother and when found should hav given him another load of potatoes, at least. On the other hand, the reverend gentleman is justified in his act by his Bible. Grand old Jacob stole his brother's birthright, his father-in-law's cattle, and his gods. The great God taught Moses to teach the Israelites to steal each one from his neighbor. "And each one stole from his neighbor gold and silver and brass." Jesus said, "Take no thought of the morrow, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, or wherewithal shall ye be clothed." Brother Carper took no thought of the morrow. He was laying up treasures "where the moth doth not corrupt or the thief break through and steal," and when "'tater-diggin'" time came he had none. And he had laid his treasure up so high he could not reach it. "And as Jesus and his disciples passed through a field of corn, they plucked the corn and ate thereof;" and as Brother Carper passed through Brother Jones's potato patch he plucked twenty bushels intending to eat thereof. Which was the better Christian?

No wonder the churches of the day are so intolerant and wicked. They pattern after the good (?) old patriarchs. And what were they? A set of lawless, licentious liars, thieves, murderers, and hypocrits. Show us one patriarch who was ordinarily good, and we will show you, by the Bible's own showing, ten whose records are as black as the walls of hell are said to be. There is where the preachers pattern.

When preachers come, if you're at home,
Then watch your wife and daughter;
For if you don't, or if you won't,
You'll soon find out you "oughter."

I am, for truth forever and forever,

JAMES POE CRYDER.

An Open Letter to a Cuban in Defense of the United States.

CIENFUEGOS, CUBA, NOV. 7, 1892.

SR. DU. ARTURO CUYÁS, Dear Sir: I hav just read in the Diario de la Marina, of Oct. 29, 1892, the ridiculous communication of your funny fellow, K. Lendas, an extract from which runs thus: "Los Europeos en Nueva York siguen oyendo con mucho divertimiento los grandiloquentes discursos con que los prohombres de este pais se cuentum unos á otros las excelencios de su patria y su superioridad sobre todas las naciones del mundo" (The Europeans in New York continue to hear, with diversion, the grandiloquent speeches with which the citizens of this country recount to one another the many excellences of their country and its superiority over all other nations of the world).

The great wonder is that such a fellow as is K. Lendas can, in the form of a pen, insinuate himself into the good right hand of a man who is so noble as is Sr. Du. Arturo Cuyás.

It is fortunate for you, my dear sir, that your K. Lendas writes for the Diario de la Marina, for really he is often very much at sea, and without a helm; though sometimes he gives us Yankees such digs of truth that it seems as though his helm were not entirely gone. But, when reflecting upon the source of nearly all of the advancements of the nineteenth century that are enjoyed by the people of "todas las naciones del mundo," such as the steamship, by Fulton; the lightning-rod and electricity, by the Rationalist Franklin, the great Yankee philosopher, and which the fanatics of "todas las naciones del mundo" erect upon the spires of their churches to prevent their gods from striking those edifices to ruins with their lightning-strokes, thus showing that they hav more confidence in the scientific invention of a Yankee "heretic" than in their gods; the cotton-gin, by Whitney; india-rubber, by Goodyear; the revolver, by Colt; the sewing-machine, by Howe; the telegraph, by Morse; the reaping- and mowing-machines, by McCormack; the sleeping-car, by Pullman; the air-brake, by Westinghouse; the corn-planter, by Brown; the breech-loading gun, by Sharp; the metallic cartridge, by Burnside; the electric light and phonograph, by Edison; the telephone, by Bell; the steam fire-engin, by an American at Cincinnati, O.; the revolving turret for ships of war and fortifications, by Timby, an American, eighteen years of age; the iron suspension bridge, by Paine; the twist-drill, by Morse; the printing press; street tramways; artificial teeth and the profession of dentistry; the fountain pen; the type-writing machine; the steam dredging-machine; the screw chucks for turning lathes; artificial ice; the refrigerator; the knitting-machine; the pin machine; the burglar alarm; the fire- and burglar-proof safe; the reversible pinion and barrel for watches; the use of petroleum; celluloid; the agricultural implements other than those aforenamed; the solid iron tire; the circular shears and all other tinsmith's machines; the stamping and spinning of metals; the universal spiral drill; the double purchase nippers; the roller flouring mill; the fish-joint for railways; myriads of other useful inventions; Mormonism and Spiritualism, which, though false foolishness, hav helped to drag the duped slaves of "todas las naciones del mundo" from the bogs of barbarous superstition or supernaturalism, religious, "spiritual" fanaticism, and slavery, the generally sarcastic tone of said communication displays the fact that the vituperativ mind of K. Lendas is beset with the same rotten, venomous envy that prompted the barbarians of Europe to put Columbus into chains, and permitted that great man to die in the uttermost depths of misery, in Valladolid; to cast the great Galileo into prison; to burn Bruno at the stake. And that, too, after those great men had publicly done their great deeds of merit and value!

This shows that K. Lendas would gladly do with the United States of America and the inventors as the Europeans did with those great benefactors of the human race. But if he and his envious pals be disposed to try it, why, just hop on, K., the sled is ready, and the Yankee boys who invented the above-named weapons will soon giv you a valuable lesson as to how to use them!

Just think of the battle of New Orleans, Jan. 8, 1815, when Packenham, brother-in-law to the duke of Wellington, came over with 15,000 of the flower of European soldiery, the very men who, five months later, defeated the ablest of European generals upon the field of Waterloo. Those 15,000 British troops fought against 7,500 American backwoodsmen under the command of the heroic American general Andrew Jackson, and in that memorable battle those Americans slew 2,600 of those superb British troops and lost but six Americans killed and seven wounded! Yes; and tell K. to think of it, and to, for gracious sake, pull down his little clothes—pull down his little vest!

Some Europeans hav even sought to rob us of our Bacon and our Shakspere! But when reminded of the fact that at the time when those great men of genius lived and wrote we were Britons, they quickly and proudly surrendered to the truth—with a tinge of envy, of course.

Gladly will we continue to elevate the Europeans, and, with our great inventions and examples, add to their comforts, conveniences, and standard of veritable merit. But your funny fellow, K. Lendas, should keep within the bounds of prudence and of truth.

Respectfully yours,

A YANKEE BOY.

Greenbackism.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., NOV. 13, 292.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Koezly wholly dissents from parliamentary rules that the affirmativ has the right to close a discussion, and claims that such a right, "maybe" established by "precedent or custom," is not "binding" on him, and yet he says "the whole civilized world recognizes gold and silver" "as its medium in trade." "O consistency, thou art a jewel."

He says Porter is unreliable, in which I agree with him, but the question is, in what way? Now, nobody is gullible enough to believe but that Porter was working in the interest of his party, and that he would not overestimate the indebtedness of the country, but there is a strong probability that he underestimated it. And a vast majority of the people, if we can judge from the recent election, believe that he did. And the matter stands thus—those who dissent from his figures are forced to conclude it was more, and his friends dare not claim it was less without virtually declaring Porter an enemy to his party, and so the only difficulty in applying "good arguments and facts" to them is, the indebtedness of the country is underestimated. But taking the figures as they are, I underestimated the number of the people whose homes are in jeopardy. To be exact, there are only a little over sixty-three million people in the United States, and allowing an average of five to the family the head of which is mortgaged, makes forty-five million people whose homes are resting under indebtedness, and the "facts" are that five-sevenths of the people's property is under mortgage.

Mr. Koezly does not understand how we can trade with other nations with an irredeemable paper money. Now, if I can get him to disabuse his mind that gold and silver are used as a medium of exchange between nations, why, then, I assume, it will be an easy task. Now, the "facts" are that they are not used as a medium of exchange with other nations (a medium of exchange is money of some kind). Nations make their exchanges on commodities. It is true that they may use gold and silver at their bullion value more frequently than any other commodity, but bullion in no sense is anything but a commodity and a product, and it does not follow, because this has been the custom (which he detests), that any other product or commodity would not answer the same purpose. So please bear in mind that our exchange with other nations is made with a commodity, no matter whether it be gold, silver, wheat, potatoes, or beans.

Now, I hav already said that our exports far exceed our imports, so this leaves a balance of trade in our favor; and suppose for the sake of argument that other nations would not consent to trade with us only for the two commodities gold and silver, as we would receive more gold and silver bullion than we paid out we would always hav enough on hand to meet any emergency.

Mr. Koezly wants to know if I know the number of my bills. No. The risks are so small, having never lost any by fire or otherwise, I never pay any attention to the number or where issued. But the banks do.

He also takes exception to what I said about money never becoming worthless until what is back of it refuses to receive it; and I hav also said that it may depreciate in time of war by a government's constant defeat. Then he cites how our money depreciated in the darkest days of the Rebellion. But let us search out the cause. The first is as above stated; and second, because the government depreciated its own money by placing the word "except" on it, therefore it refused to receive it on all occasions. And this I claim had as much, if not more, to do with depreciating it than our constant defeat in the field, the same as, if I had given my note and had been receiving some drawback and assigned two reasons why I would not receive it, it is very likely the party would go to some loan company and would submit to a greater shave than if I had told him, "Your money will be ready for you promptly when due." The facts are, the greenback was not a full legal tender or irredeemable money. They were only partially so. But does anyone believe that we would hav had the immense public debt if we had not made any more debt than the two exceptions implied, viz., to pay duties on imports and the public debt, which might hav been included in one exception, because the soldiers received the greenback as pay, the farmers received it for provisions and supplies and so forth, the railroad received it for transportation, and the manufactories received it for equipments, arms, ammunition, clothing, etc., and as we were able to furnish almost all the munitions of war, there ought to hav been very little importing done or a very small public debt? And in fact it was small, and returning to a specie basis is what made the immense debt, strictly in accord with the capitalistic "They would see to it that there was an immense debt made out of the war." They commenced by giving Uncle Sam a right-hander called the resumption act, followed by another called the credit-strengthening act, and then followed it up with a left-hander known as the demonetization of silver; or in other words, they went to Uncle Sam and virtually said: "Uncle Sam, that money you hav been paying the soldiers, sailors, farmers, and manufactories with is not worth the paper it is written on. Now, we will tell you what to do. You call that money in and we will furnish you money that you can rely on." So Uncle Sam called it in and issued bonds, or gave his note drawing from four to six per cent interest in the lawful money of the country, and finally made it payable in coin, and as this it was feared would not make Uncle Sam's credit strong enough, finally agreed to pay in gold. Now, Uncle Sam had his pockets lined with his paper money, so he dumped $1,808,300,000 in the stove and burnt it up. Now, does it not look as if they had got Uncle Sam on a terrible spree, or they had talked to him until he had become insane? To illustrate, what would you think of a person that had an immense amount of money and would burn it up, notwithstanding that it would pay all kinds of debts that he might make but two, and leave himself without a cent, and be forced to issue his notes promising to pay? Do you not think such a person would be a fit subject for a lunatic asylum? So the very fact that the greenbacks were not a full irredeemable paper, and finally the good purpose they had performed was destroyed by returning to a specie basis, is what has caused the ruination of our country.

He questions my authorities. But we generally are willing to concede the latest authorities are the most accurate. A man that has the ability to write a history is to that extent as good authority, as far as he goes, as an encyclopedia. Senator Stanford—the very fact that he is a law-maker compels him to be very accurate in his statements. And I shall hav to insist my authorities are unimpeached. And for Mr. Koezly to cite what took place in a certain period of a country's history, is not a denial of what took place at another period of the same country's history. This will apply to Russia as well as Venice. If his statement in regard to France is not a misprint it certainly was a case of overdoing a matter. The largest amount of money in circulation during the Rebellion would not exceed $2,000,000,000, while he claims they had $45,000,000,000 and more. The allusion I made to France occurred right in our own time, and he admits it worked successfully by admitting that it is a prosperous nation. Now, in summing up he has failed to sustain his fire argument, and has not invalidated my authorities by stating another case in the same country's history showing the reverse, because I am very willing to admit the same nations hav made mistakes.

Now, I suggest since the deadlock between the old parties is broken it is good time for Liberals to do a little bush-whacking before the main Liberal army enters the field.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight.
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Blackey.

So old Blackey is dead, you say—
Died in his stall last night;
His time had come and he couldn't stay
To see the morning light.

Well, who was Blackey, you wonder?
Who was he, anyway?
Who was he, that we should ponder
Upon his lifeless clay?

Only a horse! And that is all,
All that anyone knew;
Only a horse that came at call,
Obedient and true.

For eighteen years these streets he paced;
You must hav seen him oft—
With stately tread the throng he faced,
His head and eye aloft.

Over the bridge a thousand times,
More or less, he has been;
Nor thought he of dollars or dimes,
Or fields of waving green.

To Swansea town and Somerset.
From Highland avenue,
This horse oft went, and never yet
To roads e'er lost the clew.

The ponds around he walked in state,
Familiar was the road;
His ways he traced at easy gait,
Nor felt the whip's sharp goad.

The "Stone bridge drive" full well he knew.
He was a horse of will—
He feared not rain or evening dew,
Nor paused at Townsend hill.

To Stafford road, and Westport, too,
Most cheerfully he went;
He seemed to wish his best to do,
Nor dreamed of discontent.

New Boston road ofttimes has known
The pressure of his feet;
His steps, wherever they hav gone,
Were cautious, if not fleet.

Steep Brook and Ferry Lane he knew,
Also from Berkeley out;
In fact, he knew it well and true,
The city roundabout.

He meekly bore his burdens all.
Unmindful of the storm;
His highest thought from fall to fall
Was good work to perform.

Now he has gone, old, trusty friend,
To come again no more,
A sigh to follow him we send
Across the trackless shore.

And this his epitaph shall be,
Which all the world may tell:
He faithful was to Fate's decree,
And did his duty well.

S. H. W.

A Heaven On Earth.

Never, never should anyone inflict unnecessary pain of mind or body upon any living being. How often has my soul ached at the following sights and sounds: A pair of little birds, bereft of their eggs or young by some thoughtless and malicious boy, flitting around with painful cries and sharp notes of agony. A boy throwing rocks at the birds, pigeons, poultry, cats, and dogs, often hitting them, and if not depriving them of their life, causing them needless suffering from their injuries. The caged bird hanging in the hot sun, suffering from the intense heat, shivering in the draft, or smothering by the muslin enveloping its cage nearly to the top, with fresh water given it only once a day which it should hav at least twice daily. Poultry confined in a yard, which, if properly fed, are given water only in the morning, and in the hottest part of the day when they need cool water the most it has become too much heated in the hot sun to admit their drinking it, and they thus suffering intensely. A little kitten in the hands of a small child, who knows no better, because untaught, pinching it or pulling it about by a string tied around its neck, or lifting it by the tail, leg, or back, ending by violently flinging it upon the ground. The half-starved cat which I see so very often, and which I believe to be generally the most abused of all animals, which is expected to hunt for its food but is too weak, discouraged, and impatient from hunger to be very successful. The cat also barked at, chased, and often caught and torn to pieces by a destructiv dog, set on by some cruel boy, and I am sorry to say sometimes by girls and even grown people who call it fun to see it thus tortured. A cat, but more often a dog, with a tin can tied to its tail, running frightened nearly to death, and sometimes the can or string fastened in the bushes or fence in some out-of-the-way place, the animal dying a lingering and terrible death from hunger, thirst, and exposure. The patient cow kicked or hit with the milking-stool, and for no cause, by an ill-tempered man.

The overworked, too fast driven, half-starved horse, beaten because unable to draw the heavy loads required by the unfeeling master. Also the horse, driven or hitched by the curbstone, quivering with pain from the unnatural strain of the over-drawn check which holds the head so constantly and unnaturally high. The child ridiculed by schoolmates because shabbily dressed, lame, or deformed; yet needing all the more love, sympathy, and encouragement. A poor, toil-worn, wearied, discouraged, and perhaps heartsick, sorrowing man or woman looked down upon, sneered at, or patronized by their more fortunate brothers and sisters. Oh, why will not people be more kind and cultivate more of that divine love principle—giv their children better examples and teach them to follow the same; to love all people and all children, whether rich or poor, beautiful or ugly in looks and appearance; to be kind and gentle to every bird, fowl, or animal. Oh, why will not people be more humane, in every sense of the word? When will they learn to feel that every man and woman is their brother and sister, and that every child has a divine right to their protection and love? Strive more for a heaven below and less for the heaven above. Will the youth who read this join with me and thus add to the numbers of those who are working so hard with this end in view, to make a heaven here on earth? Our dear Miss Wixon is one, and there are others.

Correspondence.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Oct. 22, 1892.

DEAR MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I am a little girl and I am going to school and I am eight years old. I am studying reading, spelling, writing, and drawing. I hav two sisters and two brothers. My brothers' names are Henry and Martin and my sisters' names are Anna and Johanna. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. We all like to look at the pictures. Papa tells us that the Watson Heston picture is the best to teach how foolish the Bible is and unfit for us children to believe to be the truth.

From a little Freethinking friend,

HILDA HOLMBERG.

[We shall be pleased to hear from Hilda again.—ED. C. C.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 11, 1892.

MISS WIXON: I hope to be lucky enough to obtain a small space in your Children's Corner.

I am a stranger in this country, which is considered abroad as one of the most civilized in the world. But allow me to ask this question: Can these United States of America be considered, with propriety, at the head of civilization when the blacks and the Chinese, if naturalized American citizens, are allowed to vote, to appoint the government, whereas the enlightened females, born in this country, are refused the right conceded to the negroes and the Chinese? Are not the American females considered as people?

JOSEPH FELIX GONZALEZ,
Nativ of Porto-Rico.

[Many intelligent persons hav asked themselvs the same questions. We answer that the people in power in the United States may consider themselvs civilized in their action toward the intelligent women of the country, but they are certainly not enlightened sufficiently or they would at once see the impropriety so plainly alluded to by our brother. American women pay taxes, are held amenable to laws they had no hand in shaping or sustaining, yet are denied the privileges extended freely to negroes and foreigners. It givs us pleasure to welcome our intelligent brother to the Corner, and we hope he will call again.—ED. C. C.]

MAYSTON, TENN., Nov. 10, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav just read a letter in the Corner from Katie D. Matteson and she wants to know about Lores L. Goodwin and his cat.

I, Lores L. Goodwin, am alive and leaping, but poor Timothy Skittlebones is dead and gone, no one knows where.

I hav another cat almost like him to take his place. We call him Voltaire. He is a large cat, and thinks a great deal of his tail, and has frolicking times all by himself. He will get up against the wall and whirl around trying to catch his tail, and when he does catch it he will roll over and hold it awhile; then he will jump up and race all around the house; then he will go back to the wall and do the same things over again. He is very playful and friendly.

We had a pair of white rats once with red eyes. One we named Togga and the other Dandy. They were really cute little nuisances. They would crawl all over you and eat your clothes.

One time there were six little red-eyed rats all at once, without any hair at all. Togga got in a fight with a big gray rat, had his eyes put out, and died. We gave some of the little ones away, sold some, and some died.

We hav a nice Sunday-school here, but I don't go because

I'm a Liberal, I'm a Liberal,
And I'll tell you the reason why—
I was brought up in the Liberal faith.
And I'll be one till I die.

LORES L. GOODWIN.

[Three cheers for Lores L. Goodwin. We will all sing the same song.—ED. C. C.]

HANOVERTON, O., Oct. 23, 1892.

MISS WIXON, Dear Friend: I will now write my third letter to the Corner.

I am glad you returned from your foreign travel in good health. Our school commenced September 19th. I am in the Fourth Reader. My two brothers and I are the only unbelievers that go to school. The school celebrated Columbus day, or rather the preachers did. The school was to celebrate it, but few of the scholars did anything The exercises commenced at 1 o'clock with prayer by the Rev. Mr. Swan, of the Presbyterian church, who was followed by the Rev. Father Lindesmith, of the Catholic church of the neighboring village of Dungannon, whose speech, consisting principally of condemnation of unbelievers, occupied most of the afternoon. The exercises in the evening were opened at 7 o'clock with prayer by the Rev. Mr. Sparks, of the Methodist church.

I wish we could hav one entertainment without superstition.

The superintendent of the school is a very devout Christian. Each teacher selected the recitations for their pupils, but my teacher knew better than to assign me one of a superstitious character, for I would hav refused to speak, and, as the number of willing workers is small, they could not afford to lose even one.

The leaves are falling with each morning's frost; the farmers are gathering their corn; the fields are turning brown, and winter is coming. I am glad it is. I shall sleighride, snowball, and hav a good time.

As my letter is too long, I will close. If this escapes the waste-basket I will try again. I remain,

Your Freethinking friend,
ALICE KINTNER.

[Alice is a true, fearless, and conscientious girl May she always prove steadfast to her principles.—ED. C. C.]

BOOKS

BY

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS),

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.
Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."
In two volumes, cloth, gilt lettered, $2.50.

DID JESUS RISE FROM THE DEAD?

The evidence for the resurrection is in this book carefully considered, and found wanting. It ought to convince every Christian of the untruthfulness of this alleged miracle, for it is certainly one of the best essays ever written on the subject.
In paper, 25 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science.
In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE and OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin
In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Licentiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Absolution; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Liguori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attempts at Continency even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism.
In paper, 25 cents.

A SUMMARY OF

ARGUMENTS AGAINST CHRISTIANITY.

Price, cloth, 50 cents.

News of the Week.

PARISIANS hav named a street after Renan.

THE Berlin Socialist congress denounced anti-Semitic persecutions.

LABOUCHERE in exposing a fraudulent society remarks: "The gullibility of the British public is illimitable."

COUNT DE MUN made a sensational speech in the French chamber of deputies against what he calls the government's policy of crushing out all religion in France.

RAILROAD presidents say that it will be only justice for them to charge full rates to the World's Fair, as hotels and all other business concerns will raise instead of reduce prices.

AT Homestead, Pa., on Thanksgiving day, the Catholic church of St. Mary Magdalen, heretofore always crowded on that occasion, held but a handful of attendants. The people said they had nothing to be thankful for.

A BUSINESS meeting of the Brooklyn Plymouth church, formerly Beecher's, has decided to giv no more money to the American Board of Missions, because that Board requires each missionary it employs to declare a belief in the damnation of the heathen.

POWDERLY prophesies: "In 1896 they will hav found the Democratic party no better than the Republican party, and will then turn to the People's party—the only friend that offers relief. It now makes a Democrat mad to call him a free-trader. The party stole into power under false pretenses, and the people will oust them in 1896."

CLERGYMEN in the more ignorant parts of the country are representing to their congregations that the danger from the comet is great, and urging repentance. In some colored churches of Tennessee the comet is described as a wild space-wandering monster let loose by God, which, having heard what a godless world this is, is tearing toward it to pulverize it. Some negroes think it the devil.

AT the Pinkerton investigation at Chicago, Robert Bruce, manager of a detectiv agency, testified that the men of Pinkerton's and all other detectiv agencies are the scum of the earth. One of Pinkerton's superintendents, he says, is an ex-convict. "I would not believe a detectiv under oath," he said. "Does that apply to yourself?" asked Senator Peffer. "Well, yes; I will apply that to myself," said Bruce. He added that in strikes detectivs often manufacture evidence, to make their employers think they are doing something.

THE present comet was first perceived, by means of photography, at the California Lick Observatory, founded by James Lick the Freethinker. The principal intelligence brought by it to the notice of the public is that astronomers know next to nothing about comets. The supposition that a comet's gaseous tail would poison our atmosphere is now disputed. Some astronomers think comets big, but others think the solid part of most of them no larger than a baseball or a barrel. Some say that the friction of our atmosphere would so heat a comet that it would fly into harmless dust. It is also in controversy whether the present one is approaching or receding.

THE proceedings at the late Catholic archiepiscopal conference hav been kept as secret as possible, but information has leaked out. The school arrangement in practice at Faribault, Minn., and some other places, was the vital topic. By this arrangement taxpayers maintain the schools, while the part of the church is to furnish teachers, or in some cases contribute use of a parochial school building, while such pupils as wish remain after hours and receive religious instruction. The sentiment was that Rome would indorse the Faribault plan to-morrow if it could see its way clear to getting state support for all its parochial schools The hesitating, conservativ element propounded these questions to the favorers of this Faribault compromise: "Suppose we say yes to the Faribault plan, what next? Can you promis that state aid will be forthcoming in every case where you must hav it? Are you able to assure Rome that the Faribault plan is practicable in the majority of the schools for which you claim a share of the public funds? How will your plan work in the larger cities?" Ways and means of forcing state aid were discussed, so secretly that we can report nothing on the transactions. It was agreed that no amount of state money could make up for surrendering the outward garb and character of the teachers as Catholic brothers or sisters, and that this would be clung to.

GOVERNMENT ANALYZED. By John R. Kelso, A.M., author of The Real Blasphemers, Deity Analyzed, The Bible Analyzed, Spiritualism Sustained, The Universe Analyzed, etc. Cloth; pp. 518; price, $1.

Mr. Kelso long ago won the favor of all who purchased his works on religion, such as "The Bible Analyzed," etc. His style is exceptionally logical and precise. When he was near the completion of the present volume, his laborious, man-serving, and model life was cut off, and the book was finished by his wife, Etta Dunbar Kelso.

This work covers a very wide field, from the matters commonly called political and economic at one side to such concerns as marriage, religion, and prohibition at the other. We will offer as our opinion that no inquirer into any of these topics who purchases this book will fail to find the worth of his money. We believe that every investigator will profit by it. The views are often highly suggestiv and calculated to launch one into lines of thought the most valuable. Its first chapter consists of useful "Derivations and Definitions of Political Terms," such as government, state, nation, tribe, patriarchy, oligarchy, hierarchy, plutocracy, theocracy, aristocracy, monarchy, democracy, republic, anarchy, socialism, commune, political, allegiance, loyalty, patriotism, constitution, congress, legislature, law, statute, treason, conspiracy, rebellion, revolution, tax, tariff, vice, virtue, and punishment. Some of these definitions are notable for their incisiv radicalism. For instance, treason is defined as "the offense of unsuccessfully attempting to overthrow the government of the state to which the offender owes allegiance, or of unsuccessfully attempting to betray the state into the hands of a foreign power."

In defining "revolution" Mr. Kelso makes similar remarks:

"It is almost universally conceded that the people of every country hav, at all times, the right to better their political condition by means of revolution. And yet revolution can be attained only through treason, conspiracy, and rebellion, three capital crimes (?). Though two wrongs can never make a right, three wrongs—three great crimes—can, and according to the logic of politics do, make a great and glorious right."

On "crime" we find this:

"I define crime to be any willful act, on the part of a rational being, which invades any of the natural and inalienable rights of a fellow-being—any willful act that tends to increase the suffering or to diminish the happiness of any human being. Such acts are just as criminal, too, when committed, in obedience to statutory provisions, by many persons called the State, as they are when committed, in violation of such provisions, by an individual. Crime may also consist in a refusal or a failure to act when, by acting, we might save a fellow-being from death or some other great harm. All crimes inhere in nature, and cannot be made, modified, or abolished by men."

We come to the definition of vice. The customary Christian view is that only over-indulgence of an apppetite is reprehensible; under-indulgence is not condemned. Mr. Kelso, however, posits:

"Vice usually consists in the over-indulgence, the under-indulgence, or the unnatural indulgence of the natural appetites, which, in themselvs, are right, proper, and necessary. Thus gluttony, drunkenness, and sexual excess, being injurious over-indulgences of these appetites, are vices. Long-continued abstinence from food, drink, or that which is demanded by sex, being an injurious under-indulgence of some one of these appetites, constitutes a vice. The use of tobacco and whisky and the practice of masturbation, being injurious, unnatural indulgences of these appetites, constitute vices. . . . At the present time a person who abstains entirely from sexual indulgence is held to be strictly virtuous. And yet such abstinence, being unnatural and injurious, is really a vice."

The author thinks, on punishment, that "the form of punishment that prevails at the present time is unnatural, wrong, and improper. By engendering among the people a cruel and revengeful disposition, a disposition that is transmitted to their posterity and increased in them, it has rendered them, in this respect, worse than the most ferocious beasts, which never, from a mere love of cruelty or thirst for revenge, inflict pain upon their fellows, or even their enemies. Just think of a large number of tigers or other beasts assembling and skinning one of their number alive and rejoicing over his agonies! Until all these forms of punishment are abolished, men will never, in this respect, rise above the brutes, or even to their level. Even the fabled devils and fiends of hell are never represented as thus torturing one another. In this respect, men are worse than are these mythical incarnate monsters. Were there any such monsters, they would shudder at the horrible cruelties inflicted by men upon their fellowmen."

Chapter II givs "The Various Forms of Government" fuller consideration than they received in the definitions. On oligarchy (government by a few; from oligos, a few, and archein, to govern) we find this penetrating remark:

"Nearly all the governments of the world, at the present time, are, in their composition and their modus operandi, more or less oligarchical. The most absolute despot almost invariably associates with himself, in the administration of his government, a few other persons as ministers, viziers, and officers of various other names and grades. And in democracy, or a republic, in which the whole people are supposed to participate in governmental affairs, the government, with scarce an exception, is really administered by only a few persons. Nearly all the so-called democracies and republics of the world hav been, in reality, oligarchies—plutocratic oligarchies. governments of a few rich persons for their own selfish benefit. The government of the United States is an illustrious example."

On hierarchy, or government by ecclesiastics, we are told:

"In a political sense, few pure hierarchies hav ever existed. In its purity, this form of government is usually confined to the various religious bodies of the world, and is usually called ecclesiastical government. During a portion of their historical career, the government of the Jews, though usually called a theocracy, was, in reality, a hierarchy. It was administered by the priesthood and other so-called sacred persons, and not those mythical monsters, the gods themselvs. Some of the American Colonies, especially those in which Puritanism prevailed, were as nearly hierarchies as they well could be while subject to a regular political government. Such is Utah at the present time. Such, too, to some extent are most of the states of this Union. Indeed, though this form of government so rarely exists separate from other forms, it enters, in some of its principles at least, as an element in the composition of every known system of government in the world. This is the religious element, the most evil element that ever entered into the composition of any government. In just so far as the element enters into its composition, any government is a hierarchy."

On plutocracy (government by the wealthy; from ploutos, wealth, and krateieu, to govern) Mr. Kelso remarks, among other things:

"Few, if any, pure plutocracies hav ever existed. And yet, in their composition and their modus operandi, all the governments of the world are largely plutocratic. If they are not so in the beginning, they are soon rendered so by the political corruption which is always inseparable from the accumulation of great wealth in the hands of only a few persons. These few persons always hav, sooner or later, gained the control of the various governments under which they hav lived. This they hav usually accomplished by managing, through wars or other means, to get their governments in debt to them. Then, as creditors, they hav made their debtors their creatures—mere instruments used for their own special benefit, and for the virtual enslavement and oppression of the great body of the people. It is a fact which no one pretends to dispute that, whenever any government becomes deeply involved in debt, it uniformly passes hopelessly under the control of its creditors. Such is the condition of our own government at the present time. It is owned and run for their own benefit by the wealthy classes whose debtor it is. . . . With our House of Lords, our so-called Senate, filled almost exclusivly with millionaires and monopolists; with our House of Commons, our absurdly so-called House of Representativs, filled in like manner, almost exclusivly with the same classes and their attorneys—with our king, our falsely so-called President, either a monopolist or the attorney of a monopoly—with all these parties elected to their respectiv positions of rulership through the power of money corruptly used, what can we expect but that ours will continue to be, as it now is, a government of the rich, by the rich, and for the rich?"

A certain history of the Emerald isle had a chapter on "The Snakes of Ireland," which consisted of the six words, "There are no snakes in Ireland." When our author strikes theocracy, or government by a god or gods, he is fain to observe like curtness, thus:

"There never was any such government as this. None of the gods ever did, in person, govern any country. None of them ever had any person in which to govern. . . . As I hav already said, all the so-called theocracies of the world hav been hierarchies. The priests, and not the gods, hav been the rulers."

Aristocracy—this word is derived from the Greek aristos, best, and krateiu, to rule, hence originally signifying a government by the best. But on the pleasant, hope-inspiring suggestions of this word Mr. Kelso quickly dashes cold water:

"I do not know that there was ever any such government as this. I do not know of any people who were governed by the best persons among them. It is true that, in all countries, the rich, as a class, are usually regarded as the best. It is true, too, that these really govern nearly all the people of the world. As we hav already seen, however, a government by the rich is a plutocracy and not an aristocracy."

Socialism, Communism, and Anarchy come in for praise. Chapter III handles "General Principles of Governments." A government is declared to be a committee consisting of some of the people themselvs, assigned by them to the performance of certain specified and limited functions, and it is lamented that—

"We hav always been accustomed to think and to speak of the government as an entity—as something having, in itself, a real existence—as something endued with peculiar rights and power of its own—as something capable of owning property and of transferring property to individuals and to corporations—as something to which we all owe allegiance, and for the preservation of which we should always be willing to sacrifice 'our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor'—as something that has a right to take from us, for its own support, in what it calls taxes, tariffs, etc., so much as it sees fit of the products of our labor—as something whose simple command makes it right—makes it our solemn duty, in fact, to go out, in great bodies called armies, and shoot down hundreds of thousands of our brave fellow-men, who hav never harmed us, who are just as good, honest, and intelligent as we are, and who are just as much entitled to 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness'—as something that has a right to command us in all things, and to enforce its commands by fining, whipping, imprisoning, hanging, shooting, burning, and otherwise torturing and destroying all who dare disobey—as something so far superior to ourselvs, that it has a right to invade, at pleasure, all of our inalienable rights—as something, in short, like a God, a supreme ruler, a kind of awful personage so absolutely necessary to the welfare, to the very existence of the people, so absolutely necessary to all that is good, so absolutely sacred in its nature, that, to speak ill of it, and especially to advocate its abolition, constitute the highest crime of which man can be guilty—a crime for which all who are guilty of it ought to suffer the most cruel of deaths, and for which many brave, intelligent and otherwise excellent men hav thus suffered. And yet all these ideas of government are utterly false. They constitute one of the strongest and most harmful forms of superstition."

Mr. Kelso professes to find this connection between government and religion:

"Religion and government were originally identical. In those primitiv times, the 'ruling powers,' though invisible, inaudible, and intangible—though actually mere creatures of the imagination, were generally believed to be real personalities; real gods, possessing intelligence, appetites and passions similar to those of men. These mythical beings—usually monsters in the forms, the appetites and the passions ascribed to them by their inventors, the priests—were held to be the sources whence was derived all the authority by which man ruled over his fellow-man—as the sources whence the priests—the rulers in civil as well as religious matters—derived the right to rule, to rob, and to enslave their fellow-men. By the people generally, these mythical monsters were regarded only with feelings of unmixed and intense fear, never with feelings of love and admiration. And yet, from these purely ideal, these hideous monsters, and from them alone, was derived the so-called 'divine right of kings,' even of the present day. Of necessity, then, this pretended 'right' is just as mythical in its existence, just as monstrous in its character, as was the source whence, according to its own advocates, it was derived."

In Chapter IV the author complains that government as it at present exists arrogates to itself many wrongful functions, like this:

"One of the functions of government is to deprive men of their inalienable right to so much of the land as they severally need. If it could, in the same way, deprive them of their inalienable right to so much of the air, the sunlight, and the water as they severally need, one of its functions would certainly be to so deprive them. The principle involved in depriving them of these things would be identical with that involved in depriving them of their land. Another of the functions of government is to rob the people, directly by means of taxes, of a considerable portion of the proceeds of their toil—a considerable portion of their means of subsistence; another is to rob them indirectly of a still larger portion of their earnings, by means of tariffs—by compelling them to pay much higher for all their purchases than they would otherwise hav to pay, and by compelling them to sell their products at a much lower price than they would otherwise be able to obtain; another is to distribute the fabulous amounts of plunder thus obtained among the owners and operators of the concern. Indeed, the obtaining and the distribution of plunder is its principal function. For this, it was created. For this, it still lives. Without this, its other functions would all cease and it would perish. Another of its functions is to aid the priests within its jurisdiction to rob the people and to keep them bound in the chains of ignorance and superstition. This it does, by compelling the people to become hypocrits—by compelling them to suppress their honest thoughts, their real beliefs, and to profess a belief, which they do not entertain, in the absurd and harmful dogmas invented with a special view to their enslavement and spoliation by the priestly confederates of the governmental gangs of robbers. It does this, further, by compelling the people to observe certain days as holy days, of which its priestly confederates hav a monopoly, by compelling them thus, indirectly at least, to worship certain priestly inventions of harmful natures, called gods, in which they do not believe, and which, save as priestly impositions, we know do not exist."

Mr. Kelso supposes some governmentalist to ask, Does not our government protect us from the personal attacks which we should otherwise make upon one another or upon one another's property? Mr. Kelso replies:

"I deny that it does. . . . I propose, further on, to show that, by fostering trusts and monopolies of all kinds, and by itself setting the example of invading the inalienable rights of individuals, the public tumor undeniably surrounds the people with political, economic, and social conditions which promote inharmony and antagonism among them, and thus render more frequent and more violent their attacks upon one another's person and property."

Chapters follow on "Origin of Government," "Declaration of Independence," "Articles of Confederation," "Defects of the Confederation," "Formation of the Constitution of the United States," "Constitution of the United States," "Taxation," "Tariff or Protection." In a chapter on "War" religious wars are thus characterized:

"The strongest body of the mad murderers hav always determined what was, for the time, the color of all gods, and the only orthodox religion. When another party came into power, the gods all changed their color and their attributes, and some recent heresy exchanged places with the recent orthodoxy. But what good was ever accomplished by any of these blood-wrought changes? How much more beneficial to mankind were the gods, when assumed to be yellow than when assumed to be red, green, or blue? And so of all the other assumed attributes of these assumed monsters. No religious war was ever, on the part of the aggressors at least, a justifiable war. And so too of all other wars. The beginning of not one of them can be justified on principles of humanity and morality. Except in cases of successful revolution, in favor of greater personal liberty, no lasting good has ever resulted from any of the wars of the world."

Then "Punishments" are considered. Next a chapter on "Marriage" is thus introduced:

"Before entering, however, upon the main work of this analysis and comparison, I wish to determin whether men can, or cannot, by any possible means, absolutely create either a right or a wrong; to determin whether by legal enactments or otherwise, they can or cannot, impart the genuin quality of immorality and crime to acts, which, in themselvs, are entirely right, proper and necessary; and also, whether they can or cannot, by similar means, render right and proper, acts which, in themselvs, possess the genuin qualities of immorality and crime. In other words I wish to determin whether truth and error, right and wrong, virtue and vice, are mere human inventions, capable of being changed or abolished at pleasure, or whether they are eternal and unchanging principles inherent in the very nature of things and of actions. If they be mere human inventions, then it is evident that there can be nothing uniform, nothing permanent about them. The same thing may be true to-day and false to-morrow; right in one place and wrong in another, a virtue in one man and a vice in another; moral and proper an inch on one side of a state line, and immoral and improper an inch on the other side. In short, upon this hypothesis, truth and error, right and wrong, virtue and vice, morality and immorality cease to be realities, and become mere creations of the imagination, changing in any locality with every new act of the legislature, with every new decision of a church council, and even with every whim of each individual intellect."

Following a chapter on "Religion" comes one on "Prohibition" with this sort of sentiments:

"When the friends of Liberty, of Temperance and order, are as earnest in their resistance to tyranny, as are the fanatics of repression, in their endeavors, to crush out the last remnant of freedom in the Citizen of 'Free America,' the contest for liberty will be short, the victory sure. Justice will supplant the laws which now so effectually subvert justice. For instead of needing Prohibitory laws to prevent the poor from drowning their sorrows in the intoxicating bowl, we need the abolition of all those laws by which laboring men are made poor and sorrowful—by which they are made to crave intoxicants. For it is not so much the use of intoxicants that leads people to poverty and wretchedness, as it is poverty and wretchedness that leads them to the use of intoxicants. Ample, wholesome food, adequate clothing, comfortable and tasteful homes, literature and leisure to enjoy it, are not incentivs to intemperance, much less to inebriety. Physical discomfort, mental disquietude, spiritual poverty—these are the conditions which demand the exhilarating cup, the nepenthean drug."

After a chapter on "Money," Mr. Kelso concludes by showing "What a Government Should Be." A few sentences are:

"The true function of government consists in securing to every individual the full exercise and enjoyment of all his inalienable rights. These rights are few in number, simple in character, easily understood, hence should be easily 'secured.' The securing to every individual these rights requires nothing more than obedience to the few natural laws, upon which these rights are founded; laws inherent in the nature of men and things, and manifested in all of man's physical and social relations. It is through the enforcement of innumerable enactments falsely termed laws, that men hav been defrauded of their inalienable rights—hav been governed."

CHRISTIANITY AND EVOLUTION. By Arthur B. Moss. With Preface by Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. London: Watts & Co. Cloth; pp. 112; price, $1.

Mr. Moss needs no praise to our readers. He is with them an established favorit. He prosecutes extensiv and careful researches into ancient history and modern science, and then lays the results before the public in clear and readable form. Several of the chapters of this volume hav appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER. We can think of no way of giving an idea of the matter of this book so good as that of transcribing its well-prepared Table of Contents:

Chapter I, The Pagan Roots of Christianity.—Christianity and Sun-Worship; Annual Resurrection of Vegetation; The Myths of Osiris, Adonis, Thammuz, Aitis, Dionysius; The Pagan Origin of Christian Symbols; The Cross; Phallic Worship; The Virgin-born God; The Zodiac and Zodiacal Myths.

Chapter II, The Borrowings of Christianity.—The Logos Doctrin Traced to Plato and Philo; Belief in Immortality Originated in Egypt; Other Features of Christianity Borrowed from Egypt; Heaven; Purgatory; Hell; Madonna and Child; Sabbath; Baptism; Eucharist; Last Judgment; Wedding Ring; Candlemas; Tonsure.

Chapter III, The Evolution of the Christian Trinity.—The Man Jesus; His Probable Connection with the Essenes; Did the Early Christians Regard Him as God? "The Foggy Member of the Trinity;" The Church of the First Three Centuries not Trinitarian; Justin Martyr; Tertullian; Origen; Arius; The Council of Nicea.

Chapter IV, Original Sin and the Atonement.—The Doctrin of Original Sin Stated; The Opinions of Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen; Pelagius; Calvin; Arminius; The Atonement; Socinius; Objections to the Orthodox Theory; Dr. James Martineau's Severe Criticism.

Chapter V, A Medley of Gospels.—Where are the Original Gospels? The Four Gospels Anonymous; Thomas Scott's Criticism; The So-called Apocryphal Gospels; Illustrations of their Absurdity.

Chapter VI, Wanted, Contemporary Evidence.—Early Christians "An Ignorant Rabble;" Silence of Contemporary Historians; Gibbon's Sarcastic Censure of the "Sages of Greece and Rome;" The Forged Passage in Josephus; Its Extraordinary Context; Pious Frauds of Early Fathers.

Chapter VII, Paley's "Evidences of Christianity" Examined.—Paley's Double-barreled Proposition; The Passage in Tacitus; Was it Forged? Suetonius; Juvenal; The Younger Pliny; Martial; Clement; Polycarp; Ignatius; Hermas; Worthless Character of their Evidence.

Chapter VIII, The Testimony of Paul.—Paul's Conversion and Character; Personal Appearance; Missionary Labors; His Doctrins; His View of Christ's Sacrifice; Doctrin of Sin; Jewish-Christian Hatred of Paul; The Myth of Simon Magus.

Chapter IX, Did Jesus Rise from the Dead and Ascend to Heaven?—The Four Gospels the Only Witnesses to the Alleged Resurrection; Reply to Renan's Defense of Biblical Inaccuracies; Gospel Stories of the Resurrection Examined and Compared; Their Contradictions and Discrepancies; The Ascension; Account of a Modern "Flying-Man;" Some Puzzling Questions; Ingenious Explanation by Dr. Weiss; The Natural Solution.

Chapter X, The First Four Christian Centuries.—Pious Fancies and Historical Facts; Why the Ignorant Masses Embraced Christianity; Ebionites and Nazarenes; Manichæus and his Teaching; Increasing Wealth of the Church; Constantine Makes Christianity the State Religion; His Infamous Character; Observance of Christmas Day and Sunday; Persecution of Heretics.

Chapter XI, A Thousand Dark Years.—Hypatia Murdered by Christian Hands; Increase of the Church's Wealth and Power; Decline of Learning; Conversion by Fire and Sword; Strong Words from Mosheim; Crusades and Inquisition.

Chapter XII, The Dawn of Science.—Science Dawns in the Sixteenth Century; Priest vs. Printer; Martin Luther Proclaims the Fundamental Principle of Freethought; What is Science? Scientific Progress; Free Press; Machinery; Agriculture.

Chapter XIII, Christianity on the Wane.—Religions, their Changes and Decay; Dissolution of Dogma; Christian Theory Contrary to Modern Christian Practice; And Irreconcilable with Modern Science; The Sermon on the Mount; Pre-Christian Morality; The Duty of Freethinkers; Inspiring Lines from Goethe.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.
By R. WHEELER.
This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

Hindoo Virgin and Child.

The worship of the "Holy Virgin," the "Queen of Heaven," the "Mother of God," etc., which has become one of the grand features of Roman Catholicism, was a tenet of faith for centuries before the virgin now adored was born. In India, they have worshiped for ages, Maha Devi—The Great Goddess—and have temples erected in honor of her. Like her Roman counterpart she is the Goddess with a thousand names. As Devaki, she is the mother of Vishnu, the Preserving god, in the form of Krishna. "The gods, invisible to mortals," says the Vishnu Purana, (p. 502) "celebrated her praise continually from the time that Vishnu was contained in her person." She is represented in Moor's Hindu Pantheon, adorned with jewels, and the infant Saviour at her breast. BIBLE MYTHS shows that nearly all nations of antiquity worshipped a Virgin Mother-Goddess.

Life of Thomas Paine,

WITH A

History of His Literary, Political, and Religious Career in America, France, and England.

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY,

Author of "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," "George Washington and Mount Vernon," "Washington's Rules of Civility," etc.

To Which is added a Sketch of Paine by William Cobbett.

No real biography of Paine has ever appeared. The so-called Lives of Paine have been mainly the controversial work of pamphleteers, turning chiefly on his religious heresies. Paine was in his fifty-eighth year before he published anything concerning religion, and before that time he had acted an important part in revolutionary movements in the United States, England, and France. But in the religious conflict initiated by him, his political services and military career hav been but inadequately considered. A certain historical ostracism has buried in the archives of various countries a large mass of documents containing records of paramount interest and importance. Mr. Conway has personally searched such records, in Europe and America, and has obtained from these fresh light, not only on Paine, but on various eminent figures in American and European history with whom he was associated. A large amount of unpublished correspondence has been included in the volumes.

Mr. Conway says in his Preface: "In the laborious work of searching out the real Paine I hav found a general appreciation of its importance, and it will be seen in the following pages that generous assistance has been rendered by English clergymen, by official persons in Europe and America, by persons of all beliefs and no beliefs. In no instance have I been impeded by any prejudice, religious or political. The curators of archives, private collectors, owners of important documents bearing on the subject, have welcomed my effort to bring the truth to light."

The Course of Improvement Never Did Run Smooth.

In a recent address before the National Electric Light Association Prof. Henry Morton had occasion to remark on the objections of the bigots and the fogies against electricity. "When the development of electric currents," he said, "on a large scale and at a small cost became possible by reason of the discoveries of Faraday, Wilde, Gramme, Siemens, and others, the question of the dangers to life and property attending their use was brought prominently before the public, just as the dangers attending the use of steam, of rapid locomotion on railroads, and of dynamite were brought to the attention of the world when these powerful agencies first left the experimental laboratory of the chemist or engineer to take their part in the ordinary labor and business of life. In each instance alike there was a class of people who took the narrow and partial view that if an agency was dangerous it should be excluded altogether from public use, or, what amounted to the same thing, be surrounded with such exclusions and limitations as would rob it almost of its capacity of advance and development in its application."

These citations of the follies of obstructionists in former ages are exceedingly useful. It is necessary that men continually call to their minds that each of the institutions now used and prized was on its introduction assailed and reviled. This will induce men to be cautious not to make the same mistake, of attacking without due consideration the innovations of their own time. It is true that on the introduction of steam into England laws were passed limiting the pressure in boilers to thirty pounds to the square inch; the first railroad charter contained a clause limiting the speed of trains to twelve miles an hour, and when a speed of thirty miles an hour was suggested the idea was characterized by a prominent journal of the day as simply insane, and it was said that people would just as soon be hurled out of a cannon as submit themselvs to be hurled along at such fearful velocities, which would doubtless stop the circulation of the blood, besides arresting other vital functions. But in every case the accidents and injuries produced by these various innovating agencies—fast trains, high-pressure boilers, dynamite, and so on, hav been vastly less than those caused by the things which they superseded. The fatalities by express trains are as nothing compared with those of freight trains, and the present loss of life and injury to passengers by rail is insignificant in proportion to the number carried when compared with those of the days of stage-coaches. The same relation exists between accidents by high- and low-pressure boilers, and by dynamite and gunpowder.

Among the instructiv and warning instances of popular hostility to improvement, one is that concerning the new road system instituted in England about 1680–90. The condition of the highways had been inconceivably bad. On the very best lines of communication the ruts were deep, the descents precipitous, and the way often such as it was hardly possible to distinguish, in the dusk, from the uninclosed heath and fen which lay on both sides. Ralph Thoresby, the antiquary, was in danger of losing his way on the great North road, between Barnby Moor and Tuxford, and actually lost his way between Doncaster and York (Thoresby's Diary). Pepys and his wife, traveling in their own coach, lost their way between Newbury and Reading. In the course of the same tour they lost their way near Salisbury, and were in danger of having to pass the night on the plain (Pepys's Diary, June 12 and 16, 1668). It was only in fine weather that the whole breadth of the road was available for wheeled vehicles. Often the mud lay deep on the right and left, and only a narrow track of firm ground rose above the quagmire (Ibid., Feb. 28, 1669). At such times obstructions and quarrels were frequent, and the path was sometimes blocked up during a long time by carriers, neither of whom would break the way. It happened almost every day that coaches stuck fast, until a team of cattle could be procured from some neighboring farm to tug them out of the slough. But in bad seasons the traveler had to encounter inconveniences still more serious. Thoresby, who was in the habit of traveling between Leeds and the capital, has recorded, in his Diary, such a series of perils and disasters as might suffice for a journey to the Frozen ocean or to the desert of Sahara. On one occasion he learned that the floods were out between Ware and London, that passengers had to swim for their lives, and that a higgler had perished in the attempt to cross. In consequence of these tidings he turned out of the high road, and was conducted across some meadows, where it was necessary for him to ride to the saddle skirts in water (Thoresby's Diary). In the course of another journey he narrowly escaped being swept away by an inundation of the Trent. He was afterward detained at Stamford four days, on account of the state of the roads, and then ventured to proceed only because fourteen members of the House of Commons, who were going up in a body to Parliament with guides and numerous attendants, took him into their company (Ibid.). On the roads of Derbyshire travelers were in constant fear for their necks, and were frequently compelled to alight and lead their beasts (Tour in Derbyshire, by J. Brown, 1662; Cotton's Angler, 1676). The great route through Wales to Holyhead was in such a state that, in 1685, a viceroy, going to Ireland, between Conway and Beaumorris was forced to walk part of the way; and his lady was carried in a litter. His coach was with great difficulty, and by the help of many hands, brought after him entire. In general, carriages were taken to pieces at Conway, and borne, on the shoulders of stout Welsh peasants, to the Menai straits (Correspondence of Henry earl of Clarendon, Dec. 30, 1685; Jan. 1, 1686). In some parts of Kent and Sussex none but the strongest horses could, in winter, get through the bog, in which, at every step, they sank deep. The markets were often inaccessible during several months. It is said that the fruits of the earth were sometimes suffered to rot in one place, while in another, distant only a few miles, the supply fell short of the demand. Finally the method of raising taxes for maintaining the roads was changed to a system which in the end served its object and secured excellent turnpikes. But the new measure was at first assailed violently. The taxes levied in a new form were refused. For, as a distinguished thinker remarks, "unjust and absurd taxation to which men are accustomed is often borne far more willingly than the most reasonable impost which is new." It was not until troops had been forced to act against the people in many districts, and much blood had been shed, that the new and admirable system was introduced.

Another improvement attempted at about the same time consisted in the establishment of a line of public passenger vehicles, known as the "flying coaches," which were to make fifty miles a day, a rate unprecedented. But this new institution for some time seemed destined to an untimely death at the hands of the conservativ and the selfish. The interests of large classes had been unfavorably affected by the establishment of the new diligences; and, as usual, many persons were, from mere stupidity and obstinacy, disposed to clamor against the innovation simply because it was an innovation. It was vehemently argued that this mode of conveyance would be fatal to the breed of horses and to the noble art of horsemanship; that the Thames, which had long been an important nursery of seamen, would cease to be the chief thoroughfare from London up to Windsor and down to Gravesend; that saddlers and spurriers would be ruined by hundreds; that numerous inns, at which mounted travelers had been in the habit of stopping, would be deserted, and would no longer pay any rent; that the new carriages were too hot in summer and too cold in winter; that the passengers were grievously annoyed by invalids and crying children; that the coach sometimes reached the inn so late that it was impossible to get supper, and sometimes started so early that it was impossible to get breakfast. On these grounds it was gravely recommended that no public carriage should be permitted to hav more than four horses, to start oftener than once a week, or to go more than thirty miles a day. It was hoped that, if this regulation were adopted, all except the sick and the lame would return to the old mode of traveling. Petitions embodying such opinions as these were presented to the king in council from several companies of the city of London, from several provincial towns, and from the justices of several counties. We smile at these things. It is to be feared that our descendants, when they read the history of the opposition offered by cupidity and prejudice to the improvements of the nineteenth century, may smile in their turn.

The lighting of London streets was brought about only by a fight against bigots as protracted and furious as that which we hav to make now to pluck from an orthodox creed some outdated and revolting dogma. Those streets were long unlit at night, and what with accident, robbery, and ruffianism the venturer into them after nightfall ran about as perilous an experience as a present-day traveler across Africa. In the last year of the reign of Charles II. an ingenious projector, named Edward Heming, obtained letters patent conveying to him, for a term of years, the exclusiv right of lighting up London. He undertook, for a moderate consideration, to place a light before every tenth door, on moonless nights, from Michaelmas to Lady day, and from 6 to 12 of the clock. But, in the words of the historian Macaulay, "There were fools in that age who opposed the introduction of what was called the new light as strenuously as fools in our age hav opposed the introduction of vaccination and railroads, as strenuously as the fools of an age anterior to the dawn of history doubtless opposed the introduction of the plow and of alphabetical writing." So stout was the resolve not to be benefited on the part of these gentlemen whom the historian unceremoniously calls "fools," that for a long time after the date of Heming's patent extensiv districts continued lampless.

The establishment of a postal service in London had to undergo similar trials. The classes whose occupation it rivaled clamored against it out of selfish meanness. The porters in particular were bitter against it, and tore down the placards bearing its advertisements. Then, the narrow-minded churls who hav ever abounded disliked it because it disarranged the ancient ways of thinking and doing in which they had become egotistically set. The vain and consequential conceived a hate of a betterment which they had not seen the way to, which they had not given.

Thus it fares in all generations. A large part of the people in every age are to be expected to war against every improvement. Some—the classes possessing "vested interests"—do so from selfish and mean avarice; others do so out of morose and currish dislike to see their fellows bettered; others merely because of a reasonless wooden-headed orthodoxy, a tininess of brain which is incapable of embracing a new conception. The examples which we hav given in this article are those of hostility to material improvements; our readers will find them to illustrate the antagonism which they encounter to their own endeavors to introduce improvements mental and moral.

The World's Fair.

The Chicago Tribune sums up the work of the World's Fair Sunday-Opening Association to date. The association was formed to obtain an expression of the will of the people on the question of repealing the closing clause in the appropriation bill passed by Congress, and Mr. Thompson, the secretary, feels greatly encouraged from what he has learned in a trip East. He says that the sentiment in New York, Boston, Washington, and Philadelphia is as strongly in favor of Sunday opening as it is in Chicago.

Petitions for an open Fair Sunday will be showered upon Congress to a greater extent than that body has ever before known. These petitions will come from every state and city in the Union. They will come from ministers, bankers, clubs, hotelkeepers, and labor organizations. One unique feature of the work being done by the Association is an effort to gage public sentiment on the question. Postal-cards hav been sent to a certain number of men from "Dunn's Reference Book" without discrimination or selection, so many to every city in the United States of the population of not less than four thousand or more than ten thousand inhabitants. These cards were mailed with a circular asking for immediate response. Nothing whatever was given to prejudice the vote. The result was encouraging. From the first thousand sent out the answers indicate that four out of every five persons in the United States desire a repeal of the Sunday-closing act.

The labor organizations of Chicago will supplement the work of the association by complete and effectiv work. Mr. Morgan, of the Trade and Labor Assembly, in connection with a number of other labor leaders, will spare no means to secure petitions from every organization in the country. In addition to these, resolutions will be passed and sent to the Congressmen and Senators.

It is expected that the municipal government will take decisiv action upon the question, inasmuch as the Exposition is given under the direct auspices of the city, and further, that hundreds of thousands of visitors from foreign nations and sister cities will be depending upon the hospitality of Chicago.

Further, the Exposition being closed Sundays these people will be compelled to drift aimlessly in the streets or fall victims of the inevitable evils of a large and overcrowded city.

The Exposition authorities will also giv their moral support to the Association, and aid in every way consistent with their position in having accepted the appropriation with the obnoxious petition attached. The newspapers of Chicago are solid for Sunday opening. Aside from this Association the only other workers are the Freethinkers. Thousands of names hav already been obtained to our petitions and Mr. Putnam will shortly establish headquarters in Washington to do what he can by personal conference with the Congressmen. We trust that no Liberal will fail in the duty to aid this work. We hav printed many thousands of copies of the World's Fair Leaflets and desire their distribution throughout the country. The leaflets put the case in a nutshell, and the pictures drive the argument home.

To the Friends of The Truth Seeker.

We are truly thankful to those of our friends who hav responded to our appeal to send in their arrearages and to add, if possible, a new subscriber to the list, but we wish that more of them had done so. We hav a great many accounts which we wish to square up, and so we again ask our friends to send what is due us as soon as they can possibly do it. And as renewing time for a great many of our readers is here we are hoping they will be unusually prompt, and so help us over our difficulty.

And again we ask our friends to take a lively interest in increasing the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and for that purpose we make a liberal offer in an advertisement on the second page of this issue. And we again call attention to the handsome premium offers of books sent in connection with subscriptions. The paper ought to hav a much greater circulation, as nothing helps the Liberal cause along more than good reading which can be handed around the neighborhood. We shall endeavor to make THE TRUTH SEEKER worthy of all efforts in its behalf, and we hope thereby to increase the influence of Freethought, and make mental liberty in this country something less like a dream than it is at present. With the aid of friends we can do more than ever to advance the cause of Liberalism, for the issues are before the people and are commanding their attention as never before in this century. Now is the time to work, when the churches are trying their heretics, and the people are demanding the practical abrogation of Puritanical Sunday laws.

Some Handsome Premiums.

To induce new subscriptions and prompt renewals on the part of our friends we make the following handsome premium offers:

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a cloth-bound copy of "Bible Myths" ($2.50).

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth ($2.50).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in boards ($2).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a copy of "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in cloth covers ($1.50).

For $3.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in board covers ($1).

This is a splendid opportunity to obtain books which every Liberal desires to hav at an exceedingly low price. Old and new subscribers can avail themselvs of it, and we shall be glad if our present readers will call the attention of their friends to the values offered.

"And They Shall Handle Serpents."

The following from the Hennessey Clipper, Oklahoma, givs sharpest point to the picture on the title-page of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We think we need not say another word: "For some time the Christian Scientists hav been holding meetings northwest of town, and the ministers hav talked all kinds of talk, among which was that if you had the proper faith you could handle a rattlesnake without fear of danger. One fellow said that he and his family had often handled snakes and that when he returned he expected to hear of some of his Oklahoma converts having been imbued with faith enough to handle the most poisonous reptil without fear or danger. Mr. Southers, a respectable farmer, became infatuated with the preacher's teaching and thought his faith would stand the test. Monday he was up in the strip looking after some calves and seeing a large rattler applied the test and picked the snake off the ground, when it buried its poisonous fangs in his flesh. He refused to receive any medical treatment, relying wholly upon faith and prayer to cure him. One of the local healers was called in and the usual dose of prayer and faith administered until Tuesday afternoon, when the patient died. Many of the faithful believers refuse to take the hint and yet claim that Mr. Southers's time had come and no medical aid would save him."

A Change in the Manner of Serving the Lord.

Alabama seems to be a nice pious state which remembers the Lord and keeps the Christian Sunday, as per this instance:

"CULLMAN, ALA., Nov. 28, 1892.

"EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, New York, Dear Sir: On Aug. 17, 1890, the Turner Verein (Association) from Birmingham, Ala., celebrated their Turner festival in my hotel at the above place. There were some one hundred and thirty-five people, and they brought their refreshments from Birmingham, Ala. There was a committee of three Turners, and they ordered meals at my hotel, and served their own refreshments. Also an old man came in and bought twenty-five cents' worth of Swiss cheese off their own cheese on that Sunday. I was indicted for keeping open doors, and the all-wise jury at Cullman, Cullman county, Ala., found me guilty, and fined me $13 and cost. The solicitor asked me if I believed in a personal God. I answered I never saw him, and this was the consequence of it. I hav to pay because I do not believe what they believe.

"O Lucifer, open the eyes of the hypocrits in this world, especially to our jury at Cullman county, Ala.

"WM. RICHTER."

Down in Alabama they used to sell men and women and children, and used to flog them and hunt them with hounds. Being deprived of these innocent business recreations, they now "take it out" of the heretics. Perhaps that thirteen dollars went to some church to pay the parson who used to find in the Bible texts to support them in their former diversion with the slaves.

Charity to Rich Christians.

The Episcopalians will lay the cornerstone of their new cathedral in this city on the 27th instant. A great procession, in which many bishops and all the priests of the diocese in the full vestments of their offices will take part, will distinguish the occasion, and led by surpliced choirs with crosses and banners, it will wind through the elevated grounds on which the new cathedral is to be erected. It will be a sight novel in the history of American Protestantism, glorious in color and of an impressiv pomp and splendor. The cathedral will cost about seven millions of dollars.

So says the Sun, which adds: "The cathedral will be a monument of religious faith and a matchless adornment to the city." That may all be true, but it will be a monument of uselessness and an adornment which doesn't pay a cent of taxes. A few wealthy female citizens, of a superstitious turn of mind, will enjoy great luxury at the expense of the people who support the state.

Colonel Ingersoll will lecture about Voltaire at the Broadway Theater, Broadway and 41st street, this city, on Sunday evening, December 11th. To be sure of a seat and avoid the conscienceless speculators tickets should be purchased before Sunday night.

The Independent advises everyone who has "the ear of a member of Congress" to urge that member to stand fast to the vote closing the World's Fair on Sunday. To offset these efforts of the fanatics we urge every Liberal to write to his Congressman asking that law-maker to vote to repeal the Sunday-closing section of the appropriation bill. The people of Chicago, as well as the Fair authorities, are with us in the matter, and if the Congressmen can be made to see the real drift of public sentiment in this matter the prospects of having an open Fair are still good.

Visitors to the World's Fair next year will find Helen Gardener's works in three or four places—in the general collection of the Fair and in the New York and Virginia state exhibits. We hope that the ladies particularly will examin her "Men, Women, and Gods" and the "Pulpit, Pew, and Cradle." In writing to her for copies, one of the board of lady managers, Mrs. K. S. G. Paul, wife of United States District Judge Paul, who discharged Mrs. Slenker from custody on a technicality, says: "I ask this in the name of the women of Virginia, who will be proud to be so worthily and brilliantly represented among the world's women writers." Miss Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods" has just been translated into German.

The Hong Kong Telegraph of October 3d, considering the outbreaks at that time prevalent in the Hunan district, says: "The whole of these Hunan troubles, like all other difficulties in the interior of China between the nativs and foreigners, hav been caused solely by the missionaries, by unwarranted missionary interference and aggression. These foreign missionary societies are the curse of foreign enterprise in the Middle Kingdom; they do absolutely no good, they never hav done any work of a substantial or permanent character in religious reformation, and it is notorious that they hav been at the bottom of almost every difficulty the treaty powers hav had with China. As they are of no earthly use, and as the Chinese do not want them and hav always objected to their attempts to save the souls of the so-called heathen, it is about time they recognized the actual situation and cleared out bag and baggage for pastures new where their labors will prove of some utility and be appreciated. Let them get to the back slums of London, New York, San Francisco, and dozens of other great cities where workers in their line of business are so badly needed. The missionary fraud is about played out in China; but as long as these no doubt well-meaning but altogether mistaken enthusiasts are permitted to hav a free hand in meddling with the religious beliefs and observances, and the social manners and customs, of a people highly intelligent according to their lights, and in stirring up strife by vexatious interference with the politics of a great nation, so long will there be missionary riots and other troubles. The Chinese empire can work out its own regeneration without missionary aid or interference, and the quicker that very patent and important fact is recognized the better will it be for all concerned, and the nearer shall we get to that great goal of our ambition—the wholesale opening up of the country to foreign trade and intercourse."

About Our Books.

The Liberals of Dublin, Tex., hav purchased and circulated one hundred and fifty copies of Remsburg's "False Claims."

We shall shortly publish the fourth edition of the "Crimes of Preachers." If our readers see any records of the clergy being guilty of "ministerial conduct," from lying to murder, they will add to the world's knowledge and the cause of truth by marking the report and forwarding the paper containing it to this office. We desire to do all the justice possible to the reverend clergy who so kindly constitute themselvs our moral and religious guardians.

A new edition of William Hart's "Candle From Under the Bushel" is just fresh from the press and is No. 23 of The Truth Seeker Library. In this book Mr. Hart asks the clergy just thirteen hundred and six questions, not one of which the preachers can answer satisfactorily. Price, 40 cents.

Two pamphlets which keep the printers busy on new editions are John E. Remsburg's "False Claims" of Christianity, and the "Holy Bible Abridged." The editions this time are in handsome paper covers. Price, 10 cents for "False Claims," and 25 cents for "Bible Abridged."

The Leaflet advocating the Sunday opening of the World's Fair ought to be scattered by the thousands. In December or January we shall send them to Congressmen and to others who may be influenced by argument. We need money to do this, and those who can afford to aid are requested to do so. The price of the Leaflet is 25 cents per dozen; $1.50 per hundred. Anyone who will distribute five hundred or a thousand can obtain them at special rates.

We hav also printed, for Mr. W. H. Burr, his recent article on "Junius, Casca, Common Sense, and Thomas Paine." It sets forth Mr. Burr's views regarding these persons in answer to a footnote in Moncure D. Conway's Life of Paine. Price, 5 cents.

We hav printed for Mr. Franklin Steiner in a neat little 5-cent pamphlet his open letter to the Rev. J. L. Sooy, D.D., of Des Moines. It shows that the oft-repeated Christian statement that Infidels do not contribute to nor found charities is a falsehood. The pamphlet is called "Infidels and Charity," and ought to be widely circulated.

And attention is again called to the list of Saladin's works advertised on page 796, a large consignment of which we hav just received from England. Saladin is one of the most brilliant and sharpest writers in the Freethought ranks. Each of his books bears evidence that its author is a man of great genius wholly free from Christian superstition. It will please us greatly to circulate them widely in this country.

We also call attention to the advertisement of books for the holidays on page 798 of this paper. There are many beautiful things connected with the pagan festival in celebration of the returning sun, which the Christians hav adapted to their own use and called Christmas, chief of which is the kindly remembrance of friends with presents, and nothing can be more appropriate for such presents than books which instruct as well as please the eye. A list of such works is what we hav made for the guidance of our readers.

We hav a few sample copies of "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" which we will send to anyone who desires it. This book is now in the fourth thousand, and a new edition is in press. Sent promptly on receipt of $2 for board-covered copies; $2.50 in cloth with gold side-stamp. "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" has been in print but a few months, but the bookbinders hav just finished binding the third thousand. Each of these books is of the convincing order, because Christians cannot get around the facts and arguments it contains, supported as they are by pictures which tell the story even to him who will not read. If those of our friends who possess these books will show them to their Liberal friends and mention the large discount made on them when ordered with THE TRUTH SEEKER for a year we think they will hav no difficulty in getting a new subscriber.

Missions Among Mohammedans.

All experience shows that Christian missions among Mohammedan people are both exceedingly futil and exceedingly annoying. The teaching of the missionaries is socially, as well as religiously, offensiv, and is always strongly resented. Our English administration in India has included at times many men of intense religious convictions who hav countenanced the missionaries. But even we hav been rigidly and wisely careful, as a rule, to abstain from giving government support to any attempt to make proselytes among the nativs.

The French governor of Algeria, who is probably no more religious than most educated men in Latin countries, will naturally find the missions an unmitigated nuisance. He is bombarded with complaints from the Mohammedans, and from his own local officials, who fear, or say they fear, that violence will be used against the preachers of unwelcome doctrin. He may well believe that, unless a check is put to the propaganda, he will find himself under the necessity of suppressing disturbance by force. No governor likes this prospect, and when it is forced on him by foreigners he is not to be blamed if he asks to hav them removed.—The Saturday Review.

Approving Nods.

Mrs. Hicks: "You seemed to agree with the sermon pretty well this morning."

Hicks: "What made you think so?"

Mrs. Hicks: "You nodded to about everything Dr. Thirdly said."

In the West.

News and Notes.

Saturday, November 19th, I leave Inyo county. It takes a two days' journey through vast mountains and wild plains to reach Mound Station, a distance of 225 miles. I arrive at Reno Sunday evening and find changes hav taken place—a fire, for instance, burning out my friend Wright, etc. I remain over Monday at Reno. Fulton givs me a drive through the pleasant sceneries of this mountain valley where Reno glitters like a gem. On Monday evening I sweep over the Sierras and Tuesday morning the glorious valley of Sacramento is spread before my vision. I stay over Thanksgiving day in California's capital, and around the hospitable table of N. D. Goodell memories of New England glisten with the good things. We drive out to Brighton in the sunny morning and visit O. T. Davies on his ample ranch. R. Butterfield is with us too, and so I enjoy the few days' leisure. Saturday I press on to Stockton, and here, alas, the golden sunshine ceases. The storm wind reigns, and on Sunday the air is full of dust, as if a meteor were plowing its way along the earth. Then when the wind ceases its fiercest blast a grim rain falls, and at the hour of the lecture it is pouring heavily. It is the worst hurricane they hav had for years in this San Joaquin valley. Two churches, if not more, suspended services. Only a half-a-dozen women were present at my lecture at Avon Theater, and about two hundred men. Had the weather been favorable the theater would hav been filled to overflowing. I spoke on the opening of the World's Fair. W. F. Freeman introduced me and read a series of resolutions which were enthusiastically adopted by the audience. These resolutions will be published in another column of THE TRUTH SEEKER. They will be forwarded to the California representativs in Congress. I gave the lecture under the auspices of the Stockton Turn-Verein and Stockton Liberal League. The Freethinkers of Stockton are at the front rain or shine. Over fifty names were added to the Freethought Federation.

W. F. Freeman has been on the sick-list for three months, but his indomitable courage never fails and he keeps the old Liberty Guard of Stockton in activ service. Without him we couldn't win such glorious successes.

J. C. Gage; Chas. Haas; Geo. Hogan, of Lodi; Pope and Paine—good names to join together for freedom; Ryan, of the Independent, an oldtime comrade of Evansville, Ind., in the days when I first met Ingersoll, and was bursting the last bonds of Christianity into the "broad and unfenced universe"—these and many more I greeted, for the Liberals of Stockton are a host, and I can't mention them all. Even on a stormy night they giv Freethought a larger audience than all the churches in the city can muster. M. S. Palmer was present from Livermore, and we were all glad to hail this lively octogenarian who grows old gracefully, and is ready "to lend a hand."

So amidst lowering clouds and blustering winds California still givs the golden welcome. It is always beautiful whatever may be the freaks of the weather clerk. There is something exhilarating even in its tumultuous storms.

I leave next week for Washington, and my next Notes will be written from "across the continent."

Congress is the battle-ground, and without doubt there will be a hard struggle. The churches will make a desperate effort to stem the tide. There is an impression that we hav already won the victory in the action of the board of directors, the common council of Chicago, etc., all in favor of opening the World's Fair on Sunday. This action does not by any means settle the question. It only opens the fight. It is the expression of an opinion. It has not the power of law. That power is in Congress, and to that power we must appeal. The vote of Congress must be changed. If this is not done the World's Fair will not be open on Sunday. Everyone must see this. It won't do to lie on our oars now. The churches will make a determined resistance. Every possible influence should be brought into play to reverse Congressional action. We cannot resort to violent and revolutionary measures. We must use legal means, and Congress is the only body that can unlock the gates of the World's Fair on Sunday.

In this great contest Liberals must stand at the front, coöperating with other associations, but maintaining an independent attitude and working in accordance with their own spirit and method. This is preëminently our fight, and we must not let others take the place that belongs to the veterans of Liberty.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Invocations and Celebrations.

It is not given to many men to set the world agog after they hav been dead four hundred years. Such a man was Christopher Columbus. In the wild commotion of the last four weeks, dozens of salient points hav projected themselvs and engaged the attention of the public. We, however, hav to deal with only one—the prayers at Chicago of Bishop Fowler and Cardinal Gibbons—and chiefly with the Methodist prelate and his lengthy invocation.

This remarkable prayer, if any prayer ever uttered can be called remarkable, abounds in curious idiosyncrasies, the result of a combination of intelligence and superstition. It would not do to deny Bishop Fowler a given amount of education, information, and ratiocination in his peculiar invocation. This invocation is made to God. The ubiquitous Chicago reporter fairly outdid himself all through the three days' fêtes, and in no particular does he shine more gloriously than when he descants on the prayers thereat uttered. After describing the raging maelstrom of enthusiasm produced by the "Columbian March," he in the plenitude of his wisdom tells us, "But there is an end to all things," and so when Bishop Charles H. Fowler stood forth and waved his hands in an appeal for peace, the hush that fell was as impressiv as had been the applause. And then the eloquent divine with bowed head, his voice wonderfully loud and clear, said:

Almighty God, our heavenly father, thou art the only one true God, eternal, immortal, invisible, blessed over all for evermore.

We hav before remarked this prayer was made to God, and we giv this opening sentence as proof of our declaration.

It is the way of the clergy always to flatter their God. Whether they do this designing to produce an effect on God or their hearers, is a question we may not debate. It can hardly be possible that any sane man believes God—if there is any—could be cajoled by such fulsome and tawdry flattery as this bishop uses in the prayer under consideration. We would like to quote this prayer in its entirety, but its extreme length forbids, and we can only quote enough to make clear our criticism.

It is very seldom God is the recipient of such premeditated and superlativ flattery as he here receives from the Methodist divine. And for a very good reason. This was an occasion not offered once in a century, and the bishop was determined to make the most of it, both for God and himself—especially himself. Just after the delivery of the orations, the Hon. Chauncey M. Depew betook himself to the parlors of the Whitechapel Club, and in confidence told some of his boon companions a few of the secrets of the occasion. One of the party ventured the remark, "How about the prayers, Chauncey?" With a suggestiv shrug and roll of the eyes, the genial Chauncey informed the coterie that Bishop Fowler's prayer as originally constructed and printed contained twenty thousand words. As a matter of fact, Bishop Fowler's prayer has, including the little sting in the end of its tail, otherwise the Amen, precisely seventeen hundred and one words in it. The genial Chauncey likewise told his club friends that Henry Watterson pared down his speech five-sixths in its delivery. He also informed them that he cut down his own speech two-thirds. If the good bishop then reduced, or "cut," his prayer from twenty thousand to seventeen hundred and one words, then it would appear that there was a reduction all the way round. For all of which mercies God be thanked, "now and forevermore."

Of all the vain things in this vain world done by vain man, as a perfect concentration of all vanities is when that "forked radish," as Carlyle calls him, essays to tell "God" who he is, what he is, and what he might, could, would, or should hav done:

Thou hast that supreme power which is incapable of wearying, and that supreme wisdom which is incapable of blundering, and that supreme love which is incapable of upbraiding, and we come unto thee asking that thou wilt strengthen us in our weakness, guide us in our blindness, teach us in our ignorance, father us in our orphanage, pity us in our penitence, and save us in our faith, and so help us that we may acceptably worship thee. We bless thee, we praise thee, we laud and magnify thy name.

Herein "God" is very different indeed from Bishop Fowler. We wish we could say of the bishop that he is "incapable of blundering," but we cannot; and not only so, but we are inclined to say he is a clerical blunderbuss, as we shall try to show by his own words in this Columbian address to the deity. He stands a good second to the Rev. Dr. Burchard, of "Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion" notoriety, who was par excellence the greatest blunderbuss of his age, and whose fated words cost Blaine the presidency.

Thou didst keep this new world in the thick clouds that surround thy purposes and didst reserve it for the high honors of thy maturing kingdom. In the fullness of time thou didst bring it to the knowledge of men by the wisdom and prowess and faith of thy servant, Columbus.

Does Bishop Fowler intend to convey the idea to the mind of "God" that the American continent was a sort of chaotic void up to the time of this alleged discovery? In what way was it "reserved for the high honors of thy maturing kingdom?" "Thou didst bring it to the knowledge of men." Was it not known to the "men" who then inhabited the two continents? Were there not at that time two mighty empires, with a high and advanced civilization, occupying either continent, with vast public works, charitable institutions, splendid cities, including that mightiest element of all, "high-minded men," which Sir Wm. Jones tells us "constitute a state?" There were no "men" in North and South America at that day according to Bishop Fowler. They all lived in Europe, and the "wisdom, and prowess, and faith of thy servant Columbus" brought it to their knowledge. We do not believe this clerical twaddle, nor do we imagin it will impose for a single moment upon God, even with all the laudation herein lavished upon his "holy name."

Thus thou didst launch upon the tide of history in the two continents of the New World two new and great and mutually helpful nations. We thank thee for thy favoring providence.

This is so extremely obscure that we confess our inability to understand it. If God ever launched upon the tide of history two "new and great and mutually helpful nations," as a result of Columbus's discovery, we hav not heard of it. After this curious tilt at God, why does the bishop chop so suddenly and say, "We thank thee for thy favoring providence?" These little inconsistencies show that when a bishop constructs prayers to God weeks in advance, and has them printed to the extent of twenty thousand words and then has to cut them down, and they get into the hands of the average Chicago printer, he is pinioning himself on the horns of the worst kind of a dilemma.

Thou didst speak to our fathers, heroic and great men, men of prayer and of power, and bade them come to this open land, and plant here in the wilderness great institutions for the elevation of the race, to consecrate these vast valleys and endless plains to freedom, to free ideas and free conscience, to the sanctity of the private home and inalienability of individual rights.

As God never spoke any such thing to "our fathers," or anybody else's father, the whole paragraph is a tissue of clerical fanfaronade, gasconade, and untruth. These "fathers" came to this "open land," which belonged not to them, but to the dwellers on the soil, drove them out with fire and sword, stole their lands, and committed unparalleled barbarities in the name of God. This God Bishop Fowler is addressing and lauding in Chicago. One of the "great institutions" they planted was African slavery, which had to be atoned for in our time with rivers of blood and millions of treasure, and after all the negroes are with us yet, an unsolved problem for the future to settle as best it may.

We thank thee for the glorious history we hav inherited; for Crecy, for Smithfield, and for Marston Moor; for Lexington and Fort Sumter, for Yorktown and Appomatox—those throbbing achievements of our patriotism. We thank thee for Washington and Lincoln, for Webster and Clay, for Jefferson and Jackson, and for Grant—those beacon-lights of the republic.

What hav Americans to do with thanking God for Crecy, Smithfield, or Marston Moor? If she so desires, let England do this. We might thank him for Lexington, merely as twaddle; but really we giv the entire credit to the Revolutionary patriots, aided by the friendship of France, as to Lexington and its results. As to Yorktown, Fort Sumter, and Appomatox, was it not in wretched taste to drag in these names, referring, as they do, to a fratricidal war ended over thirty years ago, and which at this time ought never to be mentioned when the whole nation is asking the world to join us in peans of peace and brotherly love? Why was the good bishop so invidious in his selection of names, passing over such patriots as Depew and Watterson, never intimating to God that these latter patriots lived at all and are to-day the "beacon-lights of the republic?" God save the mark!

We thank thee for the mighty hosts of the hero dead and for the priceless lessons they hav taught us in patriotism, in valor, in statesmanship, and in sacrifice. We thank thee for sixty million of free, heroic, patriotic citizens; for the open Bible, the open school, and the open church; for unprecedented growth, abundant prosperity, multiplied inventions, unnumbered libraries, countless newspapers, many colleges, great universities, ubiquitous benevolences, universal peace, uninterrupted happiness, and untarnished honor. We thank thee for emancipated manhood and exalted womanhood.

We thank thee for a free conscience, by a free church, in a free state, for a free people. For these precious and priceless blessings that make life valuable and kindle quenchless hopes for this world and for the world to come, we thank thee.

In this paragraph the bishop "pulls the throttle wide open" and is almost too thankful for belief, as he even thanks God for the Sunday newspaper—an institution that is doing more good in undermining the rickety foundation of Christianity than all else whatever. In this case the bishop prays for his enemies with a vengeance, and here he is a "blunderer" pure and simple.

His palaver about a free conscience, free church, free state, and free people is the quintessence of humbuggery. The people are not free at all. They are under the domination of such jugglers as Bishop Fowler and Cardinal Gibbons, and they allow themselvs to be cajoled by them and, metaphorically speaking, they "lick the hand just raised to shed their blood."

Suppose it had been left to a majority of the American people, irrespectiv of religion or prejudice, as to who was most eminently fitted to deliver the great Columbian oration, who would hav been selected? Robert G. Ingersoll, most assuredly. Why? Because he is without doubt or question the greatest of living orators. Since the death of Beecher there is no one left to dispute the palm with him. And yet he is shelved to make room for a Depew and a Watterson! At whose instance? The church, of course. And so in place of the gorgeous rhetoric, the rounded periods, and the magnificent imagery of the great Iconoclast, we are nauseated with the dull commonplace of a Depew, and not a single thought that will liv a dozen years hence separated from the occasion itself. Such is the freedom in this God-blessed country that the Methodist bishop prates so glibly about in his elongated invocation.

The bishop now arrives at a point in his prayer where he intercedes with his God for the president's family, and he thus invokes him:

May the comfort of thy grace abound in that Christian family, and may thy tender care preserve it unbroken for an example for many years to come.

Everyone of the sixty millions of the American people could heartily wish that this prayer might hav been answered and a noble and excellent woman rescued from her impending fate. But it was not answered. And neither will a single syllable or part of this prayer ever produce the slightest effect. Mrs. Harrison was afflicted with an incurable disease that baffled all medical skill and was sure to die soon, when this vainglorious man, to tickle the ears of the public, essayed to ask some myth, with much ostentation, to accomplish the impossible, or, in other words, that it would arrest the clammy hand of death. Such is the folly of our "Christian" teachers and educators in this day of steam and electricity.

The bishop now bunches a host of people together—secretaries, judges, Senators, Congressmen, governors, clerks, typewriters, army men, women, lawyers, doctors, and the "great body of our citizens"—and asks God to bless them all in a bunch. Tumbles them all in the common sewer as it were, and vaporizes his frothy mouthings by wholesale. The only remark we hav to make on this "bunching" program is to say, that to ask God to bless a lawyer is a stroke of humor that would provoke laughter in heaven itself and make a ripple of mirth all around the great white throne.

Bless the great body of the wage-earners, and may labor and capital meet, mingle, and thrive together on the basis of the New Testament.

The bishop here arrives at the very "nub" of his long-drawn invocation, and we wish that every laboring man in America could read this prayer, that they might see just the position the clergy bear to labor and the laborer. The only answer this demagogery requires is the first fifteen verses of the twentieth chapter of St. Matthew, and we giv it entire, that he who runs may read:

1 For the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is an householder, which went out early in the morning to hire laborers into his vineyard.
2 And when he had agreed with the laborers for a penny a day, he sent them into his vineyard.
3 And he went out about the third hour, and saw others standing idle in the marketplace.
4 And he said unto them: Go ye also into the vineyard, and whatsoever is right I will giv you. And they went their way.
5 Again he went out about the sixth and ninth hour, and did likewise.
6 And about the eleventh hour he went out, and found others standing idle, and saith unto them, Why stand ye here all the day idle?
7 They say unto him, Because no man hath hired us. He saith unto them, Go ye also into the vineyard; and whatsoever is right, that shall ye receive.
8 So when even was come, the lord of the vineyard saith unto his steward, Call the laborers, and giv them their hire, beginning from the last unto the first.
9 And when they came that were hired about the eleventh hour, they received every man a penny.
10 But when the first came, they supposed that they should hav received more; and they likewise received every man a penny.

11 And when they had received it, they murmured against the goodman of the house,
12 Saying, These last hav wrought but one hour, and thou hast made them equal unto us, which hav borne the burden and heat of the day.
13 But he answered one of them, and said, Friend, I do thee no wrong: didst not thou agree with me for a penny?
14 Take that thine is, and go thy way: I will giv unto this last, even as unto thee.
15 Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil, because I am good?

"Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own?" Sure enough! And the clergy will back up the employer every time, on this "basis of the New Testament." There is no hope for the laboring man as long as the priesthood meddle with the things of this world, in which they really ought not to hav any concern. They belong to the soft-handed tribe who do not work. They are the Nati consumere fruges, born, as one of their own number has well put it, "merely to eat up corn," provided by willing and unwilling dupes, and waste their time in such silly vaporings as we are now criticising. Every now and then the Lord of the Vatican issues an encyclical on the labor question, and the Protestant clergy supplement it with impudence equally silly and uncalled for; and just as long as these religious theorizers rule the majority of mankind with a rod of iron, just so long will labor grovel at the feet of capital. Laborers of America and the world! if you ever expect to fully enjoy your inalienable rights, cease to bow to the religion-mongers, whether they be Protestant, Catholic, or Mohammedan.

Bless all the people from every land that flow into our population, that all, of every clime and color and race, may enjoy the blessings of righteousness and justice, and protection and security, under our flag, and on every yard of our soil.

The bishop now turns demagog in real earnest and asks God to bless "all the people from every land," when at this very time he well knows, if he knows anything, that our government has been guilty of the meanest insult to China ever offered by one government to another. It is too cowardly, too base, too insolent to dwell upon, and shows a total ignorance of statesmanship besides a heinous disrespect for the comity which should govern civilized nations. "Protection and security under our flag" consists in registering your name and having your photograph taken like a convicted felon. The Chinese government is about to retaliate in kind, and it is hopeful they will assert themselvs as becomes their strength and position. In the not distant future, when steam and electricity are as common in China as with us, and a nation with four hundred millions of people solidified by these agencies sets an army of ten millions of men and a navy of ten thousand ships in motion, we may hav cause to regret our want of comity with the oldest and proudest nation on the globe.

The bishop's appeal now takes the form of filling in the niche of "dumb forgetfulness," and he includes everything he had before forgotten. He asks God to "sanctify our homes and multiply our children," a rehash of the old "increase and multiply" of Genesis. It was hardly necessary to urge God to this duty, and better had he qualified it by saying "multiply fewer and better children." But it has been the way of priests and kings in all ages to urge population of any and all kinds that the church may get revenue and the king food for gunpowder, and of course Bishop Fowler must do after his kind. He now prays for the president and general manager of the Exposition, thus bringing these distinguished persons in touch with "God," and continues his medley by invoking the "choicest blessings" upon our guests, "strangers and rulers of the earth," and if God sends us the cholera next year we shall lose faith in the efficacy of the bishop's prayer and conclude he has no standing with the higher powers.

The bishop now prays for all the nations of the earth, mentioning them by name, and curiously begins with France, then little Switzerland, and then the republics of the New World. Then Great Britain, Scandinavia, Germany, Italy, and "sunny Spain." "Bless Russia with her millions of subjects, and of acres, and of wants." Does he bless her for "wanting" to drive out with fire and sword five millions of innocent Jews? Two words dispose of Austria—"bless Austria." "Bless China, populous China." Her population in this country being registered, and having their photographs taken. If China could hav her say, we are afraid she would pray, "Damn Fowler, presumptuous Fowler."

Bless Japan, and Corea, and Turkey, and Africa, and—"so ends our catechism."

Bless all the nations of the earth, whatever their form of government or type of religion.

The good bishop must believe with Pope:

For forms of government let fools contest,
Whate'er is best administered is best.

And we are willing to admit that any type of religion is as good as the bishop's, and that all types are as bad as they can be, and a useless encumbrance to mankind.

Our own good land now comes in for a lengthy disquisition on her opportunities, excellences, prosperity, intelligence, and all else besides; and then we are to "fill the world for future ages with the gladness and glory of our Christian civilization." Just so. The church has always stood in the way of every advance, retreating only when compelled by force; and finally, after yielding, turning around and claiming all the merit of the advances made, thus showing her unlimited capacity for insolence and presumption.

All things here below must hav an end, and the bishop, after praying especially for the success of the Exposition, which must hav pleased the ears of the Chicagoans and left them in a dreamy state of prospectiv prosperity and pecuniary affluence, came to a halt with the inevitable Amen, so pleasing to a long-suffering multitude. The only classes left out of the bishop's category upon which the divine beneficence was not invoked were the saloonkeepers and hackmen. This so-called prayer is without doubt the most elaborate "stump" speech ever addressed to the Lord; and is altogether a sui generis among such petitions, and stamps its author as the most unmitigated humbug of the great Columbian anniversary.

As to the prayer of Cardinal Gibbons we intend to say but little, and merely observe that Bishop Fowler prayed until it was dark, and so admonished the cardinal that he must be short in his supplication. All prayers in their general tenor are as like as two peas; and those before us are no exception. The prevailing idea being fully to inform God of the circumstances and happenings of four hundred years ago, and their relevancy to the issues of to-day. The cardinal says, "Columbus was inspired with the sublime ambition of carrying the light of the gospel to a people buried in the darkness of idolatry." "Arise, O God, in thy might, and hasten the day when the reign of the prince of peace will be firmly established on the earth." Why do the clergy always advance this idea? Jesus himself said, "I came not to bring peace but a sword" and fire upon the earth. Which are we to believe, the master or the priest?

Cardinal Gibbons only used in his prayer seven hundred and twenty-one words, concluding without an Amen, thus showing a vein of common sense that his Methodist brother lacked. Rev. H. C. McCook, of Philadelphia, pronounced the benediction in the usual form, so each clergyman stood to his appointed post, and the great day of invocations came to a close, much to the relief of a vast concourse of people worn out with oratory and prayer.

ONONON.

The Death of Two Men.

Within the last month two of the most brilliant men of genius the nineteenth century has produced hav passed to "that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns." One of them was Ernest Renan, a Rationalist, whose works in behalf of mental liberty hav been the admiration of the Freethought, and the bugbear of the orthodox world. The other was Alfred Tennyson, the great English poet, of whom we can truly say, in the words of Webster, "He came down to us from a former generation." Christians hav claimed Tennyson as a believer in their faith, but that he was not a Christian in the orthodox sense of the word there is abundant proof, as Mr. G. W. Foote has clearly shown in a late number of the Freethinker. Not that he was a Freethinker in the sense that Bradlaugh and Ingersoll are Freethinkers, but that he did not accept the dogmas that a man must accept to be properly called an orthodox Christian. Bryant, Longfellow, and Emerson are parallel cases in our own country. In fact, how many progressiv, brilliant, and brainy men of the present age are orthodox in their religious belief? Very few. To most people, the remarkable feature of these two men is the manner in which they died. For centuries Christian apologists hav thundered into the ears of ignorance the gross falsehood that an unbeliever can never die in peace, but that his last moments are made miserable by reproaching himself for denying the "living God." The egotism of the Christian clergy becomes so intoxicated that they even declare themselvs indispensable at the Infidel's funeral. At the same time they depict the beauty of the Christian's death, the Bible in his hand, a prayer upon his lips, his eyes turned heavenward, and the golden streets of the New Jerusalem looming up before his vision like the reflection of a magic-lantern upon a canvas! All good men, we are told, die in this manner. Therefore, in Renan and Tennyson we would expect to see these assertions verified. Here are two noted instances which would hush the Infidel into silence. But the tables were turned! Renan was not frightened by the proverbial legion of devils that surround the Infidel's death-bed. The groans, the agonies, and the frightful blasphemies of which Sunday-school tracts giv such glowing descriptions were not heard. He did not call upon God, nor did he send for a priest, but he did giv orders that the man with the long black robe should keep at a distance, and that he be buried without religious ceremony. Four hours before his death he turned to his wife and uttered these words, "Be calm and resigned. We undergo the laws of Nature of which we are a manifestation. We perish, we disappear, but heaven and earth remain and the march of time goes on forever." These were his last words.

Tennyson in his last moments did not turn his thoughts to religion. He did not ask for a Bible or a minister, but, as though he intended that his last act in life should be a world-renowned refutation of the ridiculous pretensions of the clergy, he called for a volume of Shakspere. Upon receiving it he turned to the grand tragedy of "Cymbeline," which of all the great dramatist's works is probably the most pagan and savors the least of Christianity. Fixing his eyes upon its pages, he read until death closed the book to him.

Had Renan recanted on his death-bed, had Tennyson died with the Bible in his hand, it would hav been heralded in every pulpit in the land as another instance of "God's mysterious providence."

English Notes.

DEAR TRUTHSEEKERS: We liv in a pretty round world, methinks; and whatever happens anywhere seems to be reflected everywhere. You good folks in the New World hav long been enjoying Watson Heston's humorous drawings illustrating the so-called holy Bible. Your poor bodies hav laughed over them till your sides were fit to split. Grim Yankee sarcasm, the most biting in the world, runs through them and saturates one and all with its mirth-provoking spirit. Some few of us hav been privileged to see the wicked Heston's horrible profanities in the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Wherever they hav been shown they hav been appreciated; but judge my surprise when I was shown the beautiful volume with its 400 pages and its 200 full-page illustrations on the drawing-room table of a well-to-do Manchester man who is not a member of the National Secular Society! As I say, it is a round world, and one not only finds friends in unexpected places, but the tit-bits of the world's productions hav a knack of finding their way where one would least expect to meet them.

That reminds me that Secularism continues to spread with unabated energy, though scarcely in the way one could wish. Christianity is broadening at the expense of its own life's-blood. Creeds are watered down till they are the merest skeletons of their former selvs. What was blatant Atheism a century ago is now most Christ-like when viewed through the magic-lantern of higher criticism. Why, the very church of which the saintly curate insisted upon the shutting up of our Freethought Publishing Depot, has startled the inhabitants by running a Sunday afternoon sacred concert. "Sacred," of course, covers a multitude of sins as well as a good collection. "More liberal views of Christianity" is the new excuse for acting as Secularists without incurring the hatred and insults which the Secularists hav to put up with.

And so it is that in England, whilst the principles of Secularism are being preached by "advanced" Christians, and religious bodies are eagerly embracing the freedom of such teaching and the benefits of its practice, the National Secular Society presents an unpleasant spectacle of standing still. What the cause is I know not; but certainly in these northern parts of England there is practically no life whatever in the movement, and no money to encourage greater vitality. This is in no way owing to the brutal opposition of some interested opponents. Men do not become Christians because of the exposition of Christian evidences. The fault seems to lie in the not altogether unwelcome fact that our opponents hav leveled themselvs up to our mark, save the honest avowal of our principles; and that there is so little difference between us that they do not see the necessity of quarreling with their respectable church and chapel friends. This is undoubtedly the main cause of our slow progress; but there must also be some fault amongst ourselvs. The idea that our work is done and that we ought to disband is frivolous in the face of our unrepealed blasphemy laws. We hav work enough and to spare, and if we are to renew our progress a change will hav to be made somewhere.

I see you are plodding away with your organization schemes in America, and no one will wish you more hearty success than I do, as you know my whole heart and soul are wrapped up in this work. Nothing would please me more than to be solely engaged in it and to devote every moment and every energy to so glorious a cause. But what hav I found here? The miserable stipend of $500 a year that I asked is not forthcoming. Nay, my average weekly earning for seven days' fairly hard labor only amounts to $4. Yet in six months I delivered over one hundred different lectures, class lessons, etc., rushing about from place to place, and holding large open-air meetings, often at the risk of my limbs and lungs. The experience was this, that the moment my back was turned upon a town the enthusiasm created lapsed and nothing was done to keep the converts together. Moreover, the ridiculous indifference often shown in preparing the way for the lecturers is enough to dishearten the most determined organizer. I am only just returned from a midland town, where I was to deliver three lectures. The arrangement was made a month beforehand; and yet there was no notice in our weekly Freethought journals which publish notices of lectures free of charge, and which are eagerly scanned every Friday by Freethinkers, especially in the provincial towns. There were no posters, and nothing to let folks know but a few insignificant handbills, which were next door to useless.

You can better imagin than I can describe the lecturer's feelings when people tell him their disappointment at not hearing him because they had no idea of his arrival in the town, especially when his payment is "by results."

I would, therefore, suggest two or three things to the Liberals who are going to form the new Federation.

1: Don't ask your lecturers to come to you at starvation rates as a special favor when you may feel sure they hav always a big thing on hand to make two ends meet at home.

2: When you do engage a lecturer, don't imagin that God is going to inspire people with the knowledge of his engagement. Jehovah is all very good in his way, but a few showy posters are infinitly better.

3: When your lecturer has stirred up the people, don't go to bed for a twelvemonth and think that the work will roll on of its own accord like your debts. It won't. If your enthusiasm is of the gunpowder order you had better buy taffy and get the toothache. You will remember that longer than the lecture.

4: If you confine your energies to the men you will make a mess of it. The children will be the men and women of the next generation. And the mothers will be the trainers of the children. So look after the mothers. They will make your meetings brighter and your doctrins more popular. My best branches are those where the influence of gentle woman is not discounted. Get them to sing, to decorate the hall, and to bring their little ones. They love tea-meetings and they pay.

5: If you make a start stick to it and peg right away. If you hold an opinion, back it. Be firm, be kindly, be well up in your arguments, and victory is yours. Be lukewarm and Liberalism will be thrown back half a century by yourselvs. And now, brethren, here endeth the first lesson, as the parsons say. Yours fraternally, SAM STANNRING.

Manchester, Nov. 19, 1892.

The Freethought Federation of America.

Chicago is alive, activ, and bustling; the streets are fairly teeming with people who hav thronged to the World's Fair city; the wheels of progress and improvement are revolving at a rapid rate, and the great event of next year bids fair to be one of the grandest in the history of our land. Mighty and massiv business blocks are being erected upon every street, and everything is being done to show the progress and triumphant march of the United States to those who shall visit our shores to witness this great exhibition of human art and industry.

During the reign of priestcraft no such display was possible, but since the advent of Science, and Man's ability to apply the forces of nature to his own immediate use, such exhibitions hav become popular and more general throughout the civilized world. It is also a noticeable fact that these exhibitions are possible only in those countries that are more or less tainted with heretic thought. The great American genius known by his inventions and discoveries in the application of the force of electricity could not hav made the results of his labors known in the earlier parts of the present century. The Comstocks of faith would hav hunted him from corner to corner, and an ignominious death would hav been the only reward for his services. This was under Christian rule, but now that the true light of Science has rippled over the space where the darkness of Faith once reigned supreme, Man, by the aid of reason and experience, has brought the forces of Nature into useful and beneficial operation. The Fair grounds are still open on Sunday, and an admission fee of twenty-five cents is still charged to those who may wish to visit the grounds and inspect the preparations that are being made for its opening next May. A vast and overwhelming majority of the citizens of this city and state are decidedly in favor of the Fair being opened upon the "venerable day of the Sun." The local press is keeping up a constant agitation to this end, and I firmly believe that success will crown our efforts in this direction.

The church party realize this fully, and are now asking for permission to hold religious services upon the grounds should the directors open the Fair on that day. Personally, I am not opposed to this step, because it will giv us an opportunity for placing Science and Faith upon trial, and show conclusivly which of the twain possesses the most attractiv powers to interest the masses. And if the religious element are allowed to hold meetings and revivals upon the ground then we as Freethinkers must be allowed the same privileges and we too should hold meetings therein; and with proper care and management, with a grand array of lecturers, starting out with the great and eloquent Demosthenes of the United States, Col. Robt. G. Ingersoll, we could soon outdo any other class in the crowds that would attend our meetings. To do this, however, will involve a considerable expenditure, and if the Freethinkers are desirous, if they are really anxious and willing, that Freethought should be adequately represented at the Fair, they must send in their contributions as soon as possible, that we may commence our preparations to this end. One dollar from every Freethinker would reach an enormous sum and would be sufficient for all practical purposes in this direction. Freethinkers, ask yourselvs the question: Shall we represent Freethought at the Fair and place our principles before the masses that will congregate there? Must we remain passiv and quiescent and watch with longing eyes the powers of darkness usurp the praise and honor for such an event, to which they hav no right? Shall we remain inactiv and allow Faith to depose Reason from her throne? I know that Freethinkers are ever ready to assist when a national crisis is threatened, and never before had we greater cause for acting in concert than by grasping the present opportunities of placing our principles upon the pinnacle of success. Friends, the issue rests with you. We are ready and willing to do our part in this undertaking. Are you ready and willing to do yours? What will your answer be? What should it be? What it will be remains to be seen. But what answer you ought to giv is too well known to need further comment.

The Federation has been preëminently successful in one direction at least, and that is, we hav succeeded in awakening in the breasts of many Freethinkers who had become somewhat indifferent about the cause, a newer interest and greater enthusiasm. The political part of our constitution has met with universal favor, and touched a string that had become deadened and dormant; the string has been drawn to a higher tension, and is now in harmony with the rest, in order to bring the principles of Freethought into the glorious light of day. Many Freethinkers hav written me to this effect, and though never affiliated with any Freethought organization before, hav sent in their names and cash as members of the Federation. And now that success has crowned our labors to such an extent, I shall in my next letter formulate a plan by which we may augment our ranks, and gather together our forces for an activ campaign in the political contest of 1896.

In answer to my letter acknowledging the receipt of $25 sent by Dr. E. B. Foote, of New York city, we hav received the following:

NEW YORK, Nov. 26, 1892.

MR. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Dear Sir: I hav yours of the 23d, and if I had time would respond quite at length. As it is, I will only acknowledge the receipt of your letter, and say that I like its tone, and also the disposition exhibited by yourself and Mr. Putnam to make the Freethought Federation a great success. Wishing you an open field and a big harvest, I am,

Yours truly, E. B. FOOTE.

Mrs. P. Van Hoeter, of Grass Valley, Cal., sends us a very encouraging letter, accompanied by a check for $10; and wishes the Federation every success. Several letters hav been addressed to me at Chicago without any definit address thereon; such letters hav gone to the general delivery, and not being called for, hav been returned to the writer. Friends are requested to address all letters, etc., to the headquarters of the Federation, from whence they will be promptly forwarded to me. The lists of the Federation are still swelling, and large numbers of petitions to Congress are still arriving day by day. Friends, do not delay in this matter; send at once for petitions, and giv us every possible opportunity to compel Congress to giv ear to the voice of the people.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH,
Sec. Freethought Federation of America.

1,137 Anthony Comstocks!

From the New York Sun.

Parkhurst suffered severely at the hands of the speakers at a meeting of the Social Purity League on Monday night.

Dr. Rainsford finds that as a consequence of his detectiv enterprise immorality is only disturbed over a wider area. The disease has not been lessened. The seeds hav merely been scattered and made more productiv of evil.

Dr. De Costa is so much outraged by Parkhurst's methods of inciting vice in order to betray the vicious to the law that he hopes that "a bill will be introduced at Albany to make it a criminal offense to tempt any man or woman to conviction." That is, he thinks that in justice Parkhurst ought to be down on the Island in company with the women he hired to get up a naked "circus" for his benefit.

The whole testimony of the meeting was that Parkhurst's experiment of doing evil to bring about good had worked to the satisfaction of the devil only. The profligacy of the clerical detectiv served only to encourage and extend profligacy. It also stimulated hypocrisy by suggesting a way of gratifying a depraved curiosity under the pretext of promoting social reform.

So far as we hav been able to find from the reports of the meeting, nothing was said about Parkhurst's new detectiv enterprise, though it is even more provocativ of discussion than the first. When he went about town on his nocturnal visits to the "temples of Venus," as he jocosely called the vilest of the vile dens of vice, he took with him one Christian young man only. Now he proposes to enlist in this service 1,137 Christian young men as his coadjutors.

These young fellows [one in each election district] are to be trained under him in all the arts of the spy, and he has issued a call for such pupils from the pulpit of a Christian church. They are to be distributed throughout the town, one to each of the election districts, so that every spy shall be able to keep a watch on every inhabitant of his district and report specially to Parkhurst. In order that they may do the job thoroughly each spy is to be instructed how to make a chart of his district, with every dwelling and every place of business indicated. He is also to take a sort of moral census of the neighborhood by acquainting himself with the habits of the residents, and, more especially, he is to shadow all public officers and employees and keep the run of the liquor saloons and the houses of vicious resort.

The spy's function, then, is to be on the lookout for wickedness. Instead of one Anthony Comstock, Parkhurst is going to train 1,137 young fellows in his specialty. Of course, he warns his pupils that they must keep out of vice themselvs and only watch other people's debauchery; but what is that admonition worth when he himself has set them the example of taking part in profligacy and inciting it? The business of such spies requires that they should associate with the vicious, and to get into that company they must be vicious themselvs. That was Parkhurst's way, and it must be their way. Moreover, it was commended to them by a great meeting at the Cooper Union as worthy of all praise, as noble, heroic, and Christian. The Presbyterian church also treats it as becoming in a minister, for Parkhurst remains in the pulpit of the Madison Square church and preaches to larger congregations than ever.

These 1,137 young spies are to be taken from the churches of the town. Presumably, therefore, they will start out in the business as fresh as young Erving was. The pursuit of vice will hav the fascination of novelty for them, and feeling that they are made secure against harm by the armor of good motivs which they borrow from Parkhurst, they will not be afraid to tread in his footsteps, however low down into hell they may tend. After a few months' experience they will become fitted to act as guides to all the vice in their respectiv districts, and will take pride in their specialty.

The shadowing and blacklisting of inhabitants of their districts will also acquire a great fascination for them. The wonderful tales of detectiv exploits hav long been very attractiv to boys, and many of them are published. Their natural curiosity, too, will be piqued, and it is likely to be especially strong in the sort of young fellows who will volunteer to enter into Parkhurst's service as spies. They will glory in the secret consciousness of knowing more about their neighbors than anybody else. They will learn to hide in corners, to dog the footsteps of people without being observed themselvs, to hold everybody under suspicion as a possible victim for their net, and will acquire the cynical distrust of human nature which marks the professional detectiv. They will hav their noses in the dirt and filth so constantly that they will get enjoyment from no other odors, even become unable to distinguish between purity and nastiness. They will grow to think that sneaking is a kind of cleverness to be boasted of, and a Christian duty well performed. The more despicable they are the prouder they will be of themselvs, and the more valuable for the service for which Parkhurst engages them.

That is the sort of education he proposes to giv to 1,137 Christian young men in New York, and that is the sort of scrutiny to which he intends to subject the decent citizens of the town. He means to set spies on the track of the inhabitants of every district, inflaming the youthful detectivs to fanatical zeal in the vile enterprise by telling them that they thus will glorify God.

Is it not time to hold another meeting of Christian ministers at the Cooper Union to decide the question whether Parkhurst's new scheme is as heroic as his original method of personally inciting and viewing shameless exhibitions for the purpose of promoting purity? If the decision is as favorable to him as the first, every church can be made a nursery for spies, and the force increased until there shall be several on every block. If spying is a Christian obligation, no Christian is exempt from it.

The Catholic Vote and the Late Election.

There hav been many theories advanced to account for the vote at the late elections held in the United States on November 8th.

Many eminent statesmen declare it was on account of the McKinley tariff; others, that it was the organized labor vote; others, that it was on account of Mr. Cleveland's popularity, but the true reason is, it was carried against the Republican party by the united vote of the Roman Catholic church.

If the Roman Catholics had divided as other sects did, Mr. Harrison would hav been elected by a large majority, and had they refrained from voting altogether, all the issues being the same, Harrison would hav carried every state in the Union north of Mason and Dixon's line and even crowded the Democrats very closely in some of the Southern states.

But the Catholics voted as a unit, as one man, and this was done under the orders of the pope of Rome, through his cardinals, archbishops, bishops, and priests, and the whole piratical crew sworn to vote for the party that would permit and assist the Catholic church the most to destroy the public school system, undermine our free institutions, and rob every man, woman, and child, and every town, city, county, territory, state, and the general government, of every dollar that their unbounded rapacity might desire.

Whenever the American people are nearly evenly divided the balance of power can be settled in every instance by the Catholic church voting as a unit for one of the parties.

I hav read the order issued by the pope to his dupes, his slaves in the United States, commanding them to disconnect themselvs from each of the great parties, keep aloof from all parties, be vigilant, be observant, test the political leaders, and when election day comes then cast the vote of the Catholic church as a unit, as of one man.

What do you think of this, you people who are not members of this most corrupt and corrupting organization on the face of the earth? These pirates talk of our common schools as being godless, as hot-beds of crime and immorality.

What do you think of your liberties, your freedom of your electiv franchise, of your methods of selecting your officers to make and execute your laws, when a bigoted tyrant can by the wafture of his corrupt and corrupting hand, on the banks of the Tevera (Tiber), determin who or what persons can or shall hold office here in these United States?

Is it not about time that we, the American people, were beginning to wake up, to look a "leedle out?"

The Catholic church has sworn to capture the United States, to destroy our free institutions, the freedom of the press, free speech, our public schools, and upon the ruins of these and our republican form of government establish the terrible Inquisition, the glory and pride of the Catholic church, but the most terrible, the most horrible, cruel curse that ever plagued the world.

As Seward said of chattel slavery, "This country must be all slavery or all free," and I say that this nation must be all Catholic or all free. It is for you to decide. What do you say, Catholicism or freedom? AMERICA.

St. Joseph, Mo., NOV. 23, E.M. 292.

Warm Resolutions.

The wage-workers of Chicago are getting heated in their expressions regarding the managers of the Fair. At a recent meeting they passed these resolutions:

WHEREAS, The World's Fair directory has recently expressed the determination to hav the Fair open to the public only from 8 A.M. to 7 P.M., and that, too, in face of the timely remonstrance that such action would effectually debar the clerk, the laboring man, and, in fact, all wage-workers from attending or in any way participating in the World's Fair exercises; and

WHEREAS, It has already been decided by all the "powers that be"—national, state, and municipal—that the said Fair shall be also closed Sunday; therefore

Resolved, That this body of wage-workers, in mass-meeting assembled, announces to the Fair directory, as well as to the general public, the inevitable conclusion at which it has arrived in regard to the action and position taken by the directory in the whole matter, a conclusion which will undoubtedly be concurred in by all wage-workers, both at home and abroad—viz.: that it has been from the start too painfully evident that the national and local directors of the Fair hav been unanimous in their determination to make of the great Columbian Exposition an aristocratic, plutocratic, kid-gloved affair from first to last, and that in their latest action in closing the gates on Sundays and evenings, the only periods when the common people could hav an opportunity of gazing at the marvelous results of man's industry, the people clearly perceive that they hav received a polite invitation to stay away;

Resolved, That the intent of the directory in this regard is also clearly perceptible in the entire course of its administration, as manifested in the flunkeyism it has displayed toward foreign potentates, civil and ecclesiastical, in its invoking of the benediction with the cooperation of cardinals, archbishops, etc., and in its evident anxiety for the presence and approbation of William of Germany, the prince of Wales, and other like celebrities of unsound minds and morals. The same disposition was recently evinced in the dedication ceremonies, from which the common people were religiously excluded, saying nothing of the inauguration ball, which was confined to the very élite or creme de la creme of the plutocracy of Chicago and other leading cities, but even the Fair grounds, which, it was absolutely claimed, would hav been irretrievably ruined by the presence of the general public.

Resolved, That under these circumstances and in view of these facts, the snubbing which labor has constantly received from the Fair directory and the determination plainly evinced by it to keep out the common people, it is the manifest duty of wage-workers and their only course to positivly insist that an opportunity be given them to attend this great gathering to which all the world is invited.

Resolved, That this body of wage-workers, on behalf of their fellow-laborers of all lands, demands that the World's Fair shall either be opened on Sunday or kept open each week-day till 11 P. M.

Remarkable Fecundity of Ancient Jewesses.

M. W. H. in the Sun.

The enormous numbers of the Israelites who came out of Egypt (600,000 armed men, besides non-combatants) are not due to textual errors, because they are again and again reiterated, verified by repeated footings, and that in two complete censuses, besides agreeing with many of the representations in the story itself. Colenso showed that these numbers are not only incompatible with the account of the seventy persons who, only four generations before, had come into Egypt, but make the account of the Exodus incredible. To mobilize an army of 600,000 armed men in a single night is an incredible feat, even if we leave entirely out of account the women and children, the aged and infirm, the "mixed multitude," and the "flocks and herds." But supposing all this done and the whole company—numbering necessarily between two and three millions—provided with the tents we find them occupying immediately afterward, why should 600,000 armed men run away from Pharaoh, or cry out from fear of the detachment of troops sent in pursuit? Why did an armed force ten times as numerous as the allied army of Waterloo need to submit to intolerable oppression? How could the petty desert tribe of Amalekites hold them in check and for a time "prevail" against them?

Again the human millions are supported by manna in the "waste, howling wilderness," but what supported the great numbers of cattle and flocks and herds of which we hear repeatedly? If the Israelites had these flocks and herds, why did they complain of having no flesh to eat and twice require a miracle to provide it? If they did not hav them, whence came the innumerable beasts for sacrifice, so carefully specified, and the Passover lambs, for forty successiv years required to be males but one year old? Again, the male Levites of the first census were 22,000; thirty-eight years afterward, 23,000. But in Moses's own generation there were only sixteen all told. These 23,000 Levites were substituted for 22,273 first-born males of all Israel. If we make the total male population only 900,000 (600,000 bore arms) every mother in Israel must hav then had at least forty-two male children.

The Notions of Right and Wrong.

From Herbert Spencer's Data of Ethics.

Religious creeds, established and dissenting, all embody the belief that right and wrong are right and wrong simply in virtue of divine enactment. This assumption, when examined, proves to be suicidal. If there are no other origins for right and wrong than this enunciated or intuited divine will, then, as alleged, were there no knowledge of the divine will the acts now known as wrong would not be known as wrong. But if men did not know such acts to be wrong because contrary to the divine will, and so, in committing them, did not offend by disobedience, and if they could not otherwise know them to be wrong, then they might commit them indifferently with the acts now classed as right: the results, practically considered, would be the same. In so far as secular matters are concerned, there would be no difference between the two; for to say that in the affairs of life any evils would arise from continuing to do the acts called wrong and ceasing to do the acts called right, is to say that these produce in themselvs certain mischievous consequences and certain beneficial consequences; which is to say there is another source for moral rules than the revealed or inferred divine will: they may be established by induction from these observed consequences. From this implication I see no escape. It must be either admitted or denied that the acts called good and the acts called bad naturally conduce, the one to human well-being and the other to human ill-being. Is it admitted? Then the admission amounts to an assertion that the conducivness is shown by experience, and this involves abandonment of the doctrin that there is no origin for morals apart from divine injunctions. Is it denied that acts classed as good and bad differ in their effects? Then it is tacitly affirmed that human affairs would go on just as well in ignorance of the distinction, and the alleged need for commandments from God disappeasr.

Letters of Friends.

Pleased by Pictnres and Reading.

DANVILLE, ILL., Nov. 20, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: We are, as from the beginning, well pleased with the paper, and very seldom differ in opinion from its editorials, or its Ingersoll's sentiments or its Heston's. L. W. LOUTZENTRISER.

A Gift Toward Civilizing the World.

TEPTON, TENN., Oct. 27, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you $5—$3 to pay one year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $2 is for you to use where it will best serve your purpose. With best wishes to all THE TRUTH SEEKER family,

Yours very truly, A. G. WINEMAN.

Finds an Interesting Difference of Opinion.

MIDDLEVILLE, MICH., Nov. 14, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I notice among the "Letters from Friends" plenty of them are "cranky." It is quite interesting for a reader to note the difference of opinion. I like the paper, and am among the oldest subscribers. M. HIMES.

A Waterer of Liberty's Tree.

Nov. 14, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $5 for my subscription and one new subscriber. This is the best I can do this time. I am doing all I can for Freethought and your paper. There is plenty of the kind of material here, but they are afraid to express themselvs. Yours for reform,

C. N. MAPES.

Generous.

BARTLETT, N. D., Nov. 21, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith find $6 as follows: Fourth quarter of installment per my letter Dec. 11, 1891, $5; copies of both TRUTH SEEKERS containing Ingersoll on Voltaire, $1. THE TRUTH SEEKER reaches us on Monday, and is always warmly welcomed. More copies should be taken here, but most of our Liberals are poor.

Yours truly, E. SMITH.

The Pamphlets Against Snnday Closing of the Fair.

EL MONTE, CAL., Nov. 5, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find fifty cents in stamps, for which please send me the Member of Congress picture leaflets. I think they are just the thing for eye-openers. This is my second order, and I will order more shortly.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,

W. H. BAKER.

A Veteran Freethinker.

NAUVOO, ILL., Nov. 19, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot well do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is nearly the only paper that I can see to read. My old eyes are getting dim at my eighty-second year. Well, now, Mr. Editor, I voted for Jackson in 1832, and now I hav voted for Cleveland, making sixteen presidents I hav voted for. Now, sir, if you hav another subscriber that can go that and one better, he shall hav the cigars. W. H. FULTON.

Some Pictnre-Favorer Shonld Get a Snbscriber in This One's Place.

SAN JOSÉ, CAL., Nov. 12, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I do not care to renew my subscription. I like your paper, except the pictures, but I am too busy to even tear off the wrappers, so of course do not read it much. And, because of the pictures, I do not think the paper is serviceable as a missionary document. People who need converting to Freethought principles are so shocked by some of them that they will not read a word in the paper, but put it in the stove at once instead.

MRS. CHAS. SCHOFIELD.

"Am a Trnth Seeker and Cannot Lie."

SHELBY, IA., Nov. 18, 292.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1.75—$1.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, twenty-five cents for one dozen leaflets with cartoon on as suggested by E. B. B. in THE TRUTH SEEKER October 15th. I hope they will be out in time for Christmas presents. I hav to go slow—am seventy-seven; unable to do anything; very limited means; but one eye and a very poor one at that; can do but little. I am sorry to write so discouragingly, but I am a truth seeker and cannot lie. Hoping THE TRUTH SEEKER and all concerned prosperity and happiness I remain, Yours sincerely, D. MORRIS.

Hav Genuin, Not Half-way, Liberty.

CINCINNATI, O., Nov. 14, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad the congress of the American Secular Union passed the resolution regarding Harman and Heywood so unanimously. If we are going to demand freedom or liberty let us do so in a manly and liberty-loving way, and not try to strangle it half-born, nor make the hollow sham of it the Methodists do or the Presbyterians or Baptists or any other sectarian body. I for one do not want any of the abridged sort. We hav had that kind for a long time, and it has been a failure just to the extent that it has been curtailed. This is plainly to be seen on every hand. W. G. SCOTT.

Keeps His Freethonght Literatnre Pnblic.

OFFICE OF PARAGON HOTEL,
REDDING, CAL., Nov. 14, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated," or Comic Bible, is a source of amusement to my guests. As I keep it on the desk in the hotel office, it will soon be worn out, but I shall get another. THE TRUTH SEEKERS I also keep on file, in book covers so they will not get torn. By so doing they are read by hundreds of people. This is a poor country for preachers. They don't get any of my yaller-legged chickens. And by the looks of the seedy sky-pilots the conference sends here orthodoxy must be on its last legs. And they hav to resort to all sorts of begging and church gambling to hold the fort under any circumstances. GEO. GROVES.

Let the Inquisition Instrnments Be in Operation!

NEW PRAGUE, MINN., Nov. 22, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Having read the letter from Mr. A. Schubert regarding the Inquisition instruments to be exhibited at the World's Fair, I think the idea a grand one, and that it should be proceeded with at once. Such tools of Christian love would be an eye-opener that would be well remembered, more so than if we should read volumes about them. It would be still more impressing could such tools and machinery be put in motion and tried on their inventors, and make them, as the old saying has it, take their own medicin. Let us remove some of the irons in the fire now, and giv our attention to this proposition at once. And if such attempt is made I will contribute $5 toward the same. SUBSCRIBER.

A Lecture on Government.

DENVER, COL., Nov. 16, 292.

MR. EDITOR: The Rocky Mountain Social League, of Denver, Col., held its annual meeting November 13th. Mr. G. O. Shove was president and Mr. Arthur Cheezewright secretary. Mrs. Lizzie Jack and Mr. Cheezewright rendered some highly entertaining and enjoyable songs. W. S. Bell was the speaker of the occasion. His subject was the nature of government, and he handled it in a masterly way. About five hundred people listened attentivly to every sentence he uttered, and the frequent laughter and applause showed that he carried his audience with him. Another evidence that the speaker touched his audience was the fact that he successfully touched their pockets. We got the largest collection we ever received at any of our annual meetings. Mr. Bell goes to Iowa, and thence to Chicago. JAMES H. JACK.

The Use of Knowing Natnre's Laws.

ELK FALLS, KAN., Nov. 17, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I like the title of your paper. Yes, we should seek the truth. Many seem satisfied with the substitute. Many, too, do not hav the opportunity; while many, again, do not know the way, or comprehend the laws of nature sufficiently for an index—blinded more or less by superstition. In nature's laws we can find the truth—and a guide to our conduct. As an illustration—Is polygamy right? No. Why? Because the sexes are born into the world about one-half and one-half.

For years we hav studied not only the material laws of nature, but also the spiritual laws; and we hav to our great astonishment found that we as individuals hav an existence after the dissolution of the body. A Spiritualist, eh? Yes, sir—it is a fact; and we wish to help others to get the same knowledge—not faith, mind you. DR. A. C. WILLIAMS.

The Bible Teaches Not to Keep Snnday.

INDUSTRY, KAN., Nov. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I noticed in last week's TRUTH SEEKER that you are going to publish a lot of pamphlets entitled "Beer, Bishops, and Bribery," containing articles taken from papers, and sentiments of leading men, in regard to having the World's Fair open on Sundays. I do hope the Liberal-minded people throughout the United States will be successful in having it open on Sundays, so that the laboring and business man will get an opportunity of seeing the World's Fair.

Now, Mr. Editor, let me suggest an idea. You know it is the universal belief, especially among believers in the Bible and Christianity, that the Bible strictly commands that we should observe Sunday as a holy, sacred day, and in order to convince them otherwise would it not be a good idea for you to insert in the pamphlets, or leaflets, the following Bible quotations in full: "Not to keep the Sabbath day holy:" St. Luke xiii, 15-17; St. Mark ii, 27; Col. ii, 16; Rom. xiv, 5; St. John v, 16, and Matt. xii, 1-3, 5? Would it not be a very good idea to print the above verses in full to convince the believers that are so wonderfully stuck on the Bible and yet do not know really what it does teach? J. B. WISE.

The Book Gets to Smell of Hell While Putting It Out.

SITKUM, ORE., Nov. 14, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" arrived O. K. I am well pleased with it. There are many books I want and will send for in time, for they are victuals and drink to me. It is a wonder that everybody does not get them. I shall try and sell some of the "Text-Books." We are having a small-pox scare here now, and no one is allowed to travel, so I cannot show my goods. The mails hav to be fumigated before they are sent out, so our good book has to smell hell a little while it is putting it out. The church and Sunday-school were forbid to open last Sunday, for fear God would let small-pox in, as it is said, "Where two or three are met together there I will be also," and "If you eat any bad thing or handle any poison it shall not hurt you."

What about the picture, "The Rock of Ages?" We want it, for there is nothing so good as pictures and diagrams to explain the good work. Talk of inspired men, but Watson Heston is the man!

I remain, Yours in the good work,

JAMES LAIRD.

[There were not a sufficient number of copies of the "Rock of Ages" spoken for to warrant the large expense of producing it.—ED. T. S.]

Encounters with Christians.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., Nov. 23, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I received the Bible Picture Book all right long since, and was much pleased with the telling blows at current superstition, now called religion. I hav been trying to get you a few subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but hav not succeeded. Times are dull here, they say. I think after Christmas I will try again, and I hope with better success. There are no Liberal meetings held here, only Spiritualists'. It is all uphill work here for anyone who does not make a pretense of some kind of religion. There are a few Christians who come to my room to see THE TRUTH SEEKER pictures. One young man said, "It just beats hell how you lie about my religion, and it will be good for you to hav to go to hell when you die!" I told him hell will be filled with decent, sensible people, while heaven will be crammed with murderers, robbers, thieves, hypocrits, and fools, who are only fit for the Christians' heaven; the devil has not respect enough for them to giv them a back seat in hell. They think I am "awful" wicked, and that I will be crying for mercy when I am dying. They say that they would hate to believe as I do. I tell them: "Belief does not make a thing true that is absolutely false in every particular. The Bible is a rope of sand which is washed away with one wave of common sense. You are prepared for heaven, but you are not prepared for the disappointment you are certain to hav, for when you die you will take a long nap and your fabled Gabriel with his tube-horn cannot wake you." Mr. Editor, that is the kind of conversation I hav with these Christian dupes. Some of them are to be pitied; others are to be blamed, for not listening to reason.

Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Watson Heston the fearless artist.

MRS. E. M. HANSSON.

A Model.

OSANDA, GA., Nov. 21, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot well do without the brave and noble champion of Mental Liberty, Freedom, and Justice.

I am like the vast majority of my fellow-mortals—a poor man. Yet I am pretty well contented, and I hav many things of which I am proud and that go a great way toward making me a happy man. I hav a loyal and loving wife, whose mind is free from slavish fear and debasing superstition. We hav four boys and two little girls, and we are doing our best to rear them right, so that they may become honorable, useful men and women—clear-headed, noble, and free from all forms of vice and superstition.

Our baby is named Watson Heston. We liv on a farm far out in the country, and hav to work hard in making crops and attending the stock and things about the place. Our children are all healthy, and there is not a fool among the lot. The boys are large enough to help us work, and they do work like little men. They go to school only about three months a year, and study a little at home. I try to teach my children the necessity and importance of being able to earn an honest living. I would like to see my children win fame and fortune, but above all I want them to be rich in all those noble qualities that go to make up true manhood and womanhood.

I am glad to assure you that the people generally are much more Liberal-minded than they used to be, but in our present depressed financial condition it is too great a sacrifice for them to subscribe for almost any kind of a paper. Next year I expect to send you several subscribers.

Yours for truth, A. D. STRICKLAND.

Threatening Aspect of Chnrch Action.

DENNISON, O., Nov. 20, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The election is over and the country is safe (?) for four years at least, and now we can take time to look at other things. The triumphers had the last "blow-out" of the season here last night in the snow.

I hav only recently arrived in Ohio from Oregon, and I see the lines between Catholicism and Protestantism are being very closely drawn, and the relations between the two sects are in danger of open rupture, which is sure to come sooner or later unless some unforeseen event occurs to ward it off. The result in Wisconsin and Illinois shows more plainly than elsewhere what is being done. The gravity of the situation cannot be overestimated, and the time is near at hand when we will be compelled to take sides in this controversy if we hav not already done so, and we should study the situation before doing so and take the right side.

A comparativly new secret order in this section is becoming very activ, and cut quite a figure in the late election, and they are so secret that they hav no regular place of meeting.

The legislation enacted in regard to closing the World's Fair on Sunday has given the Sabbatarian fanatics encouragement to ask for more; and rest assured they will ask it, too, and keep asking for more, like Oliver.

The daily papers report the president-elect as attending a meeting of Catholic dignitaries, and can we expect any redress or to hav things go better than before? The signs of the times say No!

Messrs. Putnam and Charlesworth hav a good idea, and if it can be carried out I feel sure that in 1896 the Freethought Federation will be able to do something. But the old-party men must expect to sacrifice something, to giv up old-party traditions. But if we expect to accomplish anything we must expect to sacrifice a great deal. Yours for liberty and justice,

W. D. McCURDY.

Mormons and Gentiles Petition.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, Nov. 18, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: As a constant reader of your most valuable paper I feel justified in asking a little space in which to say a few words regarding the closing of the World's Fair on Sundays. I hav cut your petition out of each number of THE TRUTH SEEKER and am engaged in circulating it among the workingmen of this city, and especially among the members of the typographical union, and will say that I am meeting with flattering success in securing signatures. I shall endeavor to place it in every place where men are employed, as I consider that it covers the ground better than any other which has come under my notice. Let every Freethinking member of our Union use his influence, and sign this petition, and we will surprise the country by the vast number of Freethinkers among the "intelligent compositors" of this country. But do not stop there! Work with every workingman and help the good cause along, and we will send in a protest that will cause our good and holy Congressmen to stop and think that there are a few of us left in this country who are not Christians and who do not propose to hav our rights as American citizens trampled in the dust. For myself, I shall send in several hundred signatures from this city, and hope to be able to secure a thousand; and every one of them genuin—no dead people will be on the list. Liberals, wake up and fight for your rights! You hav submitted long enough to priestly dictation and the time has come to call a halt. Mormondom will do her share in this fight for justice.

As a means of compelling the daily press to take up our fight in this matter I think it would be a good idea, in all states where Sunday-closing laws are in effect, to arrest all editors and employees of Sunday papers for violating those laws, and prosecute them until they come to the conclusion that Sunday laws are a nuisance and an outrage, and take up our fight against them and work for their repeal. They would not hold out very long.

An Honorable Life and Dreadless Death.

Nov. 20, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Perry Plumb was born in Jefferson county, N. Y., July 15, 1848; died at Danbury, Neb., Oct. 3, 1892.

Mr. Plumb enlisted in the 35th regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, served three years, and was honorably discharged March 15, 1865. Came to Nebraska and settled in Homestead, in Red Willow county, in 1872. He leaves a wife and six children. His death was sudden and unexpected, he being kicked by a horse Friday morning and dying Monday morning. Neither his physicians nor his friends regarded his hurts as necessarily fatal until within a few hours of dissolution.

Mr. Plumb was recognized by everyone who knew him or had dealings with him as the soul of honor. His word was as good as his bond. He was "Uncle Perry" to all the younger generation of his community. His funeral attendance was evidence of the worth, esteem, and love in which he was held by the whole community. Some there may hav been who doubted his election to association with angels in another world, from the fact that he did not believe; but not one who doubted his right to stand in this world among the noblest and best, because he was honest. Mr. Plumb was the recognized leader of our Freethought movement in Red Willow county. Every year he set apart a sum of money which was put into Liberal literature and this literature was put into circulation in his neighborhood. His funeral was purely secular, and while it undoubtedly shocked some, it proved a salutary lesson to those, so plentiful in all communities, who had predicted that while what they termed "Infidelity" "would do to liv by it would not do to die by." He did not waver or weaken in presence of that "shadow who holds the key to all the creeds."

May the shadow which has fallen over the home where he left his wife and little ones be lightened by the reflection that

When he passed he walked erect,
Nor bowed to servil fear or fcrm.

Another Kind of Greek Catholics.

HAZLETON, PA., Nov. 27, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In your last issue you answer an inquiry concerning the "Greek Catholics," but you speak of the "Greek Schismatics," so called. The Ohio man meant the "United Greeks," who, here in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, New Jersey, etc., are popularly called "Greek Catholics;" but they are not those whom you mean. These are the Ruthenians from northern Hungary and Galicia, and hav their churches and priests in a number of places (some twenty-three) in Pennsylvania, Ohio, etc. Their priests are, with one or two exceptions, all decent young fellows, Hungarians, personal friends of mine, and supporters of our paper. The Irish priests hate them, although they are Roman Catholics so far as dogmas and the pope are concerned, but they marry and hav their liturgy in the Ruthenian language (sometimes they say mass in Hungarian). They are dreaded by the Catholic bishops for their married priests, a standing danger for the unmarried Latin priests. If you look up the history of the Florentine synod, 1648, you will see that a part of the Greek church has accepted the union with Rome, acknowledged the supremacy of the pope, the "Filioque," etc., but kept Byzantine ritual, vernacular language in ceremonies, and marriage of the priests. They hav several bishoprics in Hungary and some five hundred thousand souls. They hav now a controversy with Rome, for these bishops object to their being here; but the Hungarian government is backing them, coaxing the pope not to listen. Our (Hungarian) interest is, that they should be as they are, or else, if they are pushed, they will fall away to the Russians, our mortal enemy, while their present priests are thorough, patriotic Hungarians. It would not do to hav half a million Russians in our country, so we stand by them and insist that the pope should keep himself, and make the American bishops keep, the sanctions of the council of Florence. This much concerning the "Greek Catholics." They hav a church in Brooklyn, in Leonard street, where the pastor is Rev. Eugene Volkay, also a friend of mine, and another is here in Hazleton.

Attractiv Miscellany.

HURON, O., Nov. 20, E. M. 292.

MR. EDITOR: I rent a little house on Berlin street, where I hang THE TRUTH SEEKER up on the glass door every week. Some ask me where I get that paper and how much it costs. I tell them. I am like Banquo's ghost, never will down! He that puts his hand to the plow and looks back is not fit for the job.

I heard a lady say to some of our Catholic friends the other day: "You hav got Ireland, you hav taken England, now you want America [Columbian Exposition]. You are never satisfied!"

If there is a God, he has endowed Our Bob with a brain that is past all the clergy's understanding.

Has Watson Heston inborn ideas?

Men of this world, wherever you may be Freethinkers are your best friends.

To the ladies: Those of you who think "our minister" is such a nice man, and boarding-house butter will not melt in his mouth, you are greatly mistaken, and those that seek early will find.

I hav sought, fought, and found. For myself, I can snap my finger at the foemen's taunts.

I often read pieces in THE TRUTH SEEKER which I could answer, but being financially embarrassed, I hav to devote my time where I can make the most.

To the clergy: Dear beloved in the Lord, when you get far enough advanced to realize that what you preach is not the word of God, drop it as you would a hot potato, and go forward and tell the people what you think or believe. And if you will not do that, come as near to it as you can. For I will say that the clergy are greatly responsible for a great deal of trouble that has happened in this world. And I would not hav you ignorant of these things. There is a day coming when you will hav to quit your soul-saving racket and work for things visible. What is the use of all the time talking about trying to do their souls good? Why do you not try to do their body some good?

Here endeth the first lesson. Selah.

THOMAS GODDARD.

A Freethought Paper for Children.

VINELAND, N. J., Nov. 6, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Elmina D. Slenker, of Snowville, Pulaski county, Va., one of the greatest, smartest, and most intelligent writers of all the women in the world, has started a paper for children called the Little Freethinker. It is printed at Hastings, Mich., once in two weeks, at fifty cents a year. This paper has been needed to keep the children of Liberals out of sectarian Sabbath-schools, where very little is taught except bigotry, superstition, ignorance, and prejudice. Yes, ignorance and prejudice are taught there, and here is proof of it. I hav a little pamphlet, "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," containing two hundred and eighty-eight passages from the Bible, and if one-half of these passages are true they prove every one of the other half to be absolute lies. The other day I handed this book to a young man who is considered smart for business and holds a leading place among those that hav charge of a railroad. He read a few passages and saw that each one contradicted the one before it, and handed the book back with apparent scorn and contempt, saying it was the work of Ingersoll—notwithstanding chapter and verse of the Bible was given at the close of every passage. There are ignorance, bigotry, and blindness for you. And he got it all from the Sabbath-school. I repeated two of these contradictory passages to a man who owns a large, costly, gold-bound Bible, and asked him which was true. He replied, "They are both true." "How can both be true when one absolutely contradicts the other?" "Because they were written by inspiration," he replied. He has been taught in the Sabbath-school that the Bible was written by inspiration, and when he read that God is love he believed that, when he read that God has a hell of fire and brimstone in which he roasts people eternally without permitting them to die because their great-grandmother stole an apple before they were born he believed that, because both were written by inspiration. Nine-tenths of all the pious people I hav conversed with for the last fifty years are just as ignorant as these two men.

If you want to keep your children free from such trash keep them out of the Sabbath-school and giv them Elmina's paper to read. Adults will find more than their money's worth of inspiration in the paper, and children, besides being benefited by it, can do a great deal of good by reading it to their young companions. Every family that has a child ought to take her paper. JEREMIAH HACKER.

Historical Retrospect.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Nov. 12, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Are mankind going ahead or astern? It is not unusual to hear and read the assertion that in proportion as the Christian religion declines and disappears and Liberalism takes its place, mankind deteriorates in morals and society grows worse and worse. This argument seems to us to be of a piece with that which we heard advanced a few days since as we were having a conversation with a member of the church. After denouncing Atheism and Infidelity as the rock on which the American republic is to strike, be wrecked, and go down, before long, he added, "You can see for yourself how the Sunday is desecrated here in New York." "In what respect," I inquired, "or wherein is the observance of Sunday in this city becoming more injurious under the influence of Liberalism than religion?" "Why!" said he, with great surprise, "don't you know that the museum is open on Sunday, and, worse , that bands of music play on the common on that holy day?" And this is conclusiv evidence to the poor, benighted son of the church that New York is bound for the bad about as fast as she can go! As if it is wrong or criminal to read a useful book in a library on Sunday or listen to music at such time! An idea so strange and preposterous almost makes one think that he who entertains it must hav "eaten of the insane root that takes the reason prisoner."

But we are digressing, and so we return to the great question with which I started, "Are mankind going ahead or astern?" Were another inroad of barbarians possible, and Europe and America overrun by millions of savages, a return to superstition and blind credulity might perhaps be probable, and Macaulay's New Zealander sitting on the ruins of Brooklyn bridge might become a reality. But, thanks to Liberalism! our modern civilization is so essentially different from that of ancient times that future historians will hardly be called upon to indite long chapters on its decline and fall. The theological system received a blow by the Reformation the severity of which was not greatly felt at first. It took decades, generations, and even centuries to do the work, and even now to-day the revolution commenced by Martin Luther, Zuingle, and their bold coadjutors who broke the chain of ecclesiastical oppression and proclaimed freedom of conscience to a captiv world is still going forward in its conquering march. For revolution here means progress, and progress is never final. The great voyages at sea which men were compelled to make owing to the important discoveries of Columbus and Vasco de Gama developed knowledge of an entirely different character from that of the ancients, of which the ecclesiastics were almost the sole possessors during the Middle Ages. This new kind of knowledge could not be learned from men who during their lifetime were secluded in cloisters, who did not mingle with the world, who undertook voyages neither by sea nor by land, and who consequently were ignorant of what in our days almost any schoolboy knows. The ecclesiastic might be able to invent a good plan for building a church, but it was not to be expected that he should giv a plan for building a ship designed to cross the ocean, nor for the mariner's compass, the printing-press, steam-engin, plow, loom, railroad, electric telegraph, etc. The wonders of the New World, its botany and zoology; the study of astronomy, geology, chemistry, meteorology, and other sciences, all called for new teachers, and as they could not be found among the ecclesiastics they had to be looked for in the ranks of the laity, and thus it happened that the clergy began to lose their control over the educational interest of the people. But here also the theological spirit made a determined resistance. Astronomy and geology were singled out for attacks because their demonstrations were in direct opposition to the tradition of the Bible. Philosophy, however, had to bear the brunt of the battle, and so to this day men like Voltaire, Hume, Gibbon, D'Holbach, Paine, Bolingbroke, Volney, etc., and many others of more modern date, are reproached and vilified by the ecclesiastics on account of their opinions and persecuted as far as the clergy hav the power in that direction. The principles of freedom of conscience, of inquiry through speech and the press, toleration, the right of private judgment, and the importance and necessity of Universal Mental Liberty, were not recognized in the ancient times when the Age of Faith ruled and scourged humanity as they are in the modern days when the Age of Reason is supplanting bigotry, superstition, priestcraft, and their long train of evils. Therefore this is good evidence that the human race is improving, and when in addition we remember the great advancement that has been made within the last three centuries in regard to science, art, government, law, moral and social reform, education, peace, and other secular blessings, we may safely reply to our question that mankind are going ahead rather than astern, and to-day are wiser, better, and happier than they ever were before. CHAS. ENOWITZ.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Short Sermon.

Children who read my lay,
This much I hav to say:
Each day and every day
Do what is right;
Right things in great and small;
Then, though the sky should fall,
Sun, moon, and stars, and all,
You shall hav light.

This further I would say:
Be you tempted though you may,
Each day and every day
Speak what is true—
True things in great and small;
Then, though the sky should fall,
Sun, moon, and stars, and all,
Heaven would show through.

Figs, as you see and know,
Do not from thistles grow;
And though the blossoms blow
White on the tree,
Grapes never, never yet
On the limbs of thorns were set,
So, if you good would get,
Good you must be.

Life's journey through and through,
Speak what is just and true,
Doing what's right to do
Unto one and all,
When you work and when you play,
Each day and every day;
Then peace shall gild your way,
Though the sky should fall.

Fanny's Lesson.

Fanny Selby was a pert young miss, ten years of age. She was a highly imaginativ girl, as well as a careless and forgetful one. She was very fond of flowers, and she had a flower-garden all by herself. But she often forgot to water her plants. One scorching hot day, as she was strolling around on the lawn, she thought she heard a great murmuring of voices. It proceeded from her flower-garden. All of the flowers began to talk at once. They cried out, "Oh, Fanny, do come as quickly as you can, and giv us some water, or we shall all die with thirst!" And her great purple canterbury bells, as they swayed in the soft breeze, began to toll their bells, for the heat was so intense they supposed a great many of the plants had died. She ran with her watering-pot to the fountain and filled it. She soon returned, and gave them all the water they wanted. And she made a promis to them that for the future she would try not to forget them, but be more attentiv to their wants. The last thing in the garden to claim her attention was a rose bush. There was just one rose blossoming on the top of the bush. As she stood there admiring the beauty and fragrance of the flower, she noticed that on another branch just underneath the rose were two tiny buds. One of them began to talk up quite smartly, and considering his youth, made a very able speech. It said: "O lovely rose, acknowledged by all to be queen of the flowers. I do not envy your majesty, if you do fill so exalted a position and every passer-by exclaims at your beauty and fragrance. You hav had so many compliments bestowed upon you it is not to be wondered at that you are vain and haughty. And I am sorry to say that with all your beauty you are exceedingly cruel. Do you know that your thorns scratch terribly? For the last hour you hav been jabbing your thorns through the top of my head, and I feel as though my scalp was completely torn off. And my little twin sister here at my side tells me that you hav ripped one side of her face open, and she fears that she can never expand into a perfect rose. And as for myself I do not expect to amount to anything in this world with the top of my head gone." The queen replied that she was fond of compliments, and it was a great pleasure to her to be admired by everyone. She owned that she was vain of her beauty and so full of vainglory thinking so much about herself that it made her forgetful of the little buds; but she did not mean to be cruel, and she felt sorry that she had injured them, and promised for the future she would be more careful of her thorns. The queen with all her faults was tender-hearted, and with the most infinit grace the lovely "queen of flowers" leaned forward, and pressing her rosy fragrant lips to the little buds they were instantly healed. The reconciliation was full and complete. From that hour those tiny buds throve wonderfully, and in process of time developed into beautiful and perfect roses. They were always extremely careful of their thorns, and tried not to pierce any of the little buds that came within their reach. Fanny watered the rose bush, and then went into the house to tell her aunt of the wonderful conversation that she had heard. "Well," said her aunt, "that is just the lesson that you need, for do you know that you carry about with you some very sharp thorns?" "Why, Aunt Nancy, you must be joking! Surely you don't mean what you say. Place your hands on me and see if you can feel any thorns." "No, I am not joking," said her aunt, "and it is not necessary for me to place my hands upon you to discover your thorns. You remember last week when your friends and schoolmates were going on an excursion to Lake Pearl, at the eleventh hour, you were taken ill and had to stay at home. What girl was it that hoped there would come a pouring rain, so that her young friends might be deprived of the pleasure of going to the picnic? Was it our Fanny or was it some other girl?" Fanny hung her head and got very red in the face, but she said nothing, for she knew she deserved her aunt's rebuke. "And," continued her aunt, "your unhappy temper is one of your sharp thorns; pluck it out, the sooner the better, or else you will be made very miserable by it. Yesterday you spoke cross and unkind words to your sister. Alice is very sensitiv—she did not answer you back, but I noticed that her lips quivered and her eyes filled with tears. There is another sharp thorn, for your tongue is as sharp as a brier. Guard that member carefully, or you will make many enemies for yourself, and you will be shunned by everyone as being an unamiable girl." Fanny told her aunt that she was not aware that she had any such sharp thorns, and, said she, "I will make you the same promis, auntie, that the rose made to the little buds; for the future I will endeavor to keep a bright lookout for my thorns, so that people will hav no cause for complaint against me." "I hope you will keep your promis," said Aunt Nancy, "and then that lesson given to you by the queen of the flowers will not hav been in vain." MIRIAM.

Chats With Correspondents.

DAMON.—You ask if Liberals should observe Christmas and giv gifts at that time. Well, Christmas as a holiday is good enough, and anyone may observe it as the close of the year and the gathering in of the harvests. Its only significance to us is in the light in which it was regarded by the pagans, who in many things were far superior to Christians who hav turned the old festivals into false channels. As to gifts, we should not make them by the clock or calendar but when the spirit moves us, or we are inclined to remember our friends. The holiday season may be as well observed by us as others. As to gifts, a good book never comes amiss, and THE TRUTH SEEKER catalog is a fine one to select from. Also see list advertised in THE TRUTH SEEKER as especially appropriate for gifts. We ought always to patronize our own folks before strangers.

JOHN L. D.—"Shall a fellow knock another fellow down when he insults him?" you ask. Not necessarily. Better treat him with silent contempt, or answer him according to what he says, in a few stinging words. But if he strikes you with his hand, you hav a right to defend yourself. Stand up for your rights, but do not fight unless it is unavoidable. Always be a gentleman.

ROSALIND.—Yes, use your reason about every subject. Read, that you may answer your critics. A well-informed mind is a jewel of great value.

BESSIE DUNTON.—You ask if the Editor of the Corner loves little children. Certainly, Bessie, she loves them as the purest, brightest, sweetest creatures on earth. When she dies she asks no other epitaph than this: "She loved little children."

KATIE AND HARRY B.—You wish to know if it is wise for boys and girls to be known as Liberals. Why, of course. They are to be the future men and women to take up the work of the world and carry it on successfully and truly. If they begin as Liberals and grow up in the truth of Liberalism, the world will know them for brave and true men and women. The noblest men and women who hav ever lived, the best men and women of to-day, were and are Liberals. Be good, just, wise, and fearless at all times and in all places. Be sure you are a Liberal, giv the reasons why, and then stand by your colors.

A FRIEND writes: "I hav just finished reading two of your books—'Apples of Gold' and 'All In a Lifetime.' They are both so good. I never read anything in that line that pleased me better." Thanks for your appreciation and commendation.

Correspondence.

MANHATTAN, MONT., Nov. 4, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I was glad to see my letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I take the Little Freethinker. I think it is very good. I hope you had a nice time on the ocean. I am glad you are home, because you write such nice pieces in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is nearly dinner time and I must stop, wishing you will build THE TRUTH SEEKER up grander.

Yours and always your Liberal friend,
ARCH GRAHAM.

FALL RIVER, MASS., Nov. 20, 1892.

DEAR SUSIE: I hope you are well. Ella Chase was sick yesterday. I didn't know she was sick. I took a little girl out yesterday, and saw her up at the window; I asked her to come over, but she told me that she was sick. Irene came over to-day and said she was better, and we were glad. I like Miss Wilson for a teacher very much, and sometimes she is funny. I will tell you how I stood in examination. Well, I stood 90 in spelling, 72 in geography, 90 in arithmetic, 63.3 in language, and 78.5 in average. I didn't think I should stand so high. The lowest one was language. In deportment I had "good." I got two checks, and that's all, I think, I bad.

Next Sunday night we are going to hav a meeting. I go to dancing school every Tuesday night, and next Thursday afternoon Mr. Davoll is going to hav a sunlight party and I am going. Mamma is going to wash my white dress and fix it all right.

Good-bye. Giv my love to all.

From EDNA.

P.S.—I hav not written this letter very well. E.

ATCHISON, KAN., Nov. 17, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: While I hav a few moments to spare I will present them by writing to the Children's Corner.

Well, it has begun to look like winter again. We awoke this morning and found about two inches of snow on the ground, but it is raining now, so I guess it will not stay on very long. We are living in Atchison now. I like the city much better than the country. There are a great many Freethinkers in this city. They are talking of organizing a society here, which, I think, would be quite an organization. I don't suppose they would allow them to meet on Sundays; but I think they hav as good a right as those who attend church, and a great deal more so. I am spending most of my time on my violin now. I am going in the orchestra here before long. I hav composed another piece of music for the piano. "Edith Idylle" is the title of it. It is named for some one that is very important—that is, to my notion. Well, as my letter is growing monotonous, I will close for this time.

Congratulating you on your safe return home, I remain, Your Liberal friend,
JOHN J. I. REMSBURG.

BOOKS

BY

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS),

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.
Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."
In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

DID JESUS RISE FROM THE DEAD?

The evidence for the resurrection is in this book carefully considered, and found wanting. It ought to convince every Christian of the untruthfulness of this alleged miracle, for it is certainly one of the best essays ever written on the subject.
In paper, 25 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science.
In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE and OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin
In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Licentiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Absolution; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Liguori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attempts at Continency even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism.
In paper, 25 cents.

News of the Week.

FAMIN has reappeared in Russia.

TALMAGE continues to laud the czar and his government.

RAILROADS say they will during the World's Fair reduce rates on slow trains twenty per cent, but on fast trains not at all.

THE negroes of Plainfield, N. J., remained day and night on a mountain expecting the comet, praying and singing. An evangelist had great success.

A PITTSBURGH banker closed his testimony before the Homestead investigating committee by saying: "The growing evil of the time is class legislation."

"COMMODORE" TRUE, a negro of Hiawatha, Kan., who had killed a friend, as the lynchers' noose was adjusted cried, "Well, boys, I'll meet you in heaven."

A GIRL of the Eskimo village at the World's Fair grounds who had never seen black men was frightened into a sickness by one's entering her tent, she thinking him the devil.

THE Boston aldermen hav constituted themselvs a board of censors of public printing by enacting that all theatrical posters shall be submitted to them before they can be displayed publicly.

GERMAN anti-Semites hav prepared a program of the demand they will make of the government for "the exclusion from places to which authority is attached of all persons not professing some distinctly Christian creed."

PRIEST REYNOLDS, of Bellows Falls, Vt., on entering his church found his wine gone but his silverware left, with this note: "Most holy father, God made your wine, so I will take a bottle. The devil made your jewelry, and so I leave it with best wishes.—Burglar."

AT Kingston, Ont., a Salvation Army funeral passing a Roman Catholic institution was hooted, and pelted with sticks and stones, by the pupils, while one of the Christian brothers looked on without interfering in the least. The occurrence may be brought to court.

STEPHEN HITE, a murderer hanged at Louisville on the 9th, was a Protestant and had been married by a Protestant clergyman. Before execution he had the marriage ceremony reperformed in the ritual of the Catholic church, to which his wife belonged, and himself and child received into that body.

MRS. HERZ, a Protestant woman of Bavaria, has been awarded small damages for slander of her boy by Father Aurelian, who declared that the youth had been possessed by a devil. He called several priests as witnesses, testified that he had exorcised a devil from the boy, and cited the writings of the Christian fathers.

BUCK OLSEN was hanged on the 1st at Dorchester, N. B., for murdering a constable. On the scaffold the priest said that Buck hoped for forgivness, as he had just forgiven everybody. After prayers Buck kissed the crucifix and said, "May God forgiv me." Priest Goudett cried, "Go to heaven!" and the drop fell.

A MEMBER of the Plymouth church council says: "I am sick and tired of giving to the American Board of Missions to aid in supporting missionaries who believe out and out in the damnation of all the heathen. I am tired of the whole miserable humbug, and I won't giv a cent to spread the news of damnation."

AT a meeting of the Eastern Amateur Press Association, Editor Ogden of the Long Island Philatelist said that after he had long endeavored bootlessly to hav his journal entered as second-class mail matter he published a very favorable notice of Wanamaker's Book News, whereupon his publication was admitted to the desired rates.

AN English court has unseated an anti-Parnellite member of Parliament from Ireland because of clerical intimidation of electors. In delivering the decision Mr. Justice O'Brien said that the whole organization of the Catholic church was thrown into the electoral contest. Every priest was a canvasser, on the altar, at the electors' houses, and everywhere else.

JAY GOULD died of consumption on the 2d. He left $60,000,000 to $100,000,000. He was a church-goer, but never spoke of religion. His charities always were small, except to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. Inveighers against capitalists distinguish him as especially bad, saying that while the operations begetting the Astor and Vanderbilt fortunes benefited the people more or less, Gould's work did not do so at all but was purely predatory and in no degree creativ.

Waifs and Wanderings, A New American Story. Price, cloth, $1.00; paper, 50 cents. "A prose epic of the war, rich with incident and dramatic power; breezy from first page to last with the living spirit of to-day."—[John Swinton's Paper.

Golden Throne, A Romance. "The author certainly has genius. The divine creative spark is within him. The book is filled with manly thoughts, expressed in manly words—the transcript of a manly mind. Every Liberal should read 'Golden Throne.'" —[Ingersoll. Price, $1.

Ingersoll and Jesns. A conversation in rhyme between the Nineteenth Century Infidel and the Galilean Reformer, wherein it is shown there is much in harmony between them. Price, 10 cents.

Adami and Heva. A poetic version of the Indian story of the Garden of Eden in which its superiority to the mutilated copy—the Genesis legend—is shown. Price, 10 cents.

Inquirendo Island. A novel. By Hudor Genone. 12mo, 353 pages; cloth, $1; paper, 50c. "This book is to me a delightful surprise. In my judgment it is a stronger piece of fiction than Edward Bellamy's 'Looking Backward,' which at times it reminds one of. It is a merciless exposure of Pharisaism and hypocrisy, which is so prevalent in fashionable Christianity of to-day. It is a good book, and while it will offend many, should be read by all."—[The Arena.

The Morals of Christ. A comparison with the contemporaneous systems of Mosaic, Pharisaic, and Græco-Roman ethics. By Austin Bierbower. Paper, 16mo, 200 pages, 50c.; cloth, $1. "Mr. Bierbower has carefully analyzed the old-world ethical systems which chiefly concern the modern civilized world, and in this book he has so classified the elements revealed by that analysis as to give them a high scientific value. His book is almost as systematic as a treatise upon one of the exact sciences, and stands in fine contrast to the rambling, ethical discussion of which we hear so much and which leads us nowhere."—[Chicago Daily News.

Liberty and Life. Seventeen discourses on the applications of scientific truth to morals and religion. By E. P. Powell. 12mo, 208 pages; cloth, $1; paper, 50c. "Strong, even bold, essays on ethical and religious subjects. They are the work of a man of vigorous intellect, who has studied the doctrine of evolution long and carefully, and has not found it necessary to abandon all his old reverences. The discourses are full of interest to the casual reader by reason of their fund of anecdote and biographical citation, and to the seeker for religious and moral truth they offer many helps."—[Literary World.

Evolution and Christianity. A Study. By J. C. F. Grumbine. Cloth, square 18mo, 75 pages, 30c. "Mr. Grumbine's statements are sound and well put. His book is the fruit of wide reading and investigation. It is a helpful one, is thoroughly interesting reading, and its presentation of the relation between evolution and Christianity includes much valuable thought."—[Buffalo Express.

A Physician's Sermon to Young Men. By Dr. W. Pratt. Price, 25 cents. Prof. R. A. Proctor, the well-known English astronomer, says of it: "Through false delicacy lads and youths are left to fall into trouble, and not a few have their prospects of a healthy happy life absolutely ruined. The little book before us is intended to be put into the hands of young men by fathers who are unwilling or incapable of discharging a father's duty in this respect; and as not one father in ten is, we believe, ready to do what is right by his boys himself, it is well that such a book as this should be available. If it is read by all who should read it, its sale will be counted by hundreds of thousands." The publisher will send 10 copies by mail, postpaid, for $2. Should anyone desire them by the 100 or 1,000 they can make satisfactory terms by correspondence.

Gems of Thought.

I LOVE people of worth; but bigots I hate, and I fear rogues who govern fools. —Voltaire.

THE owners of the world are those who strongly desire to own; and this is the only trait common to them all.—Parton.

IT was Voltaire who sowed the seeds of liberty in the heart and brain of Franklin, of Jefferson and Thomas Paine.—Ingersoll.

How truly noble is he whom neither honors nor disgrace can cause to deviate for an instant from a perfect and proper course.—Chinese author.

I PREFER an immoral people to a fanatical people; for immoral masses are not vexatious, while fanatical masses stupefy the world, and a stupid world ceases to interest me; I prefer to see it die.—Renan.

SHAMS and delusions are esteemed for soundest truths, while reality is fabulous. If men would steadily observe realities only, and not allow themselves to be deluded, life, to compare it with such things as we know, would be like a fairy tale and the Arabian Nights' Entertainments.—Thoreau.

IF one man conquer in battle a thousand times a thousand men, and if another conquer himself, he is the greatest of conquerors. One's own self, conquered, is better than all other people; not even a god could change into defeat the victory of a man who has vanquished himself, and always livs under restraint. By oneself the evil is done, by oneself one suffers, by oneself evil is left undone, by oneself one is purified. Purity and impurity belong to oneself; no one can purify another.—Buddhistic Scriptures.

THE rocks show that both animal and plant life hav developed gradually from lower to higher forms, from the simple structures in the earliest ages to the most varied and elaborate organisms of the present. If the special-creation theory is true, and each order of life was made at once, we should find all the ranks of each order in the rocks of one period; whereas, the lower forms always come before the higher, proving conclusively that no race or species has been made all at once, and that the forms of life hav not degenerated as under a curse, but that the course of nature is an onward march of progress. "Of special creations the rocks tell no tale."—Robt. C. Adams.

WHY, who makes much of a miracle!
As to me I know of nothing else but miracles,
Whether I walk the streets of Manhattan,
Or dart my sight over the roofs of houses toward the sky,
Or wade with naked feet along the beach just in the edge of the water,
Or stand under trees in the woods,
Or talk by day with any one I love, or sleep in the bed at night with anyone I love,
Or sit at table at dinner with the rest,
Or look at strangers opposit me riding in the car,
Or watch honey-bees busy around the hive of a summer forenoon,
Or animals feeding in the fields,
Or birds, or the wonderfulness of insects in the air,
Or the wonderfulness of the sundown, or of stars shining so quiet and bright,
Or the exquisit delicate thin curve of the new moon in spring;
These, with the rest, one and all, are to me miracles.—Walt Whitman.

A DYING NORSEMAN.
A.D. 1037.

What can these new gods giv me?
I hav Odin and Thor,
Odin, the wise old father;
Great Thor, the mighty in war.
There are gods enough in Valhalla,
And to me they ever gave ear;
Speak no more of your white Christ,
We want no strange gods here.
This new god, he cannot giv me
Once more the arm of the strong,
Strong arm that hath failed me never,
Though the fight were stubborn and long.
Can he giv me again the glory of youth?
Go down with me to the sea,
And harry the shores of Britain?
Ah! never more shall I see
The white sails spreading their wings,
Each spring as we left our home,
And day by day drew southward—
I can almost feel the foam.

. . . . . .

But now all is past and over,
I know that naught can avail.
The gods in Valhalla hav spoken.
I go; and your white Christ pale,
He cannot bring back for one instant
The glorious days that are past.
Then why should I turn from Odin and Thor,
And be false as a woman at last?
—Florence Peacock in the Academy.

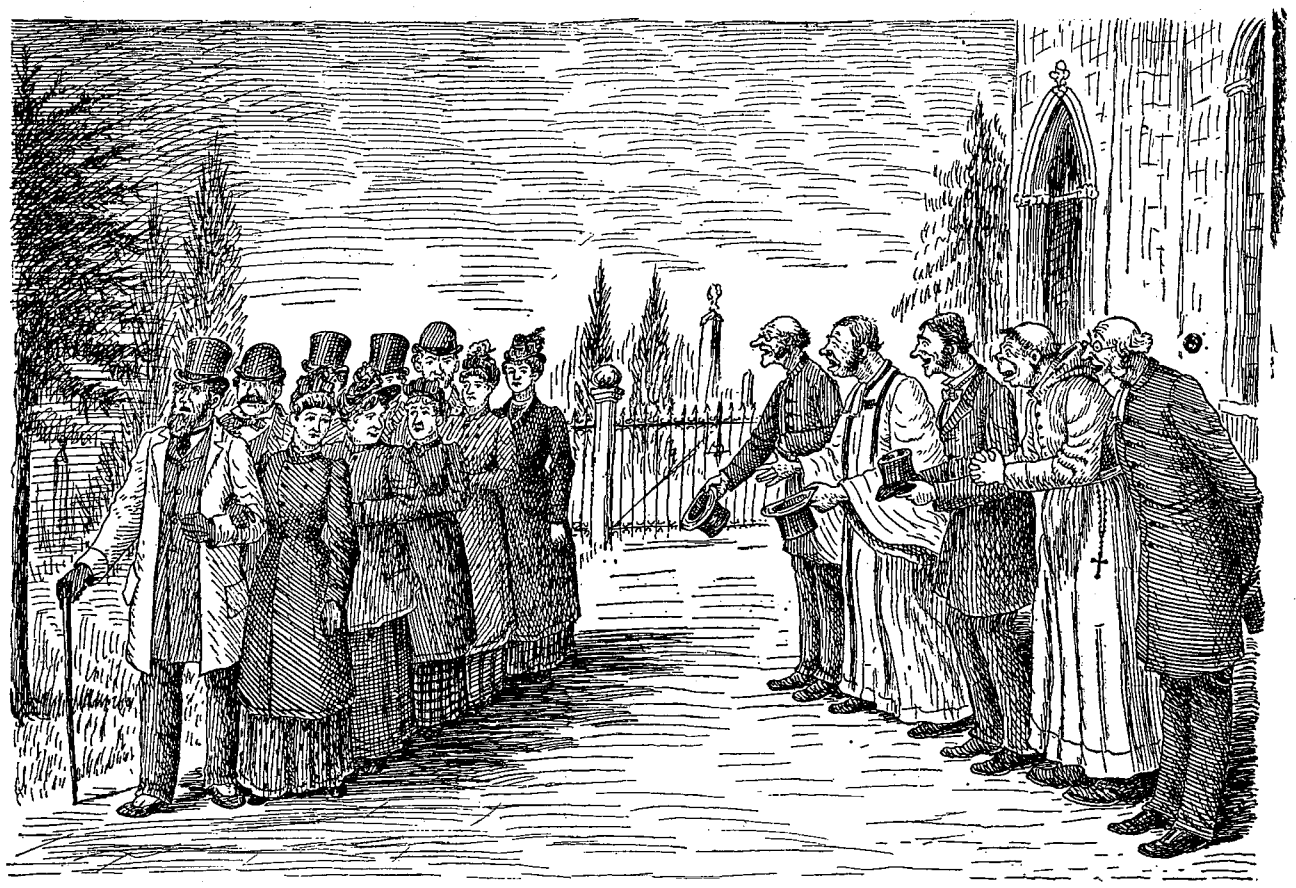
THE NOTED SPECIALIST,



For Men Only,

Is a physician of a wide and extensive practice, and his remedies are of the best. The Doctor treats all those peculiar diseases of young and middle-aged men, as the result of youthful errors and excesses, causing Early Decay, Loss of Manhood, Wasting Discharges, Varicocele, Mental and Physical Debility, Idiocy, Insanity, and Death.

To those afflicted and who are desirous of being cured a booklet of some 33 pages will be sent to their address for ten cents, sealed in a plain envelope, giving causes and Symptoms of the Complaint and a description of the Doctor's important medical discovery—an Outward Application—a positive cure—the only remedy of the kind in existence—with evidences of success.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's
ARGUMENT
IN THE
Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,
At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

BIBLE MYTHS;

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Heathen Illustration of the Temptation.]

The Bundehesh (a sacred book of the Persians,) states that Ahuramazda after creating the first man and woman, Mashya and Mashyana, bade them "to be humble of heart; to observe the law; to be pure in their thoughts, pure in their speech, pure in their actions." But an evil demon came to them in the form of a Serpent, sent by Ahriman, the prince of devils, and gave them fruit of a wonderful tree, which imparted immortality. Evil inclinations then entered their hearts, and all their moral excellence was destroyed. Consequently they fell, and forfeited the eternal happiness for which they were destined. They killed beasts, and clothed themselves in their skins.

BIBLE MYTHS shows this to be the origin of the Hebrew story.

Christianity on Comets.

While the apparition of the present comet is fresh in the minds of men, it may be well for us to lay before them a sketch of the theory of such heavenly bodies held by former generations. During the preceding fifteen centuries, about, Christianity has molded the teaching on this matter, as on all others. If people are shown the absurdity of that religion's teachings on this point, they may be led to suspect that her teachings are equally absurd on other points.

Before the rise of Christianity, the scientific spirit whose growth had begun in the Roman empire had brought forth the germs of a true doctrin of meteorology. In the writings of Pliny the historian and Lucretius the Materialistic philosopher we find implications that unusual heavenly phenomena are not tokens from supernatural powers, but occurrences of a natural origin. Seneca expresses this opinion, and predicts the bringing of comets under natural law, still more explicitly.

But with the rise of Christianity these gleams of light on the subject were extinguished. Naturalism was rapidly overlaid and forgotten under the supernaturalism of Christ. Under the pernicious influence of this personage the world rapidly grew to devote its entire energy and time to the task of discovering supernatural causes for every event. Soon elaborate supernaturalistic doctrins were constructed in regard to meteors—otherwise called shooting-stars—and eclipses, and comets. Of these three classes of rare and seemingly lawless phenomena, the first-mentioned, meteors or shooting-stars, was the only one that received a favorable interpretation. The fathers of the Christian church placed upon these apparitions constructions that were various, but all kindly. Origen pronounced shooting-stars living beings endowed with souls, citing the Song of the Three Children, a piece of literature which missed acceptance to the canon of the scripture but is retained in the Anglican liturgy. Other fathers believed them to be propelled by the hands of angels. Philo Judæus thought them beneficent spirits.

Eclipses, however, we find regarded somewhat differently. They were held to express the grief of Nature at calamities occurring to the human race. So late as the time of Charles I., an eclipse was supposed to manifest the distress of Nature at the execution of that monarch. Nothing would do the famous New England divine Increase Mather at the death of his godly friend President Chauncey of Harvard College but that Nature should lament the demise by token of an eclipse that befell at that date in Massachusetts.

The doctrin of shooting-stars was, as we hav seen, of such a nature as to do comparativly but a moderate amount of harm; and the opinion on eclipses, though more gloomy, was not more injurious; but far otherwise was the doctrin of comets. This doctrin for centuries disrupted the course of industry with notions of the approaching end of the world, fortified the structure of supernatural belief, drew mankind farther than ever under the dominion of ecclesiasticism, dulled their spirit of self-help, fattened the priests both belly and coffer, shook nations with terror, bred persecutions of heretics whose misbelief had called forth the skyey portents, and contributed to the torture and execution of so-called witches in uncounted number.

This ecclesiastical doctrin as to comets was that each is a huge ball of fire flung by an enraged God to warn mankind. The fathers of the infant church committed themselvs unreservedly to this conception. Origen stated that comets prefigure "catastrophes and the downfall of empires and worlds." Tertullian taught that "comets portend revolutions of kingdoms, pestilence, war, winds, or heat." In the ninth century the Venerable Bede, beloved of the Anglican church, reaffirmed these notions. In the thirteenth century St. Thomas Aquinas, the great pillar of the Roman Catholic church, whose works the present pope commends as the head and fount of true education, inculcated the same doctrin. St. Albert the Great, the chief Catholic writer on natural science in medieval times, taught likewise.

The production by this belief of panic fears of an approaching end of the world, continued through centuries. The tenth century was marked by the most conspicuous occurrence of the kind. At that period a large portion of the inhabitants of Christendom abandoned their pursuits, and either herded in monasteries or trooped about in praying and singing bands. The possessions of the clergy were vastly augmented by property made over to them at this period. The suspension of industry resulted in sore famins.

A general terror from the appearance of a comet occurred as often as nearly every decade. However, the acme was reached in 1456. The invading Turks had just secured a foothold in Europe. These Mohammedan hosts, which could hav been repelled by a united effort of the European nations, had taken advantage of the disunion generated among the Christians by contending sects to follow up the conquest of Constantinople by pushing far into the heart of Europe. At this juncture a comet appeared. Pope Calixtus III. publicly and solemnly anathematized both the Turks and the comet. One item of his deliverance was that the faithful should pray God to divert the cometic monster and its destructiv fury away from the Christians and against the misbelieving Turks. A petition, "From the Turk and the comet, good Lord deliver us," was inserted in the regular litany. It is supposed that from this source we derive our present Angelus, or mid-day prayer, at the sound of a bell, against the powers of evil. The papal anathema had the usual effect of such utterances, for the Turks to-day hold most of the conquests effected then, including Constantinople, and the comet, which was that now known as Halley's, has in accord with its now-discovered laws serenely appeared at regular periods ever since.

During these ages there occasionally appeared a thinker protesting against the received doctrin of comets. The prophecy of Seneca was indeed confined to obscurity, but was not altogether lost. Even in the court of the pious Charlemagne, so given over to "scriptural science" and "sound learning" and "sacred learning," we find one thinker and observer raising his voice against the reigning folly. In the sixteenth century Paracelsus writes against it. In the seventeenth, Pierre Petit and De Gamon are hardy enough to take a like stand.

This opposition kindled the horror and anger of theologians. The graceless contradicters of God's words were made to suffer for their foolhardiness and sinfulness. The most learned and forcible writers of the theological hosts were brought to the front to fortify the true doctrin. In France in the sixteenth century the weighty Bodin spread with all of his powerful influence the doctrin that comets were cursed souls of men wandering through space and scattering famin, pestilence, and war.

The prevalence of the belief in England, students of lighter literature are familiar with through the passages in Shakspere and Milton. The "Henry VI." of the former contains the invocation:

> "Comets, importing change of times and states,
> Brandish your crystal tresses in the sky,
> And with them scourge the bad revolting stars
> That hav consented unto Henry's death."

And Milton speaks of

> "A comet . . .
> That fires the length of Ophiuchus huge
> In the Arctic sky, and from its horrid hair
> Shakes pestilence and war."

As late as the end of the seventeenth century authors of note in England contended for the scriptural doctrin.

Germany is the country in which this theory took the deepest root and flourished most banefully. This view, after being taught by Catholicism, passed into Protestantism, by which it was insisted on with equal vigor. Luther authorized it. The powerful Arietus said, "The heavens are not merely given us for our pleasure, but also as a warning for the correction of our lives, and of the wrath of God." Lavather demonstrated by scriptural citations that comets are signs of death or widespread disaster. In the seventeenth century Fromundus, the eminent professor of theology at the University of Louvain—conspicuous for his war on the doctrin of the earth's rotundity—battled doughtily for the prophetic mission of comets. In 1680 Voight found that the comet of that date omened the fall of the Turkish empire, and branded as "Atheists and epicureans" all who denied the tenet that comets are messengers of an irate God. Besides these printed pronouncements, there were multitudes that issued from the pulpits. Preachers Protestant and Catholic vied in earnestness to establish the biblical theory. As an instance, we will giv at some length an account of the preaching of Conrad Dieterich. This preacher, says Prof. A. D. White in the Popular Science Monthly, whose account we shall follow, was during the first half of the seventeenth century a Lutheran ecclesiastic of the highest authority. His ability as a theologian had made him archdeacon of Marburg, professor of philosophy and director of studies at the University of Giessen, and finally "superintendent," exercising functions of an episcopal character in the Lutheran regions of Southwestern Germany. In the year 1620, on the second Sunday in Advent, in the great cathedral of Ulm, he developed the orthodox doctrin of comets in a sermon, taking up the questions: 1. What are comets? 2. What do they indicate? 3. What hav we to do with their significance? This sermon marks an epoch. Delivered in that center of Protestant Germany, and by a prelate of the highest standing, it was immediately printed, prefaced by three laudatory poems from different men of note, and sent forth to drive back the scientific, or, as it was termed, the "godless," view of comets. The preface shows that Dieterich was sincerely alarmed by the tendency to regard comets as natural appearances, and resolved to cut it off at all costs. His text was taken from the twenty-fifth verse of the twenty-first chapter of St. Luke: "And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring." As to what comets are, he declares that there is no solution of the problem save in revelation, and insists that they are "signs especially sent by the almighty to warn the earth." An additional proof of this he finds in the forms of comets. One, he says, took the form of a trumpet; another, of a spear; another, of a goat; another, of a torch; another, of a sword; another, of an arrow; another, of a saber; still another, of a bare arm; and so on. From these forms of comets he infers that we may divine their purpose. As to their creation, he quotes John of Damascus and other great church authorities in behalf of the idea that each comet is a star newly created at the divine command out of nothing, and that it indicates the wrath and punishment of God. As to their purpose, having quoted largely from the Bible and from Luther, he winds up by insisting that, as God can make nothing in vain, comets must hav some distinct object: then from Isaiah and Joel among the prophets, from Matthew, Mark, and Luke among the evangelists, from Origen and St. John Chrysostom among the fathers, from Luther and Melancthon among the Reformers, he draws various texts more or less conclusiv to prove that comets indicate evil and only evil, and he cites Luther's Advent sermon, to the effect that, though comets may arise in the course of nature, they are still signs of evil to mankind. In answer to the theory of certain naturalists, that comets are made up of a "certain fiery, warm, sulphurous, saltpetery, sticky fog," he declares, "Our sins, our sins! they are the fiery heated vapors, the thick, sticky, sulphurous clouds which rise from the earth toward heaven before God." Throughout the sermon contempt was poured over all men who simply investigated comets as natural objects, and special attention was called to the fact that a comet then in the heavens resembled a long broom or bundle of rods; and Dieterich declared that he and his hearers would consider it rightly only "when we see standing before us our Lord God in heaven as an angry father with a rod for his children." In answer to the question, what comets signify, he commits himself entirely to the idea that they indicate the wrath of God, and therefore calamities of every sort. Page after page is filled with the record of evils following comets. Beginning with the creation of the world, he insists that the first comet brought on the deluge of Noah. He cites a mass of authorities ranging from Moses and Isaiah to Albert the Great and Melancthon in support of the view that comets precede earthquakes, famins, wars, pestilences, and every form of evil. Page after page is filled with this sort of historical proof. He makes some parade of astronomical knowledge as to the greatness of the sun and moon, but relapses soon into his old line of argument. Conjuring his audience not to be led away from the well-established belief of Christendom and the principles of their fathers, he comes back to his old figure of speech, insists that "our sins are the inflammable material of which comets are made," and winds up with a most earnest appeal to the almighty to spare his people.

Here we find that, in addition to all the rest of Christianity's misdoings, it will force us, by the very numerousness of its errors in cometary teaching, to defer the enumeration of the remainder of them till next week.

To the Friends of The Truth Seeker.

The following whole-souled letter will serve as the text for a little explanation:

"PUEBLO, COL., Dec. 6, 1892.

"E. M. MACDONALD, ESQ., Dear Sir and Brother: Please send me a copy of the Bible Picture Book, boards, illuminated cover, price $1, and Col. R. G. Ingersoll's Argument in Reynolds's Blasphemy Trial, in cloth, price fifty cents. Inclosed find $2. Please keep the remaining fifty cents for your trouble. I am a subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER and like it very much. After reading it I always send it to some friend. I notice your appeal for help in your last issue. I am willing to subscribe as many dollars as any other one person. Please let me know what I can do for you. It will never do to let THE TRUTH SEEKER go by the board; it is the only really good Infidel paper in the United States, and I for one am ready to stand by it through all kinds of weather.

"Respectfully yours, N. C. CREEDE."

The reason we hav for two or three weeks made so strong an appeal to our readers is because we find ourselvs in the uncomfortable position of owing to men with whom we deal in the publication of THE TRUTH SEEKER a good many bills which we hav not the ready means to pay. It is to liquidate these bills, now overdue, that we desire assistance.

We do not like to, and do not, appeal for charity, but for what is due us from subscribers in arrears; and to those whose time is about expiring for prompt renewals. And we also solicit the aid of friends in extending our circulation, because that will not only place us in better circumstances, but will spread the literature of Freethought and do a great amount of good to the cause which we know our subscribers are as anxious as ourselvs to see advanced. We are truly grateful for every helpful hand extended, and hope that the response will soon be sufficient to place us beyond the necessity of again referring to the matter. But now we are obliged to recur to it, and urge it upon the attention of our friends. We are making many liberal offers of premiums, and those who assist us will benefit themselvs. One good turn deserves another, always, and so we try to make a large return for the money sent us. THE TRUTH SEEKER has received so little money during the past summer that the large bills referred to hav accumulated, and the persons to whom we owe them want their money. These are the plain facts, and, knowing them, our friends will know what to do.

We thank Mr. Creede for his friendly offer, and all who hav responded in any way. And we hope soon to hear from a great many more. We need to.

Some Handsome Premiums.

To induce new subscriptions and prompt renewals on the part of our friends we make the following handsome premium offers:

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a cloth-bound copy of "Bible Myths" ($2.50).

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth ($2.50).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in boards ($2).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a copy of "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in cloth covers ($1.50).

For $3.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in board covers ($1).

This is a splendid opportunity to obtain books which every Liberal desires to hav at an exceedingly low price. Old and new subscribers can avail themselvs of it, and we shall be glad if our present readers will call the attention of their friends to the values offered.

Muscle vs. Mind.

A Catholic paper claims the two pugilists who are most famous at present as sons of Catholicism. Sullivan is a Roman Catholic. Corbett is the same, and was educated at the two colleges of St. Ignatius and the Sacred Heart. "Both men," says this paper, "are splendid specimens of that magnificent physical development which they got from their Irish fathers." We are willing to let the Catholic church hav the credit of these specimens of humanity. Physical preëminence is admirable only when attained without diminution of mental. Were strength the chief excellence, a horse or an ox would be the superior of a man, and would be the master instead of the drudge. In the class of human beings that the church turns out, muscle is aggrandized at the expense of mind. Muscle is good in its place. A Rationalist neither despises the physical altogether, like the early Christian fanatics, nor elevates it above mind, like the later Christian barbarians. He givs to mind and matter each its proper place. As at present there lingers overmuch of the barbarous preference for matter before mind, to counterbalance this, and restore the just equilibrium, he usually finds it expedient to slight the former and praise the latter only.

A Factor of the Democratic Victory.

The recent election of the Democratic candidates in this country was in part due to action of the Catholic church against the Republican party.

One case of this action was in those Western states, especially Wisconsin and Illinois, where the Republican party allied itself with the movement against the private schools of the Catholics and the Lutherans.

Throughout the country, too, the Catholic press and hierarchy threw many votes against Harrison because of his retention of Morgan as commissioner of Indian schools. The Catholics hav long clamored against this officer and demanded his dismissal. A sample of their expressions regarding him is the following from the Catholic Review:

"Catholics do not desire to draw religious lines in politics, but when an official like the Hon. Thomas J. Morgan declares war on them, they must defend themselvs. And that their votes count, the result of the election proves. Good-bye, Morgan!"

One Republican speaks thus: "The Catholic church fought all along the line to defeat Mr. Harrison because of his support of General Morgan as Indian commissioner. The Roman church used to receive large sums of money from the government for its Indian missions, and the government knew little of the use it made of the appropriations, but General Morgan put it on a line with all the other churches. Hence the Roman church's opposition to him." The Rev. Dr. McArthur, of New York, referring to this sectarian broil over the Indian schools, says of Cleveland: "I hope he will be true not only to his Presbyterian blood, but to his American education. But it remains to be seen whether he will bow at the feet of Romanism or stand like a tower for Protestantism." There is too much already, we will remark, of this standing like a tower for one sect or the other and neglecting the good of the country. Neither Protestants, acting as such, nor Catholics dominated by a zeal for their faith, can administer offices with decency. Our readers may look at a letter from a personal witness of Indian school management on another page of this paper.

This demonstration of the power of the Catholic church will henceforth make that institution more than ever feared, and even catered to, by our lawmakers.

Mr. Hugh O. Pentecost has entered into partnership relations with Mr. James Edward Graybill and Mr. C. Augustus Dieterich, under the firm name of Graybill, Pentecost & Dieterich, for the practice of the law, at No. 229 Broadway, New York. We believe that in his practice Mr. Pentecost will be found on the side of justice; and so believing, we wish him success in all his cases.

Mr. T. C. Widdecombe, author of that valuable little pamphlet "Science and Religion," has donated $2.50 for subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for some Freethinker who is unable to pay for it. We hav done considerable in that way ourselvs, and are glad to receive a little aid. We shall send the paper one year to some deserving Freethinker, with Mr. Widdecombe's compliments, throwing in the fifty cents for good luck.

The editor of the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Miss Susan H. Wixon, of Fall River, Mass., at the recent municipal election held in that city, was again reëlected to the school board for three years. She was the nominee of the Republican party, but, being very popular with both political parties in spite of her heretical principles, she carried a large number of Democratic votes, and ran ahead of the minister, who was on the ticket with her. Her sympathies are with the masses. Her independent modes of thinking, her keen denunciation of frauds and hypocrisies, and her interest and affection for little children make her highly respected among all classes.

The Broadway Theater was crowded from the gallery to the back of the stage last Sunday night to hear Colonel Ingersoll's estimate of Voltaire. The orator spoke for two and a quarter hours, but no one thought it was half-past ten when he finished. It is very evident that Liberal sentiment is widely diffused among the people, for the lecture, as our readers know, bristles with criticism of Christianity and her priests, and when he flung his darts of sarcasm the building "trembled with applause," as the Sun reporter felt it. The lecture was substantially as our readers hav seen it, but the colonel went outside his notes once or twice. An allusion which the audience thought referred to Dr. Parkhurst and like busybodies was a reference to the harshness of the clergy. "You hav no idea," he said, "how severe priests are. If you allowed all the priests and ministers of New York to form a legislature to make laws for New York, where would you rather liv—here or in a well-regulated penitentiary?" A roar of laughter showed that the audience understood the allusion. "I would never think I had done my duty to a client," he went on, "if there was a clergyman on the jury. A clergyman never thinks justice is done unless hell is raised with somebody." Mr. Moody's description of his prayer on board the steamship Spree, when she was disabled and storm-tossed on the ocean, evoked from Colonel Ingersoll another remark that tickled his hearers hugely. "Religion," he said, "is to most men what a lifeboat is to a ship. The passengers leave lifeboats alone until a storm comes, and then they begin to think of them seriously, unless some man happens to be on board who is lucky at prayer." A burst of laughter greeted this, and there were audible whispers of "Moody!" Mr. Ingersoll's voice was in excellent shape, the hoarseness which sometimes troubled him having disappeared, and when, in telling of the agony of a tortured man, he lowered it almost to a whisper, he could be heard distinctly in the farthest part of the great theater. The lecture and its delivery was a great treat to those who had the good fortune to be there.

In the West.

News and Notes.

At this season of the year the weather in California is as strange and variable as human life itself. It is a picture of infinit change from gorgeous sunlight, sceneries bathed in splendor, to measureless gloom. Clouds piled on clouds, and the dark floods descending. Beautiful blue skies appear, faint shining mists float over them. The earth seems in bridal array. The fields glitter, and the mountains are clothed in diamonds even to their very crests. Then over this enchanting prospect sweeps the storm and nothing can be seen but gigantic fold on fold of its black drapery rolling along the mighty blast. And when one thinks the tempest has expended its fury, and the brilliant sunshine for a while fills the air with triumphant colors, suddenly a fiercer and wilder night possesses the sky, and tumultuous rains pour like rivers upon the soil.

There is something exciting in these vast and varied scenes. No day is like another. The ocean breaking along the shore, now in gentle beauty and then in awful thunders, never givs the same aspect. The hills and the valleys with the wonderful canopy of clouds hav a perpetual alteration. A constantly new world unfolds upon the charmed vision. And such is human li e, answering to nature's sunshine and storm. We know not when the tempest will burst, and what strange events will throng from day to day. The past is like a crystal—unchangeable in its lights and shadows—but the future is like the sea, and we know not what wave will break in music or darkness upon the shore of to-morrow. to gem or mar our lives. The gloom and the glory of the outer world so marvelously mingling, in such unexpected forms, making the day almost like night, and night sometimes as beautiful as the day—in these the mind of man finds the expression of its own destiny, so terrific at times, and then so glorious and so lovely.

Coming to California, in the wild magnificence of its elements I find something sympathetic with the tragedy of human life. And the tragedy has come—heart breaking, and making desolation like the path of a cloud laden with the lightning.

My dear young friend Walter L. Grigsby has met with a sudden death. A brave, bright spirit like golden sunshine is extinguished in a moment. He was working in his father's mill, had just returned home for a few days radiant with energy and hope, and in some unaccountable manner—it will never be known how, for he was alone when the accident occurred—he was hurled into the machinery, his head crushed, and he died in an instant apparently. His brother Arthur found his lifeless body afterward under the revolving wheel. It was about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. What a blow for father and mother, sisters and brother, to thus lose him, without warning, without a chance to say good-bye, to see him only a little while before so strong, so healthful, overflowing with mirth and the beautiful promis of youth, so loving and so eager, and now dead. Could there be a greater sorrow to crush the human heart than this?

The accident occurred on Tuesday afternoon, November 29th. The storms had been so terrific that all telegraphic and telephone communications were destroyed between Calistoga and San Francisco. I did not receive the message until Thursday. I hastened immediately to Calistoga. It was a sad moment indeed when I greeted this sorrowing household in whose circle I had spent so many happy hours, for these are true friends of Freethought and my labors both here and elsewhere hav been brightened by their devotion and generous help. The funeral services were held on Friday, December 2d. Although the day was inclement a large number of neighbors were present, and in every way the community has shown its sympathy with our friends in their awful trial, for their home has been in this valley for over thirty years. Walter looked natural in the silence and majesty of death. One could scarcely believe that his heart was still forever, that those lips would speak no more nor the eyes open. What consolation could anyone giv in an hour so sad and crushing? Not all that the heart can dream or imagin can make death other than it is. There is no hope in death, no light. It is an immeasurable tragedy. We must endure it. The Bible and the church are as helpless as unbelief itself. They cannot heal the broken heart. They cannot make that good which is evil and only evil.

Even if there is something of relief in the darkness of death when old age passes away, because old age is in itself a kind of living death and the brightest faculties cease to be, where is there one particle of light in the death of glorious youth? In all the beyond—beautiful as we may make it in our most blessed visions—there is nothing so beautiful, so sweet as this earthly existence with our friends here, our loves and hopes here, our delights with father and mother, brother and sister, and the affection that flows like a silver stream. Our dear and noble comrade could not hav gone to a better world than this. Oh, the Christian's heaven—I despise it in contrast with the world of action here. It is a shadow, while this life is a reality, the beauty and the glory that we desire.

I despise the Christian's God. What a weak, puny God he is. How helpless he is when nature's tremendous forces move on. Could he not avert this blow? Could he not stop that rushing wheel? could he not save that dear head? If not, then he is as useless as the dry leaf that drifts along the tide.

The Bible, the church, the priest, are useless in an hour like this. They only make more dreadful the fact that confronts us. Back of the gloom of nature they put the gloom of an infernal God. Instead of making nature benevolent, they make it a hideous nightmare.

We must take nature simply as it is, with its evils and imperfections. There is no wisdom in nature, no love, no justice, no mercy. Nature is not right in this thing, in this tragedy of death. She is absolutely wrong, absolutely destructiv and inhuman. Only in the strength of humanity itself, in human love and human help, is there any softening of this awful tragedy.

Man must meet death in the grandeur of his ideal life which he himself has built up out of Reason, Science, and his own indomitable spirit. The sublime ideas of truth, of justice, of brotherhood, of liberty, of progress, animate and giv us courage, and so by the grave of our brother and friend we think not simply of the cold body, but of the grand and beautiful inspirations that made his young life so happy and bountiful. We dwell in the mighty spiritual world of our ever-struggling humanity, that world which from dim and far beginnings has broadened and brightened into such majesty and splendor of poetry, music, and immortal art. In the might and magnificence of that world we triumph over death and endure our sorrow and console the breaking heart, and turn to our tasks again with the gracious memory of our beloved one enshrined in deathless beauty.

The coffin was covered with flowers, and the tender leaves wreathed the face of our dear one. The last sad look was given and he was borne away to the burial-place. The storm still continued as we went our way to Calistoga with long procession of friends and neighbors. From this place by car the body was taken to Napa. It poured furiously when we reached the city, as if the elements were in their most cruel mood; but nearing the spot where he was to be laid away forever the rain ceased, as if into her bosom nature would at last take her child in peace and quietude. Gently into the grave he was lowered, resting upon the couch where no pain shall ever come. Over the clods were placed the flowers of love and memory, and we bade farewell, a long farewell, to the precious dust Immediately after the momentary lull the storm renewed its fury as we repassed the gloomy portals of the city of the dead. It rained steadily for hours, the train was delayed, and it was nearly midnight when over the dangerous ways, flooded by the increasing tempest, we reached home. It was a sad, sad day to our friends, and the courage of their own hearts alone sustained them.

Walter Leslie Grigsby was only twenty-one years of age at the time of his death. He was universally beloved. He was always ready to help, Liberal in spirit and unflinching in his convictions. He was an earnest Freethinker. A year ago he came to San Francisco to be apprentice in the Risdon Iron and Locomotiv Works. He desired to learn his business thoroughly. He was not obliged to do the rough work that he did, but he accepted it as a method by which to acquire knowledge and skill for his profession. Though a beginner he lived on his wages. His father was able and willing to assist, but he would not accept the offered aid. He determined to be independent and self-reliant, to win his own way from the start. He spent most of his evenings in study. He learned from books as well as by practical experience. In our Freethought movement at San Francisco he was an ardent and courageous supporter. He stood by our colors through every difficulty, were there few or many in the cause. He was of buoyant disposition—looking to the bright side of things, and ready to be at the front. He was a loyal soldier—loyal to the truth, to freedom, and to humanity. He was a gallant comrade, stricken from our side in the very happiest moment of his youth and labor.

His father, Mr. R. F. Grigsby, of the Palisade Mines, Calistoga, is well known in our Liberal ranks. For years he has been a stanch supporter of Freethought, as was his father before him—T. L. Grigsby, whose funeral I attended last year at Napa. Walter's mother, Mrs. Grigsby, is daughter of one of the pioneer Liberals of California—Amos Buckman, of San Diego county. Arthur, Walter's brother, and Miss Meda and Miss Lola, his sisters, are also true and brave Liberals who desire not the consolations of religion in this dark hour. This bright and genial circle, where reason is ever shining and humanity attractiv, has been rudely sundered by that mysterious and mighty force upon whose bosom the universe itself seems but a wave that comes and goes. To these friends thus bereft is given the sympathy of every Liberal heart. Time alone can soften the sorrow which is now so overwhelming. Time will bring the sunshine and the flowers, the summer's day beyond the winter's gloom. Time will bring new duties, new toils, and new hopes. Time will make memory sweet and beautiful. Time will bring forth in lovely outline the full and earnest life of him whom we shall see no more. Over the dark canvas of the grave, now so strange and desolate, time shall paint the virtues of him we love. Time shall reveal the noble thoughts that animated his brief but heroic life. Time shall giv him to us in immortal youth.

We can liv and love; and living and loving we can pluck from death's dark bosom itself the best and brightest glory of the dear ones gone away.

Calistoga, Cal, Dec. 14, 1892.

Unreasonability of Christian "Reasonability of Hell."

With the increase and spread of reason's light and research the claims of superstition visibly recede and dwindle. An apprehensiv uncertainty of lasting credulity in the awe-inspiring doctrins forces the divine apostles to a gradual but steady mitigation of the sufferings of eternal damnation.

The Satanic Ruler of a short century ago would to-day hardly recognize his old domain. He would become amazed and completely lost as soon as he stepped inside the infernal boundary. Instead of meeting inviting blazes of a roaring fire, choking smoke of brimstone and smell of roasting flesh, he would certainly shudder at the cooling and pleasant breezes, so antagonistic to his unacclimatized nostrils and nerves. Nothing to enliven his cunning eyes, to joy his grinning jaws; no job, no salary, no hope of regency, of livelihood. Despair would prove his fate, suicide the only salvation. We therefore candidly advise his unfortunate highness to postpone the visit, and stay outside.

How did all this occur? Your enterprising church magnate has stealthily turned on a powerful hose and succeeded in pacifying the furious flames. His associates "in Christ," seeing no realization of their expected wrath of the Lord upon the sacrilegious intruder, soon fell in line themselvs, successfully helping, not only in a complete extinguishing of all the fires, but also in a total and clean obliteration of the whole subterranean establishment as regards its policy of government and objects of speculation. All the enormous supplies of coal, the numerous furnaces, anvils and hammers, shovels and tongs, pokers, nails, and chains—all hav been boldly advertised for sale and nicely disposed of to a few cheap second-hand dealers. The walls, ceilings, and floors underwent an entire renovation, and save for the few dozen of ashsacks, and mischievous pin-cushions securely fastened to the stationary sitting paraphernalia, the whole resort would not prove so very undesirable for the majority of the victims condemned by the church, which, under the guidance of the great judge on high, claims that it is nothing but just to reap the fruits in the spiritual life according as they were sown during our earthly existence.

The following is a short synopsis of a recent sermon upon this subject:

"It is most reasonable that everybody should be punished for all sins and crimes against the generous God who endowed us with a free and untrammeled will to do whatever we please, and to choose between right and wrong. God would not be just should all criminals escape punishment, and enjoy the unearned benefits of the righteous in heaven. There must be, nay! there is a hell, a fitting place for every offender to pay the dues he owes his divine master. But, like many other passages in the holy Bible, we shall not take verbatim the descriptions of hell. The reasoning power, as the fruit of our increased learning and research, is plainly showing us the way of 'divine interpretation.' The loving father in heaven will not punish his children with smoke and fire from brimstone and tar. Neither is there any devil with horns, hoofs, and tail, pick and fork. The hell is simply a state in which all will put themselvs who fail to obey the divine will of God; who do not liv a life righteous, religious, and holy."

Such and similar were the silly exhortations of the below-named pastor of St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal church, one of the "best informed" and most noted divines of the Queen city. The subjoined short criticism of his sermon might, therefore, be not out of place, though he has not shown as yet any willingness to answer my respectful prayer for his "beatifying" information:

CINCINNATI, O., Nov. 18, 1892.

REV. GEORGE K. MORRIS, D.D., Dear Reverend Sir: Last Sunday evening I was one of your most attentiv listeners. I shall never regret having spent an hour in the beautiful edifice, enjoying the enchanting choir and the really divine eloquence of your religious argumentations. Nothing would remain for me but to sign the list of your followers regarding the "Reasonability of Hell," if there but were:

1. An immortal soul in man, and
2. No omnipotent and all-knowing supreme ruler, called God.

This double "if" is in my humble opinion the fatal stumbling-block, the bottomless precipice, in every religious doctrin.

What is the soul? Where is she? And do you know there is any undying, everlasting spirit? Prove it, and then speak of its eternal tortures, or shouting joy. The ghost stories of the past are not credited as they used to be in our age of enlightenment, reason, and research. All your proof in this respect rests solely on the teachings of the foul and leprous contents of the "holy" Bible. Perusing carefully its pages you will find it most blasphemous and contradictory. Take, for instance, the creation of the "first" parents, Adam and Eve. Are all peoples the descendants of this single and only family? In such an instance Adam's sons had to intermarry with their sisters; the father with his daughters; the mother with her sons; the—oh, well! a cold chill passes through all my frame at the very thought of such divinity and wisdom of the alleged creator.

A few lines farther the same holy codex asserts that Cain went to the land of Nod and there "took unto himself a wife from among the daughters of that land." By whom became this strange land populated, Rev. Mr. Morris?

Now let us take a glance at the other end of these holy scriptures. Mr. Jesus, the reputed son of God, had his ancestry dated back to David. How do we know of it? The holy gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke furnish the great authority. The former credits "our savior" with twenty-eight generations, while Luke counts as many as forty-three, and none corresponds with the other save as to David and Joseph. Who is here right? Either the first or the other must evidently be a liar. Yet both are still enjoying a full confidence of the almighty's secretaryship, specially selected, divinely inspired and holy.

The second "if:"

According to your and every church's teachings there is no question as to the existence of an all-knowing, all-wise, and almighty God. "If" so, how can you conscientiously make the man responsible for any deed the commission of which had been recorded in the knowledge of heaven ages before? Do you for a moment believe that God could know anything without or against his holy will? If he was aware of any murder to be perpetrated, it had to come to pass, the so-called free will of the brute notwithstanding. Would not this all-knowledge condemn rather God himself instead of his servant who is bound to follow the will of his all-knowing and almighty master? You are surely familiar with the fatal results of lightnings, cyclones, volcanoes, and numerous equally horrible catastrophes. How many of God's living images are daily falling victims to these cruel agencies! What, do you suppose, will be the fate of the legions of souls thus unprepared for any of your everlasting abodes? I almost hear your answer: that "everybody ought to be always ready and prepared for his call." Yes—it is very easy to state, but by no means so easy to prove the justice of, such affirmation. Is there no speck of possibility that the heavenly father was, according to the grand Lord's Prayer, just in the act of "leading" the poor wretches into "temptation" when thus snatched away? If the almighty himself is pushing you into sheol, how are you able to raise unto him your voice and heart in song and prayer, embellished, if necessary, by a solemn American tin horn, or German dudel-sack? Besides, they might hav been just piously storing means for an increased joy in heaven by sinning as much as possible when suddenly cut short and mashed to pieces. The holy Bible says: "There will be more joy in heaven at one converted sinner than over ninety-nine uprights." "The bigger the cake the jollier the picnic."

How can the "just" and "loving" father punish his child when its intentions were of the most commendable nature, though, in fact, not exceedingly "nice?" Innocent mistakes are surely not punishable in manner and form of the teachings of Bible and church.

God's will and wish, according to your statement, is that everybody be saved and none punished. Is God unable to realize the ends of his "almighty" will? Why does he allow the king of hades to stuff his grisly kingdom with such a cruel majority of God's own subjects, his own children? Did he not know, before creating the man, that his divine share will be so insignificant as to hardly justify all the trouble in molding Adam? He should hav known, if he knew anything, that his undertaking will soon prove a total failure, an irredeemable fiasco.

And now, all those sweet, tiny innocents—where will they be domiciled? Jesus is credited with saying, "Suffer little children to come unto me, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." What? How? Did they ever earn it? Hav they already succeeded in overcoming the Lord's "temptation?" Why did God fail to take us all up while in the grasp of "the children's kingdom?" What sort of justice do you call this? But, on the other hand, how can you unblushingly accuse the children of being so indifferent and ungrateful as to enjoy the loveliness of heaven while knowing that their papas and mammas, their brothers and sisters, are probably crying, wringing hands, and despairing in hell forever, ever, and ever?

Such teachings, my dear friend, cannot possibly emanate from a source acceptable, sound, and honest. Quite the contrary is palpably their horrid and only foundation. In no way do I wish to be understood as disputing the rights of your pulpit, for they are guarded by the laws of our land; and, secondly, I do not think your institution worse than many others under the same protection. Neither do I hope your mental peace will become materially unbalanced and disturbed, as you are a gentleman of vast understanding and experience. Knowing full well that the credulity of your congregation is at your very command, somebody else would gladly slip into your place and reap the fruits of such a rich soil, should you conclude to reform.

As everybody's presence is "welcome" and "appreciated" to listen and profit by your "words of wisdom," I will surely not be denied the justice of disputing those of your statements which seemingly do not side with the truth. You claim the color of your ideas to be white, perfectly white, while to me it looks black, as black as tar, unless I am color-blind, though nobody has, so far, proved this defect in my sight. Perhaps you might be more successful in correcting this grave infirmity. Nothing else would so awaken my sense of gratitude to you as such an achievement; and I would consider it the crowning glory to my life's desires. But it must be convincing, just, and truthful—yes, truthful; for truth I am ready to suffer; and craving for truth I remain,

Yours respectfully, N. D. TANSKE, M.D.

New England Theology Two Hundred Years Ago.

From the Rev. Michael Wigglesworth's "Day of Doom."

THE JUDGMENT DAY.

Before his throne a trump is blown,
Proclaiming the day of doom:
Forthwith he cries, "Ye dead arise,
And unto the judgment come."
No sooner said, but 'tis obeyed;
Sepulchres opened are:
Dead bodies all rise at his call,
And's mighty power declare.

The saved are then judged, or rather their salvation is thus described:

My sheep draw near, your sentence hear, which is to you no dread,
Who clearly now discern, and know your sins are pardoned.
'Twas meet that ye should judged be, that so the world may spy
No cause of grudge, when as I judge and deal impartially.
Know therefore all, both great and small, the ground and reason why
These men do stand at my right hand, and look so cheerfully.
These men be those my Father chose before the world's foundation,
And to me gave, that I should save from death and condemnation.

The elect having thus been disposed of, Jesus turns to those who were not of the company chosen for him by God before "the world's foundation." After dealing with various classes of sinners in a manner which might well excite the envy of an Oriental despot whose heart had long been steeled against all the divine emotions, Christ proceeds to judge those whose lives had been pure, holy, honest, and upright, but whose greatness of soul had rendered it impossible for them to grovel before a God represented by his most zealous followers as infinitly more brutal and cruel than the worst man born of woman:

Then were brought nigh a company of civil, honest men
That loved true dealing, and hated stealing, ne'er wrong'd their brethren;
Who pleaded thus, "Thou knowest us that we were blameless livers;
No whoremongers, no murderers, no quarrelers nor strivers."

Jesus admits that they hav been all they claim, but proceeds:

And yet that part, whose great desert you think to reach so far
For your excuse, doth you accuse, and will your boasting mar.
However fair, however square your way and work hath been,
Before men's eyes, yet God espies iniquity therein.
You much mistake, if for their sake you dream of acceptation:
Whereas the same deserveth shame and meriteth damnation.

This picture of infinit injustice, however, pales into insignificance before what follows:

Then to the bar, all they drew near who dy'd in infancy,
And never had or good or bad effected pers'nally.
But from the womb unto the tomb were straightway carried,
Or at the last e'er they transgrest who thus began to plead:

If for our own transgression, or disobedience,
We here did stand at thy left hand, just were the recompense;
But Adam's guilt our souls hath spilt, his fault is charg'd on us:
And that alone hath overthrown, and utterly undone us.
Not we, but he ate of the tree, whose fruit was interdicted:
Yet on us all of his sad fall, the punishment's inflicted.
How could we sin that had not been, or how is his sin our Without consent, which to prevent, we never had a pow'r?
O great creator, why was our nature depraved and forlorn?
Why so defil'd, and made so vil'd whilst we were yet unborn?
Behold we see Adam set free, and sav'd from his trespass,
Whose sinful fall hath spilt us all, and brought us to this pass.
Canst thou deny us once to try, or grace to us to tender,
When he finds grace before thy face, that was the chief offender?

Jesus is then represented as replying in the following language:

What you call old Adam's fall, and only his trespass,
You call amiss to call it his, both his and yours it was.
He was design'd of all mankind, to be a publick head,
A common root, whence all should shoot, and stood in all their stead.
He stood and fell, did ill or well, not for himself alone,
But for you all, who now his fall, and trespass would disown.
If he had stood, then all his brood, had been established
In God's true love never to move, nor once awry to tread:
Would you hav griev'd to hav receiv'd through Adam so much good,
As had been your for evermore, if he at first had stood?
Since then to share in his welfare, you could hav been content,
You may with reason share in his treason, and in the punishment.
You sinners are, and such a share as sinners may expect,
Such you shall hav; for I do save none but my own elect.
Yet to compare your sin with their who lived a longer time,
I do confess yours is much less, though every sin's a crime.
A crime it is, therefore in bliss you may not hope to dwell;
But unto you I shall allow the easiest room in hell.
The glorious king thus answering, they cease and plead no longer:
Their consciences must needs confess his reasons are the stronger.

Having disposed of the sheep and goats, the worthy divine next lingers on the field of victory and despair much as a bee lingers over the honey-cup of a fragrant flower.

Now what remains, but that to pains and everlasting smart,
Christ should condemn the sons of men, which is their just desert;
O rueful plights of sinful wights! oh wretches all forlorn;
'T had happy been they ne'er had seen the sun, or not been born.
Yea, now it would be good they could themselvs annihilate,
And cease to be, themselvs to free from such a fearful state.
O happy dogs, and swine and frogs; yea, serpents' generation,
Who do not fear this doom to hear, and sentence of damnation!
Where tender love men's hearts did move unto a sympathy,
And bearing part of others' smart in their anxiety:
Now such compassion is out of fashion, and wholly laid aside;
No friends so near, but saints to hear their sentence can abide,
The godly wife conceives no grief, nor can she shed a tear
For the sad fate of her dear mate, when she his doom doth hear.
He that was erst a husband pierced with sense of wife's distress,
Whose tender heart did bear a part of all her grievances,
Shall mourn no more as heretofore because of her ill plight;
Although he see her now to be a damn'd forsaken wight.
The tender mother will own no other of all her numerous brood,
But such as stand at Christ's right hand acquitted through his blood.
The pious father had now much rather his graceless son should lie
In hell with devils, for all his evils, burning eternally,
Than God most high should injury, by sparing him sustain;
And doth rejoice to hear Christ's voice adjudging him to pain.
Who having all both great and small, convinc'd and silenced,
Did then proceed their doom to read, and thus it uttered.
Ye sinful wights, and cursed sprites, that work iniquity.
Depart together from me forever to endless misery;
Your portion take in yonder lake, where fire and brimstone flameth:
Suffer the smart, which your desert as its due wages claimeth.
What? to be sent to punishment, and flames of burning fire,
To be surrounded, and eke confounded with God's revengeful ire!
What? to abide, not for a tide these torments, but forever;
To be released, or to be eased, not after years, but never.
Oh fearful doom! now there's no room for hope or help at all:
Sentence is past which aye shall last, Christ will not it recall.
There might you hear them rend and tear the air with their outcries:
The hideous noise of their sad voice ascendeth to the skies.
They wring their hands, their caitiff hands, and gnash their teeth for terrour;
They cry, they roar for anguish sore, and gnaw their tongues for horrour.
But get away without delay, Christ pities not your cry;
Depart to hell, there may you yell, and roar eternally.
Dy fain they would, if dy they could, but death will not be had.
God's direful wrath their bodies hath for ev'r immortal made.
But who can tell the plagues of hell,
The lightest pain they there sustain more than intolerable.
But God's great pow'r from hour to hour upholds them in the fire,
That they shall not consume a jot, nor by its force expire.

The hymns of this age were also in perfect touch with this frightful system of thought. Take, for example, the following:

My thoughts on awful subjects roll,
Damnation and the dead;
What horrors seize the guilty soul,
Upon a dying bed.

Ling'ring about these mortal shores,
She makes a long delay;
Till, like a flood with rapid force,
Death sweeps the wretch away.

Then, swift and dreadful she descends
Down to the fiery coast,
Among abominable fiends,
Herself a frighted ghost.

There endless crowds of sinners lie,
And darkness makes their chains;
Tortur'd with keen despair, they cry;
Yet wait for fiercer pains.

Not all their anguish and their blood
For their old guilt atones;
Nor the compassion of a God
Shall hearken to their groans.

Here is another companion hymn:

With holy fear, and humble song,
The dreadful God our souls adore;
Rev'rence and awe become the tongue,
That speaks the terrors of his power.
Far in the deep, where darkness dwells,
The land of horror and despair,—
Justice has built a dismal hell,
And laid her stores of vengeance there.

Eternal plagues and heavy chains,
Tormenting racks and fiery coals,—
And darts, t' inflict immortal pains,
Dy'd in the blood of damned souls.
There Satan, the first sinner, lies,
And roars, and bites his iron bands;
In vain the rebel strives to rise,
Crushed with the weight of both thy hands.

There guilty ghosts of Adam's race
Shriek out and howl beneath thy rod:
Once they could scorn a savior's grace,
But they incens'd a dreadful God.
Tremble, my soul, and kiss the son:
Sinner, obey thy savior's call;
Else your damnation hastens on,
And hell gapes wide to wait your fall.

Below the pious author of a once popular hymn, found in the collection before referred to, givs us a graphic pen-picture of God as seen by his mental vision:

His nostrils breathe out fiery streams;
And from his awful tongue,
A sovereign voice divides the flames;
And thunder rolls along.

Think, O my soul, the dreadful day,
When this incensed God
Shall rend the sky, and burn the sea,
And fling his wrath abroad!

What shall the wretch, the sinner do?
He once defied the Lord!
But he shall dread the Thunderer now,
And sink beneath his word.

Tempests of angry fire shall roll,
To blast the rebel worm,—
And beat upon his naked soul
In one eternal storm.

Original sin and the degradation of manhood, the direct opposit of the incoming religious thought of to-day, were favorit themes with the hymnologist of other days. Let us imagin our great congregations of to-day singing the following:

Backward, with humble shame we look
On our original;
How is our nature dashed, and broke,
In our first father's fall!

To all that's good, averse, and blind,
And prone to all that's ill;
What dreadful darkness veils our mind!
How obstinate our will!

Conceived in sin, O wretched state,
Before we draw our breath,
The first young pulse begins to beat
Iniquity and death.

How strong in our degenerate blood
The old corruption reigns!
And mingling with the crooked flood,
Wanders through all our veins!

Wild and unwholesome, as the root,
Will all the branches be:
How can we hope for living fruit,
From such a deadly tree?

What mortal power, from things unclean
Can pure productions bring?
Who can command a vital stream,
From an infected spring?

These examples of the poetry which enjoyed wonderful popularity, and voiced the austere religious thought of colonial days, may help us to appreciate the ocean-wide expanse between the dominant religious thought at the time when Cotton Mather delivered his eulogy over the body of Rev. Michael Wigglesworth and the present, when the pastor of the most famous Congregational church in America declares in favor of evolution, and a learned professor in one of the greatest Presbyterian theological colleges publicly affirms that men can no longer shut their eyes to the fact that "the Bible contains errors which no man has been able to explain away*" and also that there are three sources or fountains of divine authority, "the Bible, the church, and reason." So gradually, however, has this wonderful evolution taken place, and so multitudinous hav been the educational agencies which hav steadily lifted man into a higher sphere of thought, that it is only when we examin the history and literature of a vanished age that we are able to appreciate the progress which has been accomplished, or properly appreciate the spirit of the past. Religion is evolving as is humanity. What was orthodoxy yesterday is blasphemy to-day. What is heterodoxy to-day is orthodoxy to-morrow. The history of religious evolution is a tedious and often disheartening narrativ, and so also is the story of life's evolution and the rise of man from the savagery of Central Africa to the development of a Hugo; but the story in each instance is inspiring, for the trend is upward. The star goes before. The road ever leads to a higher altitude.—B. O. Flower in the Arena.

The Church Militant.

The Mason county, Ky., grand jury returned indictments Wednesday night against nearly all the barber shops, cigar stores, and clothing houses in Maysville for keeping open on Sunday.

Mrs. Elizabeth Berry and Garry Storms were taken recently to the Hackensack, N. J., jail to serve four days each for violating the Sunday law. They reside at Woodcliffe, and were arrested on complaint of Martin J. Meyers, a farmer of that place, who charged them with husking corn on Sunday.

A correspondent of the American Sentinel in Sierra Leone, says in a private letter to the editor of that paper that "the ministers of the various denominations and other gentlemen waited on the governor with a memorial, praying for a better observance of the 'Lord's day,' and more especially to prohibit vessels from landing here on Sunday, or to discharge or load their cargoes."

The pastors of the different churches of the city of Atlanta, Ga., met recently and organized an auxiliary of the American Sabbath Union. On the same day a bill was introduced in the Georgia legislature to make the reading of the Bible in all public schools compulsory. Such schools as fail to comply with this requirement are to be deprived of their pro rata apportionment of the public school fund.

There was some excitement on the 4th at North Elizabeth, N. J., where William H. Moffitt, a hustling real estate agent from New York, attempted to hold a public auction sale of building lots, and to draw a crowd he had engaged a band of music to giv a sacred concert and a caterer to serve a free lunch to all who attended. Chief Tenny, at the head of a force of police, made a descent on the scene, and arrested agent Moffitt, caterer Gus Salsfield, of Newark, the two clerks of the agent, and the band of fifteen musicians, most of whom belong to Nickols & Suenderhaft's band of Newark. The eighteen prisoners were marched to the Elizabeth police headquarters, where Justice Hetfield held a special session of the police court, and fined each man $1 and costs, or $3.85, for disorderly conduct. The prisoners all paid their fines, and were discharged from custody.

The Pearl of Days givs the latest baseball news as follows: Playing baseball on Sunday is a violation of the Nebraska law. The supreme court of Nebraska so decided November 11th, in the case of the state against O'Rourke, a case originating in the arrest last year of a baseball team while engaged in playing a game on Sunday. The players were not fined by the county judge. The county attorney filed exceptions and carried the case to the supreme court for an interpretation of the law, so that future controversies might be avoided in regard to the legality of playing baseball on Sunday. The court yesterday sustained the exceptions. The syllabus of Chief-Justice Maxwell is as follows: "Under the provisions of section 241 of the criminal code, any person of fourteen years of age or upward who shall on Sunday engage in sporting, etc., shall be fined in a sum of not exceeding $20 or to be confined in the county jail not exceeding twenty days, or both. Playing baseball on Sunday comes within the definition of sporting and renders the person so engaged therein liable to the punishment provided for in section 241."

Spiritual Science.

In the summer of 1847 three copies of the first issue of "Nature's Divine Revelations," by Andrew Jackson Davis, came to a bookseller of Syracuse, where I was living. I bought one copy and I hav it yet. Prof. George Bush, of New York city, who had recently evoluted out of Presbyterianism, was a champion of the book, hoping it would lead many to accept the claims of Swedenborg as an infallible seer. Theodore Parker wrote to a clerical friend, of Syracuse, saying, "It is a wonderful book, to say the least." The reading of that book helped me more than anything else to throw off the shackles of orthodoxy.

In the following autumn I went to New York city to liv. Calling on Professor Bush, I spoke to him about an unintelligble theory of the tides, propounded in the book. He smiled and said he had read an adverse criticism on that very point. I called on Mr. Davis himself and spoke about his theory of the tides. He did not profess to be able in his normal state to explain it, but said that his scribe Mr. Fishbough, was preparing a paper on the subject. If such a paper ever appeared I never knew it; nor did I get any light on the subject until 1880, when I found it in Newcomb's "Popular Astronomy," that the tide on the farther side of the earth from the moon was caused by the centrifugal force of the two bodies, the earth and moon, revolving around their common center. If the earth did not turn on its axis the tides would move around its circumference in twenty-nine and one-half days instead of twenty-four hours and fifty-three minutes. The clairvoyant Davis in 1847 had vaguely perceived the agency of centrifugal force in causing the tides, but had erroneously attributed it to the earth's revolution on its axis. If any scientific exposition of centrifugal force in causing the tides on the side of the earth farthest from the moon ever appeared before the publication of Newcomb's "Popular Astronomy" in 1877, I am not aware of it.

Mr. E. D. Hicks having, as he says, seen an article of mine in which I quoted from "Nature's Divine Revelations," and imagining that I considered that work reliable, wants me "to rise and explain, and tell us of just one little fact, one scientific fact, which we did not know before being told by supposed spirits."

I am sorry to say that I find very few books, even scientific ones, that are altogether reliable. Mr. Davis was only a clairvoyant, and I know that clairvoyants are not always reliable. William Fishbough, who took down the clairvoyant's words and who wrote the "Scribe's Introduction," was a man of good repute. I knew him, and never heard anyone doubt his integrity. In that introduction he says: "Reader, do not consider this book as a standard so infallible as to relieve you from the further exercise of your reason."

The Laplace or nebular theory of world-formation is upheld in this book. I quote a few lines at the outset:

> In THE BEGINNING, the Univercœlum was one boundless, undefinable, and unimaginable ocean of LIQUID FIRE! The most vigorous and ambitious imagination is not capable of forming an adequate conception of the hight and depth and length and breadth thereof. There was one vast expanse of liquid substance. It was without bounds, inconceivable, and with qualities and essences incomprehensible. This was the original condition of MATTER. It was without forms; for it was one Form. It had not motions; but it was an eternity of Motion. It was without parts; for it was a Whole. Particles did not exist, but the Whole was one Particle. There were not Suns, but it was one Eternal Sun. It had no beginning and it was without end.

I am not now edified by this kind of pseudo-scientific rhapsody. I cannot comprehend "the beginning" of an "eternal sun which had no beginning," nor do I believe that the "univercœlum was one boundless, undefinable, and unimaginable ocean of liquid fire." Whence came the fire? Must we not postulate an almighty creator who fired up matter "in the beginning," or some time thereafter, during an eternity that "had no beginning?"

I reject the Laplace or nebular theory, whether propounded by mortals or spirits. And I hav yet to see any scientific book maintaining the opposit, or accretion, hypothesis, except a pamphlet of 104 pages by James Milleson, M.D., of Indianapolis, published in 1878.

And now, in answer to the challenge to adduce a single scientific fact which we did not know before being told by supposed spirits, I quote the following words of the clairvoyant Davis on page 160:

> The existence of eight planets has been determined upon beyond all doubt.* Still the eighth and ninth are not yet recognized as bodies belonging to the solar system.

The note by Mr. Fishbough is important, as follows:

> * At first I did not understand this expression; and it is but recently that it occurred to me that it evidently has reference to the conclusions which Le Verrier had already established in his own mind from mathematical calculations, and which the clairvoyant saw. Numerous witnesses can testify that what is said about an eighth and ninth planet, was in manuscript in March, 1846, and months before Le Verrier's calculations and conclusions had been announced in this country. The eighth planet [Neptune] was first actually discovered in September, 1846.

Leverrier's calculations appeared in the summer of 1846, and, on being compared with those of Mr. Adams, made a year earlier at Cambridge, the coincidence was found to be so striking that a vigorous search was begun for the supposed planet, and its discovery was made at Berlin, Sept. 23, 1846.

Miss Mollie Fancher, the sleepless, sightless, speechless, and foodless girl of Brooklyn, to my personal knowledge, has possessed the clairvoyant power in her abnormal state. My old friend and associate, Henry M. Parkhurst, whose house is nearly opposit that of Mollie, prepared a crucial test of independent clairvoyance, and published the result in the New York Herald of Nov. 30, 1878.

In the early days of mesmerism in France, an epileptic subject would, in his trance state, foretell the day, hour, and minute of his next fit.

And I could narrate facts disclosed to me by clairvoyants or mediums which no one living knew until subsequently verified.

In regard to "Nature's Divine Revelations," Mr. Hicks asks, "What is the difference between it and the Book of Mormon?" I hav a copy of the Mormon Bible, and I am unable to discover any merit in its composition or derive any useful knowledge therefrom.

Again, the interrogator wants to know why the clairvoyant's spirit control Galen overlooked the two moons of Mars and the fifth satellite of Jupiter. I don't remember whether Claudius Galenus, of Pergamos, court physician to the emperors Aurelius and Commodus, was said to hav controled the Poughkeepsie seer; but if he did, I venture to doubt whether that ancient M.D., who never saw any of Jupiter's moons when on earth, because there were no telescopes in his day, could hav acquired in the spirit-world all the astronomical knowledge contained in Mr. Davis's book.

Furthermore, in short and finally, if we could obtain all knowledge from departed spirits, wouldn't we be as happy as clams? W. H. BURR.

Science and Progress.

WEEKLY TRIALS.

The Mohammedans of British India hav founded a theological college at Agra, where thirteen professors, with several assistants, will expound the doctrin of the Moslem scriptures. Thus far, the patronage of the institution is, however, so slight that lectures will be delivered only on three days of the week. The rest of the time will probably be taken up by heresy trials, since the lecturers are required to teach the absolute infallibility of the Koran.

DIVERTING ATTENTION.

General Cluseret thinks that Kaiser William deliberately encourages the little isms of the German politicians to keep them from investigating the divine right of monarchs. The church has practiced the same trick for ages. Theologians quarrel violently about the locality and time of Christ's ascension to divert attention from the question if he ever ascended at all.

JUST SUSPICION.

The procurator of the holy synod of Russia (a Holy Inquisition with knout trimmings) advocates the enforcement of a law requiring foreigners to "leave the Russian empire if they fail to accept the duties of citizenship after a residence of five years." The mental sanity of persons who volunteer to stay five years in the dominion of the czar must become so suspicious that they can, indeed, hardly expect to be left alone.

A COMPANION-PIECE.

The Holy Coat of Treves has proved such a bonanza to its exhibitors that the boodle syndicate can afford to bribe a couple of judges in the impending trial of doubting scoffers. Just about a hundred years ago a Jacobin bookseller was dismissed with a reprimand for having exhibited a crucified figure with the inscription: "Le Premier des Sansculottes." If the defendant had not been able to plead the "mitigating circumstance of truth," a pair of holy breeches would hav been exhibited long ago.

LONG-HEADED POLITICIANS.

The Russian diplomats still agitate the project of founding a colony on the east coast of Africa, for reasons which seem rather to hav puzzled the outside world in consideration of the fact that Asiatic Russia already comprises three million square miles of superfluous land. The czar, however, has repeatedly denounced a free press, as the greatest possible curse of a God-fearing nation, and by crossing his Cossacks with Abyssinian baboons he possibly hopes to reduce his breed of slaves to the desired degree of illiterate submissivness.

EXPERT TESTIMONY.

A few weeks before his death, the late duke of Marlborough wrote for the Fortnightly Review an article on the "Art of Living," which will be published before the end of the year. If the rumors about the domestic habits of his grace are founded on fact, he would hav been far more competent to expound the art of shortening life.

SUNLESS SEAS.

The discovery of fish with imperfectly developed eyes made it probable that sunlight does not reach beyond a certain depth of the ocean, but that conjecture has recently been confirmed to a rather unexpected degree. By means of extra-sensitiv photographic plates sunk in the Mediterranean on one of the calmest days of the year, an Italian scientist has demonstrated that the almost vertical rays of the noonday sun in midsummer do not penetrate beyond a depth of one hundred and fifty fathoms. A submarine theological seminary might prove an unrivaled success from an orthodox point of view.

A GEOGRAPHICAL PREDICTION.

The manager of a Missouri railroad line predicts that before long the eastward stream of travel will turn in a westerly and southerly direction. The great natural resources of the Sunny South will certainly yet be recognized, but as long as our national capital remains on the Potomac the temptation of an eastward journey will spring eternal in the breast of the American office-seeker.

INGENIOUS BY-LAWS.

The paternal government of the czar proposes to reconcile bulldozed Jews by permitting baptized husbands to marry a second wife if No. 1 refuses to renounce the errors of the Talmud. The permission to cremate a stiff-necked mother-in-law would probably double the number of converts.

FATAL PROGRESS.

The Tucson Indians of southern Arizona hav for ages inhabited a valley surrounded by an old stone wall and blessed with the only good springs of that neighborhood; but they are now dying out and ascribe their fate to the coal-smoke of the locomotivs passing the foot of their mountains. Smoke and longevity are as compatible as theology and digestiv vigor, but since the completion of that railroad the national fence of the Tucsons has probably been covered with patent-medicin advertisements.

VERBAL VENGEANCE.

The Hindoo saints, with all their power of self-denial, seem to hav had a penchant for indulging in the occasional luxury of strong language. Prof. Max Müller, in his "Curiosities of Sanscrit Literature," mentions a holy pundit who devoted his life to meditation and became so enraged at the midnight crowing of a cock that he pronounced a curse of three hundred and twenty-two syllables. It would be worth knowing to what length of profanity that scholar would hav been provoked by the serenades of an American switch engin.

ARMED RESISTANCE.

A few weeks ago a big bear entered the village of Gorowno, Russia, in broad daylight and broke the door of a roothouse, protected only by a wooden bar and a picture of a Muscovite saint. There was not a gun in the village, and a mob of rustics, armed with pitchforks, had to maneuver for a quarter of an hour before they could induce the invader to beat a retreat. The bear had come from a hunting preserve of the grand duke Constantine, but the villagers got off with an official remonstrance. In Pennsylvania they would prabably hav been indicted for high treason. F. L. OSWALD.

The Cause in the State of Washington.

The conspiracy of the Ministerial Alliances throughout the state; the uniting all their forces in opposing and evading the decision of the state attorney-general, and their avowed determination to use ev ry means to influence the legislature to repeal the law prohibiting Bible-reading, prayer, and religious exercises and instruction in our public schools, calls for especial vigilance, prompt action, and very much of hard work on the part of the officers of the Washington Secular Union.

The infamous disregard of law and every principle of right and justice by the contemptible sycophants and hired tools of the churches who disgrace the judge's bench in the state of Tennessee, proves that more depends upon the judges and the state attorney-general than on the law itself.

The Sunday law of Tennessee provides only for prosecution "before any justice of the peace of the county." The utmost penalty is $3, one-half to be paid to the informer, and the other half for the use of the county.

This is the only law on the subject in the state of Tennessee, yet for the past eight years prosecution, or more correctly speaking, persecution, of Christians, devout Bible-believers, who sacredly observed the Sabbath of the Bible, and quietly followed their lawful and usual vocations on the pope's Sunday, hav been taken before the circuit court, and the fine placed at whatever figure the judge chose to levy.

And a number of devout Christians, admitted by judges and prosecuting attorney to be honest, sober, industrious citizens, whose only offense was keeping the Sabbath of the Bible, and working on the pope's Sunday, were at the instigation of Christians of another denomination sentenced to jail from forty-five to sixty-five days, and driven to work on the public highway chained to negro criminals.

And the supreme court of the state of Tennessee, to curry favor with and secure the political influence of the orthodox churches, decided that "Christianity is part of the common law of the state of Tennessee" and these Sabbath-keepers according to the Bible must educate their consciences te obedience to the will of the majority.

The Christians of Tennessee hav set the example for the Ministerial Alliances o the state of Washington, and the same results will follow, unless the leaders of the political parties are made to realize that the Liberals of our state hav an organization whose number and influence make them a power for right and justice it is not safe for the politicians to ignore.

Hence the action taken by the executiv committee of the Washington Secular Union at our recent election.

We ask no one to vote against their conscience, or their individual interests, or to work for the exclusiv benefit of either party, but simply to so far lay aside party ties and affiliations as to vote only for those candidates for judge of supreme court, state attorney-general, and member of Congress—regardless of what ticket they were on—who could be relied on to do all in their power against reëstablishing prayers, Bible-reading, and religious exercises and instruction in our public schools; to repeal our present infamous revenue law, more especially the exemption of church property from taxation, and oppose the enactment of any puritanical, rigid Sunday observance laws.

Although failing of the full fruition of our hopes, we are well repaid for the expense incurred and the herculean work performed.

Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and it will be absolutely necessary to hav able and influential representativs of the Washington Secular Union at Olympia during the next sessions of our legislature, to keep a sharp watch against any subtle schemes of the enemy, so that by being forewarned and on the ground, every attempt at adverse legislation may be defeated.

This will entail considerable expense.

The funds should be provided at the earliest possible moment, so that the best and most economical arrangements may be made, and the services of those most desired secured.

Will every Liberal of the state look to the date of their certificate of membership in the Washington Secular Union, and if in arrears for dues, promptly remit to the secretary?

Will those who can send one year's dues, $2, instead of the usual $1 for six months?

The least approach to prayer or any religious exercise or instruction in any public school in the state is sure to bring the swift, earnest protest from the secretary of the Washington Secular Union; if it is not instantly heeded and the wrongdoing abandoned, appeal is made to, and orders for discontinuance received from, the state superintendent of public instruction.

The Washington Secular Union has defeated every effort made to enforce Sunday observance. Wherever arrests hav been made the secretary has flooded the place with pamphlets on the Sabbath and Sunday question, rendering the lives of the preachers a dismal burden because they are utterly unable to answer the incessant stream of questions by their members, "Why should we keep Sunday as the Sabbath, since it is nowhere so commanded in the Bible?" etc.

Now comes the fierce battle over repeal of the present outrageously unjust revenue law, and especially that part of it which exempts church property from taxation up to $5,000 and entirely exempts from all taxation all so-called Christian benevolent institutions.

The churches hav the inside track, for Christians willingly make self-sacrifices to aid their church organization and support their cause; while many Liberals are apathetic or careless, indifferent to the fact that the few are greatly overburdened, while they go free.

Remember the Washington Secular Union has accomplished more effectiv work, and made more judicious and economical use of the money contributed to it, than any other Liberal organization in the United States.

The present executiv committee are activ, successful business men who hav the confidence and respect of the community. They are practical men, zealous workers, conscientiously performing every duty imposed upon them.

Let every Liberal of the state of Washington observe the grand old heathen festival of the birthday of the sun, December 25th. Let us renew old friendships and form new ones, and giv gifts to make others happy.

Let not the patient burden-bearing editors and publishers of your Liberal papers be forgotten. Insure each of them a merry Christmas and a happy New Year by at once forwarding a year's subscription and a new subscriber.

Liberals of Washington, the cause you love needs help! To continue the good and effectiv work of the Washington Secular Union, contributions must be made and its membership increased.

Will all who favor reason, right, and truth; all who really desire complete divorce of church and state; all who are Liberals in very truth, and not mere Bible-kickers, Liberals only in name, send a gift to the Washington Secular Union, so that we may hav efficient representativs at Olympia during the next session of the legislature, and the work of the Union be done, its aims and objects carried to success? Send contributions to the treasurer, Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, 420 North L street, Tacoma, Wash.

C. B. Reynolds,
Sec. Washington Secular Union.

Of a Business Nature.

Attention is again called to the list of Saladin's works advertised on page 812, a large consignment of which we hav just received from England. Saladin is one of the most brilliant and sharpest writers in the Freethought ranks. Each of his books bears evidence that its author is a man of great genius wholly free from Christian superstition. It will please us greatly to circulate them widely in this country.

The Leaflet advocating the Sunday opening of the World's Fair ought to be scattered by the thousands. In December or January we shall send them to Congressmen and to others who may be influenced by argument. We need money to do this, and those who can afford to aid are requested to do so. The price of the Leaflet is 25 cents per dozen; $1.50 per hundred. Anyone who will distribute five hundred or a thousand can obtain them at special rates.

We also call attention to the advertisement of books for the holidays on page 798 of this paper. There are many beautiful things connected with the pagan festival in celebration of the returning sun, which the Christians hav adapted to their own use and called Christmas, chief of which is the kindly remembrance of friends with presents, and nothing can be more appropriate for such presents than books which instruct as well as please the eye.

The thirteenth edition of Helen Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods" is now being bound, and those who hav ordered paper-covered copies, but hav not received them, will be supplied in a few days. The book is having a large sale, but not larger than its merits warrant. Every woman in the land ought to read it, and we wish that Christian women particularly could be induced to do so. They would not then be such puppets for the priests to play with.

We hav made arrangements with Otto Wettstein whereby we can offer the Freethinker's Badge-Pin and The Truth Seeker together at a material reduction. The $2 pin and the paper one year for $4.50; the $2.75 pin and the paper for $5. Also the Ingersoll Souvenir Spoon and The Truth Seeker in combination at a still greater reduction. The tea spoon and the paper, $4.75; the sugar spoon and the paper, $5.25. We giv our subscribers the benefit of all discounts.

We shall shortly publish the fourth edition of the "Crimes of Preachers" If our readers see any records of the clergy being guilty of "ministerial conduct," from lying to murder, they will add to the world's knowledge and the cause of truth by marking the report and forwarding the paper containing it to this office. We desire to do all the justice possible to the reverend clergy who so kindly constitute themselvs our moral and religious guardians.

In our advertising columns will be found a list of political papers which we can get for those who want them at a reduction when ordered with The Truth Seeker. The papers—the Tribune, Sun, and World—are all good *news*papers, and one can select his politics to suit. We read them all and are entirely impartial. We also offer the Arena in combination with The Truth Seeker—with or without the picture premium—at a cheaper rate than it can otherwise be obtained. The Arena is the most progressiv and Liberal of all the monthlies and a great many of our readers will no doubt avail themselvs of the low terms offered.

We commend to others the example of Ben Kuhns, who sends us a list of ten trial subscribers, and writes such a cheering letter. Ten families will hav the truth brought to them every week, and with the neighbors who may read them, the result of his energy and good-will will extend a long way. Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, who is one of the best of friends, has sent us two good clubs of yearly subscribers, and many hav sent one new name when renewing. It is in this way that The Truth Seeker can be made a stronger force to oppose the church bigots. Liberty is a gainer every time a Freethought journal enters a new field.

We hav a few sample pages from "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" which we will send to anyone who desires it. This book is now in the fourth thousand, and a new edition is in press. Sent promptly on receipt of $2 for board-covered copies; $2.50 in cloth with gold side-stamp. "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" has been in print but a few months, but the bookbinders hav just finished binding the third thousand. Each of these books is of the convincing order, because Christians cannot get around the facts and arguments it contains, supported as they are by pictures which tell the story even to him who will not read. If those of our friends who possess these books will show them to their Liberal friends and mention the large discount made on them when ordered with The Truth Seeker for a year we think they will hav no difficulty in getting a new subscriber.

The Brooklyn Philosophical Association meets at Fraternity Rooms, Bedford avenue and South Second street, Brooklyn, E. D., Sundays, at 3 o'clock P.M.

J. E. Remsburg will start East on a lecturing tour toward the last of December. Liberals desiring lectures should write him at once. His address is Atchison, Kan.

Mr. Franklin Steiner will lecture in Creston, Ia., Sunday, December 18th, afternoon and evening. Liberals should address him for lectures at Box 882, Des Moines, Ia.

W. S. Bell's address will be for two months, 246 State street, Chicago, Ill. Persons wishing to arrange with him for Freethought lectures can address him there.

Letters of Friends.

To Open the Fair Gates.

NEW YORK, Dec. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Please add the inclosed $3 to your fund for the free circulation of the Leaflet. It may inspire Congressmen and others with wisdom and courage to do right.

Hopefully yours,
L. G. REED.

Thinks This Paper the Chief Means to Freedom.

TYNGSBORO, MASS., Dec. 1, 292.

MR. EDITOR: I congratulate you on becoming sole manager of the brave old TRUTH SEEKER, and a paper always grand shall now become more glorious if the professors of Freethought will prove as liberal of pocket as your merits warrant them in being.

If THE TRUTH SEEKER could be sown broadcast over the country it would do more toward truly secularizing our professedly secular government and freeing the minds of a people mostly free in name only, than can making officers for mutual admiration societies or signing petitions to catering Congresses and praying presidents.

JOHN P. GUILD.

A Lecturess Breaking Ground.

ESTELLINE, S. D., Nov. 28, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Estelline Liberals hav been highly pleased, and edified as well as pleased, with Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel's course of lectures, which were concluded yesterday. To those who hav listened to her logically reasoned discourses, I need not say that the constructiv side of Liberal thought has few abler exponents, and none more successful in winning friends and converts who will strengthen the cause. Friends in the Western and Southwestern states wishing her lectures may address her at Kansas City, Mo., care of Will T. Parry, city clerk's office; or at Dallas, Tex., care of Mrs. John W. Gish, 177 Browden street. Her campaign in this state has been the most thorough yet attempted by any Liberal lecturer.

Sincerely yours, C. L. ABBOTT.

Such as This Man Would Soon Secularize the Land.

COOPERSTOWN, N. D., NOV. 24, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5, for which please send the glorious old TRUTH SEEKER for three months to the parties herein named. I think you hav struck the right plan to introduce your paper, and if all old subscribers will only try, THE TRUTH SEEKER will soon be in every town in the United States. I would like to see it in every house. I hav been a member of your family now nearly one year, and find THE TRUTH SEEKER just what I wanted. I would hav taken it sooner, but I did not know there was any paper of the kind published; and there are hundreds of others the same way. But I hav not been idle since I became a member, for I hav sold four Bible Picture Books, one "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," and this makes my eleventh subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER—one for one year, and ten three months' men. But just think of the amount of good those ten three months' men may do.

Hoping I will hav more names and money soon, I remain,

Yours for liberty, BEN KUHNS.

Somebody May Be Interested.

BOSTON, MASS., Dec. 5, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I always read THE TRUTH SEEKER with much interest and show the pictures to friends and acquaintances, who are getting educated accordingly. In your paper of December 3d "A Yankee" givs a list of various inventions, many of which revolutionized the business to which they were applicable. There is one invention, the "Lone Star Cotton-Picker," which is entitled to a notice in the same list. It is only five years since Angus Campbell started his invention, and yet it is astonishingly successful, and a considerable number of the machines are steadily at work this season. I hav received a lot of Texas newspapers from a friend in that state and send you a cutting from one of them. It took McCormick more than twenty years to get his machine along to work in the field successfully. But this cotton-picker will even now pick as much cotton as forty ordinary men can. That is, a machine which can not cost more, by the quantity, than $400 to make it, will do the work of $40,000, reckoning as in slavery times, each man as $1,000. This will revolutionize in ten years, or less, cotton-picking, as much as Whitney's gin did the cotton-cleaning. The machine delivers the cotton cleaner into the bag than is done by hand-picking. I hav seen it work and know what it will do.

HENRY N. STONE.

Deists' Gods Are But Tin Like Christians'.

STAMFORD, CONN., NOV. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of November 26th you request answers to A. Augusta Chapman's article. Notwithstanding a large amount of the arguments put forth in it will be accepted and approved of by all Liberal-minded Freethinkers and Agnostics, there is one of the positions that does not tally with its general tone, viz.: "For the little tin God of orthodoxy I hav but little sympathy or respect, and you continue to batter at him to the end of the chapter without disconcerting me a particle or calling out any remonstrance on my part. But when you question the existence of the deity in any form and even deny the possibility of such an existence—a denial by no means easy to verify, by the way—it seems to me you are treading on hazardous, not to say nntenable, grounds, and hindering, if not imperiling, the very cause of truth and humanity you claim to hav most at heart." Does not the tin deity of A. A. C.'s conception occupy about as much space as does the "tin God of orthodoxy?" To me they both appear issues of the imagination. If both of them were placed on the point of a fine cambric needle, there would be still space enough left on it to accommodate that other immense character so ideally known to this visionary class of apprehensionists as a creator. What a happy time this "trio one" would hav in this immense garden of the imagination. As to the denial of the existence of a deity not being easy to verify, that is on a par with asserting the existence of such a personage, as there is no more evidence on the one side than on the other, and the one affirming such an existence is called upon to demonstrate his position, before the other can be called upon to prove a negativ. G. W. GORUM.

Prohibition a Wrong Way of Doing a Right Thing.

CONCORDIA, KAN., Dec. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Prohibition in Kansas has now been given up by its friends as a "lost cause." Its great chieftain, Rev. A. S. Embree, pastor of the First Methodist church at Topeka, the capital of the state, frankly admitted such to be the case in his last Sunday's sermon. Yielding to ecclesiastical and Prohibition influence, the Republicans put a strong Prohibition plank in their state platform this fall. The load was too heavy and they lost the state which they formerly held by eighty thousand majority.

As the head of ecclesiasticism in Kansas Rev. Mr. Embree has pretty much run the Republican party and the state for years. But now all this is changed. Prohibition, church interference in politics, and Republicanism are all knocked out. That is right. The good sense of the people of Kansas asserted itself at last. A party that will pander to church influences richly deserves to be knocked out.

Rev. Mr. Embree stated in plain language that Prohibition had proved itself a failure, that liquor was sold as freely in Kansas as in Missouri, and that there was no use in keeping a dead-letter law on the statutes as its continual and open violation had a demoralizing influence upon society.

This is just what our Kansas correspondents hav been telling us for years, but their allegations were disputed by Prohibitionists throughout the country. The fact of the business is, Prohibition is wrong. It is opposed to natural law. It is opposed to progress, is an obstacle in the way of moral reform and advancement, and will never commend itself to the thoughtful judgment of mankind.

S. R. SHEPHERD.

The Christian Clown Clowneth.

VERA CRUZ, MO., Nov. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I see in old Talmage's big splutter of October 9th, at Brooklyn, entitled "The Career of Columbus Viewed from a Religious Standpoint," he claims that America was a religious discovery and is going to be gospelized, if God does not fail in his undertakings, and says he never heard of his having anything to do with a failure. I wonder if the old "blow-hard" has forgotten the failure his G-a-w-d made when he created all things and praised his works by pronouncing them all very good, and then had to drown them on account of a failure he made? Or does he forget, as recorded in the first chapter of Judges, where his L-a-w-d was with Jonah and drove out the inhabitants of the mountain but could not drive them out of the valley because they had chariots of iron. He also says in his picture of "gospel America" that "Atheism has no right here, Infidelity has no right here, and vagabondism has no right here." Now, I would like to ask the old hypocrit with such a good charitable Christian heart, who gave him the right to class Atheism and Infidelity with vagabondism, simply because he is too infamous in his nature to see the truths and beauties in Atheism and Infidelity and teach them and proclaim them to the world instead of his own heathenish persecuting rot. I think it is time some of the yet remaining wolves in sheep's clothing would learn the beat of honesty in connection with a respect for the rights and feelings of others, instead of always trying to make their own filth popular by throwing mud at others. I am ashamed to hav to use such language as this as applying to any member of the human family, and can only justify it with a knowledge of the fact that almost anything is admissible in self-defense, and that in my estimation the quickest way to get rid of such low, groveling, persecuting, brutish, mud-slinging natures is to put it to them in plain, undeniable terms and show them up to the world.

S. B. DAVIS.

"I Am a Slave of This Christian Country."

CHEMAWA, ORE., NOV. 28, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I liv within about a quarter of a mile of what is known as the government Indian school of Chemawa, which will be the subject of my letter. This school is supposed to be run by the government of the United States of America, and in one sense of the word it is. The superintendents are appointed by the president. With the exception of one, all the superintendents for the last eight years hav been members of some church; and I think the last three, all of whom I believe were appointed by Mr. Harrison, were ministers of the gospel. The superintendent has the power to choose the other officers, and as a matter of course most of them are church-members. I know, within my own knowledge, of one employee being turned off simply because he was a Catholic and the superintendent a Methodist, and this may hav been the cause of others being discharged.

The pupils of the school are compelled to go to prayer-meeting twice a week, to Sunday-school and church every Sunday. There is a passage in the laws of the school that prohibits both dancing and social card-playing. I might tell you more, but I think this enough to convince a few of the people of this free country how far we are from what we claim to be. I will copy a line from the amendments of the Constitution: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." While this is a fact, there is not an incorporated town in the state of Oregon that I know of where the stores and all houses of business are not closed on Sunday, and in some places the mail is not delivered under any consideration on Sunday. If a laborer does work on Sunday he cannot compel his employer to pay him. If a contract is made on Sunday it is not considered lawful. And so on. How much better are we now than we were before the civil war? The Indians of this country are in some respects treated almost as bad as the negroes were before the late war. They are sent to this government school by Indian agents. They are kept here for a term of from one to five years under government rules carried out by the ministers of the gospel. The poor men of the country hav to pay a tax to keep up this school, while there are thousands of dollars' worth of church property that goes untaxed. Yes, it sounds nice to say, "I am a free citizen of the United States!" It would sound more appropriate if I would say, "I am a slave of this Christian country!"

I read in a letter in your paper of November 16th of Liberals or Freethinkers going to church because they had no other place to go on Sunday. I would like to say this: I can learn more about the Bible, and other things too, out of one of your TRUTH SEEKERS than I ever did at all the churches I hav been to, and I hav gone to church a great deal. Maybe it was because I did not hav the sense to understand it. But I think it was because there was no sense to be derived from it.

Yours for truth, liberty, and justice,
WILL BEATY.

No God—The Bible False—Nature Sufficient.

BINGHAMPTON, N. Y., NOV. 26, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 26th the thoughts of A. Augusta Chapman seem to be a sort of a compromise between supposition and fact—Rationalism and inherited superstition. The writer tries to be Rational and at the same time a believer in something actually unknown and intangible. Perhaps, when I giv my ideas I may be open to criticism and to contradiction. We can not all think alike. Let me say a few things concerning my own ideas of DEITY.

God is represented as a being which existed prior to everything, and created all things. Now, when I attempt to speak or think of anything or any condition of things that existed in the beginning, I am lost in the thought that there was no beginning. So when I think of the space which contains all things, reason revolts against the idea that there can be any such thing as a limit to space. If space is limitless and boundless and matter as eternally old as the beginning of time, can time hav had a birthplace? can space hav been created? Who and what created God? The idea of such a being as God is represented to be—the origin and creator of everything—is entirely abstract, having no foundation whatever in reason. The idea that some superior being, or dozens, or hundreds, or millions of superior beings, may be set or placed in supervision of the world or the solar system to which we are molecule attachments, would be more reasonable than to subscribe to the doctrin that some one particular being or intelligence created and rules and supervises the entire known and unknown universe. The safest thing we can do in this world is to profit by what we gain of actual knowledge, and lay no plans, attempt no prospects, form no laws, and create no creeds based upon belief in anything we know nothing about.

I do not believe that any portion of the Bible is an inspiration beyond the imagination of the old pagan priests who invented its impossible occurrences, and frightened their ignorant and superstitious followers into believing their lies. In spite of the fact that a concerted and powerful effort is being made to keep the human mind and imagination bound to do reverence and vow allegiance to the inconsistencies of that old volume, actual knowledge, scientific discovery, and a free scope to reason hav done more within the past fifty years to expose and shatter the old fraud than has been done in all the days of known history; and among the many new things that scientific research brings to light the human mind has enough and more than enough to occupy itself. We do not need the formulated creeds of the churches to guide us in the right. Conception of right and wrong, either mentally or otherwise, comes to humanity by means of the effects which hav always followed certain action. Natural law punishes those who violate it, and the violator finds wherein he has sinned, whether in following or avoiding the many contradictory and conflicting rules of morality taught from the Bible.

Of the mind, or soul, and immortality, I will at some future time tell what I think.

Reptil Catholics.

NEW YORK, Oct. 24. 1892.

MR. EDITOR: At a meeting of fifty-nine Roman Catholic societies held in the Catholic Institute, Newark, N. J., a resolution was offered to carry any national flag in the procession of the Columbus celebration, October 21st. Ex-Alderman John Drudder arose to his feet and said impressivly: "We should hav the papal flag first. We are Catholics first and Americans afterward." There was a dead silence for the space of a few minutes. No one lifted his voice in condemnation of the treasonable act.

Shades of my ancestors! Is this favorit, minion, of the pope of Rome—this "thing"—to be tolerated in this country of ours, without being rebuked by those persons who wish well for the liberty the country givs them?

We advocate free thought without prejudice, bigotry, or superstition. Such fellows are dangerous men in a republic like ours. They cannot be citizens of the United States so long as they hold to the supremacy of the pope of Rome's temporal and spiritual power.

Arguments upon such disloyal knaves and petty rascals are lost. Ridicule is the weapon best to use with such superstitious scoundrels. It is better than reason to those blind guides, leaders of the blind. But what can you expect from the ignorant and prejudiced superstitious who carry a greasy prayer-book with them to mass, when the priest recites Latin to the dupes, they not understanding a word the priest says? Well, when it's folly to be wise ignorance may be bliss.

It makes the honest heart of man sick when he sees there is so much hypocrisy and dissimulation with regard to religious character. Sensible men should hav more wisdom and common sense than to be gulled by a set of Jesuitical priests, who hav been driven out of almost every nation on the face of earth, now making their home in these United States. That arch-fanatic Ignatius Loyola founded the order of the Society of Jesus of the Romish church, and it was checked and expelled from England in 1604; Venice in 1606; Portugal in 1759; France in 1761; Spain and Sicily in 1767, and totally suppressed and abolished by Pope Clement XIV. in 1773; expelled from Naples in 1860; and now in 1892 is spreading superstitious ideas among the Puritans and Freethinkers of this country. The Jesuits are using herculean strength; making every effort to gain power and sow the seeds of discord among the people of this country; encroaching on the school question; using deceit, plotting, intriguing, swearing and forswearing and denying the truth. These are the characteristics of the Roman Catholic Jesuit priests. And what are you going to do about it? Nothing but talk, talk. They say talking is cheap. I begin to think so too. For but little effort is made to check the advance of the enemy.

The rash proposition of an ardent Catholic over in Jersey to carry the papal flag at the head of a procession of schools, calls for a prompt condemnation. This Jesuitical order is sworn to do whatever the pope may order. It was the case with Father Mazilla, who came to the United States in 1864 and while here became a citizen to fill the chair in the famous Jesuit College of Woodstock, Md. He was recalled to Rome in 1878, and in 1886 was made cardinal. He is now in the Gregorian College at Rome for being sent to the United States as a spy on our free institutions.

We subscribe to the proper distinction made by our distinguished friend R. G. Ingersoll in explanation to the priest Maurelian: "I do not attack persons. I do not denounce Catholics, but Catholicism. I do not deride Protestants, but I do attack their creed. I hate no one because he is a Catholic. But with every drop of my blood I hate the superstitions that enslave the mind and seek to giv organized credulity the control of this world." Noble words, worthy of the man that made them. With the above Liberal principles we will convert the world to Freethought.

Parties are pushing heaven and earth to elect Cleveland or Harrison president of the United States, when they take no heed of a snake coiled up ready to spring on both candidates, and the confiding people. No notice is taken, no anxiety manifested, in dread of another Bartholomew eve. "Oh, yes," says one, "your imagination is futil, trifling, worthless, talkativ." Ah, when the hand is at the throat it may be too late to resist. Forewarned is forearmed. History repeats itself. The people of the United States will not be an exception.

Religion's Crime-Stained Career.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Nov. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: At all times men hav endeavored to produce harmony of religious belief — with but few exceptions, the Quakers for instance. The work of gaining proselytes by force as well as by persuasion has ever been prosecuted by the adherents of the different theological systems. The pages of history are replete with the records of religious wars carried on to produce a unification of faith. Of all wars there are none which teem with so many chapters of horrors and cruelties as these dreadful struggles waged in the so-called sacred name of religion. Not alone hav these wars been waged in ancient times, as for instance the war of Antiochos against the Jews; or in uncivilized portions of the globe; but we find that the most sanguinary strifes of this nature hav taken place in comparativly modern ages and in the most civilized countries of Europe. Yet it is common to hear a certain class of ignorant and thoughtless Christians talk of the evils and vices generated by Infidelity and Atheism! They are but the dust in the balance when compared with the crime, misery, devastation, and loss of life that hav marked the course of religion century after century. Who does not recollect with a shudder the horror of that one single night of St Bartholomew when thousands of Protestants were massacred in cold blood by Catholics; the thirty years' religious war in Germany; the nearly two hundred years' war of the Crusades; the persecutions of the Waldenses and Albigenses; the Spanish Inquisition (hundreds of thousands of my nativ brothers were plundered, as I am a Hebrew myself); the long age of Catholic disability in Great Britain, and hundreds of similar instances, together with the religious barbarities practiced in our own country upon the Quakers and Baptists? Precisely what Jesus meant when he said, "I come not to send peace on earth but a sword," may be doubted, but it would seem from history that the career of his religion is marked by the sword rather than by peace. Religious faith has always been a fighter, and there is not probably a Christian government on earth today in which religion is not established by force or law. Our own government does not recognize any religion, and the only reason is that it is not Christian, though the sectarians are laboring to make it so by placing in the Constitution an acknowledgment of God, Jesus Christ, and the Bible. If their pious and suicidal amendment should succeed—which may Liberalism prevent!—then the United States like the old bigots and pope of Rome will be a fighter "for the faith once delivered to the saints," and then, perhaps, will be realized what the Christians mean when they say that "all the nations of the earth hav become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ," for in that day the saints will hav "the heathen for an inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession, and there shall be no disturbers [or Liberals] in all God's holy mountain," for the Liberals shall hav no rights that Christians shall feel bound to respect and consequently be cut off with a holy indignation as cumberers of the ground! Brother Liberals, you see your fate should "the chosen servants of the Lord" ever obtain universal sway or dominion. Watch them and resist their plans!

This subject to which we hav been alluding, the fight of religion, is eminently suggestiv of the great weakness which this faith must inherently possess. It claims to be of heaven—to hav God for its author; Jesus Christ for its first teacher; a holy church, since his time, for its expounder; government for its protector; wealth, fashion, talent, popularity, interest, rank, to render it respectable; persecution, fine, imprisonment, social and legal proscription, and death as its aider and abettor, and punishment of an implacable devil and an eternal hell as the lot and portion of those who reject it. Such are the "means and appliances" which the Christian faith has had and used in its fight. Nor does it seem to hav relied much, if any, on any other. It never dared to depend on the truth alone and unaided by force for its conquests or victories. And herein we see its inherent weakness. It must therefore come to an end. And the end is rapidly approaching. Christianity is not to be a finality. Mankind are to hav something better. And we see the cheering evidence of the fact in the decay of superstition, bigotry, and priestcraft, and the increase of free thought, free inquiry, and mental liberty. The age of faith has got to die out and be superseded by the Age of Reason.

What Is a Cherub?

KERNVILLE, CAL., Dec. 6, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In several of Watson Heston's fine illustrations appearing in late numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, he pictures a cherub as being an angel of tender years. As this idea of a cherub coincides with the definition found in Webster's dictionary, the writer never doubted its accuracy until quite recently. That opinion was changed only last week by an incident which I will relate.

In the early part of last week two candidates, both prominent and influential men, whose veracity cannot be doubted, paid a visit to this remote section of the country, looking after their interests in the coming election. The road traversed is a tortuous route, along the sides of steep mountains and cliffs and through deep gorges and canyons, a road such as can be found only in rough mountains.

It was while descending a steep grade over one of those high bluffs, about the worst place on the entire route, so they relate, they observed, perched upon top of a cliff on the opposit side of the canyon, a hideous monster of gigantic size. They had had no time to think, when, with an ear-splitting scream, which sounded like the braying of a donkey, with the intensity of a steam whistle, it stretched forth its wings, arose in the air for a short distance, and then darted toward them. So swift was its flight that the gentlemen had no time to gather their terror-stricken and scattered senses as it bore down upon them. When just over them its flight suddenly checked, and with gentle motion of its gigantic wings it remained almost stationary for just one moment, and then with another wild shriek darted down.

Their spirited team of bays, which had already taken fright and were rearing and plunging, suddenly dashed forward at a breakneck speed down the steep grade just in time to escape the monster, which in its final swoop struck the top of the buggy, tearing a large rent in the cover. The horses sped on down the road, greatly to the peril of the two occupants of the buggy. After running for about three hundred yards they succeeded in getting the team again under control. They did not stop, however, but kept up a lively gait until they reached town, where they related their adventure to a crowd of eager listeners. The gentlemen felt so very thankful for their escape that they at once proceeded to render praises and supplications to the voter in true political style. The news spread rapidly and soon quite a large crowd gathered about the new arrivals. One of the gentlemen, Mr. Blank, described the monster as follows:

"It had a head like that of a monstrous crane, with bill about seven feet long and ears like a mule. Its neck was covered with wool, while the breast and remainder of the body, which was like that of a gigantic lizard, was covered with scales, except a strip along its back, which was covered with long hair that hung down on either side like the mane of a horse. Its tail was like that of a fish. The body from the eyes to the tail was about eleven feet. Its fore legs were short and provided with long and strong claws. Its hind legs were very long, shaped like those of a goat, and bare of covering except hoofs. Its wings were like a bat's wiugs and measured from tip to tip about nineteen feet. But one of the most remarkable features of its curious make-up," remarked Mr. Blank, "was two hands, like the hands of a hired man, just under its wings. In the right hand it carried an auger and a small suction pump, and in the left hand it carried a meat-saw and a Colt's revolver. It also wore glasses and had a carving knife in its boot-leg."

Then, after calling the boys up to the bar, where they could all hear, Mr. Blank struck a dramatic attitude and added:

"Boys, I would not experience another trip like that for the best office in Kern county." And the "boys," as of one voice, replied: "Hoping you will be as lucky in November." And nearly everybody smiled.

The writer having become much interested in the description of this animal, and remembering having read somewhere in the Bible a description of an animal resembling this one, search was at once begun in that book for such information as it contained thereon. Unfortunately for the student of natural history, Mr. Adam did not leave a record of the animals he named. This is indeed a thing to be greatly regretted; but before blaming Mr. Adam for this omission, we must remember that at that time paper was a scarce article and must hav commanded an exorbitant price—a luxury that could be indulged in only by those who were very wealthy, while Mr. Adam was a poor man, working for his board and clothes.

By the kindness of Mr. Ezekiel, this omission of Mr. Adam is supplied in so far as it relates to the description the writer was seeking of an animal somewhat like that seen by our friends, the candidates, and which Mr. Ezekiel says belongs to the cherub species.

Now, as Mr. Ezekiel lived before cherubim became extinct and met them on several occasions, he should be considered as good authority on the subject. He tells us that at one time, while sojourning on the Chebar river, he met and interviewed some cherubim, which he describes at great length in his book of prophecies (Ezek. i). That part that interests us most at present is the faces, which he describes as follows: "As for the likeness of faces, they four had the face of a man, and the face of a lion, on the right side; and they four had the face of an ox on the left side; they four also had the face of an eagle" (Ezek. i, 10). At a later date Mr. Ezekiel met these same cherubim at another place and again interviewed them, as related in Ezek. x. He here describes their faces as follows:

"And everyone had four faces: the first face was the face of a cherub, and the second face was the face of a man, and the third the face of a lion, and the fourth the face of an eagle" (Ezek. x, 14).

Now, after reading these two descriptions of the same subject, by the same author, the only logical conclusion we can arrive at is that a cherub and an ox are one and the same thing; Webster's dictionary to the contrary notwithstanding. But as it is almost certain that no one in any way connected with the compiling of Webster's dictionary ever saw a cherub, we must giv Mr. Ezekiel's testimony due credence, unless we regard him in the same light that we do some of our more modern acquaintances, who cannot relate the same story a second time as we heard them relate it before. With all due respect for the dead, and fearing that the late Mr. Ezekiel may hav some descendants living in our neighborhood, we dare not say we believe him guilty of such gross prevarications, but must accept his statement that a cherub and an ox are identical. How cute a cherub must hav been. Further investigation into the story of the monster seen by our political friends confirms their story. The investigators also established the fact that it was only a large musketo which had strayed away from the neighborhood of Bakersfield. This will also account for the fact that it hesitated just at the critical moment. It had probably seen the gentlemen before, knew them to be candidates, and was debating in its own mind if it was safe to tackle so much cheek and such an abundance of gall.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Choice.

A row of urchins in a school
Are often questioned. As a rule,
The answers pert, above the mark,
Ofttimes emit a lively spark.

"Now, Jimmy C., what will you be?"
"A soldier brave with a good sword!"
Then Johnny Fry made quick reply:
"I'll be a farmer and a lord."

Kind-hearted, stupid little Jack,
Whose life was love, found books alack;
Had in his mind a better plan,
And gently said, "I'll be a man!"

Now Lucy Stout put forth a pout:
She would study for a teacher;
And Mary Jane, so full of tune,
From the choir would view the preacher.

But Nellie Wiles, in blushing smiles,
Now very quickly turned the van,
And said that she would rather be
The better-half of Jackie's plan.

Her Name.

I'm losted! Could you find me, please?"
Poor, little, frightened baby!
The wind had tossed her golden fleece,
The stone had scratched her dimpled knees,
I stooped and lifted her with ease,
And softly whispered, "Maybe."

"Tell me your name, my little maid,
I can't find you without it."
"My name is Shiney-eyes," she said.
"Yes, but your last?" She shook her head.
"Up to my house 'ey never said
A single fing about it."

"But, dear," I said, "what is your name?"
"Why, didn't you hear me tell you?
Dust Shiney-eyes." A bright thought came:
Yes, when you're good; but when they blame
You, little one—it's just the same
When mamma has to scold you?"

"My mamma neber scolds," she moans,
A little blush ensuing,
"'Cept when I've been a-frowing stones,
And then she says" (the culprit owns),
"Methetable Sappbira Jones,
What has you been a-doing?"

Legend.—Continued.

"Yes," said Seth, "the world is making some progress in that which is good, but the ideal of benevolence is appreciated rather than the practice of it. Our little dog, which Mrs. Chase named Fido Augustus Napoleon Bonaparte, wishes to benefit us, but his organization encumbers him and prevents it. I heard a gentleman say yesterday, 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die, and that is the end of us.' But," observed Seth, "the dignity of life is not impaired by its abrupt termination. The triumph of the individual passes into that of the race. Religious affection does not cultivate the heart, either for this world or the next. It givs a little with one hand for show, and brutalizes with the other, caressing the bejeweled tramp while the poor person, adorned with every grace and virtue, is trampled on, even by pious particular friends."

"Must we think," said Mr. Willing, who was present, "it is often on the back track—I mean evolution? Cannot nature furnish anything strong enough to hold us firmly in a high position, if we are fortunate to arrive there? The grace of God never accomplishes this; there is no holy fly-wheel, or center of operations, but now and then some unselfish branch or sprout causes a king or savage to love you and the world. Some other king or savage will, tiger-like, hunt you down. Individuals, not machines, are the order of the day. Voltaire, as a Christian, would build churches. Let this government be in the hands of Ingersoll and every poor man would hav a piece of land in his own town, not going to the Pacific shore for it, nor having to kill five or six Indians to get possession. Why are spiders and devilfishes more plentiful than honey-bees? A spider once remarked in his sententious way, of a rich, selfish Christian,

"'Of such cruel behavior, how guiltless am I;'
Then turned to devour a poor innocent fly.

"Spiders are very unamiable," continued Seth. "Little Emma Chase says she likes wild animals, and when I told her a story about a fiery griffin and a ramping cat, you should see how her eyes sparkled and how she smiled. Hogg, the poet, carries beauty into the insect world:

"The cricket tunes his tiny reed,
And harps behind the embers dun.

"If the church cannot be tender and kind, it should bring literature and the fine arts to the rescue of the human race, something to soften their savage ways.

"They say their Christ was so lowly and kind, but Christians seem to be more hardened every day. You see those church cottages, across the way? People suppose that the poor are helped and comforted there. But Christ's suffering members are insulted there, although broken down with hard work, and if they hav not fine furniture or fine clothes they may be thankful if they can get to the poorhouse.

"Idle tales and lies are believed about them. Holy saints liv in luxury and scarcely share a crust with them. Some churches believe that they are stronger than the Bible, and no wonder, for it has accomplished so little. It has to be propped up and apologized for by the clergy, and if they could do without it the world would be relieved of a nightmare and a burden.

As time rolls on, I hope the clergy will say more about kindness and benevolence, and less respecting the Bible, splendid ceremonies, and expensiv churches.

Lexington, Ky, Nov. 2, 1892. ALHAZA.

P.S.—Mr. Camden, a clergyman, just called, and remarked that his Infidel friends were kinder to him than his own church-members, who were mostly malicious and cruel. Reason is better than faith. A.

The Ingersoll Spoon.

Hav you seen the Ingersoll souvenir spoon made by our ingenious and Liberal brother Otto Wettstein, of Rochelle, Ill.? If you hav seen it you are certainly impressed with its elegance and artistic finish. There are spoons and spoons in all sorts of designs and all kinds of elaborate workmanship, but I hav never seen one anywhere the equal of the Ingersoll. As the great orator is sui generis, so is the spoon that bears his name. The other day some friends were viewing my collection of souvenir spoons, some from across the ocean. Presently a lady took up the Ingersoll spoon. "Oh, this is more beautiful than all the others!" she exclaimed. "It is exquisit. And whose portrait is it? Not Shakspere? No. Oh, I see; it is Henry VIII.!" A gentleman looked at the spoon and laughed outright. "Why," said he, "that is Bob Ingersoll; don't you know our Robert?" The good Christian lady looked and looked again. "Is that a likeness of Ingersoll, that I hav read so much about? Why, what a fine face it is! And so that is Ingersoll? Well, I want a spoon like that, and I must hav it!"

It is indeed a lovely design, showing not only a fine portrait of the great leader of Freethought, but the torches of Liberty and Reason are strongly defined in the midst of rich scrollwork and delicate lines of great beauty.

We sometimes hardly know what to get for our friends for gifts at birthday and holiday seasons. An Ingersoll souvenir spoon is very appropriate for such occasions. It is durable and lasting in its nature, and is ever an inspiration to noble thought and right living. S. H. W.

Correspondence.

COOPERSTOWN, Nov. 15, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is the first time I hav ever written to the Corner.

I liv on a farm in North Dakota. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I go to school and study Fifth Reader and Appleton's large arithmetic. I am ten years old. I hope this letter will escape the waste-basket. Your friend,

BEE HUHNS.

[We always like to hear from the little busy bee.—ED. C. C.]

CLEONE, CAL., Nov. 15, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines. I am a friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER and like it very well. I am a girl of fourteen years. I go to school, and hav many studies. Our teacher is a Catholic. There are two families in our neighborhood of twenty that are Freethinkers. The girls at school begin to argue with me on religion, but when I ask them questions they withdraw because they cannot answer. I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will forever grow, that it may some time be the leading paper. I will close now, as my letter will be too long. Hoping this will escape the waste-basket, I remain,

A friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER,
OLGA FRITZSCHE.

ROGERS, ARK., Nov. 25, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. My pa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and I like to read the Corner. There are five churches here. Sometimes I go to Sunday-school, but I do not believe that which they teach. Mr. Remsburg was here the 19th and gave us a nice lecture. He told the Christians some truths which they did not wish to hear—how they persecuted people in the olden times for not believing their way. I am ten years old. I go to school; there are six rooms in the building, with three hundred and fifty scholars. Yesterday being Thanksgiving I had a nice little party. We played some nice games. I play some pieces out of my "Cosmian Hymn-book," in which my brothers and sisters, six of us in all, join me—as well as in free thought and speech. I will close by saying, Hurrah for liberty and THE TRUTH SEEKER! STELLA L. WALTERS.

[Six bright young Freethinkers! Who shall say the cause of liberty and progress is not in the advance? May the Walters family never be less.—ED. C. C.]

BUNDYSBURG, O., Nov. 25, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Seeing letters from various children, I thought I would write one. I am twelve years old, and hav a brother who is sixteen. We go to school. I study physiology, Ray's Third Part; Practical Arithmetic; spelling; grammar; history, and complete geography. This week I hav to draw a map of the United States and color it with crayon pencils. I would like to hear if some of the young Freethinkers hav to draw like this.

I heard J. R. Charlesworth speak in Middlefield last winter, and he stayed with us two nights. I would like to see and hear him speak again. My father is a Freethinker and has an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 19th. He considers Keeler's "Short History of the Bible" one of the most valuable books of the world. He has Davidson, Colenso, Waite, Graves, Kelso, Ingersoll, and many other such books.

We hav a nice pet dog, whose name is Ring, and we all think the world of him.

Should any of the children write to me I will try and answer them.

I hav attended Sunday-school in our schoolhouse this summer, simply out of curiosity, not because I believe the teachings.

They tried to tread on my father's toes last Sunday, by saying God struck people dead in olden times, and that it would be a good thing if he would strike some dead in this age. Which father took to mean him. When they dismissed Sunday-school he spoke to them a piece that they could comprehend without an interpreter.

Father is a director and granted them the house and did not feel like being trodden upon. This is my first. If it escapes the waste-basket, perhaps I will write again. LURA M. FENTON.

[It is owing to Liberal teaching that the usages of an ignorant past are not carried out in this day as in the olden time. The more we sustain and spread Liberal truths, the more enlightened will become the world.—ED. C. C.]

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS),

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.
Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."
In two volumes, cloth, gilt lettered, $2.50.

DID JESUS RISE FROM THE DEAD?

The evidence for the resurrection is in this book carefully considered, and found wanting. It ought to convince every Christian of the untruthfulness of this alleged miracle, for it is certainly one of the best essays ever written on the subject.
In paper, 25 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science.
In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE and OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin
In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Licentiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Absolution; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Liguori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attempts at Continency even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism.
In paper, 25 cents.

PUBLICATIONS.

The Last Tenet; Imposed upon the Khan of Tomathoz. By Hudor Genone, author of "Inquirendo Island." Copiously illustrated with original drawings by Louis M. Glackens. 12mo, 165 pages; cloth, $1.25; paper, 50c.

Inquirendo Island. A novel. By Hudor Genone. 12mo, 353 pages; cloth, $1; paper, 50c. "This book is to me a delightful surprise. In my judgment it is a stronger piece of fiction than Edward Bellamy's 'Looking Backward,' which at times it reminds one of. It is a merciless exposure of Pharisaism and hypocrisy, which is so prevalent in fashionable Christianity of to-day. It is a good book, and while it will offend many, should be read by all."—[The Arena.

Lecture on the Bible. By Rev. Charles Voysey, pastor of the Theistic church of London, with a new introduction by Rev. Herbert Taft Root. Paper, 37 pages; 20c.

God in the Constitution. By Arthur B. Bradford. Paper, 18mo, 18 pages; 10c.

A Study of Primitive Christianity. By Lewis G. Janes. Cloth, octavo, gilt top, uncut edges, 319 pages; $1.25. "Dr. Janes is evidently a thorough scholar, and one cannot fail to be impressed with the care, the honesty, the faithfulness, the impartiality, the love of truth, the conservatism exhibited throughout this admirable volume."—[Popular Science Monthly.

What Can Ethics Do For Us? By William Mackintire Salter. Paper, 12mo, 32 pages, 10c.

Freedom of Thought and of Speech. By William Mackintire Salter. Paper, 12mo, 29 pages, 10c.

The Morals of Christ. A comparison with the contemporaneous systems of Mosaic, Pharisaic, and Græco-Roman ethics. By Austin Bierbower. Paper, 16mo, 200 pages, 50c.; cloth, $1. "Mr. Bierbower has carefully analyzed the old-world ethical systems which chiefly concern the modern civilized world, and in this book he has so classified the elements revealed by that analysis as to give them a high scientific value. His book is almost as systematic as a treatise upon one of the exact sciences, and stands in fine contrast to the rambling, ethical discussion of which we hear so much and which leads us nowhere."—[Chicago Daily News.

Liberty and Life. Seventeen discourses on the applications of scientific truth to morals and religion. By E. P. Powell. 12mo, 208 pages; cloth, $1; paper, 50c. "Strong, even bold, essays on ethical and religious subjects. They are the work of a man of vigorous intellect, who has studied the doctrine of evolution long and carefully, and has not found it necessary to abandon all his old reverences. The discourses are full of interest to the casual reader by reason of their fund of anecdote and biographical citation, and to the seeker for religious and moral truth they offer many helps."—[Literary World.

Evolution and Christianity. A Study. By J. C. F. Grumbine. Cloth, square 18mo, 75 pages, 30c. "Mr. Grumbine's statements are sound and well put. His book is the fruit of wide reading and investigation. It is a helpful one, is thoroughly interesting reading, and its presentation of the relation between evolution and Christianity includes much valuable thought."—[Buffalo Express.

News of the Week.

HERBERT SPENCER is seriously ill.

DR. CYRUS EDSON, a chief of the New York city health board, predicts the revival of cholera with spring.

DURING services in the Miller chapel of Monroe, O., on the 8th, Frank Lewis and James Needles quarreled, and fell upon each other with razor and revolver.

AT San Antonio, Tex., Annie Clifton, a colored girl, has fallen a victim of religious excitement. She went into a trance two weeks ago and has taken no food or drink since.

IT is said that the declaration of railroads that they will reduce rates to the Fair but slightly is but "bluff," aimed to keep the rates high at the start so that they may not sink too low toward the end.

THE publishers of Printers' Ink complain that Wanamaker makes them pay postage of one cent a copy, amounting to $500 or $600 a week, while admitting his own publication, Book News, a rival to Printers' Ink in the same line, at one cent a pound.

JAY GOULD'S will leaves all to his family and nothing to college, museum, or hospital. One London paper says that Gould was intellectually almost equal to Napoleon I., and that his operations extended over nearly as extensiv a territory and were conducted by the employment of much the same mental faculties and habits.

CHURCH people at Slight's Station, Mich., were shocked last Sunday by seeing twenty men sawing, splitting, and piling up wood. The Sunday workers were Lutherans, and at nightfall they had enough wood piled in the shed of a crippled and sick brother to last all winter. While they labored they sang hymns and occasionally offered a prayer.

PRIEST CORRIGAN, of Hoboken, N. J., will be tried by his bishop for criticising the German Catholic congress at Newark. Corrigan says he opposed two things—denunciation of the public schools as "abominations;" and the attempt to preserve foreign languages in our schools and convert America into several diverse nations by means of the Catholic church.

SUPERINTENDENT GARDNER of the Crosby Society for the Prevention of Crime, of which Dr. Parkhurst is now president. was arrested on the 4th on the charge of blackmail. The complainant is the proprietress of a house of prostitution. She had complained to the police, who set a trap, and marked bills from the woman were found on Gardner. She tells a long tale of her acquaintance with him. In ithe figures as blackmailing her for some time; driving about in cabs on pleasure trips and drinking wine with her; displaying utter lack of principle; laughing about the churchmen as "psalm-singers" and jocosely designating brothel-keepers as "schoolteachers." The case against him is formidable. The feeling against the spying societies is strong and growing.

LIEUTENANT TOTTEN, the "calamity-howler" par excellence, has gained a convert in the person of James Holly, bishop of Hayti. The bishop writes: "Professor Totten appears as the verifier, the systematizer, the simplifier, and the popularizer of the deep researches of others who hav preceded him in that portion of biblical and historical studies which are of the most momentous importance to the generation in which we liv. By the special task which Professor Totten imposed upon himself he has placed the church and the world under the most solemn responsibility to bestir themselvs to prepare for the coming events already foreshadowed in the days in which we liv, but which it is to be feared they will not realize until the last dread judgments of our closing dispensation shall be upon them."

THE steamship Spree landed at Queenstown, Ireland, on the 3d, disabled and having been in great peril in storms. Evangelist Moody, who was aboard, asserts that providence directly interposed to save the seven hundred passengers. They assembled and read Ps. xci and prayed. Moody says: "God answered us as I knew he would. He sent us a rescuing ship, and he calmed the sea so that for a week it was as smooth as it is in this harbor, though there were storms all around us. It was the grandest test of prayer I ever knew. My son was with me. He is a student in Yale College, and the learned professors there hav instilled in him some doubts about God's direct interference in answer to prayer. . . . My boy couldn't rest. About 2¼ o'clock he came and woke me. He pointed out an occasional glimpse of a tiny light. 'It is our star of Bethlehem,' he cried, 'and our prayers are answered.' The waves were stilled and the winds were hushed by divine command."

Gems of Thought.

POLITICAL rights hav been preserved by traitors; the liberty of mind by heretics. —Ingersoll.

CUT out the love of self like an autumn lotus, with thy hand. Cherish the road to peace.—Buddha.

MORE than half the habitable world is still peopled with two-footed animals who liv in the horrible state approaching to pure nature, existing and clothing themselvs with difficulty, scarcely enjoying the gift of speech, scarcely perceiving that they are unfortunate, and living and dying almost without knowing it.—Voltaire.

I WANT the flower and fruit of a man: that some fragrance be wafted over from him to me, and some ripeness flavor our intercourse. His goodness must not be a partial and transitory act, but a constant superfluity, which costs him nothing and of which he is unconscious. This is a charity that hides a multitude of sins. The philanthropist too often surrounds mankind with the remembrance of his own cast-off griefs as an atmosphere, and calls it sympathy. We should impart our courage, and not our despair, our health and ease, and not our disease, and take care that this does not spread by contagion.—Thoreau.

COMPLETE truthfulness is one of the rarest of virtues. Even those who regard themselvs as absolutely truthful are daily guilty of over-statements and understatements. Exaggeration is almost universal. The perpetual use of the word "very," where the occasion does not call for it, shows how widely diffused and confirmed is the habit of misrepresentation. And this habit sometimes goes along with the loudest denunciations of falsehood. After much vehement talk about "the veracities," will come utterly unveracious accounts of things and people—accounts made unveracious by the use of emphatic words where ordinary words alone are warranted: pictures of which the outlines are correct but the lights and shades and colors are doubly and trebly as strong as they should be. . . . In mankind at large, the love of truth for truth's sake, irrespectiv of ends, is but little exemplified.—Herbert Spencer.

GEOLOGY givs the strongest support to the theory of Evolution. The life-bearing rocks are supposed to represent a thickness of about 130,000 feet. These rocks were formed from deposits of ooze, at the bottom of the waters, which gradually hardened into stone. Vast ages were required for these formations, and for the elevations and depressions which they hav undergone. In the lower half of these strata the only forms of life are of the lowest order, and the vegetable life is mainly of sea-weeds. In the next higher strata we find the remains of fishes and ferns. Above these come reptils and pine forests, and birds first appear. . . . In still higher strata appear mammals and leaf forests, and the animals nearest to man are found. Finally, in the latest deposit we find the remains of man and of cultivated forests. But this era of man is not one two-hundredth part of the vast ages through which organic life has existed, and he appears only as the highest outcome of nature's development, the top branch of the tree of life.—Robt. C. Adams.

METAPHYSICIANS are wonderful people. The less they understand of a thing, the more words they make over it. They seek to explain the mystery of the world "as though they were God's spies" (King Lear). They hav as many opinions as they hav heads, and as Bacon very forcibly says, they become through their speculations "like owls that only see their dreams in the darkness, but become blind in the light of experience, and are least able to perceive that which is clearest." As Spilter remarks, they possess the most extraordinary talent for bringing the simplest things into the most boundless confusion, and they wafer and plaster over the simplest ideas and opinions with such a mass of high-sounding, apparently learned, but in reality empty and unintelligible words and phrases, that a rational man loses his senses over it. But the moment we go to the root of the matter, we, as a rule, are very soon convinced that the whole tirade is, as Helvetius says, "a deluge of words, poured out over a desert of ideas," and that the "hollow verbiage about being and not-being" (Suhle) and similar philosophical technicalities can hav no other object but that of hiding the utter scantiness of real ideas and thoughts from the uncritical reader or listener. Heedless of the progress of empiric or natural science, they go on tilling their old philosophical soil and behaving as though there were no science in existence. Büchner.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

Hindoo Virgin and Child.

The worship of the "Holy Virgin," the "Queen of Heaven," the "Mother of God," etc., which has become one of the grand features of Roman Catholicism, was a tenet of faith for centuries before the virgin now adored was born. In India, they have worshiped for ages, Maha Devi—The Great Goddess—and have temples erected in honor of her. Like her Roman counterpart she is the Goddess with a thousand names. As Devaki, she is the mother of Vishnu, the Preserving god, in the form of Krishna. "The gods, invisible to mortals," says the Vishnu Purana, (p. 502) "celebrated her praise continually from the time that Vishnu was contained in her person." She is represented in Moor's Hindu Pantheon, adorned with jewels, and the infant Saviour at her breast. BIBLE MYTHS shows that nearly all nations of antiquity worshipped a Virgin Mother-Goddess.

Christianity on Comets.—Concluded.

We will conclude our history of Christian opinion on comets.

In New England the Protestant clergy fostered the same doctrin as their fellows of Europe. Danforth's "Astronomical Description of the late Comet, or Blazing Star, together with a Brief Theological Application thereof," published in 1664, proves from the Bible that comets are "portentous signals of great and notable changes," and shows by history that they "hav been many times heralds of wrath to a secure and impenitent world." Especial attention is called by this sage volume to the comet of 1652, which flared its predictiv terrors upon mortal gaze just before the illness of the goodly Mr. Cotton and vanished when his death had come to pass. From the "Memorial" of Morton we learn that that gentleman thought the passing away of brother in Christ John Putnam an event exacting from God a commemoration no less than the exhibition of a perhaps not neat but undeniably gaudy comet. The comet of 1652 was the one which this Morton thus regarded as the "very signal testimony that God had then removed a bright star and a shining light out of the heaven of his church here into celestial glory above." Another comet, however, was found by Brother Morton in his wisdom to be the messenger of a different sort of news, being "sent immediately by God to awaken the secure world." Nor was this bark of the Lord without a bite, for, says Morton, in that same year "it pleased God to smite the fruits of the earth, namely, the wheat in special, with blasting and mildew, whereby much of it was spoiled and became profitable for nothing, and much of it worth little, being light and empty. This was looked upon by the judicious and conscientious of the land as a speaking providence against the unthankfulness of many." We will add a few extracts from a sermon by the eminent Increase Mather as typical of all those preached by our sapient New England fathers to whose guidance the pietists of the present are anxious to bring us back. This sermon of Mather's is entitled, "Heaven's Alarm to the World." The texts are: "And the third angel sounded, and there fell a great star from heaven, burning as it were a lamp" (Rev. viii, 10); and, "Behold, the third woe cometh quickly" (Ib. xi, 14). In this instructiv production it will be shown, Mather promises, that "fearful sights and sounds in the heavens are the presages of great calamities at hand." From the drift of events he deduces the unflattering conclusion that "we are fallen into the dregs of time." The highly important if true discovery is made that the day of judgment is approaching. We are deprived of the comforting words of Jeremiah, "Be not dismayed at signs in the heavens," for this God's-friend who knows all about the divine intentions unfeelingly explains that reassuring utterance quite away. The "signs and wonders" of the heavens, it is shown, were forerunners of nearly every species of calamity recorded in the Bible. Coming to modern history, we find that blazing stars harbingered the invasion of the Goths, of the Huns, of the Saracens, and of the Turks. The horrible example with which it is expedient to scare unbelievers is brought forth in the shape of the emperor Vespasian, who after ridiculing comets soon died. Indeed, the meaningful shape of comets is enough to demonstrate their purpose. Next the church father Tertullian is appealed to as declaring them "God's sharp razors on mankind whereby he doth poll, and his scythe whereby he doth shear down multitudes of sinful creatures." Finally, the comet visible at the time of utterance is pointed out, and this horrific Mather thunders: "The Lord hath fired his beacon in the heavens among the stars of God there; the fearful sight is not yet out of sight. Now then if the Lord discharge his murdering pieces from on high, and men be found in their sins unfit for death, their blood shall be upon them." Then in a fearful taking and twitter the divine throws himself into wild supplication: "Do we see the sword blazing over us? Let it put us upon crying to God that that judgment be diverted and not return upon us again so speedily. . . . . Doth God threaten our very heavens? O pray unto Him, that He would not take away stars and send comets to succeed them."

However, there are, fortunately for mankind, a few penetrating and self-dependent thinkers born in every age. Nearly all of this class who surmised the true nature of comets were long held silent by the church and its terrors of rack and stake. But the three or four investigators mentioned in our last issue contrived to giv the world a hint of the truth. And finally the great Gassendi succeeded in making his voice heard, if but in a limited circle, in broaching of the true doctrin. This was early in the seventeenth century. By scientific methods he had arrived at the truth that comets are outside our earth's atmosphere. He added a common-sense argument that they are in no shape or connection injurious to mankind. Bayle is the next underminer of the scriptural cometary theory. Comets, he declares, "are bodies subject to the ordinary law of nature, and not prodigies amenable to no law." He goes over the history which theologians, determined to find what they wished, found to bristle with cases of comets' prophetic uses, and fails to discover anything of the kind. He says that comets do not appear because misfortunes are about to befall, but that they would hav appeared anyway—using pretty much the language which Shakspere puts in the mouth of Hotspur against Glendower's superstitions. "At my nativity," Glendower has boasted,

> "The front of heaven was full of fiery shapes,
> Of burning crescents; and at my birth
> The frame and huge foundation of the earth
> Shak'd like a coward."

To this cries Hotspur:

> "Why, so it would hav done
> At the same season, if your mother's cat had
> But kitten'd, though yourself had ne'er been born."

Bayle's comparison is, that one who believes that evils occur because comets come is like a woman who looks from a window into Paris streets and thinks that the carriages pass because she looks out. He cites the observing remark of Henry IV. that "the public will remember one prediction that comes true better than all the rest that hav proved false." Soon Bayle found himself in that situation whereby Swift says we may always know a genius, viz., surrounded by a confederacy of dunces against him. These pious dunces first drove him from France to Holland. Here he fared as badly at the hands of Protestants as he had at those of the Catholics of France. That great pillar of Protestantism, Jurieu, was particularly envenomed against him. Finally he found a refuge in Switzerland. The next person to deliver a blow against the ecclesiastical view was Fontenelle, who now produced on the French stage the play of "The Comet," and the hosts of superstition were rendered ridiculous in at least one circle of the French nation. Comparativly little, however, had been done to demolish the vast edifice of ecclesiastical cometary doctrin till the opening of the eighteenth century. Then Doerfel made public his observations on the parabolic paths of certain comets. Halley published his "Synopsis" and "Tables." Victory was consummated when the latter, after observing the dates of the comet which now bears his name, and which had been commanded by Pope Calixtus III. to show its face no more, predicted the time of its return, and the prediction was fulfilled.

Theologians, as is always the case, had not yielded to common sense till their very last support had been shattered and their last subterfuge exhausted. No end of curious theories were brought forth to save the failing cause. Whiston in his anxiety to find comets instruments of divine wrath lit upon the fact, as he held it, that the Noachian deluge was brought about by the Lord's dispatching a comet to flip the earth with its tail. Burnet lugged in the theory that comets are places of punishment for damned sinners—"flying hells." However, in 1868 the earth passed directly through the tail of a comet without our hearing any shrieks of the damned.

We see that the rehearsal of these God-directed efforts to explain comets has covered so much space that we shall hav to forego our intended indication of their effects on the world—the evils that they wrought. We will merely add, to the several injurious results named in our last issue, the operation of the scriptural belief in strengthening political despotism. Monarchs whose births were announced by stars and whose deaths were foreboded by comets naturally considered themselvs so far above the common mass as to be practically of another species, and it was equally natural that they should be so looked on by their subjects. Thus the biblical doctrin of the duty of passiv obedience to the powers that be received additional fortifying, and monstrous assumptions of authority by sovereigns were regarded but as manifestations of the will of the deity. Galeazzo of Milan, who on his death-bed expressed satisfaction that his end was of such importance as to hav been heralded by a comet, had been a most detestable tyrant of his people, and may be briefly taken as a type of the class. In Shakspere's "Julius Cæsar" Calphurnia urges to Cæsar:

> "When beggars die, there are no comets seen;
> The heavens themselvs blaze forth the death of princes."

The Fair on Sunday.

The Congressional committee of Mr. Durborow, of Illinois, has practically decided to report a resolution authorizing the World's Fair managers to open the Fair on Sunday, but instructing them to stop machinery and traffic, and so far as possible manual labor, on that day. This will seem to many an important gain and a pleasing measure, but it is far from gratifying us. The action will after all amount only to making the one day on which the toilers can best see the Fair the worst possible day on which to see it—the one day on which there will be least to be seen. Indeed, it may be that no part of the Exposition will be given to the public till after church hours, when the priests and parsons hav sheared what wool they want from their droves. Nothing is really right but that Congress leave the matter of religious observance entirely alone.

If the Fair is wholly open it will be a strong step in the direction of a "continental Sabbath" for the future in all quarters; if it is closed the effect will be nearly as beneficial, as millions will thereby become embittered against the church and its tyranny; but if a compromise like the above is effected, public feeling on Sabbath observance in general will remain in the same unchanged and unprogressiv rut for no one knows how many decades to come.

At the convention of the American Federation of Labor at Philadelphia, on the fourth day's session, the 15.h inst., it was requested that the World's Fair be opened Sundays. The vote was 50 to 19.

Cardinal Gibbons in a letter to Secretary Thompson of the World's Fair Opening Association says: "The Sunday closing of this spectacle would be very unfortunate for many thousands of our countrymen, who would be tempted to spend the day in dissipation. In their name I would favor the opening of the Fair Sunday afternoon to evening, with the provision that all machinery should be stopped and all mechanical and laboring work that will not be urgently necessary should cease."

The Leaflet demanding opening of the Fair Sundays which we hav issued should be distributed to the utmost of each Freethinker's means. Freethinkers ought to be tired of being slaves, and eager to throw off their chains. The Leaflet has pictured covers calculated to attract and lead to reading, and contains opinions on Sunday opening from eminent men and influential newspapers. The price of the Leaflet is 25 cents per dozen; $1.50 per hundred. Anyone who will distribute five hundred or a thousand can obtain them at special rates.

To The Friends of The Truth Seeker.

During the past week we hav added many new names to our subscription list, and we want to thank the good friends through whom this has been done. Their efforts are gratefully remembered, and we also try to make it easy for them to help us by reducing the rates and offering many premiums. Among these premiums the Picture Books hav been very popular, as they deserve to be.

But what we said last week, in answer to Mr. Creede's generous-spirited letter, is still applicable, and will be for a longer time than we care to dwell upon. We hav paid some of the bills due, but there are others remaining just as pressing and we must continue to solicit the aid of friends in extending our circulation, because that will not only place us in better circumstances, but will spread the literature of Freethought and do a great amount of good to the cause which we know our subscribers are as anxious as ourselvs to see advanced. We are truly grateful for every helpful hand extended, and hope that the response will soon be sufficient to place us beyond the necessity of again referring to the matter. But now we are obliged to recur to it, and urge it upon the attention of our friends.

Some Handsome Premiums.

To induce new subscriptions and prompt renewals on the part of our friends we make the following handsome premium offers:

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a cloth-bound copy of "Bible Myths" ($2.50).

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth ($2.50).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in boards ($2).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a copy of "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in cloth covers ($1.50).

For $3.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in board covers ($1).

This is a splendid opportunity to obtain books which every Liberal desires to hav at an exceedingly low price. Old and new subscribers can avail themselvs of it, and we shall be glad if our present readers will call the attention of their friends to the values offered.

Our Meddling Government.

Before the late Columbian celebration the national bureau of education at Washington prepared and sent to all the public schools in the country a program of exercises for them to follow in their commemoration. Part of this program consisted of an oath of allegiance to be taken by all the pupils, in these words: "I pledge my allegiance to my flag and the Republic for which it stands: One Nation, indivisible, with Liberty and Justice for all." A writer in the Christian Intelligencer, of New York, an organ of the denomination that used to be called the Dutch Reformed, comments on this proceeding as he witnessed it in New York. Strange as it may seem, we here find a religious writer in a religious journal uttering sense. He says:

"I saw this pledge administered to a couple of hundred children of the responsible ages between five and twelve years. At command they repeated it in concert, and each raised his right hand to heaven, as is the customary form of the oath in this part of the land. To say that I heard and saw this with astonishment is to put it mildly. Here was what was to all intents an oath of allegiance imposed on infants without need or shadow of right. Beyond the fact that it was part of the program, and therefore administered as a matter of course and so taken as these same infants might say the alphabet, I can get no light on the thing. To me such a performance is a serious matter, but it seemed to hav been considered only a part of the play. And that shocks me. Did any of the proper authorities demand this oath of allegiance as if these children were aliens or rebels, or as if the land were in danger and full of traitors? No. Who, then, assumed this impertinence? No one knows or seems to care. Were these teachers constituted magistrates properly to administer oaths when necessary? Why, no. How, then, came they to do it? The school authorities sent down the program to be carried out. Did they hav such rights? Of course not. Whence, then, this farce? From that nameless, spectral tyrant who rules us all—a veritable 'power in the air.' To hav scruples about such things which by blind consent hav this mysterious right of way is to be peculiar and a crank. I cannot find that any of these dear teachers had scruples about the thing. It was part of the machinery, of which they also are a part, and it was no matter for conscience, but for simple compliance."

Little things like this when much multiplied become matters of weight. The national government has no authority to administer such oaths to these children. The act is but, in the words of still another critic, "a part of the machinery, of that centralizing, all-absorbing greed of governing everything, of meddling in everything, of putting all persons into uniform, and of compelling all things to be done in a uniform way, according to a uniform pattern."

For our part, we do not view the government which is at present over these United States as so perfect that we desire our children to offer incense and adorings to it before they are able to judge. We love this government somewhat, but we love truth and justice more. We love this government considerably; we love Truth and Justice immeasurably and unspeakably. This government takes our money from us for many unjust purposes. It also abridges us of our freedom and rights on every seventh day. If a child of ours should grow up and light upon some country that did not wrong him as this nation does us, and declare allegiance to that nation in preference to this, we should not know how to oppose him. And we do not think it right to mold the mind of such a one into a rooted and unreasoning devotion to one set of institutions while he is helpless and choiceless. For ourselvs, we continue in allegiance to this country, because we know of no other that is, all things considered, better. Some suburbs of Paris hav lately fallen under Atheistic sway; if the whole of France should do so perchance we should take it into our head to favor such a glorious land of Man and Freedom more than the country which fattens priests and breeds their asylum dupes on the earnings of the sweat of our brow, and which insulted and neglected a Paine and is now too abject to honor itself by placing in the chair of its chief magistrate an Ingersoll.

Then, too, the above oath of allegiance forces the infants to affirm the doctrin of a particular political party. It compels them to speak of the republic as "One Nation, indivisible." That the United States is a body of this nature was held by the old Federalists. The doctrin is acceptable to the Republican party of the present day. But it is repugnant to at least one-half of the citizens of this country. Democrats and many others cherish as one of their dearest principles the doctrin that the United States form not a nation, but a confederation, wherein the states hav delegated to a general government certain of their powers, but only such as are expressly nominated as delegated. We do not here pronounce for either view. But we call for less inbreeding of either political or ecclesiastical doctrins into infants, by whatever majority for the time being has grasped the reins of power.

There is one alleged Christian church, though not an orthodox affair, that moves slightly; in fact, considerably. Helen Gardener left town for the West last week, and, her purpose becoming known previously, she received invitations from three Universalist clergymen to "occupy their pulpits." And it is to their credit that they "put no restrictions on subject or matter." Think of the writer of "Men, Women, and Gods" in a church! But it would be still more astonishing if the church were really Christian.

In the West.

News and Notes.

Judge Maguire, of San Francisco, has been elected to Congress. This is a Liberal triumph. He was bitterly opposed by the Romanists. He is the author of "Ireland and the Pope"—one of the sharpest arraignments of the papacy lately written. Judge Maguire is in many respects a radical reformer and his election is a hopeful sign.

I only had time to shake hands with a few San Francisco friends—Chas. F. Buryman, Mr. and Mrs. W. Botsfords, Mr. and Mrs. Emil Lemme, W. F. Eastman, etc. Times are dull on this side of the continent, and after the fervors of election there is a lull in almost everything. The Golden Gate, however, still presents a beautiful appearance. The sea is laden with commerce, and crowds come and go over the shining bay, and to the casual observer prosperity rolls on as lively as ever.

I suppose the church party, as usual, will make an effort to pass a Sabbath law this winter. Mrs. Addie L. Ballou, of San Francisco, who is thoroughly interested in the Liberal work, proposes to be on hand at Sacramento and contest the matter, and I hope the Liberals of California will giv her a generous support. I hope also that arrangements will be made for lectures by John R. Charlesworth at every possible point along the Pacific coast. I cannot be at the Oregon state convention, but Mr. Charlesworth and others will be present, and no doubt an important move will be made. I hope that every Liberal in Oregon will aid in this matter. Be present at the convention if possible and contribute to its resources.

John Dumbacher, of Calistoga, givs his usual generous contribution to our cause. I was pleased to meet J. J. Johnson and family and see the bright new baby. Life and death flow in silver and somber stream side by side.

Through my friend J. Vostrovsky I hav been made acquainted with the Bohemian Voice, a new monthly journal published in English by the Bohemians of this country. It is a representativ journal of this progressiv people. They number 350,000 in the United States. Bohemia is one of the most interesting lands on the globe—beautiful to behold, with memories of ancient grandeur—but its people are not happy, because they are not free. In Bohemia there is going on the same struggle as in Ireland to-day for home rule. Bohemia, however, has not lost its language. In that language is some of the finest literature of this century. Dvorak, who has just taken charge of the Conservatory of Music, New York, and is one of the greatest geniuses in the world of art, is a Bohemian in birth, and in spirit too. Commenius, the noble educational reformer whose anniversary has recently been celebrated in Europe and America, was a Bohemian. Prague was declared by Humboldt to be the third most magnificent city in the world. Bohemia, including Moravia, which is identical with it, the inhabitants of the latter being of the same race —the Slavs—contains a population of seven million with an area of thirty thousand square miles. The Bohemian language is used in twenty-five per cent of the schools of the Austrian empire. In Prague is a higher school for women—the only one in the empire. The genius of woman is exercising a powerful influence in the progress of Bohemia. The history of Bohemia is alive with romance, it shines with great deeds and splendid devotion to liberty. The struggle of Lizka against the combined Catholic powers of Europe is one of the most marvelous and brilliant in the records of time. This great race comes to America with education, art, and music, and the voice of freedom. Liberalism prevails among them here. Ingersoll is read with enthusiasm and his lectures are constantly translated and published almost as soon in the Bohemian language as in the English language itself. Men like M. M. Secor, of Racine, Wis.; J. Vostrovsky, of California; J. J. Kral, of Chicago, and V. Snajdr, of Cleveland, are representativs of the progressiv element of the American Bohemians. A majority are Catholic still, but the spirit of Huss prevails. We welcome the Bohemian Voice as an addition to the advanced Liberal journals of America.

I leave San Francisco with the flowers still blooming, but in a few hours I am in the land of winter, and the snows of the Sierras are piled about me. When I reach Salt Lake I hear the merry jingle of the bells and the sleighs are gliding over the ground. The snow glitters on the trees. A lovely prospect, such as I hav not looked upon for years, is spread before me. There is something beautiful in winter. It makes the blood tingle, and it charms with its white robes and jocund melodies. Winter is a brilliant season with its "bells, bells, bells." I stop over just for a day's rest; and as a kind relief from the everlasting struggle for reform, I giv an informal essay on "Shakspere" at the home of Mr. and Mrs. H. P. Mason; and in connection there is an interesting discussion of the various aspects of this wonderful literature—the more wonderful as we endeavor to penetrate the heart of its mystery. It seems impossible for Shakspere to hav written these dramas; and yet if Shakspere did not, who did? I cannot see a particle of evidence in favor of Bacon. The chairman of our meeting on this occasion, the Rev. Mr. Utter, inclined to the view that this incomparable literature was the production of many geniuses. Mayor Goodspeed, who is an excellent Shaksperian student, while strenuous in his opposition to the claims of the Avonite who scarcely ever mentions Avon in his poems, is not particularly in favor of Bacon. It is one of the marvels of literature that while Milton —one of the most learned men of his time, skilled in various languages, master in his own, a voluminous writer—uses only about eight thousand words in all, Shakspere—who quit writing at thirty-seven, who had scarcely any education—uses over fifteen thousand words, and every word with nicety and discrimination. Simply as he is, Shakspere is a greater miracle than can be found in all the Bibles of the world. Mrs. Pollock, wife of our stalwart editor, A. L. Pollock, introduced our breezy discussion with beautiful instrumental music, and Mrs. Greene, of the Unitarian choir, favored us with a solo. Mrs. Greene has a voice of wonderful sweetness, and music added its charms to the poetry of Shakspere. Mrs. Pollock has just returned from a trip to Europe, and lectures on what she has seen before the Unitarian Ladies' Association. She was especially delighted with the "continental Sunday"—so much better than the weariness of our own. In the former the splendors of art make beautiful the time for vast multitudes of people. It is indeed a day of the sun. The "continental Sunday" with its music and joy is what we want for America.

Mrs. A. R. Tibbetts made the most telling argument of the evening against William Shakspere, in that he only left his "second-best bed to his wife." To think of the author of Romeo making a will like that.

It was a pleasant occasion, that roaming into the past—enjoying its wonders, its romance, and by its gentle inspirations preparing for the greater battles that are still before us. There is nothing that will so fit a man for the work of reform as the study of Shakspere; for at the same time that he givs delight, he givs wisdom. He is so impartial, so universal, so apt, so suggestiv, and so stimulating, that he prepares you for any kind of intellectual combat. No doubt the daily perusal of Shakspere would help one in dealing with the human nature of an American Congress. In Congress will be the repetition of much that is in Shakspere; the Shallows and Dogberries, at least, will not be wanting.

I think there is a hard battle before us. The churches are bitterly determined. They will use every effort to maintain the present attitude of Congress, in which case the World's Fair will not be open on Sunday. Justice will be forever defeated.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Death and Life.

IN MEMORY OF WALTER LESLIE GRIGSBY.

Thou art gone in sudden horror,
From the faces loved and dear;
In thy bright and beauteous manhood
Thou wilt no more appear.
We hav lost thee, we hav lost thee,
In the starless gloom of death,
As the lightning in the darkness
So thy spirit vanisheth.

Where is the God that loveth?
Where are the heavens that shine?
Where is the angel telling
Of the power that is divine?
I see no God, no heaven,
No angel anywhere;
I only see the darkness,
And the force that will not spare.

Mortal grief finds no sweet message
In the shadow of the grave;
Death is death; and all our dreaming
From its torture cannot save;
We weep and cry in anguish,
And tenderly touch the dead;
But the heart is still forever,
The answering light is fled.

Let us meet the fate eternal,
In the courage of our mind;
Let us not in weak endeavor
Seek for hope we cannot find;
We are human, we are mortal,
And sorrow we must know;
But with steadfast spirit meet it,
In truth's undying glow.

Strew the flowers' sweet fleeting splendor;
Lay the precious dust away;
'Tis a sleep that knows no waking,
No weary night nor day;
There's no pain, nor any trouble,
In that chamber's jeweled dark—
The surge of life rolls placid—
It has reached the fatal mark.

Our prayers are unavailing,
And worship at God's throne;
In ourselvs we find the healing,
In human love alone;
In the hearts that cling together,
As we place thee in thy bed;
In the honor that we render
To the unreturning dead.

Our hope is with the living,
In this world still fair to see,
In the days that shine before us,
In the duties yet to be,
In the truth that beckons onward,
In the cause for which we strive,
With the thoughts that make us greater,
And the hights which we arrive.

Brave comrade, thou hast fallen,
Bravely fallen at thy post;
True soldier of humanity,
In labor's splendid host;
Thou hast won the victor's glory
In thy youth, and resting now
In thy calm and peaceful dwelling,
Glows the laurel on thy brow.

Sweet remembrance rays its beauty,
In the sadness of this hour;
For he that truly liveth
Givs the world immortal dower.
We bury not thy virtue,
Nor the love that thou hast given;
All thy kindly deeds are shining,
Like the stars which gem the heaven.

Life and death are strangely mingling;
But we press unyielding on,
From the shadow to the sunshine,
From the midnight to the dawn;
To the dead we giv our blessing
To the living service true;
For the battle never endeth,
Nor the good that we can do.

Of a Business Nature.

We hav added to the list of periodicals which can be obtained in combination with THE TRUTH SEEKER at greatly reduced rates the North American Review. The price of that alone is $5, but with THE TRUTH SEEKER one year the two are only $6.75. The Review is the leading magazine for political papers from famous politicians, and besides succeeds oftenest of any magazine in getting articles from Colonel Ingersoll.

The Leaflet advocating the Sunday opening of the World's Fair ought to be scattered by the thousands. In December or January we shall send them to Congressmen and to others who may be influenced by argument. We need money to do this, and those who can afford to aid are requested to do so. The price of the Leaflet is 25 cents per dozen; $1.50 per hundred. Anyone who will distribute five hundred or a thousand can obtain them at special rates.

We hav made arrangements with Otto Wettstein whereby we can offer the Freethinker's Badge-Pin and THE TRUTH SEEKER together at a material reduction. The $2 pin and the paper one year for $4.50; the $2.75 pin and the paper for $5. Also the Ingersoll Souvenir Spoon and THE TRUTH SEEKER in combination at a still greater reduction. The tea spoon and the paper, $4.75; the sugar spoon and the paper, $5.25. We giv our subscribers the benefit of all discounts.

We shall shortly publish the fourth edition of the "Crimes of Preachers." If our readers see any records of the clergy being guilty of ministerial conduct, from lying to murder, they will add to the world's knowledge and the cause of truth by marking the report and forwarding the paper containing it to this office. We desire to do all the justice possible to the reverend clergy who so kindly constitute themselvs our moral and religious guardians.

Score one more for the "Pictorial Text-Book," for another Christian has been helped out of his superstition by it. When ordering one last week, Mr. B. F. Parsons says: "I am a man forty-two years of age, and I hav been a Methodist superintendent for many years, but I never could quite swallow the entire contents of the Bible. I asked Jesus to help me, but 'no go.' I lived years of misery until the 'Freethinkers' Text-Book' was placed in my hands, and I saw the truth at once. Now I am happy as anyone can be, for I am not afraid of hell and shall not worry about my friends being separated. I shall do all I can to help our cause along."

In our review of John R. Kelso's "Government Analyzed" the price was incorrectly given. It is $1.50. We hav, however, filled all orders received at the price given, and lost money. Of this book Solidarity says: "An excellent work, being, as indicated by the title, an analysis to the core. The author by some process has discovered that labor creates all wealth, and with this central thought in mind givs a clear, simple exposition of his subject, touching upon the various forms of government; general principles of government; functions of government; origin of government; the Declaration of Independence; articles of American Confederation; defects of the Confederation; formation of the Constitution of the United States; taxation; tariff and protection, money, and what in his opinion government should be. The derivations and definitions of political terms in his first chapter are alone worth the price of the book, which should find a place in every library of advanced radical thought."

Of Mr. Longshore's new book, published by us, the World says: "'The Higher Criticism in Theology and Religion, Contrasted with Ancient Myths and Miracles as Factors in Human Evolution,' is the title of a work by Thomas Ellwood Longshore, published by THE TRUTH SEEKER, New York. Premising that in the present state of theological unrest and dissatisfaction with long-established creeds there is a prophecy that we are on the verge of a profound and radical change in the basis of religious beliefs; that the Bible, as infallible authority or as a divine revelation in any supernatural sense, has practically lost its power; that reverence for its special teachings as the word of God is relaxing; that it has done its work, had its service, and is gradually being supplanted by a science and philosophy better adapted to modern wants and to our human understanding of the divine revelation made through outward nature, Mr. Longshore proceeds to attack established creeds, beliefs, and customs with arguments which will perhaps prove very conclusiv to such as are inclined to his way of thinking." We may go a little farther than the World, and say that it is very convincing. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth-bound, $1.

Science and Progress.

Metamorphosis.

The special artist of a patent-medicin concern used to design portraits representing a patient "Before" and "After" the purchase of the miraculous nostrum, warranted to turn a hag into an image of the Medicean Venus. The same specialist now appears to labor in the interest of the orthodox press. A new religious weekly represents an Alaskan youth "before and after" his conversion to Christianity: No. 1, a chinless savage with his eyes close together and arms as short and clumsy as a bear's paws. No. 2 seems to imply that the sacrament of baptism has turned the convert into a refined scholar, with prominent chin, beaming eyes wide apart, and long arms tapering to aristocratic finger-points. The facial changes can be explained only by a miracle; but savages are often endowed with an ape-like gift of imitation, and the contortions of the Tabernacle clown, or the long-finger practice of the Book Concern managers, may hav helped to lengthen the arms of the redeemed nativ a yard or two.

Quaker Thrift.

The captain of the Philadelphia three-master "Willie Reed" confesses to having run so short of rations that he dreaded a first-class mutiny. Starvation, too, may hav been imminent, but the ready-witted mate obviated both dangers at once by shooting three of the hungry sailors.

Fire Monopolists.

For some unaccountable reason the clergy continue to oppose the revival of the sensible ancient custom of burning, instead of burying, corpses. Is it because the successors of the Grand Inquisitor desire to monopolize the business of cremation, both before and after death?

A Blessing in Disguise.

Philosophers hold that deadly afflictions sometimes divert sufferers from the thought of self-destruction —their minds being too much preoccupied with the problem of self-preservation. The New England combination of blizzards and Blue laws may thus account for the comparativ rarity of suicides in the Yankee states.

Spiritual Advantages.

In the Spanish provinces of Aragon, Murcia, and Estremadura some five hundred country school-teachers hav not received a cantabo of pay for the last two years, and in many cases can hardly keep body and soul together by begging on the public streets. The village priests of the same districts are still so fat that their cheeks can generally be seen from behind.

A Business Hint.

Steam yachts hav become extremely popular on the upper Ganges, and are kept agoing on all holidays, including Sunday and Friday, to the deep regret of the Mohammedan dervishes, who hav to collect their Sabbath boodle on Friday morning. St. Shepard, of Fifth avenue street-car fame, would probably advise his circumcised colleagues to buy up a flotilla of yachts and scuttle them on the eve of the Sabbath.

Gone East.

Professor Osterheld, after a six years' residence in St. Petersburg, holds that oratory is not a distinctiv talent of the Slavonian nations. In European Russia, including the province of Polen, there are less than five hundred lecturers and political orators, whereas, considering the aggregate of population, their number ought to exceed that many thousands. The rest are probably all in Siberia by this time.

Free-and-Easy Railroads.

The railway trains of the Argentine Republic can be flagged at any desired point of the pampas, and will stop with pleasure to receive freight or passengers—the regular stations being too far apart to be overnice in such matters. The conductors also admit all sorts of domestic animals to the privilege of the passenger cars, and it is nothing rare to see a ranchero board a train with a string of hunting-dogs in one hand and the horns of a refractory billy-goat in the other. Sucking-pigs in arms are likewise tolerated, but the conductor draws the line at begging friars, who still travel free on the Portuguese railroads.

Signs of the Times.

Four hundred years ago a nun escaping from a convent would hav been promptly recaptured and her abettors imprisoned, if not burnt at the stake. Nowadays (as in the recent case of Olmutz, Austria) the clergy prefer to connive at such escapades or even assist the deserter to continue her flight to foreign parts, "in order to avoid scandal."

Moral Maggots.

The decline of clerical influence in modern Italy adds one more to many proofs of the fact that Jesuitism is a symptom of disease, and that the creed of the cross can flourish best in a period of degeneration. The clear-sighted patriots of pagan Rome dreaded its progress like that of a moral pestilence, and it gained strength only under the patronage of despots like Constantine and Justinian, who recognized the value of its anti-physical dogmas for emasculating a nation whose freemen they wished to transform into cringing slaves. Under the vigorous rule of the Gothic conquerors, Unitarianism became temporarily ascendent, but as soon as the victors had adopted the effeminate customs of their subjects their creed became polluted with Trinitarian dogmas and monkish aberrations. The manlier rulers of the German empire, Otho the Great, Henry the Fowler, and Frederick Barbarossa, were opponents of popery, and the outbreak of the Protestant revolt divided Europe into a faction of mental prostitution and a faction of opposition which, at the root of it, was opposed to Jerusalem, as well as to Rome. Frederick the Great, the regenerator of northern Germany, and Joseph the Second, the reformer of the Austrian empire, were fearless Freethinkers, and under their successors Jesuitry has sunk or risen with the ebb and tide of indolence, flunkeyism, and stupidity. In North America the prospects of obscurantism sank next to zero under the administration of Thomas Jefferson, but revived with the revival of snobbery and effeminacy. The multiplication of cross-cranks, like that of maggots, always indicates the progress of decay.

Christian Civilization.

Seventeen centuries ago the emperor Trajan kept Europe quiet with sixty legions of twelve hundred men each. Now, the same purpose is made a pretext for maintaining standing armies aggregating 3,950,000 men—a number apt to be doubled upon the first alarm of actual war. If the gathering clouds should explode and the mutual assurances of Christian brother-love change into war-whoops, holy Russia alone would muster 1,400,000 baptized regulars, besides swarms of circumcised guerillas. Herr Richter, in a recent speech before the Reichstag, quoted figures proving that since 1860 the burden of taxes, due to the exigencies of the army budget, has steadily increased and will soon exceed the sum total of all other appropriations taken together. Thus far there is, indeed, no prospect of a limit to the aggravation of the evil, and the insular position of England has by no means saved her from sharing in the general affliction. Her standing army is not as large as that of France, but, together with the navy budget, the total expenditure for purposes of national defense is fully equal to that of 1805 when Great Britain tried to arm orthodox Europe in the interest of hereditary despotism. Even poor Spain has to support two hundred and fifty thousand regulars with the few drops of blood not drained by clerical vampires, and altogether the legionaries of Trajan are probably outnumbered by the Christian chaplains hired to implore their God's assistance in the work of slaughter.

F. L. Oswald.

Cincinnati, O.

Out of this feeling [of theologians against medicin] had grown up another practice, which made the development of medicin still more difficult—the classing of scientific men generally with sorcerers and magic-mongers: from this largely arose the charge of Atheism against physicians, which ripened into a proverb, Ubi sunt tres medici, ibi sunt duo athei (Where there are three physicians there are two Atheists). Magic was so common a charge that many physicians seemed to believe it themselvs: in the tenth century Gerbert, afterward known as Pope Sylvester II., was at once suspected of sorcery when he showed a disposition to scientific methods; in the eleventh century this charge nearly cost the life of Constantine Africanus when he broke from the beaten path of medicin; in the thirteenth it gave Roger Bacon, one of the greatest benefactors of mankind, many years of imprisonment, and nearly brought him to the stake; these cases are typical of very many. Still another charge against physicians who showed a talent for investigation was that of Mohammedanism and Averroism; and Petrarch stigmatized Averroists as "men who deny Genesis and bark at Christ."—Ex-President White of Cornell University in Popular Science Monthly.

Government Must Be Honest in Money.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Being a constant reader of your most estimable paper, I hav read from time to time the various theories of your many correspondents on the subject of finance, or "What is money?" as Mr. Clarke Irvine puts it, some of which are very good and sound, while others are not worth their space, and nearly all fail to touch the main question. First: all moneys, of whatever kind, hard or soft, are made and issued by authority of some government, and are money only in the domain of that government and in its circulation. As soon as money reaches and passes the border of the government issuing it, it ceases to be money, and becomes merchandise and passes for what it will bring in the money of the new realm, because the law governing the issue and value of that money cannot extend across the border with the money. But, unfortunately for this our country, and what has led astray nearly all our students of finance, our magnanimous government for the last twenty years or so has been making merchandise of its money at home, not waiting for it to reach the border, so much so that we really hav no money—it is all merchandise. And we are the only nation that in its public journals uses the term "money market," which, if it means anything, means that we buy and sell money, or "swap dollars." Shame, I say, on my government, that years ago it joined the money-mongers and became a partner with the Wall street gamblers in its own exchequer. We may talk about specie basis, intrinsic value, honest money, and all that sort of political party rot, and what does it all amount to? Only to delude, deceive, and betray the masses. It matters but little what a government makes and issues as money; its size, weight, fineness, and intrinsic value are of little importance, provided always that such government deal honestly with its people. And I am aware that right here I will be told "the government is the people." And we admit this only in theory; practically it is not so. If a government has no uniform general "legal-tender" law, if it at the same time fails to honor its issues of paper or coin money, and redeems the same (so called) at a less value than it issued the same at, then that government is a fraud and a beat, and the sooner it is abolished the better for the people, who ought to so regard it.

We hav for our so-called money a very appropriate and expressiv term, "circulating medium." Now we will suppose our so-called government makes and issues a paper United States of America one dollar and gets for it a hundred cents in something, and it goes on its mission from hand to hand settling exchanges one hundred cents every time through one hundred or a thousand hands, and in completing its circuit it gets back to the counter or desk that issued it, and there it is received for only fifty cents, then that government has committed an act of bankruptcy in any commercial business. It has committed the first breach of faith and destroyed that confidence manifested in all the former exchanges, and all the other dollars in the circuit at once take the same value, fifty cents on the dollar, and the government has by its own act made it so, and instead of "regulating the value thereof," in the words of the Constitution, has in fact destroyed the value, and whether metal or paper the effect is the same. Government has actually confiscated its own money in the interest of Wall street, and in such a case a legal-tender law would afford no remedy, and how can government consistently make such a law while it is violating such a law in advance? Indeed, a government must be honest before it can ask or demand the citizen to be so, and under our present system of practice it is both a sin and a crime for our so-called government to arrest and punish the counterfeiter when the government is counterfeiting its own money in making "trade dollars," and getting one hundred cents for every one, and then not taking them back for a cent, while they are stamped "United States of America, One dollar." But we are told "they were made to order." Worse yet, unless that government will make you and I some money to order on the same terms, and that done, allow us to issue the same, which would be allowing every counterfeiter by the same rule to issue his money. And yet that would be no greater violation of our Constitution than delegating our national banks to issue government-made notes. Where, I ask, did our Congress get the right to delegate corporations to issue money? Congress has no such right from the Constitution, and consequently all such delegated power is a usurpation, a crime more reprehensible and treasonable than ever secession was. Not treason to country, to government, or party, but treason to liberty.

The Hon. Mr. Bayard, of Delaware, had the coolness to tell us in the New York World some months ago: "It is fallacy to assume that Congress has the power to regulate values." Ah! what has become of that power? For Congress certainly had it once. If Congress has not the power to create and regulate the value of money of its own make, then what has become of that power? For Congress certainly had it by the terms of the Constitution, in these words in the enumeration of the powers of Congress, Section viii, Article 5: "Congress shall hav power to coin money and regulate the value thereof;" by which term the issuing of the same is certainly implied; and if Congress has not that power now, I respectfully ask Mr. Bayard, what has become of it? Hav Mr. Bayard and his confederates sitting in council feloniously assigned, set over, and given into the hands of a corporation powers that belonged to Congress only?—and the greatest power of all, which is in no way assignable? And to make any attempt in that direction is a crime in usurpation for the punishment of which thousands hav justly been beheaded or sent into exile.

If Congress has no power to regulate values, then how is it I hav been in business over forty years, and some twenty years of that time been using postage and revenue stamps, and in all those years they hav maintained a regular fixed and standard value without reference to the material? Now, who gave all those paper stamps their value but Congress—a value so unchangeable that I hav never known a stamp to pass for a farthing more or less than its face? And this is just the function of money. That which changes like the weathercock, up and down, is not money in any sense. It is merchandise, which Congress has no power "to regulate the value thereof;" and as soon as a government, by its Congress, has established a "money market" and made merchandise of its coin or paper issues, and said to Wall street and the banks, "Hi! ho! come here to this our auction sale of gold and tell us what our money is worth," now, instead of "regulating the value thereof," that is destroying the value thereof. This is because the entire circulating medium is thrown into merchandise and its money function destroyed. And this is why our Supreme Court has made three divisions on the legal-tender question, all different, and not one of them worth a cent. And in fact we hav no lawful money of fixed value six months ahead, and all industry and commerce are at sea on account of the buying-and-selling-money business, or "swapping dollars." Now, giv us back our government as it was. Giv back their sold-out powers to the people again. Giv us back that preeminent faith between government and people that was a glory when the nation was not rent asunder by party strife and political factions, whose only ambition is to bring to the support of their debauched fortunes the unconstitutional power of the Bank Association and the railroad cormorants, who dictate wages to labor and, to make a few more millionaires, gather in fields where they never hav sown—who hav stolen the jewels from labor and builded to Mammon a throne. Yea! giv us back that living faith in, by, and through which the government will not allow the most humble citizen to be the loser of one cent by the act of a nation dishonoring its own issues, by receiving the same back at less value than it went out at. Giv us that faith and the $100,000,000 Mr. Bayard boasts of as a reserve is but of little worth.

We hav across the water an example of the sister republic of France, who, though vanquished in a greater war than ours, managed to preserve that faith inviolate—and what has been the result? Her credit never dropped over three per cent in all that contest. Ah! a few more "black Fridays," a few more "black pay-bills," a few more acts of usurpation, a few more "credit mobiliers," a few more credit-strengthening acts, a few more electoral commissions to disfranchise a nation—and then what is the ballot good for? Away go the honor, the glory, and the liberty of constitutional government as in the fallen republics before us. Forty thousand voters in this state do not vote at all, and under these circumstances is it any wonder that even nativ Americans sell their votes for what they will bring? I could never see why the word "pay" should be on the paper money more than on the coin, or the postage or the revenue stamp. The face value with the law governing it should be sufficient, and in an honest deal it would be. But if the government is going to be tricky, then I can see the necessity for coin basis, or the putting up a pawn called "security," and under the present system the entire system of finance becomes only a pawnbroker system, at the head of which stands the United States treasury. I wish to reply briefly to one of your communications in your issue of August 13th, that of Mr. P. F. Shumaker, in which he says, "The value of a dollar compared to other kinds of property is just what the man who has the dollar can get in exchange for it." This is an admission that the dollar is not money now, but is a thing to be bought and sold as merchandise. For again he says, "The dollar has only a relativ value compared to any other species of property." And so with all his immense war of words he is talking about merchandise, which we admit Congress has no power "to regulate the value thereof"—for when the dollar is divested of its money function it is only merchandise. But now let us suppose that Congress had never demonetized its issues, but had ever honored the same, receiving the same for all government dues the same as its first sixty millions of greenbacks.

I ask Mr. Bayard, Mr. Shumaker, and everybody else, would not the same hav maintained their face value all over the world, like the old bank-notes of Venice, which for some five hundred years were held at premium over gold the world over, simply because it never dishonored its paper, without the sound of specie basis? In fact, specie basis was ever a fraud and deception. It looks well and sounds well, but, with the fewest exceptions, when the crisis came it was not there. It was like playing "Hamlet" with Hamlet left out, and almost invariably when the crisis came ran to the legislature and got a law passed for the "suspension of specie payment." And what does that mean? Simply saying to those unconstitutional corporations, "You need not pay your notes now; everybody else must pay as usual on time, but you can pay by and by." And so specie basis has been, and is now, one of the greatest frauds in the world. It is not necessary, and is introduced only as a substitute for honest dealing. And no fair government will suffer the humble citizen to be wronged out of a dollar or a farthing by dishonoring its issues; and by such dishonor it destroys that eminent faith which should ever exist between government and people.

Further on says Mr. Shumaker, "Without a specie basis for money, I am not able to think how we could determin the value of a paper money unit or a note of exchange." Very well. Then do you not see that is where your so-called paper has been dishonored and demonetized by the corporation that issued it? For if we assume that your specie basis is trade-dollars and the party issuing them repudiates them, you are in the same fix, and the so-called government has played a game of fraud besides. Then Mr. Shumaker asks, "What will we measure the value of a paper dollar with?" We answer: There is no measure. When all our money is made merchandise of there is no measure of values and we are virtually without money in the real, true sense of the term, and are financially at sea. Hence we see that redemption is far better than "resumption" and in an honorable deal will stand all tests. And now, supposing this paper dollar after going its rounds and settling its hundreds of balances, comes back where it started and is received at even one per cent premium by the government that issued it—which it certainly ought to be, if the value is changed at all, for a reward for the good it has done on its circuit—would not every dollar on its circuit hold its own and a little more? Then what is the good of specie basis? What is the benefit to the people of all that train of cars loaded with bullion, to the tune of twenty millions, and the expense of a regiment of soldiers to guard it? Is it the business of the government to go into the bullion business to control the market of the precious metals of the world and pay seven cents more per ounce for silver than it can be bought for in Europe? This may seem all right for a nest of conspirators in usurpation of functions never delegated to them by the people by the terms of their Constitution. And from that instrument I learn that "no state as such shall make anything but gold and silver a legal tender," and that is for the states as individual parts of government and has nothing to do with the general whole.

From the above we see there is no money but fiat money, and whatever is not that is merchandise, and here we should draw the line between what is money and what are commodities worth what they will bring—that the commodity is the thing sold and the money the thing used in payment, otherwise we are only either bartering commodities or swapping dollars. This then suggests the question, Without specie basis what volume of paper money can a nation float and maintain at par? Answer: If a nation's disbursements are annually, say $500,000,000, its receipts must also be the same or more; and if a nation receives $500,000,000 a year in its paper issues at par, then it can float $2,000,000,000 at par, which would be an annual redemption of one-fourth of its circulation, which is better than any specie basis ever did. And then what is the use of silver dollars, which nobody wants, nor any hard money, only as a subsidiary coin for change? And the above amount in circulation would be more than double our present circulation, which is now less than $900,000,000, or $14 per capita, while most other nations hav from $30 to $46 per capita. And it is this depletion, this unholy contraction, of the circulating medium that has well-nigh ruined our producing, industrial classes. And only pursue the same course far enough and a $5 bill will buy a farm. And our monetary method seems only to make millionaires and mendicants, bondholders and beggars.

The Tacoma Secular Union.

The Tacoma Secular Union of Tacoma, Wash., continues its career of usefulness and uninterrupted prosperity. For seven months we hav had a lecture every Sunday at the Germania Hall, the largest and most popular hall in the city; and despite the fierce opposition of the Ministerial Alliance collectivly, and the malice, misrepresentations, and desperate endeavors of the clergy and Christian bigots individually, without a single line or notice in any of the daily papers—stopped under threat of withdrawal of Christians' advertising—the interest is maintained, and our attendance, consisting of the most intelligent and many of the most influential people of the city, exceeds that of any three of the churches.

The standing and oft-repeated invitation for any clergyman in good repute in his own denomination to attend and occupy the rostrum one-half—or if that is not sufficient, two-thirds—of the time and expose our errors, or show wherein we misrepresent either Bible or history, remains unaccepted. Even the offer to take up a collection, giv them the entire proceeds, and add $5 to it from private funds of the lecturer, fails to inspire any of the shepherds of the Lord with courage to come to the rescue of the lambs.

Our society meetings, every Tuesday evening at Macauley's Hall, 1,117 Tacoma avenue, are most interesting and enjoyable. Despite rain or storm the attendance of lady members will be fifteen to twenty.

Business is transacted with dispatch; the most perfect harmony prevails. While many very earnestly and eloquently present their views, as soon as the decision of the majority is announced each and all cheerfully waive any individual preference in the more earnest desire for the general good and the interests of the society.

A spirit of emulation exists as to who can best exemplify the principles of Liberalism, insuring their own happiness by earnest endeavor to promote that of others.

Much of difficulty, trial, and discouragement, calling for self-sacrifice, courage, and persistency, had to be overcome by the gallant few who started the Union. But they hav been rewarded by grandest success. We are now lamenting the temporary absence of one of the pioneers, Dr. D. M. Angus, to whom the Liberals of the entire state are under lasting obligations for his untiring devotion and persistent zeal and self-sacrifice in promoting the interests of Liberalism.

To Dr. D. M. Angus, more than to any other, does the Tacoma Secular Union owe its success. Always genial, generous, sympathetic, fearless in defense of right, a genuin Liberal in all that the fullest, best sense of the word implies, he was a power of good in inspiring others with his own indomitable hope, energy, and persistence. He naturally won the esteem and love of every member of the Society. We are endeavoring to prove our regard for him by obedience to his wishes, doing all in our power to advance the cause at large and increase the membership and influence of the Tacoma Secular Union, so that on his return he will hav occasion of rejoicing at the good work accomplished.

After dispatch of business on Tuesday evenings we hav music, songs, duets, trios, recitations, short debates on subjects of interest connected with our work, followed by a dance, thus promoting sociability and insuring for all a really enjoyable time, digging up a few diamonds of delight from the sands of the otherwise dull monotony of business matters.

On the last Tuesday of each month we giv a public "literary," social, and ball, all of which hav been well attended and served to extend our acquaintances, remove much of prejudice, and induce a number to venture to the Sunday lecture, and thus we hav gained some most worthy members.

On Tuesday, November 29th, we gave our First Grand Masked Ball, and it was a brilliant success socially, financially, and every other way, far exceeding the expectations of the most sanguin. The tickets were limited, and none but persons whom we could gladly welcome to our homes were admitted.

Over one hundred were in costume, some queer, some quaint, some quizzical, some comical, and some superbly beautiful. Many sustained the character assumed with great ability, and a happier, merrier company never wondered at the rapid flight of time as they whirled through the giddy dance or gazed with delight upon the merry, motley throng.

Thus, by prudence, economy, morality, and moderate indulgence in pleasure while advancing the cause of mental liberty, we manage to gather some of the roses of life without the thorns.

C. B. REYNOLDS,

The Freethought Federation of America.

We are continually told what a vast influence for good the Christian religion has had upon the history of our race. With pride and self-assurance the Christian fraternity point to every noble institution, to everything that has exercised a humanizing influence upon mankind, as emanating directly or indirectly from their teachings. They are ever ready to claim all that is good in history, or at the present time. But when the dark side is presented to our view they meekly shut their eyes and try to shirk the responsibility upon others. Upon the hatred manifested by Christians toward those of other faiths history speaks out very plainly indeed, for the darkest spots in the records of our race are those acts of cruelty set forth in vivid word-pictures by those who hav transmitted to us the history of those terrible times. And to say that their representativs in this age would be just as arrogant, just as cruel and tyrannical, as in the ages past, is to say the least; for we hav only to glance at the incidents that are occurring in our own ti e to prove its truthfulness. The diabolical acts of cruelty perpetrated upon the Jews by Christian Russia to-day are lamented by every friend of humanity, and are significant in their illustration of the love entertained by Christians toward their fellowmen. This persecution of the Jewish race is not confined to Russia alone, but has been characteristic throughout the Christian ages. It has been encouraged by those in authority, and the people hav kept it up with all the fervor of religious frenzy. The general and prevailing idea was, and is now, that as the Jews crucified Christ, the punishments inflicted upon them were fully justified and only proportioned to the offense. Granting, however, that the records of scripture be true, it is evident to any rational being that the Jews did not crucify Christ. If it be true that he was put to death in the manner described by the gospels, then he fell a victim to the Roman government in a vain attempt to raise himself to the head of a party which he had hoped would be sufficiently powerful to control the affairs of the state. Moreover, he was tried and sentenced by a Roman tribunal, and was charged with sedition and treason against the Roman government, and was put to death by the prescribed method of capital punishment in vogue in Rome at that time, viz., crucifixion; and again, it is said to hav been a Roman soldier that ended his life by thrusting a spear in his side. Had it really been the Jews that had put him to death, he would hav been killed by the Jewish method of capital punishment, viz., stoning to death, which was in vogue even at that time, as may be found in the supposed stoning of Stephen. The Jews might in all probability hav saved his life; for even at the last moment, when according to the Roman customs of liberating one prisoner at the yearly festival Pilate asked them, "Whom shall I release unto you this day?" we are told that the people cried out with one voice, "Jesus, he that is called Barabbas." Evidently they regarded Christ as an impostor, and evidently they so regard him even unto the present day. And in consequence of an erroneous conception of the records of their own scriptures, the Christians still subject the Jewish people to the grossest outrages that hav ever disgraced the annals of history. Even in the United States no exception is made to this Christian rule, for intelligence comes from Buffalo, N. Y., of the infamous treatment of the Jewish residents in that town. Stones are thrown at them in the streets, they are openly robbed of their wares, and large crowds of Christian roughs hav gathered about the doors of their synagogs, breaking the windows and preventing them from entering or leaving their places of worship. These outrages hav continued to such lengths that a petition has been submitted to Mayor Bishop to interfere in the matter and afford our Jewish citizens adequate police protection.

Who can say in the face of the above that religion is a blessing to mankind? Who can say that religion promotes peace and good will among men? On the contrary, it is a blind submissiv obedience to superstitious faith that is at the root of all the evils that human flesh is heir to. The chains of earth are forged in heaven and tyrants well know how to defend the system upon which their powers are built.

. . . . . .

I hav left Chicago with its crowded streets and by-ways behind me, and I am now upon my first journey to the Pacific coast. I could not find time to make many friendly calls while in the World's Fair city, for the work of the Federation required my close attention. Upon my arrival in this place I found a large stack of mail—letters, petitions, and lists of names for membership numbering nearly one hundred, and fifty different packages and letters, which occupied several days to get straightened out; besides this each delivery brought me a fresh batch, so that my time was fully occupied. I was royally entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Geo. L. Robertson, to whom my warmest thanks are due. Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Stevens are still in the ranks and working for the Freethought cause. Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Harris also welcomed me to Chicago once more. And in the company of these a very pleasant time was spent. While here I called upon Messrs. Russel and Bennet, the two noted attorneys who conducted the case against the Catholic church in behalf of a former administration of the American Secular Union; also the brothers Reichwald, who are the oldest and most reliable commission merchants and importers of fruits in the city of Chicago, and who are now becoming activly interested in the work of the Federation. I bid farewell to these hosts of friends and make my way among the snows and frosts of the Northwest. Menomonie, Wis., is my first halting-ground. It lies snugly ensconced among the hills, and is an extensiv lumber region. It has a population of seven thousand, and possesses one of the finest auditoriums in the United States. It is not a large building, but has been put together regardless of expense. I lectured here on December 1st, and Belva Lockwood came on December 2d. I was not favored with a large audience, this being the first Freethought lecture ever given in this town; but I had to contend against several counter-attractions, the greatest of which was a campfire and bean-feast by the local post of the G. A. R., which took a large number of Freethinkers away.

Judge Carpenter is the leading Freethinker here and has held his present office as justice of the peace for nine successiv terms. Mr. and Mrs. Mark Sherman, Mrs. Stone, and Mr. Arthur Preston came over from Eau Claire, a distance of twenty-two miles, to hear my lecture; and so pleased were our friends at the result that I was immediately requested to giv them two more before leaving Wisconsin, which I did on the 5th and 6th. During this time I was the guest of Mr. and Mrs. B. Tainter, who are well-known Freethinkers, and are sixth cousins to that noble champion of liberty, Thomas Paine.

In the mean time I went up to Neilsville to giv two lectures, but there I met with the coldest reception it has ever been my misfortune to experience. I had forgotten the name of the gentleman to whom I had written and made arrangements for the lectures; nevertheless, I went, trusting that I should easily find some one, or else the hall where the lecture was to be given. I looked around me at the depot, in the vain hope of seeing some friendly eye that had come to greet me. I then repaired to a hotel, and after registering walked around the town, thinking I might possibly see an advertisement or some notice of my proposed lecture, but vain was the hope. I went back to the hotel, thinking that some one would be sure to come and inquire for me; again was I laboring under a delusion. No one knew of an intended Liberal lecture, and no one knew of an outspoken Freethinker in the place. Vainly did I search the directory, in the hope of recognizing the name of him to whom I had written. So at length, with the consciousness of having done my duty as far as possible under the circumstances, added to which is the expenditure of a little more than $10 in doing it, I gave up chasing the phantoms of my imagination, and got out of the town next day as speedily as possible, returning to Menomonie, where I was sure to meet with a friendly greeting.

As promised in my last letter, I giv the following suggestion for the better working of the Federation, which, if put into practice, will, I feel sure, assist in making the Federation a greater success than ever. That an agent or secretary shall be appointed in each county in each state, whose duty shall be to record the names of all Freethought voters in that county, and furnish the secretary of the Federation with a list of the same. Then in future elections, national or local, in those districts where Freethinkers are numerically strong, nominate a ticket of their own, and work for its success. From my own personal experience I feel sure that there are many election districts where we could be tolerably successful, and by the unflinching support of the great mass of Freethinkers we should be sure to win in some of them at least. Or, if we hav not sufficient in numbers to insure success for our side, we may compute as to how far we may hold the balance of power and sway the election of candidates.

Remember we are in the field for political work, and we must begin if we are going to do anything upon those lines at all. We must not wait until an election is upon us and then say we had not sufficient time to prepare; but let us commence and organize in every town and district. A great and glorious future is before us if we only work in concert with each other. No compromise is necessary. Our object can be gained without it.

The following letter from the president of the Oregon State Secular Union will show that the utmost harmony prevails among the most activ Freethought organizations in the country and the Federation:

ARAGO, ORE., Nov. 25, 1892.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Dear Sir: I inclose post-office money order for $2.50 to help the work of the Freethought Federation of America. You may credit me with $1, Wm. H. Schroeder with $1, and Geo. T. Schroeder with $.50. These are my oldest boys. George is not of age yet, but says he will get there soon.

I will send in a list of names soon and probably more aid. The times are so hard here and money so scarce that a number who would willingly help cannot do so now.

I wrote you in my last asking you to attend our convention. The legislature convenes on the second Monday in January (9th). I intend to hav our meeting commence about the 11th. I hav had some difficulty on account of hall, and the dates are not yet settled on that account. I hope you may arrange your appointments so you can be with us. It is partly my intention to secure an audience of the legislature (committee of the whole) and hav you address the same on the issues of our organization.

Yours for the cause, J. HENRY SCHROEDER.

W. S. Birkett and Edward Ducie, of South Butte, Mont., send us a live letter inclosing $1 each for the cause.

John A. Calder, of Jackson, Tenn., sends his second donation of $1 to our treasury.

I shall attend the convention of the Oregon Secular Union, which will be held at Salem on the 11th, 12th, and 13th of January, and I hope that the Freethinkers of that state will giv it a rousing delegation and make the meeting the beginning of a new era in our party. Let each one consider that upon his or her own exertions depends the success of these gatherings. Turn out in numbers sufficiently large to show the legislature that it is high time for them to consider our rights. We must make ourselvs heard and felt in these quarters if we ever hope to meet with success.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH,
Sec. Freethought Federation of America.

Sidetracked.

For more than two months I was switched off the road in consequence of the political lunacy—the presidential campaign. I resumed business in Denver after the election was over. It was a great satisfaction to address as I did there an audience of five hundred Liberals of all shades and colors. Pretty is that pretty does. This large meeting was not only Liberal-minded but also Liberal-handed.

From Denver I had a long ride to Creston, Ia., where there are but few genuin Liberals. There are many who proclaim themselvs Freethinkers, but when they are called upon to show their hand, or to open it, they are not to be found. I am happy to say, however, that when I find a man who takes THE TRUTH SEEKER or the Investigator, and pays for it, I invariably find a friend who stands by me. Near Creston I was entertained for four days by Jacob Geier and family. It was Thanksgiving time. We had Thanksgiving a day or two before the 24th of November, and also a day or two after. I was feasted day after day on either chickens, geese, or turkeys, with other appetizing dishes too numerous to mention. Mrs. Geier is a splendid cook and knows what to do for the fat lecturers. Mr. and Mrs. Geier, and neighbors who dropped in, joined with us evenings in the popular amusement of high five, while Miss Minnie Geier manipulated the organ keys and filled the air with rich melodies.

The lecture at Creston was not largely attended.

Those who came were pleased and disgusted—pleased to hear the lecture, and disgusted to see so little interest taken in the cause of Freethought. I am greatly indebted to Messrs. Henry and Allen for courtesies shown me while in Creston. Mr. A. J. Allen introduced me to the audience in a few appropriate remarks, and Mr. Henry shouldered most of the expenses.

From Creston I came to Macedonia, Ia., where I gave two lectures to large and enthusiastic audiences. Mine were the first lectures of the kind ever given in this place. Many of those who had never heard a radical lecture were expecting "awful" things. Such persons were disappointed to learn that I was advocating only liberty, justice, progress, etc.

I think the people of Macedonia will want more such lectures this winter. There are quite a number of Liberal minds here, such as Wm. Tomkins, Dr. G. L. Stemple, Sylvester Dye, James Perks, J. M. Harlan, Willoughby Dye, and J. M. Kelly.

I hope to be in New York some time in the spring. My address this winter will be 417 State street, Chicago, in care of George E. Wilson, bookdealer.

W. S. BELL.

One Miracle.

This miracle was a small, ordinary, every-day sort of a miracle, but it proved a great stumbling-block to a great many people. Amongst them was myself, but I "wrastled" and this is what I saw.

Webster declares that a miracle is an event or effect contrary to the established constitution and course of things, or a deviation from the known laws of nature; a supernatural event. Very evidently, any retrograde motion of natural laws must be a supernatural event. But hav nature's laws ever been retrograded? We shall see.

"Then spake Joshua to the Lord in the day when the Lord delivered up the Amorites before the children of Israel, and he said in the sight of Israel, Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and thou, Moon, in the valley of Ajalon.

"And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed, until the people had avenged themselvs upon their enemies. Is not this written in the book of Jasher? So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day.

"And there was no day like that before it or after it, that the Lord hearkened unto the voice of a man: for the Lord fought for Israel." Thus says Josh. x, 12–14.

When we question this thing, we are usually told that as the sun stands still now, it evidently did the same in those days, and that it was the earth whose course was stopped. Now to begin with, down in those regions the surface of the earth makes about a thousand miles an hour on its diurnal revolution. The sudden stop of this tremendous speed would instantly send all men, animals, water, earth, and all therein and thereon, on a journey through space. Elephants, trees, houses, would go sailing through the air, and goodness knows where they'd stop. Of course, an all-powerful God would, when he stopped the earth, increase the power of gravity, so as to hold things on. Now, the centrifugal motion which an elephant's massiv body would acquire would need, to hold it back, or counteract it, a centripetal, or gravitativ, force applied so strongly that neither man nor beast would be able to move a foot from the ground. Therefore they would hav but little chance to avenge themselvs on their enemies. However, granted that the earth stood still, it would hav been thrown from its place in the grand system, and as a result all the planets, comets, and other heavenly neighbors would long ago hav smashed into our terraqueous ball, and this would not hav been written. Besides, if the earth, for one second, had ceased its motion, the superior force of the sun, or perhaps some other body, would hav drawn us in its direction. The only thing that keeps the earth suspended in space is the constant motion, as may be seen in the gyroscope. A second's stop, and away we'd go, up, down, or some other way, and in a few seconds thereafter this earth would be a gigantic comet, flashing its millions of miles of fiery train, and making for some greater system than the present one. Of course the all-powerful God could prevent all this, but since he had, as we find from the few previous verses, killed more of the enemy by hailstones than the Israelites had done with the sword, it would hav been more like an all-wise God to send some more hailstones, rather than to suspend the operations of the entire solar system, or perhaps the whole universe.

So far, we hav the sun previously fixed, the earth commanded to halt, and Joshua also orders the moon to stand still. Well, there they stood, and "hasted not to go down, about a whole day." The antipodeans were blessed with a twenty-four-hour night, and the moon ceased her journey around the earth. This was necessary, or the moon would hav run into us. It, too, was in the same danger of being sucked toward the sun, but it wasn't. In other words, the universe stood still, so that more blood might be shed, more murder committed, and an already defeated and retreating enemy might be massacred. And then Joshua, who is supposed to hav written this book which bears his name, asks, "Is not this written in the book of Jasher?"

Joshua himself probably saw it there, and as it is not included amongst the works of our Bible, we are not able to answer that query. If Joshua can advance no other reason for the truth of his story, it stands on rather insecure foundation.

Then Joshua tells us that "there was no day like that before it or after it, that the Lord hearkened unto the voice of a man." Well, well. This says in so many words that all the talks of Moses with the Lord were fabrications of the Mosaic writers. Moses says he expostulated with the Lord and the Lord heard him, and Joshua says that is a fib, because the Lord never before hearkened unto the voice of man. To make assurance doubly sure, he says, "before or after it." How long after it? Did some other party hav a hand in writing this book? Was it written a hundred or so years after the death of Joshua? Where is this book of Jasher, the Upright, from whom Joshua seems to hav copied? Was not as much inspiration necessary for Jasher to tell such a fib, as for Joshua? Why, then, is not Jasher given a place in the Bible?

Must we discard this miracle? If we do not, then by Joshua's own words, it was the very first. If we do discard, we call Joshua a fabricator. Finally, if Joshua was inspired to write this book, why did he say the sun stood still at his command? The truth is, there was no more divine inspiration necessary to the author of "Joshua" than there is to the author of this article.

Before bidding Joshua adieu I would like to ask why no historian but himself has spoken of that twenty-four-hour day—that most wonderful event of all times, the stopping of sun, earth, moon, and consequently, stars, planets, comets, and the universe.

God is perfect. We all profess to believe that. God is perfection. Now, imperfection cannot emanate from perfection. Hence when God made the universe and all things which therein are, they were necessarily perfect. The revolving spheres, the suns—all, all were perfect. Hence to stop for a second one of these on account of a petition from one small man, would prove the existing state of things to be wrong. Perfection begets perfection. It is unchangeable. The laws of nature are perfect. Absolutely perfect. God is perfect. Neither, then, admits of any change. Neither can be changed. What seem as changes are but the working out of a great plan, a plan so great that it cannot and must not be confused, upset, and broken by a mere whim of excitement. God made all to run after its own plan, and all seemed good in his sight. But to say that, because he is all-powerful, he, like a spoiled child, must turn his toys topsy-turvy, and walk backward, or with feet in the air, is the hight of absurdity.

Cincinnati, O. CHARLES INGRAHAM.

Hell in Tennessee.

A correspondent of the New York Times in enumerating the horrid persecutions of the Jews by the Russian Christians has this among others: "Under a revival of an ancient Sunday law the police hav begun either arresting or blackmailing such Israelites as dare to appear in the marketplaces of the Pale on Sunday. This Sunday prohibition, which often brings about terrible riots, with the usual accompaniment of Jewish lives lost, and Jewish shops and houses plundered and burnt, is one of the most characteristic features of the anti-Jewish laws. The Hebrews, of course, religiously abstain from labor on Saturday. It was considered by Ignatieff an extremely smart trick to forbid them doing business on Sunday as well. In its essence this meant that the Jews could only hav five earning days against other people's seven. Although there are laws on the books prohibiting Christian labor or business on Sunday, they are a complete dead letter. Every traveler in Russia knows that Sunday in the markets and business streets differs in no respect from any other day, save that there are no Jews about. Having remained idle on Saturday for their own faith, they are compelled to observe Sunday for the Christian Sabbath—the while the Christian works or barters from morning till night, and the marketplaces are filled as well with Tartars, gipsies, and Persians whom no one molests."

Now, suppose we change the name of Russia in the above to Tennessee, the name of Jews to Seventh Day Adventists, and the name of Ignatieff to the bigoted brute Judge Swigart, and we hav an exact picture of the reign of terror now raging in west Tennessee.

What meaning can we attach to the glittering phrase, "This land of civil and religious liberty," where such horrid persecutions are enacted—where one bigoted, pig-headed, religious Christian sect uses the civil laws to do out another different sect of Christian cranks? Surely and of a truth Christianity is the religion of hate. Not only hating everything else differing from it, but each faction hating most cordially every other faction but itself.

If Christianity had any power within itself to commend itself to the judgment of mankind that it claims to hav, it would not need the aid of the civil law to support or assist it. But judging from its works, both in the Old World and the New, it is the most devilish of anything on the face of the earth.

It seems that Christians never use the Golden Rule (that's for others), and least of all Judge Swigart. LYMAN L. GOODWIN.

J. E. REMSBURG recently held a discussion in the Indian court house at Caddo, I. T., with Rev. Dr. Smith, the leading Methodist divine in the Choctaw nation. He has also been debating with Baptist divines in Arkansas. He will come East about the last of December, and Liberals desiring lectures should address him at once at Atchison, Kan.

Lie and Truth.

From Life.

One day a lie broke out of its inclosure and started to travel.

And the man who owned the premises saw it after it had started and was sorry he had not made the inclosure lietight.

So he called his swiftest truth and said:

"A lie has got loose and will do much mischief if it is not stopped. I want you to go after it and bring it back or kill it."

So the swift truth started out after the lie.

But the lie had one hour the start.

At the end of the first day the lie was going lickitysplit. The truth was going along away behind it and was getting tired.

It has not yet caught up.

Letters of Friends.

We Will Distribute Improving Literature.

DUNKIRK, N. Y., Nov. 26, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Some Christian no doubt stole my TRUTH SEEKER for November 8th. I hope it will do him good. I inclose $1, for which send me one copy of the 18th, and use the balance as you see fit. WILLIAM H. WYMAN.

A Hint to Advertisers.

CORNWALL, Nov. 30, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Why do not seedsmen, manufacturers, et al, advertise in THE TRUTH SEEKER? It must hav a very large circulation, and would pay, I believe. What seeds I get each year would nearly pay one-half cost for advertising. Each time I write a letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER and it is published I receive papers, magazines, circulars, and catalogs from all over the United States. A. L. MCFARLANE.

A Children's Freethought Paper.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Nov. 30, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The Little Freethinker comes to me from its editor, asking a notice. It seems a nice paper, full of instruction for the ones for whom it is designed; but, like all small things, if it grows it must hav sustenance, and now is a good time for those who hav been asking for a child's paper to prove their sincerity by sending to Elmina D. Slenker, the editor, Snowville, Pulaski county, Va., a subscription for the paper, fifty cents per year, semi-monthly. LUCY N. COLMAN.

Letter from a Hydra-Headed Monster.

ELKTON, MINN., Nov. 31, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I will try and send a few names of Antichristians, as there are quite a number of them here. But they are afraid to express their honest convictions, I being the only hydra-headed monster who does meet them with their own boomerang, thereby incurring the displeasure of some of the hypocritical Methodists because I deal out their own medicin in such rich profusion—a little from Noah, the first drunkard on record; incestuous Abraham; the two double-dyed libertins Solomon and his father; righteous Lot, the debaucher of his own flesh and blood; Moses the Egyptian murderer and thief; seasoned with Num. xxxi and Lev. xii, and the serpents they can handle and the poison they can drink if they only believe. All compounded makes quite an emetic. While they are dodging these shot or shell I add, by the way of variety, a few contradictions. Yours in hope,

MARTIN FLEMING.

A Freethinker's Life Attempted.

NEW HARTFORD, IA., NOV. 29, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: One morning during the first week of November an attempt was made on the life of our Liberal friend, Mr. M. W. St. John, living near Cedar Falls, Ia. At about 5 o'clock in the morning, while his sons were at the barn doing chores, a shot was fired through the window of the house, the ball passing within about three inches of Mr. St. John's head. Mr. St. John has long been a radical Infidel, but, further than being pelted with rotten eggs by the meek and lowly followers of Jesus, he has escaped bodily harm. Mr. St. John is acknowledged by the best men of Cedar Falls to be a strictly honorable and moral man, and his only crime against the church is his vigorous attack at all times against the immoral parts of holy writ. They could not answer his attacks, and as stale eggs did not subdue him, they no doubt thought to quiet him with cold lead. It was a narrow escape, but we can tell these cowardly pious bigots that M. W. St. John is not a man to be intimidated and that he will denounce Bible errors until dead. The Cedar Falls weekly Globe heads the announcement of the attack upon his life thus:

A WASTE OF POWDER. An Unsuccessful Attempt Upon the Life of M. W. St. John, of Mt. Vernon Township.

The editor then gives a scurrilous account of the affair, tending, in our opinion, to cause the would-be murderer to reload and try again. Mr. St. John replied to the editor's slanderous account of the attempt on his life, and unwittingly the pious imbecil heads the reply in glaring letters: "A Waste of Ink." Yes, friend St. John, so far as your reply affects such men, it was a waste of ink; but when we consider that these headlines hav placed that editor far beneath the respect of all honest men, and that by this inhuman act he has shown himself to be lower than the ruffian who attempted your life, we know it was not a waste of ink. As in the case of all defenders of the Holy Slush we hav ever met, this editor's own words condemn him.

We hav fifty on our petition for opening the World's Fair Sundays and are daily adding new names.

I hav just read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 26th A. Augusta Chapman's page, and am sorry you headed it, "We Desire That Some One Answer This." Augusta must hav some sort of a god and I for one am willing to let her fix up a great big god to suit her fancy. A thousand gods will not prevent her from being governed by the laws of nature, even though "these inflexible, insensate laws never yield to tears and entreaties."

Wishing you every success as editor and manager of the best paper on earth, I am,

Sincerely yours, MEL PIERCE.

The Greatest Missionary Known.

YPSILANTI, MICH., Nov. 15, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I see you hav printed in pamphlet form F. Steiner's open letter to the Rev. Mr. Sooy. Inclosed I send you $1 to pay for half a dozen of the same, W. Hart's "Candle from Under the Bushel," the balance in leaflets. The country is overrun with these same 7x9 preachers, or pulpit poodles, as Saladin calls them, who seem to think that all that is necessary to make great men of them is to stalk into a pulpit with the strut of a turkey-cock and defame such men as Voltaire, Thomas Paine, or Robert Ingersoll, and the thing is done. We would advise the reverend gentlemen to take out an insurance policy against lightning for the benefit of their families, as friend Steiner may again take it into his head to pass that way. I shall want Colonel Ingersoll's "Voltaire" when printed. I think it grand. His allusion to the bears carried me back to my childhood days, when the sight of a man with a prairie on top of his head caused me to cast my eyes about to see if there were any she-bears in sight. This and the whale story are off the same piece. It would seem that the whale's Thanksgiving dinner of missionary did not sit well upon his stomach. He was not used to having a camp-meeting held there, and he seems to hav resolved to rid himself of his submarine worshiper. Three days' and three nights' continual praying made him desperate. He resolved to beach his troublesome passenger, which he did by running full tilt against the shore. Jonah was lifted from his secret devotions and sent headlong onto terra firma, an astonished if not a wiser man. The sacred volume does not inform us what the effect was upon the whale. Perhaps the Rev. Mr. Talmage might inform us. It has always been a mystery to me that God, who is so very anxious to save the world, did not keep Jonah on the track. He certainly was the most successful missionary we ever read of. With a sermon composed of only eight words he was able to bring that immense city Nineveh to its knees. It would not hav taken him long to hav brought the millennium had he missionaried a little longer. I think there would hav been no difficulty in securing his services after he failed in the gourd business. But "God's ways are not as our ways"—and we are thankful that they are not.

Our last election was a stunner to a great many. It is hard for Christians to think the religious question had anything to do with it, but that it had I hav not a doubt. The taxpayers of this country are getting their eyes open to the vast amount of money invested in churches that pay no tax, also the determination to force religious legislation upon it, and they are determined to call a halt in that direction. I for one am with them.

Yours truly, JAS. P. DICKINSON.

A Priestly Utterance, with Comments.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Dec. 5, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I will send you the following quotation from a Thanksgiving discourse in Washington, D. C., by the Rev. Dr. T. S. Hamlin:

We hav dedicated magnificent buildings in our Western metropolis to an exhibition of material and moral progress; an exposition that already draws the eyes of the world, and that is to show, as one of its chief glories, the closed gates that mean an American Sunday. We are a more prosperous, more free, more law-abiding, more liberty-loving, more humane, more moral, more Christian people this day than ever before in our national existence.

The president heard it, and was much flattered and consoled.

In the first sentence it is stated that "one of the chief glories" of the World's Fair is "its closed gates that mean an American Sunday." To me it is an infamous statement, but entirely consistent with the plans and purposes of American priestcraft. If the reverend gentleman should liv to see those gates open on Sunday in spite of his premature triumph, I hope the president will console him. To my opinion, they, and every member of Congress who voted to close those gates on Sunday, violated their official oaths, the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution, and all human rights, and are traitors to American liberty.

I wrote our member of Congress from this district—elected by the People's party—but he is one of the traitors. Our Senator of the People's party voted right.

Most of them who voted to close the Fair on Sunday did it from policy. What do most Congressmen care about Sunday? They violate it continually. They well know that all time is alike, and that all Sundays are man-made.

I ask the Rev. Mr. Hamlin where his American Sunday came from. If the Bible is his authority for keeping Sunday, then he and most people never keep it, for he well knows that the Sunday of the Decalog is the seventh and not the first day of the week.

That infamous murderer, debaucher, and tyrant Constantine stole our "American Sunday" from the pagans, when he became a Christian. That is where our "American Sabbath" came from. And the people generally do not know but that it is the Bible Sabbath. Constantine paganized Christianity and Christianized paganism. Our American pagan heathen Sunday is unknown to the Bible. The Rev. Mr. Hamlin says we are a more "liberty-loving" people than ever before—while no Freethinker and humanitarian can hav a fair trial in our courts. Down in Tennessee church and state combine to persecute, prosecute, fine, and imprison quiet and industrious Adventists who keep the true Bible Sunday and work on the pagan or the Rev. Mr. Hamlin's American Sunday.

The Rev. Mr. Hamlin says we were never a more Christian people than we are now, which is the only truth in his series of assertions.

The gist and spirit and practice of popular Christianity is, "Believe or be damned; and if we, the Christians alone, cannot damn you sufficiently, we will call on the state and laws to help us." This is Christian civilization with a vengeance. Our Sabbatarian, Prohibition, God-in-the-Constitution, godly, priestly, church-and-state people are determined to rule or ruin.

Surely I, who for fifty years hav suffered everything but imprisonment—barely escaped that forty years ago—and death, know what I am saying. Here in "free" Kansas, where I hav been twenty-two years, there are Christian bigots—men and women—all around me, and some belong to the People's party, who would stop my tongue and pen and disfranchise me if they could.

The People's party resolved that God almighty is the supreme ruler of nations; but they do not let him rule. They pray to him to do this and that. And if one of their number dies they say, "It has pleased almighty God" to kill him or her. Truly, if there was a God he would stop such false charges.

Well, the chief reason of my writing this article is my intense desire that the gates of the World's Fair will be kept open on the Rev. Mr. Hamlin's American Sunday, he and his coadjutors to the contrary notwithstanding.

"O Liberty! O sound once delightful to every Roman ear! once sacred! Now trampled upon!" Shall we hav more liberty, or lose what little we ever had?

J. H. COOK.

Paine's "Age of Reason."

NEW YORK, Nov. 28, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I notice by comparing the present age with forty or fifty years ago, Freethought has made great, progressiv strides toward knowing what truth the Bible may contain. We find Professor Briggs is commanded to appear before the presbytery for heresy. Also Prof. H. P. Smith, of a theological seminary, for unsound teaching on biblical scholarship and inspiration. He taught that the Old Testament contained errors of historic fact. What is heresy but private opinion? And what is Deism but the opinion of those that only acknowledge one God? What is deity but the nature and essence of God? Thomas Paine was a Deist; he believed in but one God. And do not the Christians? They believe in Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, three in one and one in three; which is hard to understand, but they believe it all the same. The true Deist has but one god, and his religion consists in contemplating the power, wisdom, and goodness of the deity in his works. Were man impressed as fully and as strongly as he ought to be with the belief of a God, his moral life would be regulated by the force of that belief, he would stand in awe of God, and of himself, and would not do the thing that could be concealed from others. We can know God only through his works.

It is surprising to know what ignorance there is in men who profess to be acquainted with the scripture. Not one of them out of ten thousand ever read the "Age of Reason." They know "Tom Paine" only by hearsay, and are prejudiced against him. If you ask them, "Hav you ever read the 'Age of Reason?'" they invariably say, "No, and I do not want to." "Why?" "Because he is a Deist." "That is the very cause why you should inform yourself what a Deist is. Your superstition, bigotry, and narrow-mindedness lead into error." The writer has been conversant with the Bible from his youth and knew it from Genesis to Revelation, and but recently read the "Age of Reason," and was surprised to find such good reading and explanation of the scriptures. It is a good text-book for the Bible, and should be circulated throughout the world as a companion to the Bible. Thomas Paine was a great man, a profound thinker. The ministers who preach a doctrin that they hav been taught by adhering to theologians are afraid of Thomas Paine. And well they may be, for he tells them truth that can not be gainsaid or resisted. They do not want to hear or know about him. It is not their bread and butter. They that never read the "Age of Reason" hav no case, no brief, to offer against the author.

Let one divest himself of superstition, early tuition, and conform the mind to reason and common sense, and he will become a happy man. His fear of punishment hereafter will vanish as snow before the genial sunshine.

It is noted in the November 19th TRUTH SEEKER that an old friend had passed away, eighty-three years of age, with no fear. He desired that no clergyman should speak at his funeral. His wishes were faithfully carried out. No cloud of superstition hovered over the peaceful scene. That is the true death-bed scene of a Freethinker.

The law of Reason is righteousness, making wise the simple. It is pleasant to know that there are some people sensible yet living in this good world of ours, not carried away by ignorance and superstition of others.

There is now an effort made among the Liberal Freethought people to hav the "Age of Reason" read in their family, that they may know what the book really contains so bad about the Bible. Let any person read that book, whether the mind be prejudiced or not, and he will be astonished to learn what light and information he will derive from the truths it contains.

It is pretty hard to fight superstition with much prospect of success where reason is deprived of liberty of thought.

It is stated by the faithful that Father O'Keefe after kissing the great big toe of Pope Leo XIII., has returned from Rome and describes his interview at the Vatican. He says Leo has a wonderful love for America and Americans, and manifests a deep interest in everything that concerns the United States. The interest he manifests, it is said, is surprising. Of course he does so. The old presumptuous Jesuitical fool knows very well he has no footing any more in Rome. Having been driven out of Europe, his last asylum is in this land of freedom. The spirit of the times shows the Jesuits are making great efforts to gain the United States for their religion. Should it ever come to this, it will be in order to use "bell, book, and candle."

There is but little use in having much sympathy with people who deliberately, without investigation, go blindly on deceiving themselvs as well as others concerning the truth of whatmay be gathered from reason and common sense. Every person should investigate and examin for himself and not leave it for another to do for him.

Throw away Ritualism. Begin with the "Age of Reason." Try and find out some untruth stated in it if you can—then it may be condemned. S. R. THORNE.

A. Augusta Chapman Answered.

ADDISON, VT., Dec. 9, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I will write a brief answer to A. Augusta Chapman's letter, Nov. 4, 1892.

The mind of every person who becomes a great admirer of self fails to comprehend the true good that results from the expression of an opposit reasoning. Mrs. Chapman, this seems exactly your condition. You jump at conclusions that the Truth Seeker Company are giving to the human family a pugnacious paper full of base, low ideas bowing God out of his own universe. Since the above is your opinion, I would kindly commend you for having honor enough to address this Company of reasoning people and offering to hold a controversy with them in regard to this all-important subject. Very good in you so far. But remember, it is custom to allow the challenged party to choose the weapons of defense. Then we will take the mind, acts, and condition of the whole human family under the old ways of teaching God and Christianity, to prove what kind of power the orthodox God has over his people; using just as few and simple words in the matter as possible. Now, if Mrs. Chapman truly has a tangible knowledge of God which she can demonstrate to us we wish to know it. A great flow of eloquent words with a lot of old say-so's will not answer our demands.

Now, Mrs. Chapman, we, as honest men and women calling ourselvs truth seekers, do firmly believe your supposed God is the devil, which must be cast out from the universe, even though it will cause very great grief and mourning among all creeds of orthodoxy to part with their old ideal magic man-god whom the people hav so long bowed down before, talking to him in tears, begging and pleading for mercy, peace, and happiness without obtaining anything but an absurd promis of having good things when we are all dead, wanting nothing more. Truth seekers must and will hav a God for to-day, taking no thought for to-morrow. To prove the power of your supposed magic God a failure, I could tell you a very great number of circumstances, while two or three ought to be convincing. My father and mother were very conscientious Congregationalists, worshiping according to the custom of all the denomination, having perfect confidence in the care and protection of the ever-watchful eyes of the magic being. So on this particular morning my father bowed in humble prayer, asking the magic ruler to guide him and his family into all truth, guard and protect him and his family from all harm on that day, then went out from his home full of confidence, not knowing any need of wisdom, thinking his supposed God would force care upon his mind at every need. At this time my father had some business to transact on the opposit side of a pond. It was the 3d day of April, when the strength of ice was gone; nevertheless, he determined to cross it instead of going around the safe way. The consequence was my father was brought home a corpse, leaving his feeble wife and children to support themselvs. Under the burden my mother sickened and died, leaving us children without friends, home, or love, and without the common comforts of life such as other children enjoyed around us. The clergy and church people told us children we must submit patiently to our lot, for it was all by the will of God that life must go hard with us to teach us to love and obey the church's greatly admired god of love and mercy. So much to pay the clergy and the common reading of the Bible which teaches people to pray to, and trust all to the care of, a supposed man in the sky. Again, a father and mother reared two energetic, loving sons, constantly teaching them to love and adore the church's God, and every day asking from such power guidance and care; and lo, just at the dawn of manhood both sickened and died with malignant fever, neither parents or sons ever comprehending that it was lack of any knowledge in regard to wisdom's laws that brought them to an untimely death. Again, the clergy seek to comfort the bereaved ones with the idea that it was the decree of a wise god to call them home to heaven early to make the parents hav greater love and confidence in the church's god, thus placing deception upon deception to deceive to the very last.

We will change the matter a little, and tell now of two farmers whose farms join. One is an Adventist deacon who spent all his spare time and means trying to get everybody to work for the adored voice of Adventism. The other farmer spent all his spare time buying cattle and sheep for market. So it chanced that he bought a nice flock of fat sheep from the deacon in the morning, promising to return in the afternoon to weigh them, as they were bought by the pound. But on returning home the business affairs of the buyer demanded that he should return to weigh the sheep some hours earlier than he intended, and to his astonishment he found all the feeding-troughs filled with salt, grain, and a great quantity of water, the deacon intending to get all the weight possible for the buyer to pay for. The deacon was beat, and owned up that he was caught in the very act. Now, how much of the true principle which constitutes true man among all men was there manifest in this deacon who claimed to be a genuin saint governed by the church's idolized god? One morning this deacon arose and wrote in his diary that he was feeling very well, thanking his god for protection, then went about light work, leaving the harder part for others; at noon partook an enormous dinner for a man not working hard, and was found senseless in a short time after, lived three days, and died. Then the clergy again, as usual, said it was the will of his god that he should lie down to rest from his labors of love and care for the church, until the trump of god shall sound to awake him and resurrect his body from the ground to mingle no more with ungodly men and skeptics.

There could not be room for all the books in the world if all the acts of church people were told which are the result of harping to and trusting in a false, unreliable god—which should not only be spelled with a small g, but should be spelled "devil" going about deceiving all those who are void of reasoning.

Truth seekers positivly will not blindly bow to the church's imaginary god. Their god must speak with the spirit and voice of Wisdom, teaching the results of every cause. We admit one point with you, that Nature is the mother of all things, and adding to this that Wisdom is a self-creating power, father and ruler of all who are not subjects of the church's imaginary god, which is truly the fallen angel light that is lifted up deceiving the world until the true light of Wisdom and Reason became almost unknown, until the great folly of professing people served to anoint the eyes of reasoning men and women.

Now, Mrs. A. A. Chapman, I am ready to take chapter and verse all through the Bible with you to prove my statements true. Or we will bring to public view the sayings and doings of all the clergy and their followers to prove whether truth seekers are refusing the true god, which, if properly named, is called Wisdom, and which is able to walk, talk, and become manifest in reasoning men and women—these not being puffed up with soaring imagination and flowery, swift-flowing speech, nor aiming to be called talented and smart. MRS. S. W. SMITH.

A Freethought Sister's Wise Thoughts on Many Topics.

SAN JOSÉ, CAL., Nov. 10, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: During the last year I hav been reading your valuable paper and am deeply interested in the good work you are doing for humanity. It came to me first like a white-winged messenger of hope from R. H. Schwartz, now my husband, when I was living in a hot-bed of orthodoxy in Pennsylvania, surrounded by people who imagined they saw horns sprouting from my head, looked for cloven feet, and actually were afraid to be with me during a thunder-storm, fearing their God would send me to eternal torture by a stroke of lightning from his merciful hand and send them along to keep me company as a punishment for being with me, a wicked Infidel. The consternation Mr. Heston's cartoons created was amusing, and THE TRUTH SEEKER was condemned as the devil's work.

I shall in the near future send a number of your papers to my former friends. I cannot resist the temptation of endeavoring to enlighten them.

I want to giv my version of the story of the garden of Eden, and ask some good Christian friend to enlighten me if I am wrong. God, the Bible and ministers claim, is perfect. He decided to make a world, perfect—it could not be otherwise. He created two human beings, perfect also—they could not be otherwise—placed them in a garden and forbade them eating fruit from the tree of knowledge (could they be perfect without knowledge?), a very unnecessary command, for perfect beings cannot sin. If there was a devil and he tried to tempt God's children to sin he could not hav succeeded—they are perfect. Again, God, being perfect, could not create an imperfect being, or devil. God's devil was an archangel—perfect—and could not fall—for perfection knows no sin.

If the Christian God is perfect the Bible is false; if imperfect, it is false. I can see no use in a God of imperfection, and a God who creates evil (Isa. xiv, 7) cannot be perfect.

The idea of a personal God ruling and reigning over all the vast millions of worlds and human beings is ridiculous. I am not surprised that he has three heads in one; am inclined to think he could use quite a number more to advantage. If he patterned every world after this one, and destroyed every nation in every world by a flood for wickedness, and out of the vast numbers saved such a godly man as our Bible Noah, who celebrated his delivery from the flood by getting on a big drunk, he must hav had his hands full, and I am not surprised to find him calling on the poor insignificant women to organize the Women's Christian Temperance Union (and with many Noahs even Frances Willard would find her patience taxed) to help keep his naughty boys sober. If he had to die for every world to save lost sinners from a hell he himself created, and a devil he cast out of heaven because the poor fellow imagined himself equal, perhaps superior, intellectually to himself (what a silly God he is!), he must be nearly used up by this time. Perhaps that accounts for the famin, pestilence, drouth, horrors, and poverty sweeping broadcast over our land from year to year. He may be away saving some other world, or too nearly used up from his last experience to hear the cries of his children, stretch forth his hand, and save them. What a very negligent God he is! And how cruel to woman! I wish I could compel every woman to read her Bible, or the parts pertaining to herself: 1 Tim. ii, 9-15; Peter iii, 1-6; 1 Thess. iii, 10; Eph. v, 22-24; 1 Cor. vii, 39; Num. xxxi, 17, 18. Women, read these references, and then remember that every Sunday-school teacher, every woman who is an activ worker in the church, every woman who does not learn in silence from her husband and be in subjection, is doomed for eternal torture if the Bible is true.

Every individual who joins a church takes a false oath (can never go to heaven, sing psalms, wear a robe and crown, play a harp, etc.): "I solemnly promis to renounce the devil and all his works; the vain pomp and glory of the world, the flesh, and mammon; the wearing of costly apparel, jewelry, etc.," and winds up with "God helping me, amen." If this meets the eye of one person who can honestly say he has not broken this solemn oath he could command a large salary from Barnum, besides being exhibited as the most wonderful curiosity on earth. And everyone who is guilty of breaking this solemn promis can rest assured that if the Bible is true they will all go to the hell they create for the sinner and unbeliever.

Having been a member (and dupe) of the church for ten years, I speak from experience. I know the horrors of the believer who fears eternal torture.

I know now that mankind, woman especially, must trample the Bible under their feet before they can rise and become free.

I believe in woman's rights, dress reform, etc. I want to see her stand side by side with the opposit sex and vote. I want to vote—to feel that I can help elect the president that will stand by the American people and be true to the Constitution of the United States. But I would rather die without voting than see woman vote now. She is not prepared to cast her vote for the best interest of the country, because she does not think. She would be her own worst enemy, and discover her mistake when too late. It is highly necessary to arouse her to her position in the Bible, church, and dress reform. First she must use her reasoning faculties and realize the littleness of dress, novel-reading, gossip, dancing and the harm it does, and that outside of this limited space her knowledge is blank.

Dress reform is sadly needed. Women are catering to a fashion, ruining their health and their offspring. I want to see tight clothes, lacing, etc., laid aside. I admire Dr. Mary Walker—her courage, her independence, and unconcern as to the opinion of the world. I am her friend, and am surprised in an article published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 10, 1892, that Robert G. Ingersoll should refuse her admittance to his home because she prefers health and comfort to the awful curse, fashion, and dares to use her own judgment publicly in regard to her own habiliment. Mr. Ingersoll is a grand man. I admire his courage, truth, and firmness. But I think his eyes are still closed to the great need of dress reform, and woman's privilege to think for herself in this age. I claim with him that woman has every right that man has. Dress reform is one of them. And the colonel as a leader of Liberals should encourage the mothers of our nation to dress for health and comfort.

Mr. Schwartz is much pleased to find that the Liberals are awaking to their duty in regard to the Freethought Federation of America. We are with the movement heart and hand, and will make an effort to get others to join, and will do all we can to help the cause financially. We will giv this matter attention at our earliest possible convenience. I will inclose the names and addresses of several Freethinkers who hav never seen THE TRUTH SEEKER. If you send them sample copies you will, I think, get a few subscribers. I will do all I can to get subscribers for you, and should feel glad to help you in your good work for humanity. I am,

Yours for Liberty,

MRS. R. H. SCHWARTZ.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Giv the Old Year His Due.

Yes, giv the poor Old Year his due
Before we toll his knell!
He's been a faithful friend to us,
And served us long and well.
Oh, was it not his hand that brought
The springtime's wealth of green,
And flung into the lap of May
Fit garlands for a queen?
And though among the blossoms fair
He dropped some sprigs of rue,
We'll take him by the hand and giv
The poor Old Year his due!

When summer held high carnival
Among her sylvan bowers,
Was not his hand the one to strew
Her onward path with flowers?
And when in billowy harvest fields
The reaper's song went round,
Did he not loiter on his way,
Till all the sheaves were bound?
And if among the bearded grain
Some blighted stalks there grew,
We'll winnow out the gold and giv
The good Old Year his due!

Ah! was he not our comrade still
Through many a glade and wold,
When all the autumn trees were gowned
In crimson, dun, and gold?
And when his hair and beard grew white
With flakes of wintry snow
Did he not bring the Christmas joys
To set our hearts aglow?
And if the brimming cup he held
Was mixed with sorrow, too,
We'll drain it to the dregs and giv
The kind Old Year his due!

—Frank Leslie's Weekly.

One Way.

A CHRISTMAS STORY.

Come, children, hain't you romped enough?
You'll tire yerselvs clean out;
Come, draw up 'round the fire an' hav
A story-tellin' bout.
Here, Jennie, come sit 'side o' Tom;
An' Dick, here, next to Bess;
An' Sue an' Harry right in here—
You'll all find seats, I guess.

Here, Jack, put on another log,
An' make a lively blaze;
I dunno how you city folks
'Ll like our country ways;
But a'ter all my boys growed up
And all had gone away,
I 'lowed as how I'd run this place
In the good old-fashioned way.

I love the good old practices
On holidays, and so
We hav our open-fireside talks,
Yule log an' mistletoe;
An' you gran'children come out here
To pass a few cold days,
An' we try to entertain you
In our poor, simple ways.

Ah, well! Hi, Ned, there goes the door—
I vow this is a night;
That whistlin', roarin' wind out thar
Ain't all bark—it can bite.
We ought all to be right thankful
Fer a good warm seat an' bed;
Jack is thankful for his Nellie,
May is thankful for her Ned.

Christmas brings us all together,
Rounds out the dyin' year,
Gathers the twigs of the fam'ly tree,
An' fills our hearts with cheer.
Make pledges for the year to-day,
An' whatever comes, do right;
Our hearts are warmer than the snow,
Let us keep our lives as white.

But I s'pose you're tired o' preachin',
Want me ter git ter "biz;"
But don't go an' get oneasy
An' begin to fret an' quiz;
Dick, go git the nuts an' raisins,
Put the apples on ter roast,
An' let me recollect a bit—
See what story you'd like most.

Well, children, I'll tell yer a tale
Of sixty year ago,
When people acted nat'ral like—
Wer'n't ruled by Style an' Co.
When men could call their souls their own,
Wer'n't driv about like steers
Ter hav their manhood all crushed out
By plottin' an' by fears.

When young men wus content ter go
The way their fathers led,
Content ter work their fathers' farms
An' eat their fathers' bread;
'Fore men bound down the continent
With iron bands an' stout,
An' their rush an' grab fer money
Crushed all their goodness out.

But I'm wanderin' from my story:
It wasn't far from here
A fellow lived called "Sassy Sam,"
Feared by everybody near.
He was the worstest of the worst,
That, no one could deny,
An' he had tricked so many folks
That no one wouldn't try.

He raised the old scratch everywhere:
In church, in school, at home,
An' peace would al'ays take its leave
Wherever he would roam.
The tail of every yeller dog
Sam had long since introduced
To numerous termater cans,
An' lively scenes produced.

In church, he let some mice loose once
(Which made the women yell),
Hitched a donkey in the pulpit,
An' muffled up the bell.
At school he al'ays was the first
(In all except recitin').
He was never out o' trouble
An' almost al'ays fightin'.

At the farm next to his father's,
Ajining on the west,
Lived Sally Green—of all the girls
The one that he loved best.
She was a bright and bonny lass,
An', though her charms he knew
(Contra-wise to girls nowadays), stayed
Winsome, frank, and true.

So these two grew up together
In childlike innocence,
An' Sam kep' al'ays sociable
With lovers' diligence.
He called fer her on Monday morn
An' took her ter the fair;
In winter took her out ter ride
With pung an' sorrel mare.

Farmer Green had laughed at Sally
As long as Sam was young;
But a'ter several years passed by
A different song he sung.
He watched Sam's pranks on other folks
With many a hearty laugh,
But havin' Sam go turn on him
Wa'n't such a joke by half.

The old man called to mind how Sam,
One dark, still, drowsy night,
Stole up the hill behind his barn
An' gave them all a fright,
How he built a roarin' bonfire,
Went down an' rung the bell;
An' people thinkin' the barn afire,
Came rushin' up pellmell.

An' several other things like this
He now could recollect,
An' so in Sally's int'rests now
Wus extra circumspect.
Though Sam had sobered down a bit,
The old man quickly saw
He wa'n't the right sort o' feller
Ter be his son-in-law.

Autumn now gave way ter winter,
Ice wus formin' on the creek,
Sam was gettin' mighty constant,
Callin' now three times a week.
Sally's father warned him off once,
Said he'd hav him 'round no more.
An' when he found him there next night
He threw him out the door.

An' now 'twas day 'fore Christmas:
The young folks of the town,
Brought together on the river,
Wus skatin' up an' down.
An' Sam an' Sally in the crowd
Were whisp'rin' on the sly
(Fer lovers did, an' al'ways will,
A parent's power defy).

An' now a race has been proposed
Fer girls (a half a score),
An' Sally lines up with the rest,
Far toward the other shore.
The boys, now gathered on the bank,
Raise many a hearty shout,
An' see, the signal's given now,
The girls hav started out.

Now Sally shoots ahead a bit,
First of the strugglin' ten;
A shriek! she's tumbled in a hole
Made by the fishermen.
She falls! the ice breaks under her!
The crowd stands speechless there,
An' Sally clutches hard the sides
With strength born of despair.

But Sam now shoots across the ice,
Like arrow from a bow,
But can he reach the freezin' girl
Before she goes below?
The crowd looks on in breathless awe;
He'll be there in a trice,
But just before he reaches her
She sinks beneath the ice.

A groan goes up from all the crowd;
Sam keeps on like a streak,
An' now the deadly hole is reached;
He plunges in the creek;
He clutches Sally as she sinks,
An' then, despite her weight,
A few bold strokes now bring him up
Where helpin' han's await.

Sam got a Christmas present,
An' 'fore it come spring thaw,
Struck partnership with Farmer Green,
An' 'came his son-in-law.
An' now perhaps you're wonderin'
Where Sam an' Sally be;
Well, Sally's now your gran'mother,
An' Sam—well, Sam is me!

Correspondence.

BRONSTON, KY., Nov. 8, 1892.

DEAR AUNT SUSAN: I hope you hav enjoyed yourself while on your voyage, and I missed you from the Corner so much. I wish you would visit our country some time. We liv near Bronston, a small village containing about one hundred inhabitants, one church and one storehouse and one Infidel. I think there are more, but they do not say so. We liv on the Cumberland river, the largest watercourse in Kentucky. The steamers run all winter from Nashville to Burnside. We hav a nice school, and our teachers are Miss Mamie and Miss Sallie Pettus. We hav no religion in our school.

If I see this in print I will write again in the future. GERTRUDE STIGALL.

P.S.—I will giv what I think is the right answer to Jas. D. Douthitt's questions. Sacred history is pertaining to the Bible; profane history is pertaining to this grand and beautiful world.

[We shall always be glad to hear from Gertrude. She writes very nicely. If we should ever go anywhere near Bronston we would be sure and find our friend, when we would hav a good time talking over matters of interest.—ED. C. C.]

Hard to Understand.

Little boy: "I shu'd think that these 'thousan'-leg' bugs would starve or somethin'."

Little girl: "Why?"

"They've got to hunt for things to eat, same as other bugs, havn't they?"

"Of course."

"Well, I don't see how they can keep all those legs goin' and think of anything else."

A Little Mixed.

"Goodness me, Wallace," cried his uncle, "you are getting to be a big fellow. Nearly eight now, aren't you?"

"Guess so," said Wallace; "papa says I'm worse than a dozen."

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

EMIL KRONNER, proprietor of a New York city museum, has been arrested, at the complaint of ministers, for picturing the life of Christ with a magic-lantern. The pictures are reverent. The ministers say that a Bowery museum is not a fit place for such pictures.

A CATHOLIC paper says: "One perfect act of contrition on the part of Jay Gould at fourteen minutes past 9 o'clock on Friday morning of last week would at fifteen minutes past hav ushered him into the communion of saints before the throne of God. That is Roman Catholic theology."

AT Medina, N. Y., John Souci and Florence Compton ran away and were married by a Methodist preacher. On their return the girl's parents enforced a marriage by a preacher of their own denomination, which is Presbyterian. The bridegroom, being a Catholic, was not satisfied till the knot was tied by a priest.

THOUSANDS are still flocking to the picture of the Virgin and Christ-child which miraculously appeared on a window in the Catholic church at Canton, Minn. The church front is decorated with crutches of cured cripples. The sale of articles about the church as relics has enabled the trustees to buy a large tract of land around it.

Life of Thomas Paine,

WITH A

History of His Literary, Political, and Religious Career in America, France, and England.

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY,

Author of "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," "George Washington and Mount Vernon," "Washington's Rules of Civility." etc.

To Which Is added a Sketch of Paine by William Cobbett.

No real biography of Paine has ever appeared. The so-called Lives of Paine have been mainly the controversial work of pamphleteers, turning chiefly on his religious heresies. Paine was in his fifty-eighth year before he published anything concerning religion, and before that time he had acted an important part in revolutionary movements in the United States, England, and France. But in the religious conflict initiated by him, his political services and military career hav been but inadequately considered. A certain historical ostracism has buried in the archives of various countries a large mass of documents containing records of paramount interest and importance. Mr. Conway has personally searched such records, in Europe and America, and has obtained from these fresh light, not only on Paine, but on various eminent figures in American and European history with whom he was associated. A large amount of unpublished correspondence has been included in the volumes.

Mr. Conway says in his Preface: "In the laborious work of searching out the real Paine I hav found a general appreciation of its importance, and it will be seen in the following pages that generous assistance has been rendered by English clergymen, by official persons in Europe and America, by persons of all beliefs and no beliefs. In no instance have I been impeded by any prejudice, religious or political. The curators of archives, private collectors, owners of important documents bearing on the subject, have welcomed my effort to bring the truth to light."

Two vols., royal oct., gilt top, portraits, $5.

BOOKS BY SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS),

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.
Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."
In two volumes, cloth, gilt lettered, $2.50.

DID JESUS RISE FROM THE DEAD?

The evidence for the resurrection is in this book carefully considered, and found wanting. It ought to convince every Christian of the untruthfulness of this alleged miracle, for it is certainly one of the best essays ever written on the subject.
In paper, 25 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science.
In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE and OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin
In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Licentiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Absolution; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Liguori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attempts at Continency even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism.
In paper, 25 cents.

Gems of Thought.

THE noblest employment of the mind is in the study of nature and truth.—Aristotle.

OUR priests are not what the foolish people think them. Our credulity makes all their science.—Voltaire.

How monstrous, how absurd, the attempt to make one's self illustrious through making others miserable. . . . The new conquests of a sovereign do not render the states more opulent which he already possesses; his subjects gain nothing.—Frederick the Great.

HE [Frederick the Great] told Voltaire that if the affairs of the world were really governed by an all-wise Providence, as people imagined, the people of Europe would not be the extremely dull men many of them were. "The Newtons, the Wolfes, the Lockes, the Voltaires, would be the masters of the world."—Parton.

EVERY author writes in the faith that his book is to be the final resting-place, and sets up his fixtures as for a more than Oriental permanence; but it is only a caravansary, which we soon leave without ceremony. We read on his sign only refreshment for man and beast, and a drawn hand directs to Ispahan or Bagdad.—Thoreau.

IF there be another life—a day of judgment, no God can afford to torture in another world the man who abolished torture in this. Though God be the keeper of an eternal penitentiary, he should not imprison there the men who broke the chains of slavery here. He cannot afford to make eternal convicts of Franklin, Jefferson, Paine, and Voltaire.—Ingersoll.

SOME who admit development of physical forms from lower orders still cling to the idea that the mind of man is a special creation. But consideration of nature's facts will show the gradual development of mind, from the instinctiv movements of animalcules for the purpose of procuring food or propagating their kind, until its upward course culminates in the thoughts of a Newton or a Darwin. When the coral polyp throws out its lassoo to capture the passing food, when a dog answers the dinner-bell, or when a man raises his umbrella to the rain, is not each giving evidence of the existence of what we call mind? There is a progressiv development of the brain in the higher animals, and mental powers correspond in force with this growth. Haeckel says: "The human mind is but a more highly developed ape-mind," and Wallace declares that there is less of a gap between the minds of a dog and a Hottentot than between the minds of a Hottentot and a Newton. Dr. Gray gives instances of the exhibition of mind in plants, as when they catch and devour insects or reach out their tendrils toward supports.—Robt. C. Adams.

THE first claim of science is founded on the essential difference between scientific and unscientific opinion. "The classification of facts," says Professor Pearson, "and the formation of absolute judgments upon the basis of this classification—judgments independent of the idiosyncrasies of the individual mind—is peculiarly the scope and method of modern science. The scientific man has above all things to aim at self-elimination in his judgment, to provide an argument which is as true for each individual mind as for his own. . . . The scientific method of examining facts is not peculiar to one class of phenomena and to one class of workers: it is applicable to social as well as to physical problems, and we must carefully guard ourselvs against supposing that the scientific frame of mind is the peculiarity of the professional scientist." Not only is this method not that of the average man, but its very existence is scarcely surmised by him. His method—if such it can be called—of arriving at conclusions is to fasten his attention on a few salient facts, and to interpret them according to his own prepossessions and interests. If asked to take a point of view from which, perhaps, other facts would become salient, or to divest himself of self-interest as a canon of interpretation, he will in general decline; in many cases, indeed, he will be totally incapable of responding to the invitation. The idea of requiring a wide range of facts as a basis for induction, of checking the result of a survey or examination by that of a second, third, fourth, or tenth, and of treating self-interest or previously formed opinion as a disturbing influence from which the judgment is to be kept as free as possible, is one which long ages of struggle with the problems of Nature hav at length bequeathed to the scientific workers of to-day, but which has no lodgment, and but slight recognition, in the minds of the multitude.—Professor Youmans.

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

BIBLE MYTHS;

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Heathen Illustration of the Temptation.]

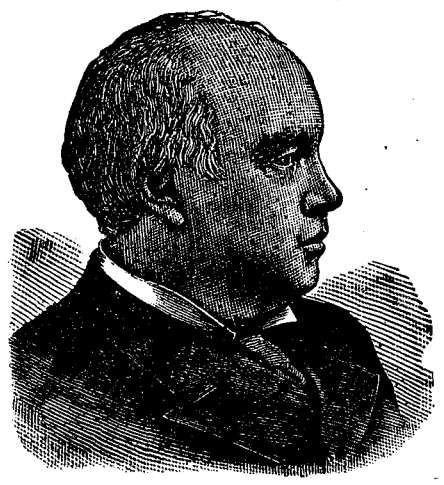
The Bundehesh (a sacred book of the Persians,) states that Ahuramazda after creating the first man and woman, Mashya and Mashyana, bade them "to be humble of heart; to observe the law; to be pure in their thoughts, pure in their speech, pure in their actions." But an evil demon came to them in the form of a Serpent, sent by Ahriman, the prince of devils, and gave them fruit of a wonderful tree, which imparted immortality. Evil inclinations then entered their hearts, and all their moral excellence was destroyed. Consequently they fell, and forfeited the eternal happiness for which they were destined. They killed beasts, and clothed themselves in their skins.



BIBLE MYTHS shows this to be the origin of the Hebrew story.

Preachers Being Shamed Into Rationalism.

Now and then there starts forth from the clerical ranks a preacher who is too honest to go on declaring the Bible infallible when we Rationalistic investigators hav so abundantly proved it erring. As he declaims the old assertions of biblical inerrancy he sees in one pew a smile on the face of some man who has heard Ingersoll, in another corner a twinkle in the glance of a reader of Paine, and again a gleam of under-meaning in eyes that hav been bent upon Oort and Kuenen. He grows weary of lying, and knowing that his most sensible acquaintances know he is lying, and at some time or other comes out with a burst of plain-spokenness that induces a brisk resort to a heresy trial by the orthodox, and would cause these strait-laced to hav recourse to rack and stake if they only had the numbers and power that they fervently desire.

The latest of these reformed preachers—these brands snatched from the burning who giv evidence of desire to become regenerated and lead an upright life—is Rev. Dr. Briggs, a Presbyterian. His trial by his presbytery at New York city has occupied the valuable time of many parsons and parsonlings during nearly the whole of December. The chairman of the prosecuting committee was an old curmudgeon named Birch. On the 6th inst. this stiff old grimsir knit his brows, peered ferociously at the culprit over his spectacles, and launched into a recital of the misdeeds of the hardened being before him. Charges 1 and 2 were given to the world. In the first of these charges Dr. Briggs is accused of teaching "that the reason is a fountain of divine authority which may and does savingly enlighten men, even such men as reject the scriptures as the authoritativ proclamation of the will of God, and reject also the way of salvation through the mediation and sacrifice of the son of God as revealed therein." Dr. Birch took the ground that the Bible was the only rule of Protestantism. "If these charges be true, where does Presbyterianism stand?" he asked. To call the church and reason fountains of the divine truth was to affirm their authority. He quoted several divines to prove that the Bible was held as the only rule of faith by Protestants. Dr. Briggs in his inaugural address had assailed the infallibility and inerrancy of the scriptures. Mr. Birch declared that "when Professor Briggs ventured to say that the scriptures were not inerrant he called God a liar." Birch continued that every letter, word, and phrase of the scriptures was true. "God does not cross his t's or dot his i's for nothing," he exclaimed. The scriptures must be undefaced, a perfect Parthenon, and, to quote his homely metaphor, "there should be no fly-specks on this mirror." On the following days the heretic was turned over on his gridiron from side to side till each was thoroughly browned. Charge 4 was omitted, and charge 5, which says that Professor Briggs denies that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch, was taken up. "If Moses," urged Birch, "did not write the Pentateuch, then no Jew can be blamed for not accepting Christ. This assertion of Professor Briggs makes Christ dishonest. Who will pretend that he did not know all that has since been discovered and used by the higher criticism? It will be a surprise to some of us that Professor Briggs has used quotations in his works which are extracts from Thomas Paine. You cannot divide Moses or Christ. Begin with rejecting the Old Testament and you will wind up by discarding the New Testament." The above statement that Christ's truthfulness depends on Moses's having written the Pentateuch, arises, our readers will probably perceive, from Jesus's ascription of that work to Moses in Matt. xix, 8; Luke xvi, 29, 31, etc. Dr. Birch's final sentences were an impassioned rhetorical appeal to Christ, "the Christ of the divine, inerrant, infallible Bible, who could never fail."

In his turn Dr. Briggs made a gallant defense. Besides speaking he distributed among the assembly a good-sized pamphlet entitled, "Who Wrote the Pentateuch?" One extract runs:

"The testimony of the Hexateuch [the first six books of the Bible] itself tells a different story and shows conclusivly that the Hexateuch embraces Mosaic originals, several different codes and historic documents, and the handiwork of a number of editors at different epochs in the history of Israel, and that the unity of the Hexateuch is the result of a final redaction of all the earlier elements."

He buckles to answer against a deliverance of the last general assembly, which deliverance was:

"The general assembly would remind all under its care that it is a fundamental doctrin that the Old and New Testaments are the inspired and infallible word of God. Our church holds that the inspired word, as it came from God, is without error. The assertion of the contrary cannot but shake the confidence of the people in the sacred books. All who enter office in our church solemnly profess to receive them as the only infallible rule of faith and practice."

To this his defense was:

"The general assembly has no authority under the constitution to make dogma by deliverance. The general assembly has no authority under the constitution to giv an interpretation of the doctrin of the church by deliverance, and impose such interpretation upon the presbyteries and the ministry."

In regard to errors in the scriptures he took this stand:

"You will sometimes hear the proverb cited: Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus [False in one, false in all]. But this ancient proverb has no manner of application to the matter in hand. It does not refer to errors of ignorance or inadvertence, but to errors of deceit and falsehood. If it could be shown that the writings of the Old Testament, any of them, were written with the intent of deceiving and misleading men, then we could not trust them as infallible in matters of faith and practice. But the errors that hav been found in the Bible are not errors of deceit, but of inadvertence; not of falsehood, but of lack of knowledge."

In this last position we cannot giv Dr. Briggs our complete concurrence.

Professor Briggs took up the charge that he had taught "that errors may hav existed in the original text of the holy scriptures as it came from its authors." Here much distinction was made between declaring that there were errors in the very first manuscripts of the scriptures, of which manuscripts none exists at the present day, and declaring that there are errors in the copies of those originals which we possess now. Dr. Briggs boldly declares:

"It is the unanimous testimony of modern biblical scholarship that there are errors in the Hebrew and Greek texts now in our hands, errors that meet us in textual criticism, in literary criticism, and in historical criticism, that no one has been able to deny or to explain away. Modern biblical scholarship has forced the advocates of inerrancy to fall back from the texts in our hands and grant that there are errors in them, in order to rally about the modern dogma of the inerrancy of the original autographs.

"I shall adhere to the policy which I hav thus far followed with regard to errors in holy scripture. I hav refused to accept the dogma that the original autographs were inerrant. I hav maintained that there are errors in the texts which we hav, and in the best texts we can get by the science of textual criticism, and that it is improbable that the original texts, if we could discover them, would be much different from those we hav in that regard.

"But I hav refused to affirm that there were errors in the original autographs, because it is unscientific and it is unscholarly and it is against the truth-loving spirit of Christianity to make affirmations of dogma where we hav no certain evidence. I hav always refrained as far as possible from pointing to errors in the present text of scripture. But every biblical scholar admits them."

Feeble and faltering are these steps with which the church is being shoved forward by Rationalism. But the goal will be reached in some generation or other, and will be excellent, most excellent.

What Religious Rule Is Like.

The political party that controls New York city is more intimately identified with the church than the political party which governs any other city in the country. If church influence were of beneficial operation on government we should find New York city governed better than its fellows; if such influence were maleficent we should find it governed worse. The fact is, that we find it governed worse.

Its sanitary condition is bad. The annual death rate per thousand in London is 17.5; in Chicago, 19.6; in Philadelphia, 20.7; in New York, 26.6. No one who is at all acquainted with the facts will question the advantages of New York for drainage and water supply over the other cities named, and yet how marked the difference in the death rate. It has been stated by competent authority that New York should be one of the most healthful cities in the world, so abundant has been the natural provision of all the facilities for maintaining the best hygienic conditions.

The corruption of the Tammany-Catholic party has caused the most valuable members of the health board to be removed from that body, some by dismissal and some by their own action in withdrawal. Dr. Jacobi says:

"I sent my resignation as one of the consulting members to the board of health about ten days ago and it has been accepted. I hav no hesitancy in saying that the reason I did so was because I am unwilling to serve even in an advisory capacity to the health department when I see and realize that that department is no longer an independent body for the public good, but that it dare not call its life its own and has become subservient to an outside influence who knows nothing about or cares nothing for the public health. The trouble dates back to the peremptory demand for the resignation of Dr. W. A. Ewing, sanitary superintendent, which was without warrant, only that his place was wanted for a Tammany man. The way in which Ewing's resignation was demanded was simply disgraceful. I was told by him that on the day he resigned President Charles Wilson of the board asked him for his resignation, and he said he would take twenty-four hours to consider it, but President Wilson told him that he must hav the resignation that afternoon, and added: 'If your resignation is not forthcoming at once, mine will be demanded by the powers that be.'"

Dr. Prudden says:

"My connection with the board of health was solely in a scientific capacity. I am not a partisan of any kind, and when I saw matters shaping the department into a political machine I did not consider that my professional duties were any longer required. The forcing out of Dr. Ewing and Councillor Prentice, two men of great worth to the board and its impartial work, was the beginning of the trouble."

Such non-partisan journals as lead a feeble existence in New York city are anxious that the quarantine against cholera at this port next spring be in the hands of a national commission, and not in those of the local health board possessing much faith in Catholicism and Tammany but little efficiency in prophylaxis.

Other cities much poorer maintain public libraries. New York has none, its rulers evidently deeming the instruction given in church, and the reading of the trashy dailies which are devoted to the glorifying of said rulers, sufficient intellectual pabulum for the populace.

The two men in New York city at present who are probably in the eyes of the masses the greatest, are the coming mayor and John D. Crimmins. This mayor, Gilroy, is a good Catholic. Crimmins is a great power in business, politics, and religion. He is, in the words of one describer, "the new civilian king of New York—a man with more power probably than any other individual ever enjoyed in the metropolis." He is the controler of most of the street railway companies. He has an army of men under his control. He is, says one estimate, "in the position of a supreme dictator. No man in New York's history ever occupied a similar eminence, or one even analogous." Now, when this has been learned, it is unpleasant to find further that in religion Mr. Crimmins is a Roman Catholic and a devout one. He is at present treasurer and trustee of St. Patrick's cathedral, and is on the board of managers and directors of most of the prominent Catholic institutions in the city. Whenever a new building is to be erected by any Catholic church or order, he is called in as consulting director. At the time the relic of St. Ann was brought from Montreal Mr. Crimmins had it fetched to his house by Archbishop Corrigan. A number of other prominent Catholics were present and paid reverence to the relic with their host and the archbishop.

The World's Fair on Sundays.

The question of the Sunday opening of the World's Fair has been taken into court. An application has been made in a Chicago court for an injunction restraining the World's Fair directors from closing the gates on Sunday, and Judge Tuley will hear arguments on the matter on January 3d. The question was brought before him to the amendment of a bill filed in October by the South Shore Transportation Company. The South park commissioners, the city of Chicago, the Illinois Central Railroad Company, and the World's Columbian Exposition were made party defendants. The bill alleges that the South park commissioners hold the property in trust for the people, and cannot giv the use of the land to any corporation to the exclusion of the public. The people hav paid heavy taxes for the improvement of the park and cannot be excluded on Sunday. Jackson park is public property, a place of resort owned by the whole people. The park commissioners, it is alleged, hold this property in trust for the people and hav no authority to debar the public from it on any day in the year. It is further alleged that since they hav not the right to bar out the people they hav not the right to delegate to any other body the right to close the grounds on Sunday. It is claimed that under the charter, the citizens and taxpayers hav the right to visit Jackson park on any day in the year without paying for admission.

The Rev. H. H. George, general field agent of the American Sabbath Union, Colonel Shepard president, called upon Secretary Foster at the treasury at Washington, D. C., on the 22d, in some alarm, to break the news to Mr. Foster that the above injunction had been applied for in Chicago. Mr. Foster had got ahead of Mr. George a little. He supposed Mr. George had come to ascertain what could be done to prevent the Chicago people who run the Fair from receiving their souvenir coins before the rules were announced closing the Fair "on the first day of the week commonly called Sunday." Mr. Foster read to Field Agent George an opinion by the acting solicitor of the treasury, F. A. Reeve, on the protest of Thomas K. Cree, of New York, that until there was a Fair there need be no rules, but that there would be no Fair until next May, while the law provides for the payment of the subsidy at once after the directory had promised to close, which it has done. Mr. Foster candidly told Mr. George that he was opposed to closing, but he would stipulate that, if kept open, there should be no machinery running. The opinion is as follows:

"Mr. Cree protests against the delivery of any of the souvenir half dollars to the representativs of the Columbian Exposition until the provisions of the law making the gift are complied with, namely, that the Exposition shall be closed on Sunday. He contends that 'in the eyes of the law' the Exposition was formally opened in October, and, therefore, that the law requiring its closing on Sunday is now in full force and is being violated by Sunday opening.

"I do not understand that the Exposition was opened in October. Section IX of the act of April 25, 1890, authorizing the Columbian celebration, provides for 'the dedication of the buildings of the World's Columbian Exposition . . . on the 12th day of October, 1892, with appropriate ceremonies.' This has been done. Said section further provides 'that the Exposition shall be open to visitors not later than the 1st day of May, 1893.' Section IV of the act of Aug. 5, 1892, declares that all appropriations made by said act (including, of course, the 5,000,000 of souvenir half-dollar pieces) are made 'upon the condition that the said exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; . . . and it shall be, and it is hereby made, the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by the act of Congress of April 25, 1890, to make such rules or modifications of rules of said corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week, commonly called Sunday.'

"The commissioners hav not yet prescribed the rules authorized and directed by said section of the act of 1892, nor are they bound to do so prior to the formal opening of the Fair at any day not later than the 1st of May, 1892. I observe that the program for the formal opening of the Exposition in May next has been completed by the committee having charge of the matter.

"The making of rules prohibiting the opening of the Exposition on Sunday is not a condition precedent to the delivery of the souvenir coins. The act of Aug. 5, 1892, provides that 'before the secretary of the treasury shall pay to the World's Columbian Exposition any part of the said 5,000,000 silver coins, satisfactory evidence shall be furnished him showing that the sum of at least $10,000,000 has been collected and disbursed as required by said act (the act of 1890), and provided that the said World's Columbian Exposition shall furnish a satisfactory guarantee to the secretary of the treasury that any further sum actually necessary to complete the work of the Exposition to the opening thereof has been or will be provided by said World's Columbian Exposition.'

"The statute thus presupposes that the souvenir coins will be used for the purpose intended before the Exposition is formally opened. I am, therefore, of the opinion that the Exposition has not been formally opened, and the statute has not been violated by the delivery of said souvenir silver coins."

There occurred at Chicago on the 13th in the course of the Sabbath Union's endeavor to close the Fair an incident which is one of the best jokes of the season. This unlovable association was made the victim of an unexpected blow at the hands of those whom it had counted its friends. This blow was the more grievous because it was administered by one of the most Sabbatarian of all Christian denominations. A mass-meeting was held in the church of a Methodist Episcopal congregation. Everything went on smoothly for a time, and the "American Sabbath" had everything its own way. Dr. H. H. George, a leader in the movement, Mr. Locke, and others advocated the closing of the World's Fair Sunday, and vigorously denounced the efforts of the directors and the mayor and city council to hav Congress repeal the closing act. These speeches were warmly, if not unanimously, approved by frequent "amens" and clapping of hands. No one looked for any opposition to a long set of resolutions which were read, condemning the efforts being made for an open Fair on Sunday. When the reading was concluded Rev. H. N. Axtell put the resolution to a vote. To his surprise the "ayes" and "noes" seemed equal. On a rising vote the "noes" were largely in the majority. After a moment of wonder the chairman said he would like to hav some explanation for the action of the majority, and then the Rev. A. D. Jones, a Seventh Day Adventist, stood up, and despite interruptions and questions made a long and aggressiv speech. Personally, he said, he would not turn over his hand to determin whether the Fair should be opened or closed on Sunday, but he was opposed to the resolution because it condemns the effort to hav the Fair opened on theological grounds, and because Congress had no right in the first place to say whether it should be opened or closed. The action was unconstitutional because no power on the subject had been delegated to Congress. The fourth Commandment, he said, had been sent up for reading by Senator Quay as a reason for the passing of the act, and Senator Peffer was right when he said the Senate was engaged in a religious discussion as to whether the first or the seventh day should be observed as Sunday. In answer to questions he said the employment of chaplains in Congress and in the army was unconstitutional and that Congress could not in any way establish or legalize a Sunday law. "Then you are an Infidel?" was asked him. "No, sir; no, sir. I'm a Christian. God never gave his pledge in favor of Sunday. He always said the seventh day was the Sabbath and when you say he meant the first day, where is your respect for the law of God?" Mr. Stowe, Mr. Locke, Dr. George, and others replied to him, and Rev. Mr. Jones came back with other arguments.

In another column Mr. Stevens givs the results of canvassing the people's opinion on Sunday opening, by means of postal cards.

It is to be hoped that by some means or other the detestable outrage that the Sabbatarians are striving to perpetrate will be prevented.

About two hundred newspapers in this land of the free hav printed the statement that Helen Gardener is no woman at all, but a man. The last paper to say it was the Saginaw Courier-Herald. A friend of Helen living in that town corrected the error. "I am," he said, "personally acquainted with Helen Gardener, hav visited her in her home in New York, hav spent parts of the summer with her at pleasure resorts, we correspond regularly, and she has given me all her books, some five or six in number. She is a very pretty, charming, and brilliant young woman, but unfortunately for her masculin admirers she is married to a man whom she loves devotedly. 'Helen Gardener,' of course, is a nom de plume. She and her husband once visited Saginaw and spent some days here while she was gathering materials for her startling novel, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?' This powerful and realistic, though unconventional story, has done much good and had a phenomenal sale, reaching twenty-five thousand copies in five months. Her last story, 'Pray You, Sir, Whose Daughter?' issued three or four months ago, has already run through two editions of nine thousand copies each, and a third edition is now being printed. This book has sold well in Saginaw, and the other might be read with profit by all young men. 'A Thoughtless Yes' and 'Pushed By Unseen Hands' are each a series of fascinating short stories containing profound and important philosophical truths popularly stated. Her book on 'Men, Women, and Gods' is a strong attack on the popular theology of this day, and while not profound it cleverly exposes many theological absurdities. Helen Gardener is an earnest advocate of woman's rights, but does not belong to that class of hobbyists who bore you to death with their 'views' when you want to hav a pleasant conversation on general topics. She is a fine conversationalist, clever, witty, stern, or pathetic as the case discussed may demand. Her writings are certainly wholesome, and if parts of them shock prudes and conventionalists they only shock to enlighten."

What the unregenerate will probably call righteous retribution has overtaken a Long island pharisee. Simeon Poey, of Whitestone, was known as a very pious gentleman. He owned a yacht but he would not go sailing on Sunday till after church, and he resigned from a yacht club because the members made Sunday their principal day of recreation. Mr. Poey was president of the Law and Order League of Whitestone, and put forth his best efforts to prevent the Germans of the town from obtaining their regular supply of beer on Sunday, though he himself would visit his club after church, and partake of liquid refreshment considerably stronger than beer. But he did it out of sight. The gentleman is now behind prison bars because he has for all the years covering his extraordinary piety been systematically robbing the corporation in which he held a responsible position, and which position gave him no small share of his respectability. He is one of the best examples of phariseeism that we hav ever known. And there are thousands like him in the churches of this broad land. A friend traveling in the drug business relates a story which accounts in part for the prevalence of such scamps as Poey. Recently this friend went down on Long island to sell goods, and, incidentally, with a commission to buy a drug store if he found a profitable one for sale. One of the stores offered met all the requirements until the last question was asked—Why is the store for sale? The aged proprietor replied: "My friend, I am a crank, I think for myself; I don't believe in the old things that my neighbors do. And if your friend buys this store the first thing he must do is to join that Methodist church over there. That is the dominant sect here, and I don't care what his religion is, or whether he has any, he must belong to it or he won't stand any chance in this town. I am too old to change my ways, and I want to get away to some place where hypocrisy is not at quite so high a premium." But the old man is still selling drugs there and sighing for his release, and there are other Poeys growing up in the churches to fill the prisons because the prevailing religion ostracises thinkers and cuddles hypocrits.

The Mohammedan theological students, whose numbers in Constantinople are legion, hav always been one of that city's most unruly and baneful elements. They hav always been noted for their fanatic hatred of everything that savored of progress and civilization, and their presence in Stamboul has constituted a powerful obstacle to the development of the Turkish empire. The sultan recently took radical steps to rid his capital of their presence. One night a few weeks ago he caused over five thousand of them to be hurried before daybreak on about a dozen large passenger steamers, which started forthwith, conveying them to distant portions of the empire. Some were dispatched to Broussa, others to the Arabian shores, while some were conveyed to Palestine. In order to lessen the bitterness which this treatment might arouse in their breasts, they were each provided by the sultan's orders with a small sum of money sufficient to keep them from want for some time. Their departure from Constantinople is stated to be viewed with feelings of universal relief, both by the Ottoman government itself and by the foreign colony established on the shores of the Bosphorus. In this America of ours the same class of persons studying theology, together with those who think they hav learned something about it, are equal obstructers of progress and happiness. If the whole brood of them were seized and bundled off to some outland or other we should bear the bereavement quite dry-eyed.

Missionary Turner and his wife complain of gross ill treatment at Sungpan, China. While they were waiting there the nativs, who were suffering from want of rain, concluded that the foreign missionaries were skilled in necromancy and had used their arts to prevent rain. They were lashed into fury at this, and attacked the missionaries. Mr. Turner was seized, his arms and legs were tied, he was kicked and struck over the head, and then the mob seized his wife and children. A military mandarin, apparently to gain time, suggested that the missionaries should be tried before the mob proceeded further. This being acceded to, they were taken to the Yamen and ordered to be beaten, but two nativ Christians volunteered to be beaten in their place. The mob was satisfied, and the missionaries left Sungpan. We will comment that if the pretenders to supernatural influence over the weather and so forth in this country were served in the same way it would do no little toward discouraging imposition and promoting truthful dealing.

The Leaflet advocating the Sunday opening of the World's Fair ought to be scattered by the thousands. In December or January we shall send them to Congressmen and to others who may be influenced by argument. We need money to do this, and those who can afford to aid are requested to do so. The price of the Leaflet is 25 cents per dozen; $1.50 per hundred. Anyone who will distribute five hundred or a thousand can obtain them at special rates.

We hav made arrangements with Otto Wettstein whereby we can offer the Freethinker's Badge-Pin and THE TRUTH SEEKER together at a material reduction. The $2 pin and the paper one year for $4.50; the $2.75 pin and the paper for $5. Also the Ingersoll Souvenir Spoon and THE TRUTH SEEKER in combination at a still greater reduction. The tea spoon and the paper, $4.75; the sugar spoon and the paper, $5.25. We giv our subscribers the benefit of all discounts.

We shall shortly publish the fourth edition of the "Crimes of Preachers." If our readers see any records of the clergy being guilty of ministerial conduct, from lying to murder, they will add to the world's knowledge and the cause of truth by marking the report and forwarding the paper containing it to this office. We desire to do all the justice possible to the reverend clergy who so kindly constitute themselvs our moral and religious guardians.

In the West.

News and Notes.

I find the following in the Salt Lake Herald:

The Journeymen Barbers' Union, in session at St. Louis, want the ministers of that city to preach a sermon apiece, on the same day, against Sunday shaving. "Every man his own barber," is the preachers' motto, and many of those who shave are very particular with their tonsorial operations on the days when they are to preach; so it is a delicate question, especially as the lesson must be to the recalcitrant barbers, rather than their customers.

There are many Freethinkers among the barbers. I hope these will see the folly of the proposed legislation to forbid Sunday shaving. The only possible way the barbers can succeed is by the aid of the church. In a purely secular government no legislation to enforce idleness would be allowable. To ask the legislature to make Sunday shaving a crime is paternalism and ecclesiasticism in the state. Cannot the barbers take care of themselvs? Are they not full grown men? Are they little children, that their interests must be looked after by the government?

The Journeymen Barbers' Union are uniting with the church and joining church and state. This matter of Sunday shaving can be settled by mutual and free coöperation. Let there be no resort to state tyranny.

I had a "divine providence" on my trip East as well as Moody on the deep sea. A large stone fell upon the track at Royal gorge, and being covered with snow the engineer did not perceive it and the speed of the train was unrelaxed. Fortunately the stone was just one inch too small and the engin passed over it without being derailed—but was seriously injured, and we were detained several hours. It might be said that we came within "an inch of our lives." If the stone had been a little bigger we might hav been hurled down the precipice. God, in his infinit wisdom and love, hurled that stone upon the track, but his "divine providence" made it just a bit too little for effectiv service. Small favors thankfully received. Larger ones not so much so. We didn't pray, but I think we got an "answer" just as much as Moody did, and escaped by the "skin of our teeth." Why God should get one into such a peck of trouble in order to giv "divine providence" a chance to exhibit its ground and lofty tumbling I don't understand.

I am in Chicago. I find an immense feeling here in favor of opening the World's Fair on Sunday. The Herald has sent in a petition of four hundred thousand names. The Sunday Opening Association, mainly a Liberal Christian organization, is hard at work. I find several thousand names at our headquarters. Yesterday five hundred names came in from Oshkosh, Wis. This mail names from Oregon, etc., hundreds daily. The fight in Congress will not come until after New Year's. Pour the petitions in. Joseph Cook says the Fair will not be open on Sunday. The bigots are not disposed to yield one inch. If we could put it to the vote of the people our majority in favor of the opening would be vast indeed. But we must deal with Congress, and that makes the issue uncertain. We know what politicians are. Pope describes them with too much truth:

> I see the right and I approve it too;
> I know the wrong and yet the wrong pursue.

I hav met C. H. Darrow, of Chicago, who has materially aided me in the work to be done at Washington; also E. A. Stevens; Geo. L. Robertson; Dr. and Mrs. De Lespinasse, who are visiting in Chicago; Judge Waite; Reighwald brothers; Dr. Greer; Dr. Bishop; Mrs. Hewitt Harris, the artist, and family; A. D. O'Neil, and others who are in hearty coöperation with this most important movement in behalf of a free American Sunday.

W. S. BELL'S address will be for two months, 246 State street, Chicago, Ill. Persons wishing to arrange with him for Freethought lectures can address him there.

MR. FRANKLIN STEINER lectured in Creston, Ia., last Sunday and will speak at Newton January 7th, and expects to go to Ottumwa and Macedonia soon. He wishes engagements in northern Iowa and will be pleased to hear from friends in that section of the state. His address is Box 882, Des Moines, Ia.

Science and Progress.

Self-Combustion.

Prof. H. P. Smith, the most accomplished scholar of a rather Liberal theological seminary, has been expelled from the ministry of the Presbyterian church for denying the "plenary inspiration" of the Bible—i. e., for recognizing the fact that a large number of contradictory traditions cannot all be true. The author of the treatis on the rule of three might as well be impeached for the anti-trinitarian tendency of his doctrin; but, happily, the time is past when persecutions of that sort can hurt anybody except their instigators. The blind rage of the Holy Inquisition degraded Spain from the highest to the lowest rank among the countries of Christian Europe by burning out the noblest and most intelligent men of a once highly gifted race, at the rate of fifteen hundred a year; but the "firing-out" process of our modern heretic-hunters involves less ruinous consequences. It results merely in driving the ablest exponents of their faith into the camp of their adversaries, and burning down the composit elements of the church to a caput mortuum of impotent bigotry.

Young America.

The hight of the Wellingtonia cedar is said to be exceeded by a recently discovered variety of eucalyptus, but there can be no doubt that America leads the world in the production of wide-awake youngsters. A citizen of Cincinnati, O., was treating his family to a summary of the morning news and noticed a curious twinkle in the eyes of his youngest daughter (æt. ten) when he mentioned that the Rev. Parkhurst, the "Christian detectiv," as the New Yorkers call him, had started on a Western lecturing tour. "Will he do the leap-frog act?" asked the little lady.

A Lost Paradise.

The sportsmen's paradise of the Pacific slope is fast becoming a tradition of the past. There was a time when the California coast range was so overstocked with deer that their raids on the farms of the lowlands were a serious obstacle to agriculture, and hunters, even of moderate skill, could get a month's supply of venison in a day's still hunt. Thousands of fine bucks were shot merely for the sake of their hides in districts where game is now so scarce that the state legislature of 1890 prohibited deer-hunting for the period of five years to prevent the total extermination of the species. The fishing-grounds hav likewise been gradually depleted. In the neighborhood of the larger cities (Stockton excepted) angling has ceased to be a popular pastime, and good fish stories can rarely be heard outside of Sunday-schools. The urchins besetting the wharves of East Oakland think themselvs lucky to bring home a dozen rock-bass of an ounce apiece; but there was a time when the salmon were so abundant in the Sacramento and its upper tributaries that the horses of teamsters trying to cross a ford were often scared wild by the multitude of fish leaping out of the water all around. In the Alleghanies sportsmen hav come down to squirrel-hunting; and for Texas, too, game laws would be more useful than Sabbath laws.

The Austrian Inquisition.

Austria is trying to compensate the loss of her military prestige by joining in the crusades of the church militant. A Vienna orator was recently jailed for quoting a line from Heine advising Christians to "relinquish heaven to the angels and skylarks."

Ernest Renan.

Renan, with all his easy-going good nature, could use pretty strong language if occasion demanded it. "That epic," says he, in his comments on Edwin Arnold's "Light of Asia," "is both too immortal and too heterodox to leave its author a shadow of a chance for a niche in Westminster, to which remarkable pantheon the surest passport appears to be not merit but conformity to the doctrin of the Thirty-nine Articles." Shakspere he thought rather overrated (an opinion strangely prevalent in continental Europe), but recognized the transcendent genius of Lord Byron, and denounced Moore's consent to burn the autobiography of his friend in order to please a clique of British bigots, as "all in all the meanest act recorded in sacred or profane history." Like Victor Hugo, he was a strong partisan of the first Napoleon, and thought that the early death of the French Cæsar proved the favor of Fate even in the last act of the great historical drama. "St. Helena," he said, "was, after all, a lesser evil, and Fortune was kind to her favorit to preserve him from witnessing such feats of the great nation as the appointment of a government committee for the elaboration of a medal to reward an exhibitor of millinery flounces."

Long-tailed Saints.

The ape-worship of British India has survived the progress of civilization, and in the neighborhood of Benares and Lucknow the slayer of a Hanuman monkey would be promptly mobbed, and probably killed, like Lord Elphinstone's gardener, who was torn limb from limb for treating a surprise party of long-tailed marauders to a dose of buckshot.

A Victim of Bacchus.

Mirza Kahn, the son of the shah of Persia, has broken his neck on a hunting expedition to the Elbury range. In Christian Europe the accident would be ascribed to the "mysterious dispensation of providence" or to the bad condition of the roads, but the Persians hold that horsemanship and truth-speaking are the chief qualifications of a cavalier, and the relativs of the ill-fated prince admit that he was rather fond of wine.

Is the North Getting Colder?

The clearing of forests may explain the alleged improvement in the climate of Chili and Patagonia, where summer is said to linger half a month longer than a hundred years ago. But if the temperature of the southern hemisphere is increasing, it is at least equally certain that the north is getting colder. The Danish government has repeatedly considered the question of assisting the nativs of Iceland to leave a clime which almost every other year threatens them with annihilation, and yet there is abundant evidence for Professor Lundberg's assertion that the island-home of the Edda was once quite as habitable as any part of modern Sweden. Greenland, too, once deserved its name, and there is no doubt that Labrador formerly contained five times its present population. The mammoth skeletons of the Siberian moorlands imply a similar change, and in the course of time European Russia may become untenable to a civilized race, and Canada so cold that the description of the orthodox hades will excite the envy, rather than the horror, of a frostbitten community.

Gin and Jesus.

The support of the temperance movement is a redeeming feature in the policy of our orthodox friends, but the trouble is that the sincere promotion of sanitary reform is inconsistent with the anti-physical dogmas of their creed. The ethics of the New Testament distinctly depreciate the importance of bodily health. The body, according to the theory of the Galilean Buddhist, is the enemy of the immortal soul, and the deified moralist who changed water into wine repeatedly repudiates the health-laws of Moses, and informs his disciples that a man cannot be defiled by things that enter his mouth. The fruits of that doctrin were the alcoholized potbellies of the medieval convents, and the persistent ignoration of a physiological truth which the followers of Mohammed recognized more than a thousand years ago. F. L. Oswald.

Items of Foreign News Interesting to Freethinkers.

A new Freethought society has been formed in Brussels, Belgium, and over fifty members were admitted at the first meeting.

Here is a little story about the late Renan. One day when he went into a church he uncovered his head. "What!" said a friend, "I thought you had broken off with our Lord?" "Well," said Renan, "we greet one another, but we never speak."

The Spanish Freethinkers and some sensible newspapers are not done protesting yet against the closing of their congress by government. It is all they hav done so far. Still, if arrests and imprisonments are made no one can tell where the knife will be.

The Belgian Freethought society at Gand, Libre Pensée Gantoise, has instituted a series of entertainments the income of which is to be expended for the social development of the society and the formation of a library. Our Secular societies ought to do likewise.

At a ministerial meeting held some time ago at Bergen, Norway, it was resolved that the defeat of the French in 1871 was due to their lack of good religious schools. According to this if a country has good religious schools it can lick any one that is not so fortunate. But the truth is just the other way. The French schools were in the hands of the clergy solely, and very few of the French soldiers knew anything except to say their "Mary."

Foreign exchanges speak well of the American Freethought Federation. All speak in words of hope, stating that the old association, the American Secular Union, hardly had life enough to gather in at its annual meeting two dozen voting members. Friends, send in your money and names to Mr. J. R. Charlesworth. G. N.

Unreasonability of Christian "Reasonability of Hell."

NO. 2.

Not anticipating any acknowledgment from Rev. Geo. K. Morris, an article under the above title has been published in No. 51 of The Truth Seeker. Yet I shall readily confess having been painfully mistaken; an answer came. The same bearing quite forcibly upon some of the most vital points of issue, we herewith bring it also before the forum of our readers, accompanied by a few short comments and a copy of a personal reply to the said Rev. D.D.'s epistle.

Unexpected, I stated, was the answer, for seldom, yes, very seldom do ministers of the holy gospel "lower" themselvs to discussing the "divine truths" with non-clericals, and still less with anti-clericals; and, secondly, because there is practically no disproving answer to the arguments spread before him.

The great pastor's reply consists mainly in his objections to my meddling with his business, claiming a full and patent mastership and rulership in his apostolic capacity and sphere. He knows what he knows, and does not care if anybody else likes it or not, as long as "all intelligent persons in this country" (please do not laugh too heartily) will continue to show a pious satisfaction with his knowledge. Not a word did he deem worthy of uttering in regard to the disputed existence of the human soul, or God's personal government, merely regretting my "bitter hatred" and "erroneous conception." How sophistically kind, and kindly sophistical.

Yes, but I hav probably more reason to regret the regular and outrageous robbing of my pocket-book toward the support and multiplication of the holy hypocrits, their families and lieutenants. Wrong and delusiv are their teaching and preachings; wrong and unjust are their benefits in salaries and social position. The church properties are free from any incumbrance of taxation; an increased ratio in all state and municipal contributions is therefore mine and everybody's forced and tyrannical misfortune.

His abusiv reflection by way of comparison of the medical with the so-called theological science, is too pueril and absurd to justify more than this passing mention.

A shame and disgrace to our country and age stands the church of to-day, with her Bible and creeds, her blessings and prayers, her teachers and Gods.

Now let us read the letters themselvs:

St. Paul Methodist Episcopal Church,
George K Morris, Pastor,
319 W. Seventh st., Cincinnati, O., Nov. 26, 1892.

Dr. N. T. Tanski, Dear Sir: Your letter came to me last Monday on my return home. Other dutics hav prevented an earlier reply. I thank you for this sad, yet interesting piece of your moral and intellectual autobiography.

Were I to speak of your letter with the frankness that characterizes your reference to my preaching you would think that I meant to insult you. I beg therefore that you will excuse me from a rejoinder.

I will only say that, as you are a specialist in one branch of physical science, I also am a specialist in the science of the spiritual life. For thirty-five years I hav been a reverent student of the matters which it is my delight to teach to those who are willing to learn. Many other branches of learning hav engaged my thought and medicin among them. Pardon the apparent rebuke, but I could not bring myself to write you on medicin as you hav written me on Theology. Were I to be so inconsiderate as to do so you would think of me about as you hav forced me to think of the author of the letter now before me. And I, alas, would be without defense, as he is. If in reply you were to say that you are an expert in these matters also, the character of your first letter would overwhelmingly confute you.

Since all intelligent persons in this country know that my profession offers no inducement of a pecuniary character, because the ability that wins success in preaching would command much larger remuneration in business, we expect to hear the imputation that we preach for money or position only from the unclean lips of the canaille.

Regretting your bitter hatred toward matters of such great moment as those you discuss and your fatally erroneous conception of these sublime realities, I am,

Sincerely yours, Geo. K. Morris.

Copy of my reply:

Cincinnati, O., Dec. 2, 1892.

Rev. Geo. K. Morris, D.D., Dear Sir: Your reply to my humble sentiments regarding the sermon on "Reasonability of Hell" received. I am by no means astonished at your cheap excuse that, having been teaching religion for so many years, you understand your business. I hav studied the Bible, and all of her supplementary traditions, with the closest and most reverential scrutiny for some twenty years, until the "Lord's," yes, the very "Lord's prayer" accidentally convinced me of her irreverence and absurdities. Unfounded stories, myths, and claims unprovable, mesmerize all pitiable idiots into a slavish submission and trembling prayer. No true intellect will sign a list of any Christian membership, unless a personal benefit, hypocrisy, shall stimulate him to disregard all scrutiny, honesty, and justice.

These, my objections to all the reverend usurpers, are made in good faith, and by reasons given in my former communication; and I solemnly demand of you a proof, clear and honest proof, of my mistakes and untruths. But to call anyone criticising you and your consorts simply canaille, is, by no means, reasonable, though probably church policy. "Unclean" are rather the lips of the religious bigots instead of those of the true "Infidels" who can never, nor will ever, concede that the all-powerful master of the universe, if there is any, is so unjust, mean, and ungodly as the church has been (I hope unconsciously) making him from times immemorial.

I hereby earnestly advise you to read Paine's "Age of Reason," John Peck's "Christian Absurdities," "Candle From Under the Bushel," and the weekly TRUTH SEEKER. A different "I" will signalize your name, and gladly will you confess: Mea culpa!

Respectfully yours, N. T. TANSKI.

The International Freethought Congress at Madrid.

About two months hav rolled by since the prohibition of the Spanish government which put an end to a congress which began so favorably and with so much enthusiasm. In speeches delivered too many truths had been told about the Catholic church to suit the clergy.

The reports about the congress that appeared in various journals were contradictory and no satisfaction would be got from them, so the writer resolved to wait until the official report came out in La Raison.

Among the adhesions reported to the International Federation at the congress we will mention:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, New York city.
Freethought Federation of America; president, S. Putnam; secretary, J. Charlesworth.
The society Roberto Ingersoll, Jacksonville, Fla.
The society Fideles Obreros de la Baja, La Paz, Cal.
The New York Spanish periodical El Progresso.
The New York Spanish periodical El Pensamiento Contemporaneo.

GERMANY.

Deutsch Freidenker-Bund (German Freethought Federation).

ENGLAND.

National Secular Society.
The London Freethinker.
The National Reformer.

ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

Nine Secular journals.
Fifteen Freethought societies.

AUSTRIA.

Der Lichtfreund, organ for the Free-religious societies of Austria and Hungary.

BELGIUM.

The National Freethought Federation, comprising one hundred and twenty-five societies with over fifteen thousand activ members.

THE REPUBLIC COLUMBIA.

Three societies.

REPUBLIC ST. DOMINGO.

One journal, El Boletin de Comercio.
Three societies.

SPAIN.

Las Dominicales del Libre Pensamiento.
One hundred and fifty Masonic lodges.
Two hundred and fifty Freethought societies.
Fifty journals.

Besides the above-named, one thousand individual adhesions, among whom we will mention: Nicolas Salmeron and Pi y Margall, ex-presidents of the Spanish republic, several members of the Cortes (Spanish congress), and several professors from the universities of Madrid, Barcelona, Salamanca, Seville, Ovieda, Granada, etc.

FRANCE.

The Grand Orient of France, Masonic society, comprising four hundred lodges.
The French Freethought Federation, comprising three hundred societies.
Four independent societies.
Six journals.

Besides a large number of individual adhesions, among whom we will mention: Max Nordau, Jean-Paul Ceé, René Goblet, and Yves Guyot, ex-ministers of France.

GUADELOUPE.

The Freethought Society Antorcha.

GUATEMALA.

The Secular journal Las Noticias.
The Secular journal El Quétzal.

HOLLAND.

De Dageraad, monthly Freethought magazine.
De Dageraad, the Freethought Federation of Holland.

ITALY.

Ten societies.

Among individual adhesions: Giovanni Bovio, professor of University at Naples; Enrico Ferri, professor at University at Florence; Jacques Moleschott, member of senate.

MEXICO.

Gen. Porfirio Diaz, president of the United States of Mexico.
The Grand Diéte Symbolique Ecossaise, comprising one hundred lodges.
Four individual Freethought societies.
Fifty-three Masonic lodges.
Fifty journals.

PERU.

Four societies.

PORTUGAL.

The Portuguese division of Le Grand Orient, one hundred and twenty lodges.
Five individual adhesions, among whom is D. Theophile Braga, professor University at Lisbon.
Four journals.

ROUMANIA.

The journal Munca, Bucharest.
M. Constantin Mille, lawyer, Bucharest.

SAN SALVADOR.

Freethought society America Central.

SWEDEN.

The Swedish Freethought Federation.

The Existence of the Universe Proves the Non-existence of God.

AN OPEN LETTER TO A. AUGUSTA CHAPMAN.

ESTEEMED MADAM: Gods—your God and all other gods—were invented, assumed, inferred, and considered a necessity to account for nature and cosmic life. But no such necessity exists. Existence to-day implies, yes, absolutely proves, eternal existence. As well might we assume a time when time was not, a time when space was not, as to assume a time when the universe was not.

Something exists to-day. This requires no proof. The sum total of all existence cannot be increased or decreased to the amount of a solitary atom. Something cannot spring from nothing. Hence existence to-day proves eternal existence.

Before proceeding with my argument I must here define what I mean by "existence." All forms are transient (destructiv of both Gods and spirits). There are no eternal forms. The only existence per se in the universe is matter. We know this exists. It embraces all reality, all existence. It is the objectiv, or basis of all subjectiv, and without it those who attempt to materialize thought and annihilate substance would not even be able to generate from their physique their stupid theories and attempt to draw the horse with the cart. Whatever exists is a form of matter, and whatever is not matter does not exist. All is matter, the remainder—nothing. This constitutes the great realms of God and spooks.

The universe exists only as an infinit aggregation of matter. Its worlds, suns, and their respectiv associate phenomena—men, houses, trees, rocks, etc.—hav no existence de facto, but all these are simply mutable forms of lesser or greater aggregations of immutable matter. These forms are alike transient; at one time they were not, and at some indefinit time in the future they will cease to be. Their components, matter in its chemical and physical elements, alone survives and thus perpetuates the formation process forever. Therefore, when I speak of existence here, it is in the sense of abstract existence, not in the sense of existence of special forms.

The eternity of matter being conceded, this proves that it was never created, and, hence, needed no creator.

Matter is force. The idea that matter is inert, dead, impotent, and needs the aid of a creator or outside agencies or forces to manipulate it, is exploded. Matter is force, one and inseparable, physical and chemical force, and fully accounts for all cosmic phenomena.

Nature is one vast chemical laboratory; and, soulless and will-less, in the course of eternity, matter, of its own potencies, mingles with and selects by chemical affinity and physical process, genial elements, and unaided evolves into flowers, trees, men, worlds, suns, and systems. Evanescent and delicate in its segregate form, it becomes, in vast aggregation, the power which moves worlds and controls the universe. It is the sole cause and creator of a world teeming with life and beauty, and the source of all harmony and order pervading the boundless realms of space. As the tiny drop of water or molten lead in mid-air assumes a globular form, so all cosmic bodies are shaped by virtue of like potencies composing and surrounding them. No God is needed in either case. On the contrary, it would require an infinit number of Gods to prevent phenomena, rather than a single God to cause the same.

Matter being eternal proves that its general aspect has also been forever the same. No eternal chaos, followed by a sudden miraculous jump into its present form, but an eternal statu quo—a veritable and only perpetual motion. Hence no beginning to harmony and order, no first world, sun, or system, but all phenomena but a repetition of similar phenomena preceding them forever. If six thousand (or six million) years ago matter had been dead, inert, motionless, and in chaos, it would be in identical condition to-day. But, it is plain, what matter or all existing causes would not produce or evolve during the eternity of time prior to the above time it would, of course, never evolve. An eternity of time is ever sufficient time to accomplish at any special period of time what it has accomplished at the present time.

The same argument demonstrates the fallacy of postulating a "First Cause," a "lawgiver," a "designer," or a "God" in order to explain existence and life.

A "First Cause" implies an eternity of time prior to the time when this "First Cause" is supposed to hav caused the universe or before it began to act as a cause. Think of it! For countless millions of ages, multiplied ad infinitum, this cause was absolutely inert, dead, and non-productiv of a solitary effect, then suddenly, without cause—because no other causes existed—it created (from nothing) an infinit universe as we behold it to-day! Can the credulity of fetichism go beyond this? Common schoolboy sense would conclude that if such "First Cause" had existed during all eternity without being activ as such "First Cause," it would never hav become activ.

The same train of thought annihilates a "lawgiver." To giv, make, or enact a law implies a time before such law was given, made, or enacted. Applied to nature this again implies an eternity of time before the particular period of time when such law was enacted. But what such "omniscient lawgiver" would not giv or enact during an eternity, "he," of course, would never enact.

The idea of a "designer of the universe" shares the same sad fate: What an unchangeable, allwise "designer" would not design during all eternity, "he," of course, would never design.

And last, but not least, the God-idea, when subjected to the same crucial test of logic and reason, "must go!"

"In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." It would be hard to find a line in Munchausen which contains more falsehoods than this: First, no beginning; second, no God; third, no creation; fourth, nothing to create. But pardon, dear madam, this digression upon a subject which has now little interest for you and from which you concede you hav evoluted. But you hav fashioned a higher ideal for your God, "a higher source of the origin of all our material blessings and even life itself." Will you kindly inform us what your God was occupied with before, in his wisdom, he caused the origin of the universe? The duration of the period of time since this (imaginary) "origin," and the antecedent period, compares about as one drop of water does to all the moisture on the earth and "in the heaven." And no matter whether the period of such origin is supposed to be six thousand or six million of years ago, any definit period is utterly insignificant when compared with the infinit period of beginningless time preceding it. What then, my friend, was your God's occupation before the creativ act? If "omniscient" he must be perfect and unchangeable. Prior to "the beginning" he must hav embodied within "himself" all then-existing causes. No extraneous causes existed during all the infinit cycles of ages of eternity. "He" existed content (of course) in idleness, in absolute dark vacuum, and solitary and alone (almost any other member of "our persuasion" would hav longed for a companion of "t'other persuasion") during all this dreary eternity of time. All existing causes did not prompt "him" to create a universe or a mouse. Now, like causes produce like effects. But no other causes existed to change God's lonesome condition of eternal solitude. If then your God, during the eternity prior to the period when you assume he caused the origin of the universe, had so existed, would it not follow, as a logical necessity, that 'he" would so exist now? How, then, can you reconcile God's act with his omniscience?

Theism implies an eternity of nothing, of standstill, suddenly and miraculously transformed into a comparativly very brief period of universal life, motion, and activity—an absurdity which all thinking and honest minds must and will discard in the near future. And thus, as you hav courageously discarded "the little tin God of orthodoxy," I am sure that my good friend will continue in the grand work of investigation, and soon also discard her "sovereign ruler," or her "God of Perfect Wisdom," and leave them behind too!

And imagin this grand world with all the countless Gods obliterated, and all the wealth and energy now sacrificed upon the altar of phantoms and for idle pomp and mummery applied to the moral and intellectual elevation of man. No more Catholics, Methodists, Mohammedans, or Jews, but only men and brothers. No more sources of dissensions, hatreds, and jealousies. No more churches, cathedrals, synagogs, or idols, but only schools and halls of science, music, and art. No more devotion of time and money to the unknown, but only to the true, the pure, and the beautiful. Morality and good behavior taught in graded lessons in our public schools, and a system of morality based upon natural law, generally promulgated, would be infinitly more productiv of men of character and women of virtue than a vague system of theology which rewards and punishes only after death.

Let the gods go! They hav absorbed the vitality of the world for centuries, now let us work and liv for mankind.

But there are many other reasons which prove there is no God. It has never been proved there is a God, and if there is one he himself has not proved it. Yet the burden of proof devolves upon those affirming. Has God been proved? No! as our greatest Theists admit, and I will agree to giv $100 to charity for every definition of God which I can not prove to be absurd.

Existence (nature) is absolutely incompatible with the existence of a God. It is either all God or all nature. It cannot be both. The one annihilates the other. Nature is infinit—here and there and everywhere. God, if "he" exists, must be infinit also. If not infinit, "he" cannot be God and all it implies. But two infinit entities are impossible, both cannot exist in the same space at the same time. We look around the world, we search space for billions of miles with our telescopes—alas, no God! All is nature. Nature here and there and everywhere. Where, then, is God?

To insist, dear friend, that nature "is as undemonstrable an entity as God himself," is, permit me to say, one of the weak arguments in your very interesting letter. You know nature exists, and to explain it—for no other reason—you still cling to the (higher) God idea, which, however, you cannot explain. So, in seeking the latter, you tacitly admit the former. But without the self-evident fact of nature—grand and, indeed, awe-inspiring—the God idea would never hav been born.

But, en passant, permit me here in kindness to suggest a simple but practical test to demonstrate the supremacy of nature over God: Boldly place your finger in the fire, pray fervently to your God to protect your finger from injury and you from pain, and if at the close of the experiment you hav experienced some pain, you will at least hav received demonstration of the existence of nature, if not of God!

One of the strongest arguments against a God you involuntarily supply yourself. You say: "I, nor anyone else, ever knew wisdom, intelligence, knowledge, affection, or benevolence disassociated from a personality of some sort." You hav seen what you (wrongly) interpret as "unerring intelligence and undoubted beneficence" in nature, and consequently, these being purely personal attributes, you are compelled to a Theistic solution.

Permit me to reply as briefly as possible: A God implies being—an organic being; this physical being; this necessitates limit, as an unlimited being is an absurdity; but a limited being cannot be God.

"Divine Potentiality" implies animal potentiality, because, as you say, where there is no being or personality there can be no "Divine Potentiality." Such a being necessitates brain. A God without a brain cannot be a God, but, my dear madam, a God with a brain cannot be infinit, and consequently can not be God.

A God can only be conceived in the form of man. But a man-God, though a huge giant, is but an impotent agent to change the course of the smallest planet even a hairsbreadth. Imagin your God personality off in space among flying and burning orbs, with no foothold but violently revolving, flying, and burning orbs, and by what law of nature would he escape instant destruction? Science says all organic life freezes to an icicle in interstellar space—this freezes out God. And if "he" should venture too near to one of the stars—which are all suns, except a very few planets—or too near our sun, he would instantly be incinerated!

Please imagin yourself in a large hall and molten balls of fire shot from immense cannon flying thick and fast all around you and you hav an approximate idea of the fate of a God, if he really exists in interstellar space.

And lastly, as intelligence is always associated with personality, so is it always associated with sex. There is no sex without intelligence, and no intelligence without sex. But sex implies kind—male and female. The one without the other would be a lamentable failure—an adaptation for no purpose, one of the "mistakes of nature" we read about. If there is a God, you admit he must be a being or personality. Conceded. Now, if a person, what gender? The church in ignoring a female God virtually denies both, as the one cannot possibly exist without the other and imply perfection.

The Freethinkers and The Fair.

Samuel P. Putnam, president of the Freethought Federation of America, is in the city on his way to Washington with petitions, chiefly from the Pacific coast, of over twenty thousand names favoring the opening of the Fair on Sunday.—Chicago Herald.

The foregoing item evidences that Liberals hav to look to the Federation for whatever real, aggressiv work is to be done before Congress concerning the opening of the Fair on Sunday. It also implies a good deal more—that the Federation is not exclusivly an organization for extorting financial aid from generously disposed Liberals to be frittered away in incompetent idleness, nor yet a charity to maintain impecunious persons.

It means that its officers do not even wait till the money is forthcoming to perform any necessary service, but go and do the work first, relying on the support of those who believe in paying for labor honestly performed. There is another point to this: this season is generally the lecturer's harvest, and Mr. Putnam could hav labored for months with certain financial success on the Pacific coast, but regardless of that, or whether he will ever be paid or not, he comes all the way from San Francisco to Washington, D. C. He proposes with the Torch of Reason to try and disperse some of the dark clouds of bigotry and superstition that now lower over our national citadel. May the Liberals aid him in his heroic assault.

I was pleased to see by the enormous package in Geo. L. Robertson's store that the Freethought Federation is distributing THE TRUTH SEEKER'S admirable pamphlet on closing the World's Fair on Sunday. It is an "eye-opener." Macdonald is to be congratulated on his enterprise, and the Federation for knowing a good thing when they see it.

I see that the replies to the postal cards sent out by the Sunday Opening Association of this city, among whom are those of the mayor, postmaster, Editor Scoll of the Herald, and Rev. Dr. Thomas, show that seventy-two and one half per cent favor the opening of the Fair on Sunday. That shows how the public feels.

After all, those interested in an open Fair are likely to steal a march on the Sabbatarians. And though the legal fight will be made and should be made in Congress on the constitutionality of its imposition of such conditions to the appropriation, that will not end the matter. At least, many are convinced that unforeseen complications might arise to defeat the proposed amendment, and knowing the uncertain temper of Congress on any question requiring a little backbone, those interested hav decided that there should be another point on which to base their movement. About two months ago a number of prominent south side citizens, among whom, I learn, was my old friend and former employer, Otis S. Favor, applied to Judge Tuley for an injunction restraining the World's Fair commissioners from closing the gates of the Fair on Sunday. January 3d was set as the date of the hearing. The ground on which the writ is asked is, that by the provisions of the city charter Jackson park is public property; that the park commissioners hold it in trust for the people, and that neither the commissioners nor the World's Fair authorities nor Congress hav a right to shut the public from the park at any time.

If it is possible, under the law and the evidence, for Judge Tuley to decide in favor of Sunday opening, there is this assurance, that no fear of incurring the enmity or displeasure of any class will deter the grand old chancellor from doing his duty. So that we are hopeful of this decision.

I append a clipping detailing the postal card canvass.

Chicago, Dec. 18, 1892. E. A. STEVENS.

The World's Fair Sunday Opening Association has received returns from the postal cards sent out to get an expression of the people on the question of Sunday opening of the Fair. The replies show that seventy-five per cent of the people answering the committee's request favor open gates and a quiet Sunday Fair. The special committee of the association appointed to get an expression of the people on this question has made its report, in which the members tell of the method of obtaining the sentiment of the people and also the result of their work in this line. In sending out the requests for these expressions of opinion the committee selected from Dunn's commercial reference book the twenty-five first printed names in the list of business men rated above $1,000—liquor-dealers excepted—in forty different cities of the United States of a population of less than fifty thousand. They also selected from the same book the first ten names—liquor-dealers excepted—of men rated above $1,000 in each and every city of the United States of a population of not less than four thousand nor more than ten thousand.

To these men, as representing the popular sentiment of the country, postal card tickets with the following two propositions were sent:

"Do you favor absolute closing of the Exposition on Sunday?

"Do you favor opening the Exposition on Sunday with a cessation of machinery, merchandising, and unnecessary labor?"

Nothing in the way of argument pro or con was sent with the cards, the whole matter being left in a purely unprejudiced light.

Of 2,758 answers received there were voting for the first proposition 756; for the second proposition there were 2,002 votes, giving a ratio on the entire vote of 72½ per cent in favor of open gates and a quiet Sunday Fair. From the different states the percentage on the entire vote received in favor of repealing the closing clause was as follows:

Alabama	75 1-7	Nevada	75
Arizona	75	New Hampshire	64 1-7
Arkansas	78 1-5	New Jersey	67 1-5
California	77 1-2	New Mexico	75
Colorado	78 1-5	New York	68 1-2
Connecticut	74 1-10	North Carolina	64
Florida	60	North Dakota	78 1-4
Georgia	75	Ohio	62 1-8
Illinois	71 1-2	Pennsylvania	71 1-2
Indiana	66 1-6	Rhode Island	68 1-4
Iowa	75 1-9	South Carolina	72 1-7
Kansas	75 1-7	South Dakota	76
Kentucky	74 1-7	Tennessee	78 1-5
Maine	64 1-2	Texas	74 1-2
Maryland	80	Utah	100
Massachusetts	69 1-2	Vermont	65 1-8
Michigan	76 1-6	Virginia
Mississippi	71 1-4	Washington	77 1-2
Minnesota	79 1-3	West Virginia	83 1-3
Montana	81 1-8	Wisconsin	76
Missouri	74 1-7	Wyoming	71 1-4
Nebraska	82 1-3

In concluding the report the committee says:

"We hav taken, so to speak, crude portions of the public sentiment from every state and section of the country, making the rule apply to small cities particularly, as it is here the stricter sentiment of Sunday observance is admittedly the strongest. We furnish in this what we truly believe—and what in the commercial world would be exact knowledge—is an average expression of the will of all people on the question of Sunday and the World's Fair. No fairer nor more unprejudiced and unbiased plan for securing an expression from the people could be devised; for on such tests the industrial trades, produce, and commerce of the world is carried on with absolute security. We submit the results to those concerned in confidence of their reasonable consideration."

The committee making the report includes Mayor Washburne, Postmaster Sexton, James W. Scott, and Rev. Dr. Thomas.

Working for Justice.

From the Stockton, Cal., Independent of November 29th.

Notwithstanding the rain Sunday night S. P. Putnam had a fair-sized audience in the Avon Theater to hear his lecture on the World's Fair. Mr. Freeman, of the Liberal League, who introduced Mr. Putnam, apologized for the necessary omission of the singing. Two important members of the maennerchor had gone to a wedding festival and were unable to return in time, and the singing could not proceed without them.

Mr. Putnam spoke without notes, and told how Congress came to insert the Sunday-closing proviso in making the appropriation for the World's Fair, and said that Congressmen had been bulldozed and blackmailed into passing it. He read the resolutions of workingmen's organizations in favor of keeping the Fair open, and said the churches had practiced false pretenses to influence Congressmen to close it. Petitions sent from Ohio and Pennsylvania purported to represent more petitioners than there were inhabitants in those states, and one from California contained the names of men that were dead before the petition containing them was drawn. He showed that only twenty-one million of the inhabitants of the United States were nominally Christians, and that forty-two million must, of course, be non-Christian, and said that this showed that the United States was not a Christian country. He added that the Declaration of Independence only mentioned God once, and the Constitution not at all. A decision of the United States Supreme Court had pronounced the country Christian, but it went outside the law and back to the fact that Ferdinand and Isabella, Christian monarchs, had commissioned Columbus to discover the New World. To do so that tribunal ignored a plain provision of the Constitution, and Congress had done likewise by legislating in recognition of the so-called Christian Sabbath, established by Constantine, one of the most cruel of all tyrants. Jesus did not establish Sunday as a Sabbath and Paul told the Romans not to contend about the subject. For three hundred years Sunday had been observed as a feast day, not as a Sabbath, and there was no warrant for it as such until Constantine proclaimed it.

At the close of the lecture petitions for opening the Fair gates were signed by large numbers, and Mr. Putnam announced that he was going to Washington to labor for the repeal of that part of the law closing the Fair on Sunday.

Before the lecture began W. F. Freeman presented the following resolutions which had been adopted by the Turn Verein and Liberal League, and they were adopted unanimously:

WHEREAS, The Congress and Senate of the United States hav surpassed the powers delegated to them by the Constitution in attaching to their appropriation to the World's Fair the proviso "that the exhibit be closed on Sunday;" and

WHEREAS, Deeming such legislation dangerous in the extreme, affording as it does a precedent which will lead to greater abuse of power in the same direction, and practically tending to a union of church and state; therefore be it

Resolved, That we earnestly and emphatically condemn the action of our constituted authorities at Washington as hasty, ill-advised, and reckless, and respectfully urge that they reconsider the aforesaid objectionable proviso, and take such actiou as will cause it to be expunged from the bill, thereby showing to the world that in the United States, the boasted land of religious liberty, religion can and must be maintained without the aid of political legislation by the government.

The Freethought Federation of America.

Minneapolis has been called the Queen City of the Northwest, and not without good reason. Here, amid the snows and ice of winter, such winter as is unknown to the southern and eastern portions of our country, is a busy, bustling people, full of life and energy, made up of that activity of purpose that has made the American nation what it is to-day. Here, in the grand march of civilization, what was a few years ago a vast wilderness of forest growths has been built to a grand city of two hundred thousand inhabitants, the push and the enterprise of whom are excelled nowhere in the United States. In place of forest trees we find huge and massiv business blocks. The hum and the whirl of machinery has taken the place of the rustling of leaves as the winds blew through the forests. Here, upon the banks of the Mississippi stretching away upon either side, is a grand example of human art and industry in bringing together in one grand center large business enterprises and commercial activity of every description. Minneapolitans did not succeed in nominating our next president, but they hav succeeded in getting the latest United States cruiser named after the city; and the Minneapolitans are made up of that kind of stuff that we need not be surprised should they urge Uncle Sam into a naval encounter, just to try the new ship and to see what she is made of. The rivers and lakes are all frozen over and covered with a thick mantle of ice. Over its surface the skaters skim with ease and grace. Racing with ice yachts is a sport heartily enjoyed in this country. They are built, and rigged with masts and sails, like an ordinary yacht, but are provided with runners; these, placed upon the surface of the ice, with their sails unfolded to the breeze, glide along at an exceedingly rapid rate. The ice offers less resistance to the progress of these boats than if they were placed in water, so that a very little breeze will carry them rapidly along. I was met at the depot by Charles Lownd, who immediately took charge of me, and made me his guest while in the city. On Sunday afternoon we pay a visit to the Minnehaha falls, now immortalized by the poems of Longfellow. It is a grand and imposing sight. The waters fall for a distance of nearly forty feet, and upon every side are to be seen gigantic pillars of ice, whose varied hues make them glow with many colors. They resemble huge stalactites, down the sides of which rushes the water with mighty force, send its spray all around, and this falling upon the trees and shrubs forms there a coating of ice which makes them look like crystals in the sparkling sun. We next visited the lake in Central park, which fairly swarmed with skaters. It is exhilarating sport, and I could scarcely help breaking the tenth Commandment, just for a few minutes. I felt as though I would rather be a skater just then than a lecturer. Eventually, as I could not resist the temptation—and in this respect I did not differ from the "first man"—I tried it. Some of them were cutting fancy figures on the ice, so did I. Mine were not fancy. My figures resembled a "dot and carry one." They came near having to carry me. Mr. Lownd assured me that I had done first-rate, considering my inexperience, but I only wished that I might hav done better.

Sunday morning I went and heard the Rev. Mr. Simmons deliver a grand address upon our public-school system in the Unitarian church, and in the evening I went to the People's Meeting and heard the Rev. Mr. Sample. The former was the more scholarly discourse, and Mr. Simmons should receive the support of the most heterodox people in this city. I did not lecture here at all, the time being too short to make any arrangements for an independent meeting, and, although Mr. Lownd had made strenuous efforts to secure me an engagement at the two meetings mentioned above, he was unsuccessful, I being unknown to the directors. However, I was assured of a hearing the next time I visit Minneapolis.

Several petitions upon the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday were circulated, and a large number of petitions is expected from this city. The great majority of the people here are decidedly in favor of such opening. The local press expressing the views of the people is explicit upon this subject.

I was pleased, indeed, to meet with such sturdy Freethinkers as Mr. Lownd; G. Cox, late of Vancouver, B. C., now a resident of this city, whose efforts in the cause of Freethought are too well known by his friends to need comment. Messrs. Macomber, Cooper, Pierce, and Dr. Clark make up the Liberal vanguard, all of whom treated me with the utmost respect and consideration. "All good things must come to an end," says the proverb; so did my visit to Minneapolis. So, bidding good-bye to my new friends, I plunge farther into the snowy regions of the Northwest, en route to Crookston, where I am billed for two lectures. Crookston has a population of about three thousand, and is situated in the Red River valley. Its population is made up largely of the Scandinavian element, which is Liberal in the extreme. This little Minnesota town is fairly alive with Liberals, which speaks well for the value to this country of the Scandinavian people. My advent had been eagerly anticipated, and I soon found myself amid a host of friends, who could not do too much to make me welcome to their town. The Freethinkers here hav a large influence in the political issues of the district, and, working upon the plan laid down and urged by the Federation, they hav been preëminently successful in their endeavors. The Freethinkers, fusing with the Populists, hav succeeded in electing three well-known Freethinkers to office—namely, H. E. Boen, the new Congressman-elect; Frank Ives, judge of the district court, and A. R. Holston, county attorney. Here is a splendid achievement, and now will the Freethinkers in other parts of the country take these gallant workers in our vineyards as their exemplars and work to accomplish the same end? J. O. Matthews, the deputy county treasurer, is also an avowed Freethinker, and places himself upon the list of THE TRUTH SEEKER subscribers. William Münch follows suit and sends in his subscription also.

My first lecture was received by a large and enthusiastic audience, which frequently manifested its appreciation of the lecture. Upon the second night the hall was filled to its utmost capacity, and to add to the attraction the local Baptist preacher had ventured into the lion's den and attempted to muzzle him. He had been induced to this by one of his friends and supporters, but I venture to think that the preacher, when he got home, uttered a fervent prayer for the "Lord" to save him from his friends in future, especially when a Freethought lecturer is in the arrangement. The reverend gentleman made the poorest attempt to defend his cause of anyone I hav yet encountered. Nevertheless, it served as an interesting feature of the meeting, and his discomfiture became the talk of the town next day. Freethought is in the air. At every street corner may be seen groups of people discussing the topic of the day. And the largest hall in town will hav to be engaged the next time a Freethought lecturer visits this town. Thirty stanch and enthusiastic Liberals placed their names upon the roll of the Federation. World's Fair petitions are being circulated and Freethought is being pushed forward in this town with a vim and enthusiasm that cannot fail to win.

Andrew Steenerson got out his sleigh and, with a splendid team, took me for a ride upon the vast and almost boundless prairies of Minnesota. On and on we sped, over the broad, snow-covered plains. The temperature almost froze our breath, and long ere we returned the horses were covered with a hoary frost where the perspiration had been turned to ice upon them. It was a cold ride, but bracing. I thoroughly enjoyed it, and it gave me an immense appetite for supper.

Ole E. Hagen is among the foremost in our ranks here. Of Norwegian birth, yet a true American and a brave Freethinker, he has labored upon several journals in this portion of Uncle Sam's territory, but his views became too Radical for them. He has written and published two pamphlets in the Scandinavian tongue entitled, "The Freethinker, the Priest, and the Sexton," and "Priestcraft and Churchcraft." Mr. Hagen gave me fifty copies of these pamphlets, the proceeds of which are to be given to the Federation. Their price is fifteen cents each. Any of our Scandinavian friends who may desire one or both of these pamphlets, written in their nativ language, may hav the same by applying to me at the headquarters of the Federation.

Ole Hagen, Andrew Steenerson, Elias Steenerson, and several others whose names I cannot now recall, are to be found ever ready to welcome the Freethought pilgrim as he journeys to and fro upon the face of the earth. Our friends here were so gratified with the result of my lectures that they wanted some more. I could not conform to their wishes, for other engagements called me away; and as much as I would like to hav given them another talk, or even to stay a little longer in their midst, I must obey the call of duty's voice and journey on to other fields. Amid farewells I leave this host of friends and once more resume my journey into North Dakota.

Several Freethinkers hav written me, and others hav expressed their views personally, upon Freethought headquarters in Chicago during the World's Fair. They desire some place wherein accommodations for Freethinkers can be made, and wherein the friends of our cause from all the parts of the globe may meet and congregate together in the bonds of friendship. Undoubtedly many Freethinkers will visit the Fair, and an enormous sum will be required to safely carry one through the extortionate rates of hotelkeepers or those who hav rooms to rent. Hotel rates and prices of accommodation will be doubled, and in some cases trebled, and what we now propose is to lease some building during the continuance of the Fair, fit it up for as many as it will comfortably accommodate, and then we shall hav a place for Freethinkers to come to, and where they can obtain accommodations at ordinary rates without any attempt at extortion. This will cost money, of course, but if a few Freethinkers of means can be found who are willing to assist in this scheme it can easily be done, and at the conclusion of the Fair their money will be returned with a good dividend. The rooms could be engaged in advance, whenever one could be found empty, and as soon as one stepped out another would step in, so that the place would always be occupied and failure would be impossible.

Now, how many of our rich Freethinkers are willing to undertake their share of this process? How many desire to see Freethought headquarters in Chicago during the Fair? It is now time to cease talking about it, to cease saying just how much you would like to see this done, and come down with that assistance that makes the project possible. The Federation will do its share. We are willing to manage the concern and do our utmost in that direction. Will you do yours? Six or seven thousand dollars will be required to make the move a success. A start could be made with half that amount, and how many are ready to put up a share in the Freethought headquarters? It cannot be done without financial assistance, and unless we get it as speedily as possible it will be useless talking further upon the subject. Let us hear from you. Those who will help us to sustain the cause of Freethought may send their names to me, with the amount they will invest, and which shall be published in THE TRUTH SEEKER'S columns from time to time.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH,
Sec. Freethought Federation of America.

What!

I can imagin how a man could be bribed with a dollar or two to vote for a man he had intended to vote for.

Also by the use of a dozen dollars or so, a man in a tight place might be bribed to vote for some one he had not intended to.

I can imagin how by the use of a few hundred dollars a mean man might be bribed to burn another man's stacks or barn; or for a few thousand dollars a mighty mean man might be bribed to murder a fellow-man.

But what tremendous crime calls for the bribe of $2,500,000? Is it possible that noble, honorable men would offer such a bribe as that? Is it possible that noble, honorable men could be bribed into a crime commensurate with such a huge appropriation?

Behold the Congress of the United States bribing the management of the Columbian Exposition into an actual union of church and state!

Behold the acceptance of the bribe by the management and its enforcement of the contract!

Indeed justice has fled from the haunts of men.

For shame, for shame, for shame!

Maud: "Mamma, please answer me this one question. What is a spirit?"

Mamma: "Why, Maud, I can't explain it to you; you would not understand if I did."

Maud: "Oh, yes, I should."

Mamma: "Well, then, a spirit is something you perceive but don't see. Now you don't know any better than you did before."

Maud: "Yes, I do. It's a skunk."

MR. TRUTH SEEKER: Once more
I write to you, as I wrote before.
Inclosed a dollar you will find,
To send me a book of another kind.
The name, the title, you will know,
For I write the name of the book below.
"The Origin of Species" it's to be,
And please be quick and send it me.
It's by Darwin. And don't forget;
For I hav never read it yet.

Will Some Newburgh Reader Reply?

WARREN, O., Dec. 3, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The attached clipping is from the Daily Chronicle, of this city, of November 21st. I hav challenged the truth of the Newburgh incident and called for authentic proofs, but without response so far. I thought best not to allow latter-day miracles to get established by simple consent. I wrote to the mayor of Newburgh, but that courteous official has done nothing but preserve the stamp inclosed him for reply. If I can procure a few short letters from prominent Liberals of Newburgh, N. Y., I hav permission to publish them. D. MCLAREN.

The meeting Sunday night at the Presbyterian church was the most interesting one yet. Mr. Potter spoke of an Infidel club in Newburgh, N. Y. He said these men burnt the Bible, baptized a cat, and gave communion to a dog, and the same night two died in bed, and one had a fit and died, and within five years two starved, seven were drowned, eight shot, five committed suicide, seven went to the gallows, and one froze to death, while three died what were called accidental deaths.

The First Women, and a Brooklyn Misstater of Facts.

MILLEDGEVILLE, ILL., Dec. 5, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I see a great many comments on the two first chapters of Genesis in regard to creation, and I hav never seen any mention made of how many women there were on earth before there was one born of woman. I hav taken some trouble to figure on the subject, and I can make out five. First, God created man and woman. That is one. That one is never mentioned again. Next he made one out of a rib. That is No. 2. Then Cain emigrated to the land of Nod and got him a wife. That makes three. Then one of Cain's sons took two wives. That makes five. Now, I defy any priest or parson to prove the above false. I hav asked several church people how many women there were before there was one born, and everyone would say, "Why, there was one, of course." And then I would say, "There were five." Then they would say that I could not prove it by the Bible. Then I would get the old novel and read the two first chapters of Genesis and make them keep count, and when I got through just see how they would twist and squirm and try to lie out of it. But facts are stubborn things.

I was reading in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 3d your account of Russia. I had just finished reading Talmage's sermon about the same country. Now, if you hav not read it I wish you would. I read it in the Toledo Blade of November 24th. Either he is an awful liar or there is a misstatement somewhere. According to all accounts I hav read about that country, it is the worst-governed land on earth. But according to holy Talmage it is one of the best-governed countries in Europe. He says the Russian people just worship the emperor. He says in another sermon in the same paper that in twenty years Russia has only transported to Siberia 443 prisoners, and those that hav been sent there are well treated and hav a good chance to better their former condition in life. Now what do you think? I think I would help pay the Rev. T. D. T.'s fare to that blessed Siberia provided he got the same treatment that those convicts get. Yours for civil and mental Liberty,

M. H. WILLFONG.

Christianity Persecuting the Vicious Whom Its Ignorance Has Bred.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Dec. 3, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Our ministers in this city hav got a good fit on the last few weeks and hav compelled our mayor to issue orders to close up the city disorderly houses and put the prostitutes out on the streets without one day's notice or any provision to giv them homes or any place to stay or get a meal. They use them more like cattle than human beings. These are the so-called heads of the Christian church, and the so-called followers of the man that did not hav where to lay his head and the man that was not ashamed to talk to the fallen women of his day and told the mighty braves of his day, "You that hav no sin cast a stone at her." He did not try to chase her off the earth as the fanatics of Pittsburgh are trying to do. The Rev. Mr. Donehoo says that the Infidelity of our people is to blame to a certain extent. Would the reverend gentleman tell us what caused the prostitution back when Jesus told the man without sin to cast a stone at her (John viii, 7)? He might also answer at the same time what effect Infidelity had on the harlots in Rahab's time. They lived in the city at that time, and they were all the people in the city that the Lord or Joshua could trust to deliver his chosen people. Now, this fight against the prostitutes by the ministers shows that the ministers hav lost their grip on the people, and the church God has also lost his grip of superstition and fear on the people. This raid on the magdalens is not to fill heaven with them, but the church God and the priests and preachers now call on the strong arm of the law to drive them into the churches to help fill the contribution-box. That is the strong power that is making the magdalens get out of the city or reform and go to church. They, the preachers, ignore the teaching of the scripture altogether: "No man can come to me except the father draw him" (John vi, 44). Now, the actions of these fanatics prove that their church God is not able to draw them or that he is too slow for them to wait till he is ready to move them. I do not know of any commandment in the book that tells them to persecute the bad to drive them into the kingdom. Now, this man that the preachers profess to follow was not afraid of being polluted by living in the same city with them, and the book that they claim is filled with his sayings says: "I say unto you that the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom before thyself," righteous preachers (1 John xxi, 31).

I hav been trying to get some of the good people of this section to take the Bible Picture Book and to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER. But I hav had no success as yet. Many are willing to read books and papers if you hav them. They hav mine nearly worn out.

DELMONT JONES.

The Election.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Nov. 27, E.M. 292.

MR. EDITOR: As various persons and papers hav given the reason of Harrison's defeat, I will giv one. The administration in its foreign policy has been all that any American citizen could wish for, but its home policy has not been up to the standard of American citizenship, from the fact that the president could hav released E. H. Heywood from the prison in Massachusetts, and he could hav released Moses Harman from the Kansas prison, but he turned a deaf ear to the demands of justice, and in the interest of the hierarchy, Anthony Comstock, John Wanamaker & Co., has left such men to suffer in prison, who are better men than their persecutors. This is one of the very potent reasons of Harrison's defeat. There are a great many people who are called Freethinkers in this country that hav heretofore been Republicans but think too much of justice and humanity to silently submit to the wrongs perpetrated on innocent men on account of their belief or unbelief. The Freethinkers are very conservativ. They accord to all persons the rights and immunities they claim for themselvs. Hence they hav kept their mouths shut and hav not been very vociferous in behalf of Harrison's election. The Constitution of the United States says that Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of any religion or the abridgment thereof, and we want that to be so in fact, but when the administration uses its power in behalf of the priesthood and for the furtherance of the Christian or any other religion, then all Freethinkers enter their protests, and hence their action in the present campaign.

We want total separation of church and state in fact. We want the church taxed just the same as our knives and forks that we eat with. We want the abolition of all sumptuary laws; also of all Sunday laws as a religious institution.

In fact, we want fewer enactments of legislatures. We think the legislature or Congress that would repeal some of the obnoxious laws now on the statute-books would immortalize itself. We want laws the masses respect; others are a dead letter. We want "liberty for man, woman, and child;" and we want it understood when we say "liberty" we do not mean license to do wrong to our neighbor.

President Harrison had the prestige of the government patronage, and thereby was nominated. He had the prestige of having been elected four years ago. And yet he was badly beaten this year, and as we said, the above are some of the reasons. The people hav been thinking for themselvs and they hav made up their minds that you cannot make people good by law. You cannot make people pious by keeping some of the best in prison.

There are other very plain reasons for Harrison's defeat. One is, he affixed his signature to the law closing the World's Fair on Sunday in the interest of Wilbur F. Crafts and a part or fraction of the church, and against the interest and welfare of the laboring man who has made it possible to hav a World's Fair and who cannot spend the time to go and take his family on any day except the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday. It is a well-known fact that rich people do not need legislativ favors. But it seems that the workers of our country hav no rights that church and political bigots will respect. And the only recourse they hav left is the ballot, and they hav used it this time most effectually for the defeat of the present administration.

Of course the tariff hullabaloo had its effect and was made the question at issue, but it was only fog for the purpose of keeping the real questions from being brought to the notice of the people.

The Catholic and free school question, and the total separation of church and state, ought to hav had a hearing before the people, and will hav in the near future. We will hav to face the music sooner or later, and the sooner the better. We must keep our free school system in the United States intact and not submit to the dictation of the pope of Rome. Otherwise the great and glorious American republic is doomed. G. G. BECK.

We Must Be Our Own Gods.

Dec. 6, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In your paper of Nov. 26, 1892, appears an article asserting the affirmativ of whether or not there is a wise and powerful personality directing and controling the universe.

The author says, "The existence of a supreme being may, I think, be affirmed, if not confirmed and established, by the threefold logic of nature, experience, and history, as well as by the deductions of pure reason and reflection." To support this it is in effect said, first, that inasmuch as the earth and other planets must be supported, especially in light and heat, by another body, the sun; and inasmuch as, inferring from the analogy of the whole being usually mirrored in its parts, each planet should hav everything needful to the maintenance and development of its varied activities; that, if the universe were self-derived, etc., these properties of light and heat not being in fact self-derived on earth, nature compels us to look to a higher source for those material blessings.

Now, considering the universe as a whole, I cannot agree with this view. The whole may be to a certain extent mirrored in its parts, but not necessarily in all. What one portion of the universe lacks may be made up in another portion. But, that matter and natural laws are identical throughout the universe has been proved. Büchner says (Force and Matter, page 96): "Above all things, it [spectrum analysis] has taught us that the mass of the sun contains no other chemical elements in its ardent or incandescent tegument than those which exist in our earth," and mentions several of these elements. In the course of the chapter he proves conclusivly the truth of the proposition. This being the case, it would seem that it was only the conditions in which the earth and other planets are placed through the operations of natural laws which cause them to appear dissimilar in these and other properties to the sun.

I quote again from the same author: "Nobody can comprehend how an eternal and ruling intelligence can be in unison with immutable natural laws. The rule of the former would render the latter useless, while the working of immutable natural laws admits of no exception, nor of any personal interference, and therefore can never be set down as a system of government rule." Again: "While human laws necessarily presuppose a lawgiver or controling will, it is not so in the case of natural laws, which are not imposed upon nature, but are inseparable from and identical with her very self." Another writer says: "He who finds this theory of the universe comfortless philosophizes with wishes instead of knowledge." A natural order of the universe being proved, as it can be, we are placed on a foundation of fact and truth upon which all impregnable theories must rest.

In regard to the worship of nature and of man. Is not the feeling with which thinkers and investigators regard nature, simply a feeling of admiration for natural laws (nature's very self), regarding them as the All, the Whole, the Universe in short? Is not Nature simply a collectiv name given to all the grand natural laws and their operation which hav been, are, and always will be, the subject of investigation and admiration of thinking people? And is not the feeling toward man also a feeling of admiration for so wonderful a portion of universal matter? Is not the worship of nature or of man, as we generally regard worship, or deification, done only by those who hav not fully comprehended the natural order of the universe, those who imagin something as being above or outside the universe and call it God? What leads to the thought that man is or should be deified is that many hav very truly said, that we should regard man's good as the highest good of all. And in this connection it does not seem as though we should consider man's past crimes and cruelties, because it is the more perfect, or what we hav learned to consider the better, part of man that would naturally be deified if any, and not the imperfect.

As to sin and original sin. Sin, according to Webster, principally means a transgression of the law of God; and original sin substantially means nativ depravity of heart. I will take the term God to mean natural universal forces, both physical and moral, forces which act without regard to the wishes or feelings of men. I can then see that the transgression or disregarding of any of these will always work injury to the transgressor. And, if there were any such thing as nativ or innate depravity, the ideas of it would hav to show a universal similarity and hav an absolute value, which they cannot do. We find such ideas, in fact, in the highest degree relativ and changing, so that their existence cannot be proved.

It may be true that no one ever knew "wisdom, intelligence, knowledge, affection, or benevolence dissociated from a being or personality of some sort," but is not that being a human being? And if we hav never seen these in a "perfect and infinit degree" then we hav never seen a perfect and infinit mind, and we can just as well look to an infinit development of mind for these in an infinit degree, as to assume an outside personality and call it God.

In regard to design implying a designer. Would it not be well to prove design before we say a designer is implied? I would here again respectfully refer to Büchner's "Force and Matter," the chapter on "The Fitness of Things in Nature." That chapter is a complete answer to all the arguments founded on design in nature. I will quote, "If matter, as has been shown, cannot exist or be thought of without force, motion, and form, it stands to reason that the genesis and destruction of individual forms, existences, and institutions of nature are a necessary and obvious result of physical existence or of the interaction of natural forces. Not less obvious must it appear that these natural forces by their million-fold reactions must determin and limit each other so that at length an apparent order and design must hav arisen," etc., and the author goes on to say that inapposit and unfitting things must necessarily hav perished by their own defects in the course of time, leaving only the more apposit. And Kant says, "Design is introduced into the world by the reflecting reason."

In conclusion I would say that to me, "infinit wisdom," "infinit love," and "infinit power" are all creations of human minds, "reasoning from the known to the unknown." But I also believe that obeying the natural law of reciprocity (the doing to others as we would hav them do to us) to the utmost degree we will approach "infinit love;" through a knowledge of the universe we will approach "infinit wisdom," and making our best application of such knowledge we will approach "infinit power." A. B. L.

A Personal Experience with the Catholic Church.

HOWICK, CAN., Dec. 12, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Will you lend a small place in your columns to record the death of my father, Benoni Laperche? He died at St. Hyacinthe, Quebec, on the 8th day of December, 1892, and was buried on the 10th at St. Chrysostome. He was nearly ninety years of age. His record is that of an honest, intelligent, and respectable man; but he was born too soon and not in the right locality to become a Freethinker. In conversation on religious topics he showed a keen perception and a clear vision that would hav done honor to a Freethinker, but the old superstition was too deeply rooted. He lived and died what his surroundings had made him, a Roman Catholic. At his urgent request I transported his remains a hundred miles to bury him alongside of my mother. He had had a second wife, but had remained strongly attached to the first. About a year ago, when he requested me to lay him alongside of my mother, he told me he had asked the bishop which of his two wives he would hav in heaven, and the bishop had answered, "The first." This gave him great joy and hope of future happiness, but much anxiety in the mean time as to the possibility of his not reaching that celestial Jerusalem. My father was fairly educated, but, like all Roman Catholics, he knew very little about scripture. He was certainly not conversant with Mark's gospel xii, 25. Whether the bishop indulged in this bit of falsehood from a motiv of kindness to the old man or because he really did ignore what his Lord and master had answered to the scribes on this same question, I cannot say. Either is possible.

This funeral brought me in contact with the hierarchy which I had left thirty years ago, and with which I hope to hav nothing to do for at least another similar period. In the course of two hours I hav experienced all the religion I want for time and eternity! Two hours more would hav ruined me—financially if not morally. My father had been a member of and had paid fees to a religious order half of his life, in consideration of which the church owed him a first-class funeral service. The priest did not deny his right, but he named a long list of ornaments, vestments, and paraphernalia to be used, and ceremonies to be performed, all of which were most essential to giv the funeral a respectable appearance and which he called "extras" and must be paid for. Without these "extras" I am at a loss to know what his first-class service would hav consisted of. Even the tolling of the bells was reckoned among the extras. All the good there was about the whole performance was the music, and he had nothing to do with that, as it was kindly supplied by my personal friends. In this short intercourse with the institution that I blame for all the misfortunes of my life, I experienced anything but edification, but I noticed that that money-making organization which Father McGlynn calls "the machine at Rome" has more than doubled its means and cunning devices to defraud the people in the last thirty years.

After such a long absence from the place, I was amazed to find the friends of my childhood at the point where I left them in 1850. There seems to be no material change, unless it is for the worse. Indeed, they appear to be more tightly chained down and oppressed by the church than they were of yore. I am told they hav one of the most penurious priests of the province for curé. His whole devotion is for mammon and the almighty dollar. They know, by a dear experience, all about his insatiable greed and worldly penchant, and they cordially hate him for it, but they still cling to him as an indispensable evil. Some of them are brave, bright, and intelligent men and women, yet they are unable to catch the idea that such a miser cannot be the authorized agent of God or that the institution of robbery he represents cannot possibly hold its chart from heaven. I do not blame them, as I believe that if I had remained there as they hav I would be as they are. The religious atmosphere is so thick and foul that Liberal ideas can not penetrate through it.

Unlike the intelligent Protestants, there are no hypocrits among them. A conversation with some of the brightest citizens soon persuaded me that they firmly believe what they profess. Even the nine years of adulterous life of a Montreal priest, and the offer made by the press of Montreal to the bishop to point out some more such cases, do not weaken their confidence in the sincerity of their teachers.

This shows what a power there is in early training, and ought to awaken all Liberals to the importance of purifying the schools. The stronghold of the Roman machine is its wise, but wicked, custom of maiming the mind of children into the belief that God so despises knowledge that he punishes with eternal damnation everyone who dares open his eyes and investigate before purchasing, and that he is so infatuated with blind and docil submission to its wicked, oppressiv, and tyrannical speculation as to reward it with eternal bliss in some peculiarly formed castle in the air. The rulers of the church know right well that such an infamy could not be successfully practiced on full-grown human beings. Hence their cunning practice of taking advantage of helpless infancy.

The world is getting civilized in its different parts only as fast as the people are awaking to the importance of taking the care of their souls and bodies in their own hands, and I am afraid this province will always drag a long way in the rear of civilization. In no part of the world can much advance be made so long as parents and teachers hav the right to teach to the young any fancies they only suppose to be true, as being indisputable facts. But this province of Quebec has furthermore to recover the right of individual judgment, of which every Roman Catholic is robbed before he is old enough to know the good of it. Without self-control of individual judgment there is no reform possible in either religion or politics. A great drawback with the French people of Canada is that there is nothing published in the French language but what is especially prepared for them by their oppressiv lord and master.

Yours for light and justice to all,

CHAS. LAPERCHE.

What Spirits Hav Done.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Dec. 4, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In reading the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER I noticed an article from C. Severance on Spiritualism. He claims to hav been a Spiritualist for many years, but only from having been reared by Spiritualist parents and believing in the ism the same as children of Christians believe in Christianity—from having been reared in that belief. He does not claim to hav believed from having investigated the evidences of Spiritualism, consequently his belief had no foundation to rest on. He was in a very different position from one who had arrived at a knowledge of the truths of Spiritualism from long and carefully examining its phenomena. Professor Hare, of Philadelphia, investigated the subject of Spiritualism, believing it to be a delusion, to show to the world in what the delusion consisted, and instead of finding the hoax found a great truth, and like an honest man published to the world his discoveries and an account of the phenomena through which he gained that knowledge. Professors Hare and Crookes and Wallace and Zollner, Judge Edmonds, Professor Mapes, and scores of others that could be mentioned, became Spiritualists from investigation. Professor Wallace did not giv his opinion to the world until he had investigated the subject for many years so that he could giv his views understandingly. Not so with Professor Lancaster, who gave his opinion condemning Spiritualism after having the experience of two evenings at Wallace's house under unfavorable circumstances or conditions.

Mr. Severance makes many assertions that hav, according to my views, no foundation in facts. He claims that "cold Materialism" is entitled to as much credit for freeing the minds of the people from church dogmas as is Spiritualism, which I think is not true. Where "cold Materialism" has freed one, Spiritualism can claim at least ten. Very few of the Materialistic publications, if any, could sustain their papers were it not for the support and patronage of the so-called foolish Spiritualists. Mr. Severance asks, What good has Spiritualism done? He claims that it has done nothing for the world, and that all inventions are made by those not Spiritualists. I for one deny that to be true, and on the other hand claim that nearly all, if not all, of the great inventions are made by Spiritualists or mediums, though they may not always know it. These new ideas or points in new inventions come by impression, as I claim and believe, from spirits. I hav been in the manufacturing of machinery for many years, and hav done my share in improving woodworking machinery. I hav in many instances had the important parts of machines suddenly impressed so vividly on my mind that I could go to work and construct them as easily as though I had made many of them. In some instances I hav been shown in an instant the whole machine. These impressions are always given me at times when I am not thinking of them. If they came when I was studying on the thing given I might then more reasonably take them to be the outworking of my own mind. I hav questioned very many who had invented novel improvements that were very much out of the usual line, and in every instance they were impressions. Some receive them while asleep. Some hav to get up and make a drawing of the thing at once, as they could not retain it until morning. This is not the case with me, as after the impression is once made I never forget it. I can wait for years and then go to work and construct it as first seen. I might giv the conditions and circumstances under which I hav received some, to me, new ideas of improvements of machines, but it would take too much writing. Edison, one of the most versatil inventors of this or any other age, is a medium, and I hav no doubt spirit impressions hav much to do with his many improvements. Professor Morse was a medium and Spiritualist. Perhaps Mr. Severance will say that the electric telegraph is not of much account rather than acknowledge that a Spiritualist has ever done any good in the world.

Severance has made one good point, in regard to the burying alive of many, which I cannot answer as I do not recollect any instance of people being saved that I can giv. I think I hav heard of instances of persons being saved, but my recollection is not vivid enough to giv a satisfactory statement. If I cannot giv instances of saving life under these conditions, I can giv many of those which occurred aboveground. I will giv an instance or two, though I cannot remember names to any great extent. Peter West was a noted medium, and was in the army during the Rebellion. He was going home on a furlough, and when he arrived as far as New York was out of money, as he was, like many other mediums, not very good at making money go far. He got the privilege to ride on the locomotiv from New York to Buffalo and help fire. It was over the Erie. At the point where they were at the time they were about to go round a curve around a hill to where there was a high bridge over a stream. West asked the engineer if there was not a bridge around the curve, and on receiving an affirmativ reply, said that a spirit had told him that a section of the bridge was down and that he should stop the train, which was done in time to save the train and, in all probability, many lives. The passengers were so grateful to West that they made up a handsome purse for him and he was under no further necessity of riding on the tender. In another instance, when a passenger train was running over a Michigan railroad, the conductor saw a spirit come on board, which told him that there was a rail taken up a short distance ahead and that he should stop the train at once. The conductor signaled the engineer to stop, and on stopping found that a rail had been taken up, and the wheel of the locomotiv was within four feet of the end of the rail. Some twenty or twenty-five years ago Abraham James was conductor of a passenger train on the Michigan Central railroad. At that time the track for some distance coming out of Chicago was alongside of the lake on spiles and elevated several feet above the ground. At this time there was a heavy blow from the north, which caused the water to rise and had weakened the support of the track so that the piles one side had settled so much that some cars standing on a side track had fallen over on the track over which James's train ran. He left Chicago in the evening just after the arrival of the express train from the East, and as the track was known to be all right but a moment before felt that all was right ahead. Soon after starting a spirit told James that there was danger ahead and to stop the train, which he did not heed. Very soon thereafter the same warning was given again—without heed, as he felt that the track was all right as the incoming train had run over it so recently. Very soon the voice with much emphasis exclaimed, "For God's sake stop the train!" which he did just in time to save the train being upset in the water. When they stopped they were so near to the obstruction that it tore off one side of the caboose and at the same time injured the engineer's knee severely.

As Severance claims that hypnotism explains so much of Spiritualism, I would like to know how it explains how a musical instrument can be suspended in the air within three or four feet of a gas burner and any tune that the company may call for be played on it, or any accompaniment of any piece played by any one of the company on the piano. How is writing done between two slates that the medium has never seen open or even touched in any way? How are plants, minerals, birds, and small animals brought long distances and brought into the room when the doors and windows are closed? The only way he can get over such manifestations is to deny their ever having occurred. I, for one, know they do, as I hav witnessed them repeatedly. I was skeptical about things being brought by spirits until I had tested them so that I could not doubt. I will mention but one instance, as my article is already too long. I was given a piece of petrified wood about the size of a hen's egg that the medium claimed was brought from Nevada in the vicinity where I owned some mining interest, at the same time describing the locality, when he had never been within two thousand miles of it. I was skeptical in the matter, and to test it I went to another medium, Charles H. Foster. The specimen was left wrapped in several thicknesses of paper. We went into a room in the light with the doors and windows closed, and I held two corners of the handkerchief while Foster held the other two, and while in that position the specimen was brought and apparently dropped as if from the ceiling on the handkerchief. I know there was no trickery about this, as I knew where the specimen was at the time. I would like to giv other manifestations and this one more in detail, but my article is already too long. I hope some other one who is more used to writing than I will reply to Severance. The large part of my life has been spent in using and constructing machinery, so that I am more at home among the machines than I am with the pen. A. H. FRANK.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Recompense.

Never a word is said
Or breathed upon the air,
But the truant voice has sped
To vibrate everywhere.
And it may be in hours of pain
We shall hear it again.

Never is a kind act done,
Or an aching heart at rest,
But like flashes of the sun
It warms the human breast.
And maybe when we need the aid
The kindly deed shall be repaid.

Never a day is given,
But it tones the after years;
Never are acts forgiven,
But the forgiver best appears.
For the love and kindness given to-day
Are ringing the bells in the far-away.

There is no end to the sky,
And the stars are everywhere;
Time is eternity,
And life is full of care;
But golden deeds and words of love
Are boundless and grand as the sky above.

IDA BALLOU.

Our Jewels.

One of our young lady correspondents, who aforetime sent communications to the Corner from a Western town, was married not long since to a young gentleman of Massachusetts. J. W. writes of the couple: "The young people of whom you make inquiry seem to be doing finely. The young lady is educated and accomplished; besides, is a culinary artist and a practical housekeeper. She is amiable and sensible withal. What more could the heart of man desire? If your Corner girls are all the quality of this one, you possess that of which a queen may be proud, and you may well exclaim with that noble Roman mother Cornelia, 'These are my jewels!'"

We are proud of our girls, and our boys, too. They are indeed jewels of the first water, every one. No more intelligent, brighter, brainier children can be found anywhere on the face of the earth. More than all, they are Liberal and thoughtful. They are the offspring of sensible parents, of course, or they could not be the fair-minded, reasoning beings they are.

When we think of the men and women who are to come—the poets, artists, merchants, farmers, teachers, philosophers, preachers of genuin truths, we see a goodly number from our Corner, good men and good women who are to take up the work of this world and carry it on toward perfection, who are to disseminate, far and wide, the seeds of truth and liberty. We see among them those whose names will ring triumphantly down the ages as harbingers of love and good will, promulgators of manifest truths, heralds of wisdom and progress.

These are not only our jewels, but the jewels of the world, whose starry luster, undiminished and untarnished by time and its changes, shines on and on forever, illuminating the aisles of the incoming centuries as well as the present age.

Correspondence.

WANSIC, ORE., Nov. 18, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I wrote to the Children's Corner some time ago and thought I would do so again.

I liv on the banks of the White river. It rises at the foot of Mount Hood in the Cascade range. It is a very rapid stream, and with it carries a very large quantity of sand. About five miles above its mouth is a beautiful waterfall which falls about sixty feet. A short distance below there is another fall. The stream is very narrow here and the water pours over to a depth of about thirty feet. The scene is grand and picturesque. Farther down this empties into the Deschutes river, which is a larger stream and is also swifter and deeper. This stream has a fall of about twenty feet, and here is where salmon are caught in large numbers. The Indians come here from the reservation and catch them with hooks, spears, nets, and in traps. This stream empties into the Columbia river and through the Columbia reaches the Pacific.

I would like to tell you about Mount Hood, but I am afraid I will tire you with this letter. PERCY B. DRIVER.

NOBILITY, TEX., Dec. 1, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first attempt at writing to the Corner. I see so many letters from other boys and girls, I thought I would write also. I am fifteen years old. I am not too old to write, am I? I like reading the Children's Corner very much, for it is so interesting.

School commences Monday, but I am not going. I study history, geography, grammar, arithmetic, and spelling.

There are not very many Freethinkers around here. I hav a brother who is an Infidel, and nobody can make him believe any other way. He has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for four years, but he is not taking it now.

Well, I guess I had better close for fear this will find its way to the waste-basket. I will close, hoping to see this in print.

Yours sincerely, AGNES CAYLOR.

CALVERT, TEX., Nov. 20, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav just finished reading the Children's Corner, and I thought I would like to write a letter. I am fourteen years old, and my little brother Frank is seven years old. Papa is a Freethinker. I go to Sunday-school, but I do not think there is much good in it. Frank does not go to Sunday-school, but goes fishing with papa. I went to hear Mr. Putnam speak and I like that kind of preaching. My grandma is a great Methodist, and says she thinks papa talks very foolishly. When Mr. Putnam spoke here he dined with us the following Sunday. I hope the World's Fair will be kept open on Sunday because I want to go. We do not hav any Bible-reading or prayers in our school, but the teacher makes us quote verses from the Bible. One of my classmates said this verse, but it was not taken out of the Bible. It was:

Good God of love,
Look down from above
And pity us poor scholars.
We hav a fool
To teach our school,
And pay him sixty dollars.

If my letter escapes the waste-basket I will take courage and write again.

Your little friend, LULU BAINUM.

[We hope the above quotation was not repeated in school, for it would be very rude and insulting to the teacher. We must be respectful and polite to all. We shall be pleased to hear from Lulu again. Tell us about the town of Calvert—its situation, industries, climate, etc.—ED. C. C.]

STOCKHOLM, WIS., Dec. 1, 1892.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Miss Wixon: I am glad to know that you hav arrived safely on American soil again.

I missed the Correspondence of the Corner very much while you were gone, for it seemed to me that all the little friends of the Corner went with you.

I read your letters which you wrote to the Corner and thought them very interesting indeed.

Yes, my mamma and grandpa saw quite a number of icebergs when they came from Sweden. They were off the banks of Newfoundland.

I am just recovering from an attack of the measles, and find it quite lonesome, for I hav to stay in the house all the time.

School closed on account of so many being sick with the measles.

It is very unpleasant out of doors, for the snow is thawing some.

Lake Pepin is all one cake of ice, so you see when I am well I can go skating any time I want to.

If I liv I hope to be an honest, Liberal man.

I do think I can succeed without Christianity—or strong drink, for I think they are twin sisters.

I tried to solve the historical questions in THE TRUTH SEEKER No. 13, but I was taken sick.

I hav a scroll saw and hav succeeded in making a few plain ornaments.

Mamma would like to hav you giv your opinion in brief of the Chautauqua system of education.

With regard to you and the Corner friends, I am, Your Liberal friend,

EVALD B. STROMBERG.

[We trust our friend has quite recovered from measles, and is now able to run out and play. Yes, we did take all the children of the Corner with us in mind, and wish we could hav had their company bodily. What a glorious time we would hav had! An honest, Liberal man—let it be your ambition, and you will succeed in all you undertake. The Chautauqua system is good for those who cannot hav other methods.—ED. C. C.]

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y., Dec. 6, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: We returned home from London yesterday (Monday), or rather from Liverpool, where we took the steamer Aurania, Cunard line, the same as we went to England on. We like it very much; it is a splendid ship.

The weather was not as nice as it was going. We had two very rough days. Ma, Portia, and I were very sick, and we were obliged to remain in our stateroom two days. The waves dashed against the steamer so dreadfully we could not go outside on deck.

Pa is such a good sailor he was on deck every day, and never missed a meal.

We met a young lady on board, a passenger that crossed on the City of Rome the same time you did. If you hav a list I wish you would see if her name is on it—Miss Edith Price. We asked her if she knew you or your sister, but there were so many passengers she could not remember. We only had 60 cabin, 116 second, and 248 steerage. I was sick the first night going from Liverpool to Queenstown; it was rough in the channel, St. George's channel. Queenstown looked so pretty from the ship. We saw such funny sights. Women and men came up to the side of the vessel in rowboats with their goods to sell. Some had shawls, apples, oranges, tin pails and plates, caps, laces, and a great many other things. They tied their boats to the side of the vessel and if one wanted to buy anything they would send it up in baskets. They had some beautiful Irish lace, hand-made. They knew how to charge for their things.

We carried 1,180 bags of mail, and we had quite a large cargo. I will mention a few things: Irish potatoes, dry goods, oranges, figs, cotton mitts, raisins, machinery, drugs, wines, etc.

I hav not said anything about London. I cannot tell you anything, because you hav been there, but will tell you some of the places: Tower of London, British Museum, Picture Gallery, Crystal Palace; saw a dog show and a poultry show. We visited South Kensington Museum, Albert Hall, heard Patti; got caught in a fog; it was so dense had to hav lanterns to see. You could only see your hand in front of you. It was terrible, but pa found his way home; he knows London well. I hope I shall never see another fog like that.

We had disagreeable weather, always raining or foggy. We saw Albert Memorial, House of Parliament, Westminster abbey, St. Paul's cathedral. We went to see so many places I cannot remember them all.

Oh! London is a busy place. You could not describe it if you would write for days and days.

I hope you and your sister are well. I received a letter from a boy in California. He was looking over the back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and saw my name, so he wrote. He livs on a ranch in California with his mother. His father is in Arizona. I was pleased to receive a letter from our Western states. His name is Robert Loose. Perhaps you know him.

How glad our animals were to see us. They knew us just as well as if we were home all the time. The dogs were so glad to see papa.

We are all well and send love to you and your sister. Your young friend,

GERALDINE BROADBELT.

[We are glad to welcome our friends safely home from a foreign shore. We hope you will not go so far again in some time, for we are anxious when you are out at sea.—ED. C. C.]

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

THE adoption in Maine of an educational qualification of the right to vote is causing a crowded attendance of evening free schools.

THE last words of Fred McGuire, hanged at Sing Sing, N. Y., on the 19th for murdering a woman for her money, were the Lord's prayer.

IN Detroit, Mich., Protestants are discharging Catholic employees and boycotting Catholic stores, while Catholics are retaliating similarly.

RABBI ROSENBURG, of New York city, has been expelled from the ministry by his congregation for eating a morsel of ham at a free lunch counter after a glass of beer.

IN Spain, despite the emphatic protests of the Papal nuncio, the bishop of Madrid, and thousands of aristocratic Catholics, a Protestant church was consecrated on the 19th with the consent of Premier Sagasta.

THE Catholic hierarchy in the province of Hungary has directed that in all its churches for four Sundays civil marriage be denounced as concubinage and the children of such marriage be declared illegitimate.

AT Albuquerque, N. M., on the night of the 18th several men drove up to the Catholic church in two buggies and forcing the door entered and "desecrated the statue of Christ" by knocking off the head and one of the arms.

THE will of Mrs. Mary Preston, of Lexington, Ky., is being contested. Late in life she entered St. Joseph's Infirmary and there such influence was used on her that she bequeathed her property to the Catholic church so largely that her natural heirs will litigate.

THE unseating of Member of Parliament Fullam has led to investigations which reveal shameful intimidations of voters by threats of spiritual penalties. The bishop of the diocese in question preached that on a vote against Parnellism depended the voter's salvation. The priests beset the polls and threatened hell-fire to whomsoever voted against their candidate.

THOMAS JAMES, postmaster-general under Garfield, says of the periodical which alleges unfair discrimination by Wanamaker: "I cannot conceive why Printer's Ink should not be allowed to go through the mails as second-class matter. I think the autocratic manner in which that journal has been dealt with by the post-office department is an unjustifiable outrage."

SAM LEE, a New York city Chinaman, was beaten by two Americans, and appeared in court with an interpreter. Lawyer Manzinger for the accused argued that Chinamen hav no rights in a police court because they do not believe in a God. "Do you believe in God?" Justice Voorhis asked Sam. "We are Christians and we know what we are doing," replied his interpreter. The examination then went on.

IT is said that Father Jones, of the church at Canton, Minn., which contained a window bearing so-cal'ed miraculous pictures, plotted with a saloonkeeper who is a pillar of his church to produce the fraud in order to raise money. They went to a photographer of a neighboring town and had the glass treated accordingly. Disclosure of the fraud has led Archbishop Ireland to hav the window removed.

A MAN who has the appearance of a priest is locked up in Long Island City, N. Y., accused of obtaining money under false pretenses. He was arrested on the streets on the complaint of Father John McGuire of St. Mary's church. He was selling religious pictures, and, it was charged, gave as an inducement to his customers medals and copies of the Testament of St. John and prayers, which he said were blessed. The medals were shown to Father McGuire, who said they were not blessed, and he informed the police.

LABOUCHERE, the eminent editor of London Truth, is led by the case of Jay Gould to propose a preventiv of large fortunes. "Were I an American," he says, "I should meet this tendency by a progressiv death duty on all bequests. What I mean is that the duty would not progress on the sum total left by the individual, but on the sum inherited by the individual. Suppose that a man left $10,000,000, and that my progressiv duty doubled itself on every $500,000 inherited by any of his heirs. My plan would work out in this way. If the duty on the first $500,000 were five per cent, should he leave one person $1,000,000 the sum of $75,000 would hav to be paid, $175,000 by anyone getting $1,500,000, and so on, until the effect of leaving an excessiv amount to one individual would be that the state would become the sole heir."

Life of Thomas Paine,

WITH A

History of His Literary, Political, and Religious Career in America, France, and England.

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY,

Author of "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," "George Washington and Mount Vernon," "Washington's Rules of Civility." etc.

To Which is added a Sketch of Paine by William Cobbett.

No real biography of Paine has ever appeared. The so-called Lives of Paine have been mainly the controversial work of pamphleteers, turning chiefly on his religious heresies. Paine was in his fifty-eighth year before he published anything concerning religion, and before that time he had acted an important part in revolutionary movements in the United States, England, and France. But in the religious conflict initiated by him, his political services and military career hav been but inadequately considered. A certain historical ostracism has buried in the archives of various countries a large mass of documents containing records of paramount interest and importance. Mr. Conway has personally searched such records, in Europe and America, and has obtained from these fresh light, not only on Paine, but on various eminent figures in American and European history with whom he was associated. A large amount of unpublished correspondence has been included in the volumes.

Mr. Conway says in his Preface: "In the laborious work of searching out the real Paine I hav found a general appreciation of its importance, and it will be seen in the following pages that generous assistance has been rendered by English clergymen, by official persons in Europe and America, by persons of all beliefs and no beliefs. In no instance have I been impeded by any prejudice, religious or political. The curators of archives, private collectors, owners of important documents bearing on the subject, have welcomed my effort to bring the truth to light."

Two vols., royal oct., gilt top, portraits, $5.

WOMAN, AND HER RELATIONS TO HUMANITY. Gleams of Celestial Light on the Genesis and Development of the Body, Soul, and Spirit, and Consequent Moralization of the Human Family. Collated by Christiana Cawein. Boston: Colby & Rich. Cloth, pp. 180; with portraits of collater and a spirit named Benjamin Haman. Price $1.

This Spiritualistic work consists of communications purporting to hav been made to us who yet feel "this sensible warm motion" by denizens of another and a viewless world. These deliverances deal with high and mighty matters, and promis glorious things.

A pamphlet entitled "Hard Knocks at Christianity" knocks lustily against the ancient superstition. Its 44 pages giv a local habitation to a lecture delivered by R. Wheeler, of Salida, Col. This lecture knocks on the head the doctrin that the gospels are authentic, knocks out the assertion that Christianity is in accord with science, and plants a knock-down blow on the belief that religion is a benefit to man. It is a good missionary document. We wish it luck. It sells for 20 cents, or six copies for $1.

Swedenborg was a man of great natural gifts who was crazed by the Christian religion, and spent his latter life in building huge systems of crackbrained interpretation of scripture. As it is a greater crime to spoil a genius than to ruin an ordinary man, the Christian church should be especially anxious to thrust memory of Swedenborg into the farthest corner out of mankind's knowledge and reproach. Instead of this, the American Swedenborg Publishing Co. shamelessly sends us a book translated from Swedenborg's Latin, entitled "The Doctrin of the New Jerusalem." Its price is not communicated to us. If we recollect aright our last dealings with the old-paper men, we are not astray in awarding to the work a value of one cent per avoirdupois pound.

A promising title is "The Well-Dressed Woman: a Study in the Practical Application to Dress of the Laws of Health, Art, and Morals." The work thus inscribed is by Helen Gilbert Ecob. It is published by the Fowler & Wells Co., New York, at $1. Its 251 pages are neatly bound in cloth. They contain some pictures showing the female form as it should naturally be and as it is distorted by dress. They are moreover embellished with a number of large engravings of pretty women in reformed garbs. The work enlarges upon the effects of the compression of woman's waist, and as the denunciation does not include the pressure of the male arm it likely enough deserves some consideration. There is extensiv condemnation of all the deforming influences brought to bear upon woman's frame, except to be sure that directed to the deforming of her brain by the priesthood. Though the ones treated may not be so blameworthy as this latter which we mention, they perhaps still present a considerable need for reform.

A dog-fancier once wrote to an English gentleman recommending the purchase of a notable rat-dog named Vermin. He stated, with some disregard of spelling and capitalization: "Hit his my umble opinion that vermin would be kapital cumpany for a gentleman, and espeshully as being so liveli, would be found very amusing." We now come upon a book devoted to the urging of this sentiment, that a dog makes capital company for a man. The title-page bears the quotation from Pope:

"But thinks, admitted to that equal sky,
His faithful dog shall bear him company."

The title is, "Where Is My Dog? or, Is Man Alone Immortal?" Its aim is to prove that dogs go to heaven the same as human beings. We cheerfully admit that dogs hav souls just as much as men hav. The volume contains 202 pages, in cloth, and is published by Fowler & Wells, at the price of $1. This book intersperses its reasonings that dogs possess our mental faculties with readable anecdotes. It is written in a bland and pleasant style, the author being a clergyman and having nothing to do but saunter about and squeeze women's hands and pat dogs' heads—and at the time of writing, we suppose, being comfortably full of yellow-legged chickens run down for him by one of his canine friends. The reverend concludes: "I hav shown how the lower animals: (1) Rely upon Providence; (2) How they see the departed. . . . We . . . conclude then that, in common with men, they hav the faculty of spirituality." Yes, dogs are suitable companions for men. They are intellectually perfectly fit companions for some men.

Bennett-Teed Discussion. Between D. M. Bennett and Cyrus Romulus R. Teed. Jesus the Lord God Creator of Heaven and Earth. Paper, 30 cents.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. Bennett and G. M. Mair, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion 2. Miracles and supernatural achievements have been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus. 3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history. Bennett affirms; Mair denies. This is an exhaustive discussion. Price, $1.50.

BOOKS

BY

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS),

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.
Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."
In two volumes, cloth, gilt lettered, $2 50.

DID JESUS RISE FROM THE DEAD?

The evidence for the resurrection is in this book carefully considered, and found wanting. It ought to convince every Christian of the untruthfulness of this alleged miracle, for it is certainly one of the best essays ever written on the subject.
In paper, 25 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science.
In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius.
Cloth, gold-lettered. 75 cents.

ISAURE and OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin
In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Licentiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Absolution; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Liguori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attempts at Continency even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism.
In paper, 25 cents.

Gems of Thought.

ONE hour of justice is worth more than seventy years of prayer. — Oriental proverb.

THE GREAT RIDDLE (BODY AND MIND).

There is a prisoner in a cell;
How he got there no man can tell;
Prisoner and cell may weigh ten stone,
The cell weighs just the same alone.
There does he liv, and work, and play,
And will until he goes to stay;
The cell does move we do declare,
That is what proves the prisoner there;
No eye hath seen him thereabout,
And none shall see when he goes out.
No one hath seen; no one shall see;
Now tell me how these things can be.

THE great men are the heroes who hav freed the bodies of men; they are the philosophers and thinkers who hav given liberty to the soul; they are the poets who hav transfigured the common and filled the lives of many millions with love and song. They are the artists who hav covered the bare walls of weary life with the triumphs of genius. They are the heroes who hav slain the monsters of ignorance and fear, who hav outgazed the Gorgon and driven the cruel gods from their thrones. They are the inventors, the discoverers, the great mechanics, the kings of the useful who hav civilized this world.—Ingersoll.

THE whole history of criticism has been a triumph of authors over critics: so long as criticism has meant the gaging of literature, so long its progress has consisted in the reversal of critical judgments by further experience. . . . The ordinary reader, however familiar with notable blunders of criticism, has little idea of the degree of regularity, amounting to absolute law, with which criticism, where it has set itself in opposition to freedom of authorship, has been found, in time, to hav pronounced upon the wrong side, and has, after infinit waste of obstructiv energy, been compelled at last to accept innovations it had pronounced impossible, under penalty of itself becoming obsolete.—R. G. Moulton.

BUT what precise notions had the ancient nations of these representations [idols]? What virtue, what power was attributed to them? Believed they that the gods descended from heaven to conceal themselvs in these statues; or that they communicated to them a part of the divine spirit; or that they communicated to them nothing at all? There has been much very uselessly written on this subject; it is clear that every man judged of it according to the degree of his reason, credulity, or fanaticism. It is evident that the priests attached as much divinity to their statues as they possibly could, to attract more offerings. We know that the philosophers reproved these superstitions, that warriors laughed at them, that the magistrates tolerated them, and that the people, always absurd, knew not what they did.—Voltaire.

SOME men make their due impression upon their generation because a petty occasion is enough to call forth all their energies; but are there not others who would rise to much higher levels, whom the world has never provoked to make the effort? I believe there are men now living who hav never opened their mouths in a public assembly, in whom nevertheless there is such a well of eloquence that the appetite of any age could never exhaust it, who pine for an occasion worthy of them, and will pine till they are dead, who can admire as well as the rest the flowing speech of the orator, but do yet miss the thunder and lightning, and visible sympathy of the elements which would garnish their own utterance. The age may well pine that it cannot put to use the gift of the gods. He livs on still unconcerned, not needing to be used.—Thoreau.

THE clerics and their lay allies commonly tell us, that if we refuse to admit that there is good ground for expressing definit convictions about certain topics [religion], human society will dissolve and mankind lapse into savagery. There are several answers to this assertion. One is that the bonds of human society were formed without the aid of their theology; and, in the opinion of not a few competent judges, hav been weakened rather than strengthened by a good deal of it. Greek science, Greek art, the ethics of old Israel, the social organization of old Rome, contrived to come into being without the help of anyone who believed in a single distinctiv article of the simplest of the Christian creeds. The science, the art, the jurisprudence, the chief political and social theories of the modern world hav grown out of those of Greece and Rome—not by favor, but in the teeth of, the fundamental teachings of early Christianity, to which science, art, and any serious occupation with the things of this world, were alike despicable.—Huxley.

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

In paper, 25 cents; in cloth, 50 cents.

BIBLE MYTHS,

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

Hindoo Virgin and Child.

The worship of the "Holy Virgin," the "Queen of Heaven," the "Mother of God," etc., which has become one of the grand features of Roman Catholicism, was a tenet of faith for centuries before the virgin now adored was born. In India, they have worshiped for ages, Maha Devi—The Great Goddess—and have temples erected in honor of her. Like her Roman counterpart she is the Goddess with a thousand names. As Devaki, she is the mother of Vishnu, the Preserving god, in the form of Krishna. "The gods, invisible to mortals," says the Vishnu Purana, (p. 502) "celebrated her praise continually from the time that Vishnu was contained in her person." She is represented in Moor's Hindu Pantheon, adorned with jewels, and the infant Saviour at her breast. Bible Myths shows that nearly all nations of antiquity worshipped a Virgin Mother-Goddess.
